THIS volume is one which, although in many respects meritorious, rather suggests than supplies a deficiency. Mr. Henderson, its editor and compiler, died before the sheets were through the press, and, if we may judge by his preface, his work does not claim to be so much a systematized text-book, capable of serving as an adage-dictionary, as the expansion, for the amusement of general readers, of a manuscript collection made for private use There are certain tokens to be found in the volume that its author did not sufficiently discriminate, in the conception of his task, between proverbs bearing the stamp of antiquity and spurious articles of questionable Latinity. To say nothing of the insertion, amid terse sayings of Cicero and Pliny, Plautus and Terence, Horace and Juvenal, of stray bits of the Latin Bible, like Cæco cæcus dux," and "Canis reversus ad vomitum," it will cost any reader with the slightest amount of scholarship an inward pang, as bad as a twinge of gout, to come across such a "proverb" or "quotation" (we give the writer his choice under which head to class it) as "In puris naturalibus," "stark-naked", and "Malo malo malo malo," "I would rather be in an apple-tree than a bad man in distress." And when we add to these solecismal samples of canine Latinity the bad grammar, syntax, or prosody which are endorsed in such sentences as "Ense cadunt multi, feriunt sed crapula plures," and "Nux, asinus, mulier verbere opus habent," enough has been said to caution the unwary against accepting a collection, which has so much of bad and indifferent mingled with a great deal that is sound and good, as one that it would be safe to stereotype, even if we could overlook the defect of references, which, had they been added, would at least have doubled the value and interest of the book. But, to tell the truth, so little has been done amongst us hitherto for Latin proverbs, that severe censorship would be unwise even in cases where there was more affectation than there is here of exhaustive research, and where the premature removal of the author did not condone errors and omissions.

From whatever point of view we regard Mr. Henderson's work, it is clearly entitled to the praise of a good design; it is the first impulse of a movement the result of which must, some day or other, be a satisfactory manual And it has this merit at any rate, that if—as we should infer, though in utter ignorance of his antecedents—the author's Latin scholarship was rather wide and superficial than deep and recondite, he certainly brought to the illustrative part of his work a familiar and ample acquaintance with the gems of English literature. Many a good Latin scholar might be warranted to compile a capital handbook of Latin Adagia, whose lesser acquaintance with his own country's poets and prose-writers would not suffice for adorning his Latin "instances" with the appropriate English parallels which Mr. Henderson scatters not less liberally than discriminately. There is much importance in this at the outset. As far as we know, there is no English collection of Latin adages pretending even to dry and naked completeness; and, if there were, it would need the gilding of happy parallelism from modern languages and literature to make it popular. Dr. Wilhelm Binder's German collection surpasses Mr. Henderson's in giving the authority for every proverb which he prints; but nevertheless his manual is dry and stiff and uninviting, so that only a real taste for research and "Notes and Queries" will sustain a reader through more than a score of its pages. Now the book before us is readable, irrespectively of its Latin. The illustrations spice the text, and, being generally apposite as well as various, conduce to fix the interpretation, and to point home the application. When Mr. Henderson quotes from Lucretius,

> Medio de fonte leporum
> Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus angit, he does not omit to bring to bear on the beautiful original parallels from Gay, Shelley, and Hood, all touching the same chord, all equally telling and apposite. Even such an adage as "Vestis virum facit," which is from Quinctilian (Inst. viii. 5), and represents the εἵματ' ἀνήρ of the Greek, and "the tailor makes the man" of English, Dutch, and German proverbial philosophy, he contrives to cap with a quotation from the pages of our Laureate:—

> Let never maiden think, however fair,
> She is not fairer in new clothes than old.

Sometimes, where the Latin adage or quotation is unauthenticated, we are apt to doubt whether it may not be an afterthought suggested to a cunning modern by a snatch from contemporary proverb-lore, or poetry. The proverb given in p. 102, "Equi dentes inspicere donati," "to look a gift-horse in the mouth," looks very suspicious, and, were it not that it may be traced back to St. Jerome, would bear on its face a later date than the rhyming adage quoted by Archbishop Trench, "Si quis dat mannos, ne quære in dentibus annos." And did we not know that the touching sentence "Heu! quanto minus est cum reliquis versari, quam tui meminisse" was in existence before Shenstone's day, who inscribed it on his cousin's monument, one might fancy it an expansion by a modern craftsman of Moore's verses, which our author quotes by way of parallel:—

> To live with them is far less sweet
> Than to remember thee.

Only those who have experience in proverb-hunting can tell what a boon consists in the appendage of even an abbreviated name. It is but the outstretching of a finger-tip, yet it often settles the question of giving up the search, or pursuing it to discovery. Give us the author's name, and 'tis odd if index or glossary cannot furnish chapter and verse. Nay—apart from the [illegible] in and humour. "Slow waters run deep" is traced to the Latin historian Quintus Curtius, whose proverb, "Altissima flumina minimo sono labuntur," is given in p. 18, with a curiously close parallel from Shakspeare. To the same author we trace "the bark that is worse than the bite," 'Canes timidi vehementius latrant quam mordent"; another Latin form of which is Lucan's "Audendo magnus tegitur timor." Sometimes, where an author's name is omitted, something in the ring and rhythm of a proverb helps us to guess it; e.g., in p. 21, we should have little hesitation in attributing to Ovid the pentameter "An nescis longas regibus esse manus?" This is the original of the French "Les rois ont les mains longues," and of Shakspeare's "Great men have reaching hands." But it is helpful to get at its drift from the context, which is found in Ovid's Epistle of Helen to Paris, where the timid frail one is reminding her stealthy wooer that, though Menelaus is abroad, he has plenty of spies about home:—

> Sic meus hinc vir abest, ut me custodiat absens;
> An nescis longas regibus esse manus?

And there are hundreds more of adages and quotations to which it would be exceedingly interesting if we could attach, preferably indeed an exact, but, failing that, even an approximate authority. Towards the end of the volume under review we find "Vino vendibili non opus est suspensâ hederâ," the obvious counterpart of "Good wine needs no bush." The compiler attaches no name to it, and we suspect that the adage in this shape is scarcely of classical mintage. But the allusion is undeniably classical. Roman taverns sported an ivy bush outside the door, in token of the god whose brows its leafage and berries begirt. Kelly, a modern proverb-collector, traces to this custom the origin of our slang epithet, "bosky," and without doubt we may fix upon the modern proverb, as well as its original, the unstrained interpretation, that where good liquor is kept the fact will be known by its bouquet and its good repute, without the instrumentality of any puff or signboard. We could have wished that Mr Henderson had given us a clue to the authorship of "Dat deus immiti cornua curta bovi" (our "Cursed cows have short horns"), or of the more classic-looking adage, "Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdim," or of some two or threescore other unaffiliated saws. Some proverbs carry on their face a post-classical date, though perhaps an ante-classical allusion, as may be seen in the alternative for "Deus ex machinâ" given at p 83, "Cum duplicantur lateres, venit Moses"—a proverb which Archbishop Trench compares with "Man's extremity, God's opportunity." And many more are of Greek origin. We do not mean those which Roman industry borrowed in classical times, in common with much more of its literature, from Greece, and of which the pages of Plautus will exhibit endless examples, but scraps from Latin translations of Greek phrases, due to the diligence of Erasmus and searchers of his date, such as are "Asini vellera quærens" (p. 28), referable to the [illegible] of Aristoph Ran. 186, or "Ignavis semper feriæ," the Latin version of ἀεργοῖς αἰὲν ἑορτά in the 2[illegible] verse of the "Gossips" of Theocritus. But readers, learned [or] unlearned, will meet in this volume a host of Latin prov[erbs] with which they will be entitled to claim acquaintance through intimacy with their offspring. Quinctilian's neatly-turned adage 'Celerius occidit festinata maturitas," is the earlier type of our coarser proverb, "Soon ripe, soon rotten." Publius Syrus is entitled to the parentage of a whole string of English saws, such as "Good company on a journey is worth a coach," from his bequest to posterity of the most true and trite maxim, "Comes jucundus in viâ pro vehiculo est"—a maxim which the genius of Shakspeare appreciated and reproduced in other places, as well as in his admirable stave, "Jog on, jog on the footpath way." Cicero's "Arcem e cloacâ facere" (Pro Planc. 40, § 95), "a citadel out of a sewer," or, as Mr. Henderson puts it, "a palace of a pig tye," will come home to us as an early edition of "the mountain of a mole-hill." The phrase, "Duos parietes de eâdem fideliâ dealbare," from the same writer's Epistles (Ad Fam vii. 29 fin.), correctly translated, "to wash two walls from the same lime-pot," is, like that of Plautus (Cas II. viii 40), "In saltu uno duos apros capere"—our own "killing two birds with one stone," in another and a more expressive dress. Strange to say, the editor does not credit either of these adages to its owner. In Cato's "Homines nihil agendo discunt male agere," we see the germ of Dr. Watts's admonition anent idle hands, though his wording is rather after the manner of St. Jerome's variation of the same maxim—"Facito aliquid operis ut semper te diabolus inveniat occupatum." In the o'er-true word of Cicero (De Invent. i. 56) quoted at p. 195, "Lachrymâ nihil citius arescit," is found the unwitting ancestor of Byron's "Fresh tears may dry the bright blue eye," and the mimic, Publius Syrus, in his "Casta ad virum matrona parendo imperat," is beforehand with our adage about "stooping to conquer."

There are one or two conspicuous omissions in this collection, for which amends might be made without adding to its bulk, if the publishers would retrench with judgment the superfluous and superogatory matter of the present volume It ought, for instance to contain Cicero's "Epistola non erubescit," an adage that has its children in the French and Italian literatures It ought still more to include so telling a variation of "Out of the frying-pan into the fire," as "De calcariâ in carbonariam decurrere," from Tertullian's De Carn Christ, for it is a better counterpart of our English adage than "De fumo in flammam," p. 77 And we marvel yet more that Mr. Henderson should have overlooked the Latin form, due to St. Jerome, who got it from the Greek of Plutarch, of the modern saw, "Nobody knows where the shoe pinches so well as the wearer," "Nemo scit præter me ubi soccus me premat" (Ad Jovin. i. 29). A reference to Plutarch will show that the saying originated with Æmilius Paulus, who when his friends blamed him for divorcing his wife and giving no reason for so doing, pulled off his shoe and said, "Is it not handsome? is it not new? yet none knows where it wrings the foot but he that wears it."

It is because by many Latin and Greek proverbs of antiquity hangs just as quaint a tale as this, that it is to the interest of all friends of literature to call for as good and gossiping a manual of the proverb-lore of each language as can be made. As we said at starting, this volume can only be regarded as a first move in the right direction, and its value lies rather in its apt parallels than in its far from exhaustive or discriminative list of originals. Nevertheless it is a volume well worth adding to the library, whether for such help as it does afford in tracing the genealogy of a proverb, or for the entertainment of a leisure-hour in the coincidences and divergences of ancient and modern gnomology It is very handsomely printed, and might, with a little pains, be made even more handy and useful than it is in its present form.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. GUSTAVE SERVOIS, the accomplished Secretary of the Société de l'Histoire de France, whose thorough acquaintance with the political and literary history of our neighbours during the seventeenth century is well known, has just issued a new edition of La Bruyère.* Amongst the moralists of the Louis Quatorze epoch none stands out so conspicuously as the author of the Caractères. Pascal is more of a theologian; Nicole is Pascal diluted; La Rochefoucauld's cynicism gives to his pungent aphorisms a disagreeable character; and whilst admiring the truth of some of his remarks, we are offended by the view which would represent selfishness as the mainspring of all human action La Bruyère's code of morality is far from being an easy one, but it allows a little more for our weaknesses than that of Pascal; he combines the vis comica of Molière with the terseness of La Rochefoucauld, and his style has an energy of which very few of his contemporaries can boast. The second volume of M. Servois's excellent edition, just published, contains the last chapters of the Caractères, the posthumous dialogues on Quietism, and the correspondence—if we may give that name to a few letters, chiefly preserved in the archives of the Condé family, and now printed for the first time by permission of the Duke of Aumale. Annotators have, it is well known, endeavoured to identify the persons described by La Bruyère under the names of Theotimus, Theodectes, Diphilus, &c. M. Servois carefully discusses this rather obscure subject, and his appendix gives us a number of interesting details about French society two hundred years ago.

When, between 1820 and 1830, the romantique movement took place in France, considerable attention was bestowed upon the dramatic literature of foreign countries. Few Frenchmen at that time knew anything of German, English, or Spanish writers. Schiller and Goethe had been introduced to our neighbours only through the scanty extracts translated in Madame de Staël's work on Germany, the imperfect version of Le Tourneur was the sole means which those who could not read English had of studying Shakspeare; and, as far as Spanish literature is concerned, Corneille and Molière were certainly far more familiar with it than the contemporaries of M. de Chateaubriand and M. de Fontanes. A complete revolution, however, soon occurred in this respect, and under the name of Chefs d'œuvre des Théâtres étrangers, a collection of dramatic masterpieces was issued, to the intense horror of the enthusiastic worshippers of Racine and Voltaire. M. Guizot took charge of Shakspeare, M de Barante translated Schiller, and M. de la Beaumelle rendered into French some of the principal plays of Lope de Vega. The two first-named portions of the series have retained all their original popularity; but M. de la Beaumelle's share in the undertaking failed to satisfy scholars and men of taste. Accordingly, the present publishers of the Chefs d'œuvre des Théâtres étrangers have entrusted the Spanish dramatist to M. Eugène Baret*, a writer thoroughly acquainted with the style and genius of Lope de Vega; and, if we may judge from the contents of the first volume now before us, French readers will soon be able to form for themselves a really correct idea of his works. Besides a biographical introduction, M. Baret gives us here translations of seven plays, prefacing each of them with a short notice stating the subject, explaining the allusions, and showing how the poet has illustrated both the history of his own country and the manners of his times. We are glad to see that the publishers entertain the idea of reprinting the entire collection of the chefs d'œuvre. Goethe, Lessing, and Calderon are announced as in the press.

M de Pontmartin's Nouveaux Samedis† continue with the same regularity as M. Sainte-Beuve's Nouveaux Lundis, and it is amusing to see the most celebrated literary productions of the day judged from two diametrically opposite points of view. In the present volume, M. de Pontmartin examines the best works of M. Guizot, M. Renan's Questions contemporaines, the novels of Mrs. Craven, and a number of other topics, which enable him to say what he thinks of modern French society, of Cæsarism, Christianity, and democracy. As a representative of the fusion of the two branches of the Bourbon family, with a decided leaning towards the elder one, he takes the pessimist view of things. What has become of dramatic literature, for instance? Thirty years ago the lifeless pasticcios of Soumet and Raynouard were considered masterpieces compared with the monstrous dramas of Victor Hugo and Alexandre Dumas. When, ten years later, the stage was invaded by pseudo-historical tragedies carved out of the Trois Mousquetaires, critics looked back with regret to the days of Angèle and Lucrèce Borgia; now we have got a little lower still, and M. Émile Augier's Paul Forestier makes us long for compositions even half as good as the crude seven-act dialogues which entranced the habitués of the Porte Saint-Martin. The Nouveaux Samedis, though rather onesided in their general drift, are nevertheless distinguished by a considerable amount of sound criticism, and cannot fail to interest the reader.

The ladies ought to club together and raise at least a statue to M Guy de Charnacé Who are those fair ones described in the Femmes d'aujourd'hui‡ under the names of Edith, Armide, Flamen, Manon, Cinderella? We know not, except in the case of the one who opens the gallery; and when we say that even the notorious Theresa obtains from Count de Charnacé a mention which is by no means unfavourable, we shall have given sufficient proof of his catholic disposition. The introductory chapter, entitled "Polyhymnia," is the best in the book; but the most dissimilar and opposite characters are even here brought into close contact—Mrs Craven next to Madame Michelet, Daniel Stern (the Countess d'Agout) side by side with Madame de Gasparin. The dithyrambic style adopted by the author is wearisome by its monotony, and never did any Précieuse of the time of Molière write such amphigouri as we find in the three hundred pages of this tedious volume.

Some one said, a little while ago, that the restoration of the Bourbons had given fresh youth to France, and a critic thereupon remarked upon the strange notion of a period of rejuvenescence connected with a King so gouty that he could not walk, and Cabinet Ministers the youngest of whom was more than sixty. Yet there is no doubt that a new and vigorous life was infused into the French nation when constitutional government took the place of Imperial despotism, and with that life neither the infirmities of Louis XVIII. nor the antiquated notions of his advisers had anything to do. If we wish to form a correct idea of the wholesome agitation which prevailed amongst our neighbours between 1815 and 1848, let us turn to the stirring pages of M. Duvergier de Hauranne's Histoire du Gouvernement Parlementaire.§ The ninth volume, just published, begins with the year 1826, and takes us down to the close of the Session of 1828; that is to say, it places before us some of the most important events which took place during the reign of Charles X. The Greek Revolution and Missolonghi, the efforts of M. de Villèle to re-introduce absolutism, the dismissal of Messrs. Guizot and Villemain, the dissolution of the reactionary Cabinet, and the accession of M. de Martignac—such are the landmarks in this most interesting octavo. M. Duvergier de Hauranne's style is extremely animated; he excels chiefly in describing the incidents of Parliamentary discussion, and in giving us the physiognomy of the several political parties. In this respect he strikes us as far superior to M. de Viel Castel, whose Histoire de la Restauration is too tame and colourless.

The well-known Oriental scholar, Herr von Hammer, many years ago translated into French the poem of Antar. After having finished his version, however, he locked it up, and the pressure of other literary work caused him to forget his endeavour to make European readers acquainted with what may be called the Iliad of the Arabs. Fortunately, M. Poujoulat, the friend and collaborateur of M. Michaud, the historian of the Crusades, happening to be in Vienna about the summer of 1852, saw Herr von Hammer, who presented him with the MS. copy of his translation, leaving him to revise and publish it in the way he thought best. A French work written by a German must needs require a little pruning and correction. M. Poujoulat accepted the tedious task thus laid upon him, and the result is a series of brochures containing the various episodes of which the poem of Antar is made up.* The only complete MS. of the original work was brought from Egypt in 1802, by Herr von Hammer himself; it now belongs to the Imperial Library at Vienna, and fills no less than thirty-three folio volumes, comprising four thousand pages. Up to the present time the poem of Antar was known to French readers only through a few scanty extracts imperfectly translated, and unsatisfactory in every respect. It is obvious that a literal version of the entire epic would be unnecessary, and would only weary and disgust the reader. M. Poujoulat has made a judicious selection from the most remarkable passages, and he has given us quite sufficient to enable every student to appreciate one of the choicest productions of Oriental genius. Three out of the ten parts of which the version is to consist are now published.

If we were rash enough to suppose that no production of contemporaneous French literature could escape us, M. Vapereau's Année littéraire et dramatique† would be enough to undeceive us. Although we knew, for instance, that Positivism had made important conquests throughout the domains of literature, we were not aware that a modern Lucretius was now endeavouring to celebrate in French Alexandrines the approaching downfall of revealed religion and the triumph of materialist doctrines. Almost every page of M. Vapereau's instructive handbook furnishes us with facts which had utterly escaped our notice, and it must be rather galling for authors—who, as we all know, are rather irritable—to believe that, were it not for the Dictionnaire des Contemporains, no one would even suspect their existence. This is the eleventh instalment of a work which will be profitably consulted by the future historian of the nineteenth century; it is arranged under the same heads as the previous volumes, it is equally complete in biographical details, and has those alphabetical indexes which are so useful for prompt and accurate researches.

One of the writers noticed by M. Vapereau is M. Chasles, whom he calls a French reviewer cut according to the English pattern, and about whom we had occasion some months since to say a few words.‡ It is perhaps hardly correct to place the amusing lecturer of the Collége de France in the same line as the contributors to the Edinburgh, the Quarterly, or even Blackwood, although, in his way of discoursing de omnibus rebus, he reminds us a little of our friend Cornelius O'Dowd. His recent volume is a series of short articles so varied in their character that it is almost impossible to give here any adequate idea of them. From a discussion on the present state of Russia and its progress westward, we pass to an interesting notice of Polish poetry; then comes an essay on European caricature, a chapter about books and manuscripts, &c. &c. Encore sur les Contemporains is a miscellaneous farrago containing nothing very new, but written in a light, easy style, and with just enough learning in it to make it worthy of a professor of the French University.

M. Vivien de Saint-Martin's Année géographique§, like M. Vapereau's volume, deserves a brief mention. For completeness, accuracy, and abundance of details, it would be impossible to find any publication superior to it. Not only does the reader get some interesting particulars respecting the most recent travels in every part of the world, but a catalogue raisonné of all the publications bearing upon geography and ethnography enables him to refer at once to any special work he may require, and a number of statistical tables condense the enormous mass of facts scattered throughout the most important geographical treatises and impressions de voyages issued during the course of the previous year. Amongst the names which figure in M. de Saint-Martin's necrological list we find those of Mr. Spence Hardy, well known as an Oriental scholar; Count d'Escayrac de Lautur, whose Mémoires sur la Chine have obtained some success; and Sir James Brook, the Rajah of Sarawak.

On the subject of penal legislation M. Thonissen has written one of the best works which we have seen for a long time.‖ In jurisprudence, as well as in every other branch of human knowledge, it used to be taken for granted that we need not go further back than the Greeks and Romans. The Areopagus and the Forum contained, many people thought, all the original germs of modern law, and no one suspected that we could learn, nay that we had learnt, without being aware of it, anything from Egypt, Hindustan, or Palestine. M. Thonissen has endeavoured to dispel this prejudice; in fact, the two volumes he now publishes leave entirely out of the question both the Romans and the Greeks, in order to deal exclusively with the remoter nations we have just named. As far as Hindustan is concerned, we need scarcely say that the Mânava-Dharma-Sâstra, or collection of laws ascribed to Manu, is the principal text commented on by M. Thonissen; he also refers occasionally to the interpretations and glosses of subsequent writers, and he quotes largely from the code of Yajnavalkya. But at the same time he shows the immense difference which separates the laws of Manu from the rules and observances laid down in later days, and he points out that although the Mahomedan invaders, and after them the Europeans, have introduced new penal enactments of a character which neither Brahminism nor Buddhism ever suspected, yet these innovations are merely tolerated by the Hindus, who still cling enthusiastically to the code of their old lawgiver as to a perfect model which it is both presumptuous and wicked to try to equal. The second part of M. Thonissen's work treats of Egyptian criminal law, and the numerous quotations given at the foot of each page prove that the learned writer has carefully consulted the books of Messrs. Mariette, Lepsius, De Rougé, Oppert, &c., to say nothing of works of an older date, like those of Letronne and Champollion. It is the legislation of the Jews, however, which occupies the greatest amount of space in the present volumes. M. Thonissen has discussed it from every point of view, and, not satisfied with the details supplied by the Old Testament Scriptures, he has gone for information to the Talmudic writings, to Josephus, and to those modern critics who, like Selden and Casaubon, have explained or illustrated the Pentateuch.

At last, after a long interval of suspense, and after an act of petty and ridiculous spite which placed the Government of Napoleon in the most odious light, an absurd restriction has been removed, and the Duke of Aumale is allowed to publish his Histoire des Princes de la maison de Condé.* When the victor of Austerlitz persecuted Madame de Staël and ordered the suppression of the De l'Allemagne, there was at any rate some faint shadow of an excuse for this measure. The seizure of the Duke of Aumale's work cannot be justified on any plea whatever. If it had been the most paltry production imaginable, it would have risen into immediate popularity from the circumstances connected with its appearance; yet it possesses abundant intrinsic merits. The author begins his first volume by drawing a comparison between the leading characters of the sixteenth century and those of the seventeenth. The former—our remarks are confined, of course, to France—stand conspicuously apart by their originality and their independence. Each one seems to bear a stamp of his own, and to be distinguished from all his contemporaries. The latter have a kind of family likeness; they are cast, so to say, in the same mould; and even their genius has a sort of regularity which strikes us as lacking in grandeur and power. The origin of the Bourbon family then comes under consideration, and with the thirteenth child of the Duke of Vendôme we are introduced at last to the chief of the Condés. Every one knows the important part played in the wars of religion by the princes of that illustrious house; they were for a long time the leaders of the Huguenots, and they distinguished themselves both as politicians and as soldiers. The two volumes just published do not take us further than the death of Henry IV.; they include therefore only the biography of the first Condé and part of that of the second. The author has been able to make use of many valuable documents belonging to the family whose history he undertakes to write; some of them are printed in extenso in the appendices, together with other letters and State papers preserved either in the British Museum or the Record Office, and the various collections of Paris or Geneva. The work is illustrated by two maps and two portraits.

The campaign of Sadowa has given rise to a whole library of brochures, two of which are now before us. M. Paul de Katow, collaborateur of the journal Le Monde Illustré, presents us merely with the description of the war, and all the anecdotes he could collect whilst engaged as Special Correspondent of a French paper.† M. Julien Klaczko aims higher; he publishes a professedly diplomatic sketch‡, and he endeavours to trace to its first causes the supremacy which Prussia now enjoys on the Continent. How the question of the Papacy and of French intervention in Italy has been mixed up with the affairs of Germany, and how the Treaty of Villafranca has through a series of complications brought about the present threatening aspect of the political horizon, will be apparent to those who read M. Klaczko's essay, contributed in the first instance to the Revue des Deux Mondes.

M. Fermé has published two small volumes, entitled respectively

Strasbourg and Boulogne.* In reproducing without a word of comment all the pièces justificatives connected with the attempt made by the present ruler of France to upset the throne of Louis-Philippe, he has not infringed the letter of the law; but at the same time he cannot be regarded as an admirer of Imperial institutions when he drags once more to the daylight the antecedents of Napoleon III.

We can here do little more than name M. Victor Hugo's new romance.† There is no doubt that the author of Notre Dame de Paris cannot write a volume, or even a few pages, without leaving somewhere the stamp of his genius. Les Misérables contained several striking chapters, Les Travailleurs de la Mer could boast of many highly-wrought episodes, and even in L'Homme qui rit there is no lack of M. Hugo's usual energy; but, on the other hand, the author's less agreeable characteristics were never, we think, more glaringly conspicuous than in the present work. It is difficult to imagine how a man who has spent so many years on English soil, and who must know something both of English history and of English institutions, should give such a caricature of the reign of Charles II. and of the society of the seventeenth century. But even apart from this, L'Homme qui rit abounds in offences against the true principles of art. The characters are for the most part either unnaturally good or monstrously bad, and the style exhibits all the author's characteristic fondness for incongruous metaphors and startling images.

If we must have sensational stories full of horrors and improbabilities, we should prefer applying to writers who, like M. Gaboriau, aim at nothing else but excitement pure and simple.‡ Les Esclaves de Paris has no pretensions to teach philosophy or to recommend Red Republicanism; it does not form part of a triology destined to illustrate a grand social thought. M. Gaboriau's sole purpose is to amuse, and he does so thoroughly. It is hard to believe that what he calls le chantage—that is to say, the art of worming out people's secrets and trading with them—is as extensively practised in Paris as our novelist suggests, but chantage has afforded the groundwork for two interesting volumes.

M. Louis Enault's Pupille de la Légion d'Honneur§ is a story illustrating the old maxim of virtue triumphing over difficulties, and being at last properly rewarded. Under the title of Un Crime littéraire, M. Gaston Lavalley also has published a novelette‖ which both morally and artistically is quite unexceptionable. We are glad to see a few writers of fiction, at all events, abandoning the traditions of the Feydeau school, and adopting a healthier style.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THERE is reason to hope that the risk of a collision between the two Houses may still be averted. The time which has been afforded for reflection has certainly not in all instances been wasted, and it is believed that some eminent prelates are disposed to restrain the ardour of impetuous laymen. If the majority, under the rash guidance of Lord DERBY, persists in its intention of throwing out the Irish Church Bill, the general duty of the Government will be clear, although there may be some difference of opinion as to the course which ought to be immediately adopted. As a responsible statesman, Mr. GLADSTONE is bound both to give effect to the decision of the House of Commons and of the country, and to save the House of Lords, as far as possible, from the consequences of its own indiscretion, by giving a plausible opportunity for resipiscence and retractation. The preponderance of argument in favour of the Bill will be more overwhelming in the House of Lords than in the House of Commons, because the necessity of ultimate concession is even more demonstrable than the expediency of abolishing an indefensible institution. Lord DERBY's followers have apparently thought that their former chief has still a moral claim to the allegiance from which he formally released them fifteen months ago. It had previously been rumoured that they were discontented with the leadership of Lord CAIRNS, who was content to be the lieutenant of Mr. DISRAELI; and it would have been only by a painful effort that the body of Conservatives could have acquiesced in a measure of which they not unnaturally disapprove. Mr. GLADSTONE might himself feel a certain sympathy for an error which would be logical, if it were allowable to deduce practical inferences from conventional propositions. The two Houses possess equal powers, as two Knights Templars, in the legendary days of their poverty, possessed equal property in the horse which carried them both on its back. It is conceivable that the occupant of the crupper may have insisted on his right to turn to the left, when his partner with the bridle in his hand had already chosen the right-hand track; but eventually he must have discerned the truth of the maxim that one must ride behind. Having liberated their consciences by a protest, the mass of the peers will probably on a second trial submit to the laws of necessity and of nature. As Lord SALISBURY reminded them in a recent debate, the paramount authority rests, not with the House of Commons, but with the nation. Taunts and menaces would only tend to convert useless and obstinate resistance into a point of honour. Some of the volunteer advisers who disguise their counsels to Mr. GLADSTONE in the form of imaginary rumours of his intentions, suggest the extravagant course of a fresh appeal to the country, not on the abolition of the Irish Establishment, but on the existence or constitution of the House of Lords. It is difficult to say whether the dissolution of a devoted House of Commons on a revolutionary issue would be more criminal or imbecile. The figment of a reaction would be for the first time accredited by a wanton repetition of the question which was so distinctly answered at the last election. Violent language in the House, or out-of-door disturbances, would enlist the sympathies of the great body of Conservatives on the side of Lord DERBY and his adherents, although their policy has hitherto been almost universally condemned. When the party which has right on its side happens also to be the stronger, it would commit a great mistake if it were deliberately to put itself in the wrong.

Although a Bill which has been rejected in either House cannot according to the forms of Parliament be re-introduced in the same Session, the Government may by a simple contrivance divide one Session into two. A prorogation, followed by a summons to Parliament to meet for the despatch of business, would enable the House of Commons to pass another Irish Church Bill copied word for word from the present measure; and in two or three weeks the Bill might pass through its stages without renewed discussion. Mr. DISRAELI, who may be supposed profoundly to disapprove of the tactics of Lord DERBY, would not waste time in again proposing the amendments which he scarcely troubled himself to support when the present Bill was in Committee. The marked silence of the Opposition, when Mr. GLADSTONE was welcomed with cheers by his party on Monday last, indicates the general disposition of the House of Commons to maintain its own supremacy in any conflict with the Upper House. If the Bill had been carried by a bare majority, the defeated party would have welcomed the reversal of a doubtful judgment, but no section of the House is inclined to surrender its ultimate control of policy and legislation. If the Bill were again presented to the House of Lords at the beginning of August, there would be a reasonable probability that it would be accepted; and a second refusal would justify the Government in adopting vigorous methods of coercion. It is desirable that as little time as possible should be allowed for agitation in England or in Ireland. The autumn of 1831, after the rejection of the first Reform Bill, was a troubled and alarming season. If the peers persisted in their refusal to pass the Irish Church Bill on a second occasion, the consequences would be scarcely more serious than if Mr. GLADSTONE were at once to postpone further legislation to the spring of 1870. The noisy exultation of the Orangemen might do incalculable harm if they were allowed to boast for seven or eight months of a Parliamentary victory. Even if their patrons in the House of Lords were ill-advised enough to reject the Bill a second time, the certainty that measures would be taken to overcome a factious opposition would temper the enthusiasm of the most reckless partisans, while it would at the same time temper the excitement of party which may find itself for the moment disappointed and baffled.

In the last collision between the two Houses the Lords were on the main question substantially in the right, although it was doubtful whether their unusual interference in financial legislation was consistent with the best constitutional precedent. Mr. GLADSTONE's proposal to abolish the Paper-duty was disapproved by many of his political supporters, and by at least two of his principal colleagues, because the repeal involved a large increase of a deficiency which was otherwise considerable. When the Lords rejected the Bill, Mr. GLADSTONE was eager to fight out the quarrel, but he was firmly overruled by Lord PALMERSTON, who had not approved of the proposed sacrifice of revenue; yet the House of Lords, although it had displayed its power and performed a public service, had little reason to congratulate itself on the result of a temporary victory. In the following year, although his Budget again exhibited a deficiency Mr. GLADSTONE, with the support of the House of Commons, compelled the Lords to submit to the repeal of the duty by including all his financial provisions in a single Bill. In all similar trials of strength experience sooner or later confirms the truth of the proverb that the weaker must go to the wall; and prudence suggests the expediency of evading a contest which has only one inevitable result. But for the wise moderation of Lord PALMERSTON, the resistance of the House of Lords to the repeal of the Paper-duty would have been overcome by some more violent and humiliating method. In the present dispute it would be imprudent to rely on Mr. GLADSTONE's perfect exemption from the weakness of resentment and irritation; and, if the peers are too proud to care for their own safety, they ought, for the sake of their clients, the Irish clergy, to consider that the Minister whose overtures they reject has something of the temperament of TARQUIN's Sibyl. In the present instance, although the display of virtuous indignation and impetuous resolution would be loudly applauded, undisputed command of a great majority ought to produce the cheerful moderation which naturally accompanies conscious strength. It is not impossible that even on the Ministerial benches there may here and there be a certain sympathy with the cause of the Irish Church, if not with its imprudent champions; but every member of the majority holds his seat on the implied or expressed condition that he will help to destroy the Irish Church by whatever methods may be adopted by Mr. GLADSTONE. If there were any doubt of the terms of the bargain concluded at the election, the constituencies would, on appeal, unanimously confirm Mr. GLADSTONE's version of the contract.

It is not even technically correct to assert that the House of Lords possesses equal and co-ordinate power with the House of Commons, for the more popular assembly, through the Minister of its choice, disposes of the prerogative of the Crown which may at any time readjust the balance. By an exceptional and yet legal process, the Government can at any time fill a contumacious House of Lords with a majority of its own supporters. The experiment was practically tried a century and a-half ago, and Lord GREY was prepared in 1832 to repeat it on a larger scale if the mere intimation of his purpose had not sufficed for the attainment of his object. By one of the tacit assumptions which are necessary to lubricate the wheels of the Constitution, it is understood that a Minister shall not, except under pressure of imminent necessity, pack the House of Lords for a special purpose, but the check on his discretion involves the correlative obligation to give way in time. The recent debates on the comparatively unimportant question of enabling the Crown to create life-peers have given the peers an opportunity of reflecting on the character and functions of their House, and thoughtful men can scarcely have failed to arrive at the conclusion that it would be rash to precipitate a dead-lock. The well-known fact that bayonets are never, except by a figure of speech, crossed in battle, is due to an instinct of self-preservation which statesmen ought to possess as fully as soldiers. The weaker combatant only avoids a murderous collision by retreating in time; and in the present crisis the recall ought, if possible, to be sounded before Mr. GLADSTONE has advised the QUEEN to create a hundred peers whose votes may be relied on. It may be hoped, on the other hand, that he will leave an opening for repentance before he finally throws on the Opposition peers the responsibility of deteriorating the position of their order. An extraordinary Session held for the peremptory adoption of the Irish Church Bill would provide a pretext to hesitating members of the party for refusing to follow Lord DERBY a second time to the breach. As the Ministers are not exposed to the temptation of showing deficient firmness, they can well afford to be temperate and courteous, and not even to bare too ostentatiously the steel gauntlet which their adversaries well know to underlie the velvet glove. It has probably not occurred to any politician that the doomed Establishment of Ireland is in the smallest degree interested in the efforts of the House of Lords to prevent or delay its extinction.

CONSERVATIVE PEERS IN COUNCIL.

THE peers under the immediate guidance of Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS have arrived at what is generally thought to be a dangerous resolution. They have determined, if they can, to reject the Bill on the Second Reading. It took the public by surprise to learn that this should be their decision, as it was thought that regard for the interests of their order, deference to constitutional usage, and a perception of what would best serve the Irish Church would alike induce them to let the Second Reading of the Bill pass without serious opposition. They have, it seems, thought otherwise, and there appears to be little doubt that, having made and announced their decision, they will persevere, and will use every effort to throw the Bill out. They may fail, for a considerable section of the Conservative party seems inclined to a milder course, and will either vote for the second reading or will not vote against it. But Lord DERBY and his friends, who have, it must be owned, immense influence with the peers, will get a majority against the Bill if they can. The importance of the step they are taking must, we should suppose, be perfectly obvious to them, and numberless instructors have all this week been trying to bring it home to them. Still they appear to stick to their purpose, and it is not to be supposed that they do so without some degree of thought and deliberation. Passion, pique, and prejudice, the exigencies of party, and delusion as to public feeling, may account in a great measure for their conduct, but they do not account for it wholly. They are to be credited with having some sort of reasons for acting as they intend to act, and it seems to us worth while to examine what these reasons can be. The first thing in effective warfare is to understand thoroughly the position of the adversary, and the supporters of the Irish Church Bill cannot do better at the present juncture than set themselves to imagine on what grounds a Conservative peer, who gave himself the trouble to reason out a defence for rejecting the Bill, would conceive himself to be acting. His reasons cannot of course seem valid to those who entirely differ from him. After every endeavour to do justice to the views which we may suppose to have influenced Lord DERBY, we still consider the course suggested by Lord SALISBURY and Lord CARNARVON infinitely preferable, but it would, we think, be a mistake to suppose that Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS are acting without reasons which, from their point of view, must seem to possess considerable weight.

The first of these reasons we imagine to be, that they cannot bring themselves to believe that they could adopt with success the alternative course suggested to them. What is proposed is that they should allow the Bill to pass the second reading, and then alter its character by amendments. They may very well say that this is an illusion. They hear it proclaimed by the Liberal party generally, and by the Ministry, that no amendment of any importance can be made in the Bill if its general principles are admitted. As Mr. GLADSTONE repeatedly said in the Commons, the whole Bill hangs together. The Lords might of course invent quite a new Bill, and introduce it in the shape of amendments, but they cannot alter the present Bill so as to leave it substantially what it is, and yet, to use a favourite expression of their supporters, "take the [illegible]ng out of it." The Conservative organs which recommend trusting to amendments always use language of the most [illegible]r and the most studied vagueness. They say that amendments must be introduced which will protect the interests of the Church, which will undo the work of spoliation, and so forth, but they never say what such amendments could be like. Amendments like the amendments of Mr. DISRAELI—amendments designed, not to protect individuals, but to give the new Church body a large capitalized fund as a source of perpetual endowment—are the embodiment of a totally different measure from that which has passed the Commons. There might be amendments perhaps with regard to very tiny details, such as an amendment giving over the glebe-houses free of charge, which would not militate against the principle of the Bill, but it would seem such a very small mouse to come out of a mountain if getting rid of a building-charge were the only result of the championship of the Irish Church by the Conservative peers. The amendment which would most please their supporters would perhaps be one altering the Ministerial proposal about Maynooth. But, if compensation is to be given to Maynooth, the Lords could scarcely take their stand against the Commons by insisting that an additional burden should be imposed upon the British taxpayer. If no compensation at all were to be given to Maynooth, which would be the amendment most gratifying to the ultra-fanatics of the party, then either the Lords must propose also to take away all compensation to the Presbyterians, which would be very offensive to Orangemen, or they must treat the Roman Catholics with an odious and offensive inequality which a very little political foresight must warn the leaders of the Conservatives would hereafter be a source of great difficulty to them. If, then, no substantial amendments can be devised, the Bill must be either suffered to pass into law very much as it now stands, or it must be altogether rejected; and, seeing this, those who detest it may think that if a stand is to be made against it, it must be made against it as a whole, and at the outset of the discussion.

In the next place, the Conservative peers may imagine that they are likely to gain more than they will lose by boldly rejecting the Bill. They are invited to pass the Bill because it has passed with the approbation of overwhelming majorities in the House of Commons; but they may say that the worst that can happen is that they will be forced to pass it after a struggle, instead of bowing at once in humble subserviency to the Commons. There is a notion afloat among many of those who form the circle in which these Conservative peers move, that the House of Commons does not fairly represent the nation in this matter. There is apparently no ground whatever for entertaining this opinion. If the constituencies were not in entire accordance with their representatives, they would soon let them know their minds as they did in the days of Lord MELBOURNE, when the attack of the Whig Ministry on the Irish Church was foiled because the Whig county members informed the Government that their constituents did not really like what was being done. Nothing of the sort is going on now, and the electors are in perfect harmony with the elected. But Conservative peers who secretly see and acknowledge this, and appreciate its consequences, may argue with themselves that it is possible the tide of opinion will be turned when it is seen that, to carry the Bill, it will be necessary to resort to extremities in order to overpower the peers. The nation, they may fancy, goes with the Government, because the Government has had a career of unchecked success; but when it is shown that there is a centre of strong opposition to the Government, opinion may waver, and people may ask whether they are really prepared to crush an honourable, independent, and respected body of Protestant peers in order to please the Irish Roman Catholics. Even if the nation continues to support the Ministry, and the Bill is sent up again to the Lords, the peers may say that to yield then will not be the same as to yield now, for they will have appealed to the nation against the Commons, and, if they bow, they will manifestly be bowing, not to the Commons, but to the nation. This, they may urge, will be the course most likely to uphold their dignity, and to win general respect. If they yielded without a struggle to the Commons, they would be thought a set of poor creatures, whose political [illegible] over, and whose constitutional independence [illegible] sham, acknowledged by themselves to be a sham. Whereas, if they show a bold front, they will get credit for their boldness, they will animate their friends; they will assert their title to exist, and if they yield on the next trial of strength to the wishes of the country, they will be regarded with the feelings of respect and tenderness which Englishmen habitually show to those whom they have forced to yield after a fair and honourable contest.

Lastly, it must not be concealed that the Conservative peers think, not without some show of reason, that the Irish Church Bill cannot be taken by itself. It seems to them part of a general series of revolutionary measures that they see looming before them. They think that the Church of England will soon be attacked, that their landed properties may soon be endangered, and that every year changes, all in a democratic direction, will be made in the administration of public affairs. They see dimly a vague immeasurable peril menacing them and their order and their families. They do not know to what revolutions a measure avowedly revolutionary may not lead. Against this advancing power of democracy, against these unknown schemes of social and political change, they feel that they have elements of resistance and a great dormant force in their vast possessions, in the charm of their names, in the traditions cherished towards historical families by a nation passionately fond of its traditions. But if they never do anything, if they let every opportunity of resistance go by, if they do not inspire confidence by showing a belief in themselves, their force may be frittered away before any effective use can be made of it. To be bold—to be even, as others think, somewhat over-bold—now will be true wisdom in the end. They will thus form a body of resistance to violent change which will show its strength in Parliament, and still more in the country, and, by showing strength, will gain strength. They will teach the Liberal majority in the constituencies that there is an antagonistic force to them which is not to be despised. In calculating the political future, the lovers of revolutionary measures will know that they have to deal with a body of men, possessed of vast influence, who are determined to defend their interests. This may perhaps only whet the ardour of revolutionists, but it will confirm, encourage, and consolidate the enemies of revolution, and it will attract some considerable portion at least of that large neutral wavering mass which has no decided opinion, but which always takes care to keep clear of a party that owns itself weak and beaten, and which always in times of panic flies for protection to men of spirit and determination. To reject the second reading of the Irish Church Bill may, therefore, be part of a much wider issue, and be the first step towards organizing a resistance to revolution which, if no such organization exists, will have its own way entirely. Such, we imagine, are the considerations which have weighed with Lord DERBY and his friends, and, although they are not likely to influence persons out of the high Conservative circles, and do not inspire in us a moment's hesitation as to the expediency and necessity of carrying the Bill, yet they are considerations which, we think, deserve some attention from all who wish to appreciate correctly the real nature of the present crisis in English politics.

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS.

THE second ballot has relieved the French electors from the discredit of rejecting the ablest members of the Opposition. M. THIERS will, however, be almost the only representative in the Chamber of the Orleanists or Parliamentary Liberals who alone maintain in France the principles which have for many generations been in England associated with liberty; for the theories of M. JULES FAVRE and of other moderate and sincere Republicans have never been confirmed by practical success. An able and well-known English writer has suggested both ingeniously and truly that M. THIERS and his friends are on almost all practical questions heterodox, if they are judged by the standard of the Liberal creed. They support the temporal power of the POPE and the French occupation; they are hostile to German and Italian unity; and M. THIERS himself is an inveterate opponent of Free-trade and of political economy in general. It may be added that as an historian he has done more than any contemporary writer to propagate the superstitious belief in the First NAPOLEON which was the chief foundation of the revived Empire; yet it may be permitted, to those who have but a faint belief in M. THIERS' political wisdom, to remember that the question is not whether his opinions are to prevail, but whether the policy of France is to be regulated by an Emperor or by a Parliament. If there must be an absolute ruler, NAPOLEON III. is a better statesman than his eloquent adversary; but the EMPEROR and the Red Republican members of the Legislative Body are equally hostile to constitutional government. FOX, who was as ignorant of economy, as factious and as prejudiced, as the most obstinate Orleanist in France, is not without reason regarded even in the present day as the hero or patron saint of the hereditary Liberals. The Parliamentary system which lasted from 1815 to 1848 furnished the French nation with its only experience of liberty, and it seems desirable that the sole survivor of that political generation should have an opportunity of protesting in the Legislative Body against the personal government which has succeeded. It is unfortunate that younger and sounder supporters of free institutions should have discovered, by their failure at the election, how little the educated classes in France are in sympathy with the mass of the nation. Napoleonist peasants and Socialist artisans are equally indifferent to the merits of candidates such as M. ALBERT DE BROGLIE or M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL. They can understand a docile nominee of a Prefect, or a revolutionary libeller, and they like them the better because in their case political sympathy implies no feeling of personal respect. An accomplished gentleman who thinks for himself offers a kind of insult to the popular passion for equality. It is felt that M. ROCHEFORT and M. GAMBETTA, even though they may possess personal ability, are not too proud to express in the coarsest form the anarchical aspirations of the rabble. M. THIERS is probably returned on the second ballot because the Government would have greatly preferred the success of a noisy demagogue. M. JULES FAVRE, himself a sincere Republican, has given M. ROCHEFORT the triumph which AJAX conceded to ULYSSES, of having contended with the greatest orator and lawyer of his party, although he has been ultimately defeated.

The disturbances which have for the first time since 1851 occurred in Paris are rather ominous than formidable; yet the result of the election bodes ill for the stability of the BONAPARTE dynasty, while it is in the highest degree discouraging to the friends of constitutional government. A moderate Opposition, although it might have been unable to extort from the EMPEROR the concession of Ministerial responsibility, would have prepared the way for Parliamentary supremacy in a future reign. The RASPAILS and GAMBETTAS will have no serious desire to reform a Constitution which they propose to overthrow. Notwithstanding the present popularity of their professions, it is scarcely probable that the nation at large has renounced the antipathy to revolution which it displayed twenty years ago. NAPOLEON III. has always affected the character of a champion of social order against enemies whose existence had almost been forgotten. The adversaries whom he had long denounced are now sufficiently visible; but it may be doubted whether he will prefer a life-and-death struggle to a combat conducted according to the ordinary rules of warfare with belligerents who might, at the worst, have been contented with a compromise. The hostility of the great towns would have been still more unanimous if the city constituencies had not been in some instances diluted by the arbitrary inclusion of country parishes in the same electoral districts. Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles have virtually voted for a new revolution; and even in country places the devotion of the peasantry to the Empire is perceptibly relaxed. A Government majority of only three to one is justly regarded by the Liberal party as a check to the system of personal government; but while they celebrate a party triumph, moderate politicians can feel little confidence in the representatives of Parisian Jacobinism. The French Correspondent of the Times, himself perhaps a defeated candidate, draws the true moral from the recent election, in the indignant contempt with which he denounces universal suffrage. Inviting or rejecting the domination of a master, the multitude is always and everywhere opposed to the natural supremacy of intelligence and station. The supporters of the extreme Republican candidates have not even desired to return members capable of governing the country as England is governed by the leaders of the House of Commons. It was hoped that M. ROCHEFORT would be as calumnious and seditious in his speeches as in his printed lampoons, and that, after provoking some act of violence on the part of the Government, he would fulfil his blustering pledge of taking his post in a barricade. The cottage freeholders who follow the village Mayor and the parish priest to the polling-booth display in a safer form the absence of sound political instinct which they share with the revolutionists of the towns. In the country the notaries, the money-lenders, and the small shopkeepers are scarcely numerous enough to constitute a middle class; and in the great towns the traders and the owners of property are practically disfranchised. When the suffrage was, under the shortlived Republic, comparatively free, the Assembly found it necessary or expedient to purge, by an act of exceptional violence, the constituencies to which it owed its title. The PRESIDENT, when he took possession of absolute power, revived universal suffrage as the natural correlative of despotism, although he must have been aware that under other circumstances the alternative of anarchy might be preferred to absolutism. For eighteen years it has been found possible to coerce the great majority of voters, and to exclude the Legislative Body from all share in the Government. Whenever universal suffrage in France ceases to be a fiction, it will not reform the Empire, but destroy it. The professions of devotion to the principle of promiscuous voting, which are echoed by one party from the other, are remarkable specimens of conscious, or unconscious, cant. The Republicans know that, notwithstanding the progress which they have achieved, they are still in the minority, and the EMPEROR must feel that the pedestal of his power has been dangerously reduced in area. The friends of freedom and Parliamentary government are excluded from political power in the future as well as in the present. If they could obtain admission into the Legislative Body, their ability might secure them influence; but with almost the solitary exception of M. THIERS, they are contemptuously rejected by the constituencies. In the United States, where local institutions and material circumstances render both Kings and Parliaments unnecessary, the chief characteristic of universal suffrage is the coarseness and corruption of representatives who are only tolerated because they exercise little political power; yet in a country where, beyond the limits of the great cities, pauperism is unknown, and social inequality but trifling, it would have been impossible to restrict the franchise. The Legislative Body of France is even more powerless than the House of Representatives at Washington, but if at any time it becomes a sovereign assembly, it will be compelled to reflect the opinions either of uneducated petty proprietors, or of clubs of Socialist workmen. In such a contingency, it is not improbable that the EMPEROR's intelligent dictatorship may be remembered with regret.

In estimating the results of the election, all parties necessarily assume that universal suffrage is irrevocably established. According to the most plausible calculation, the total majority of voters for the Government is only 800,000 out of 8,000,000, although the proportion of parties in the Legislative Body will be in a far greater degree favourable to the Government. It might well have happened that a considerable majority of the Assembly might have been returned by a minority of electors; for the unanimous opposition of a populous electoral district only affects the return of a single member, although the votes might outnumber the collective majorities in a score of contested circumscriptions; yet the EMPEROR, who has always boasted of the vote of the people, may well be alarmed at the discovery that the scale of numbers is now so nearly balanced. The semi-official papers contrive to give the Government a large majority, by counting as supporters all the members who are not directly hostile to the dynasty. To four millions and a-half of Government votes they add upwards of a million given to so-called dynastic candidates, who are supposed to be friendly to the Government, although they received no official support; but for their immediate purpose the apologists are compelled to reckon the members of the Third Party, and their leader, M. EMILE OLLIVIER, as supporters of the Empire. It is admitted that the Opposition, properly so named, represents two millions and a half of voters, all of whom, according to the rash contention of the Imperialists, must be opposed, not only to the policy of the Government, but also to its fundamental principle. The EMPEROR himself has hitherto regarded as his most formidable enemies the Orleanists and the other advocates of Parliamentary government, and he may perhaps think it easier to deal with antagonists who are as hostile to society and to property as to himself, but the fact remains that he can only count on a greatly diminished majority, which will be inferior in vigour and in ability to the Opposition. It appears scarcely probable that he will try the dangerous experiment of solving domestic difficulties by foreign adventure. A war, while it would alienate the quiet population of taxpayers, would be eagerly seized by demagogues as a pretext for attack. The EMPEROR's diminished popularity is generally attributed to the failure of his foreign policy in Mexico, and during the contest between Austria and Prussia. An unnecessary war with Germany, unless it were attended with extraordinary success, would be a more dangerous mistake. The establishment of the Empire was greatly facilitated by pacific professions, and there is nothing to prevent the inveterate enemies of the Government from proclaiming in turn that the Red Republic is peace.

THE SECTIONS OF THE CONSERVATIVE PARTY.

THE difference of opinion which is manifesting itself among the Conservative peers as to the tone which the House of Lords ought to adopt with regard to the Irish Church Bill evidently only reflects the divergence of tendency and opinions traceable in different sections of the party. No great political party is really ho[illegible]ous throughout, and a critic might easily show that there are at least as many sections of the Liberal party as there are of the Conservative. But the differences which, under one set of circumstances, divide a party without interrupting its outward coherence, or preventing it from acting as a whole, may easily, under other circumstances, split a party into fragments outwardly marked off from each other. Current events show that there are at least three main sections of the great Conservative party and how these different sections stand to each other now, and are likely to stand to each other in a future not very remote, is a question of considerable interest for English politicians of this generation. First of all, there is the ruck of the party, or, if that is too invidious an expression, the main body of honest, well-to-do, hereditary Conservatives. They are born to look at politics in a certain way, and to carry Conservative opinions into every department of their happy, noiseless, unimaginative lives. They are the squires, the minor nobles, the good old Tory churchmen, the unimpeachable, unremarkable, self-satisfied families of county life. They toil not, neither do they spin. They think not of the age into which they are born, and stand aloof alike from the evil and the good of their generation. Sustained by an honest pride, and a love of duty that is persevering but easily satisfied, they go through a happy round of small but meritorious observances, and are never troubled with a doubt as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of their political creed. Sometimes they feel strongly, as many of them now feel about the Irish Church, and as in their hearts they felt about the Reform Bill. But without leadership, and the sense of comfortable obedience to men of higher calibre than themselves, they labour under a secret consciousness of want of power, which bids them seek a recompense in cultivating their local importance. It is very seldom that they can get a man of real ability to reflect their views adequately, and yet to irradiate them with something above the mediocrity which experience teaches them is unhappily congenial to their ranks. By a piece of good luck they have got a truly representative man like them, and yet superior to them, in Mr. GATHORNE HARDY. With exalted intelligence and indomitable courage he sets before Parliament and the nation the inmost feelings and the traditional opinions of the honest, mediocre, everyday Conservative. He equally with the silliest young aristocrat of his party adopts the unadulterated, unhesitating tenets of the party, of uncompromising but legal and honourable resistance. Shoot down the Irish till they spin cotton is the simple maxim of his school. Such men are a great power in England, and theoretically all constitutional philosophers agree in congratulating England that there is such an element of peace, sobriety, and moderation in the country. It is thus that the dim, confused views of farmers, curates, and most first-class passengers on suburban railways obtain an authoritative and respectable expression; and if we once get away from the circles of educated Liberals in London, and of enthusiastic Nonconformists and Radicals in large boroughs, the old-fashioned, unreasoning, deeply-feeling Tory element seems so strong everywhere that we may well wonder how it happens that in the face of it the Government of England has for many years been always in the hands of the opponents of Toryism, or in the hands of Tories who, to retain office, have been obliged to borrow the ideas of those whom they profess to dislike and despise.

Quite a different section of the Conservative party is composed of the very great peers, the landowners owning almost entire halves or quarters of counties, men born to take a leading position in English social and political life, and to rule the neighbourhoods in which they live. They expect to take a prominent part, not only in local but in Imperial business, and they come to Parliament to represent themselves as much as to represent the peerage generally. The existence of such men in the English aristocracy gives it dignity and importance, but locally often exhibits it in its worst side. It is not, we think, conducive to the happiness of life, or to its refinement, or to the self-respect of honourable men, that such an influence should be exercised by one peer in any part of England as is exercised in his own territory by the Duke of BEAUFORT. But such men appear in a much more favourable light when they apply themselves with competent ability to the business of public life and take advantage of their great social importance to make themselves masters of the affairs of the country. Lord DERBY furnishes an example of this section of the party fully equal to any that could be desired. The object of this section is one which, it must be owned, is quite a legitimate one. They wish to have a fair share, at the very least, in the government of the country. They want to rule, to show their power, and to test their ideas, in the actual administration of business. They naturally decide, in a great measure, what the Conservative party shall do, and what it shall not do, in critical moments. They lean, therefore, to an alliance with whatever is adventurous in their party; they welcome outsiders, and even very irregular and doubtful Conservatives, if they can thus strengthen their hold on the public, and make their rule more popular. In recent years they have found such an ally in Mr. DISRAELI. It was the countenance and support of Lord DERBY that made Mr. DISRAELI's leadership possible, and the two were strong enough at a critical moment to impose on the great bulk of the party a measure wholly distasteful to them, and utterly alien to their principles and traditions. They have always seen that great cleverness, and manifest, undeniable ability, recognised by the public, were what they wanted in those who were to help them to rule, and not something of an approximation to their own hereditary importance. They have now installed Lord CAIRNS in the leadership of the House of Lords, indifferent to the reluctance of smaller peers to be ruled over by an Orange barrister, and only desirous to create and keep alive the impression that their party offers a special and exceptional career to men of great ability. In the same way they were content for years to uphold the leadership of Lord LYNDHURST. The public respected the party for being led by a man of such eminent powers of mind, and the party gained lustre by offering so brilliant a position to a man who had made his own fortune. In ordinary times these rulers of the Conservatives, the men of exceptionally great territorial importance, and the men of exceptionally great intellectual eminence, lead the mass of the party as they please. Sometimes they suddenly, as in the case of the Reform Bill, impose on this pliant body a great sacrifice, and make an immense demand on their devotion. Sometimes, as at present, they throw themselves into the passions of their humbler supporters, and raise a great shout of good old Tory battle.

But they are not unopposed or free from all control, for there is a third section of the party, small in numbers generally, but of high political consideration, and able in a gentle way to appeal, not unsuccessfully, to the mass of the Conservatives. These are the Parliamentary leaders who, being by birth or accident or conviction Conservatives, yet look on Conservatism as only one side of English politics, who understand Liberals, and are, to a great extent, in harmony with them, and who always live in an atmosphere of good sense, and think of the nation as much as of their party. Lord STANLEY, if he is to be called a Conservative at all, is one of the most conspicuous of these men. He would at the present moment be a very damping chairman at an exuberant Orange gathering. But it is perhaps not fair, either to him or to the party, to put him in any classification of Conservatives. The prominent members of the section of Conservatives of which we are speaking are Lord SALISBURY and Lord CARNARVON in one House, and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Sir JOHN PAKINGTON in the other. They are men of different degrees of ability, certainly, but they all agree in the mode in which they judge, and in the spirit in which they approach, public affairs. They may be described as Liberals who on many points come to Conservative conclusions, but their idea is to look to what the nation wants, not to get a Conservative triumph. Lord SALISBURY was one of the most zealous debaters on behalf of his party, but when he got into office he governed India with a passion for progress altogether out of the compass of ordinary Whig officials. Lord CARNARVON gave up office rather than aid in passing Mr. DISRAELI's Reform Bill; but when the Suspensory Bill came before the Lords, he separated from his party because he felt himself driven back into an examination of the principles which the maintenance of the Irish Church involves. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Sir JOHN PAKINGTON are men of much less mark, but they are on the same plane of political thought. We should like to know what political compromise Sir JOHN PAKINGTON would not accept, or what office he would not at ten minutes' notice think himself competent to hold. Not that he is a mere office-seeker, but he feels as if nature had made him in omnia paratus to a really remarkable extent. This is the line of Conservatism, it may be added, which is substantially taken by the only Conservative organ that ordinary people ever see. The Standard fights, of course, for its party, and worships its leaders, but it always considers how questions may be regarded by persons who are aware that Conservatism is not the only conceivable type of political opinion. And it is admirably seconded in this by its excellent staff of foreign Correspondents, who not only give the greatest amount of readable information as to foreign countries which is to be found in any one periodical, but treat every subject in a vein of gushing Liberal enthusiasm. How great is the practical influence of this section of the Conservatives no one exactly knows. It may possibly next week show itself greater than is expected; or it may very probably seem to be almost eclipsed, now that an appeal has been made by determined leaders to the passions and prejudices of the mass. But in quieter times, and under more favourable circumstances, it may grow very rapidly, and in the next ten years it is conceivable that the real guidance and leadership of the party may rest quite as much with the section now represented by Lord SALISBURY and Lord CARNARVON as with that now represented by Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS.

COLONIAL POLICY.

MR. ADDERLEY has recently published the first part of what is intended to be a sort of constitutional history of our colonies, combined with an exposition of his own theory of colonial government. Something of the same sort was done by Earl GREY, after he had long administered the Colonial Office; and one of Mr. ADDERLEY's main objects is to demonstrate the fallacy of Earl GREY's policy, and to set up a rival theory of his own in its place. Mr. ADDERLEY's long devotion to the subject entitles his arguments to consideration, even from those who are unable to see in them much more than transparent fallacies; and, apart from the special views of which he has made himself the advocate, his narrative may be accepted, as far as it has yet gone, as a substantially accurate account of the relations which have from time to time existed between Great Britain and her numerous offspring.

The changes in this respect have been very remarkable. Sir CORNEWALL LEWIS revived an almost forgotten fact when he reminded the men of our day that the early colonies of this country were almost entirely independent except in their external commercial relations. The régime of Protection determined alike our home and colonial policy. The colonies communicated only with the Board of Trade, and so long as they supplied us with an exclusive market no one thought of meddling with their own management of internal affairs. As the natural correlative of this independence the colonies assumed the duty of self-protection, and instead of murmuring at the withdrawal of British troops they were apt to resent as an encroachment the appearance of English red-coats to save them from dangers which they considered themselves well able to ward off by their own unassisted efforts. The Protection theory of colonial government broke down with the insane attempt to impose taxes by Imperial authority; and when the failure of the system was manifested by the successful revolt of the North American colonies, an entirely new method of administration was attempted. For a long time protection was continued more as a boon to the colonists than to ourselves, but the leading idea which came into vogue was no longer that of political independence, but of centralized control. The assumption of the right of more energetic interference on the part of the Mother-country necessarily led to the not yet exploded theory that the colonies were entitled to rely almost exclusively on England for their defence. British troops maintained at the expense of this country were not only tolerated but expected by all our colonies, and the new régime was based upon the idea that it was the function of England to govern and to defend all her outlying provinces. The system sapped at once the old sturdy self-reliance of the provincials, and the striving for political liberty which had been so marked a characteristic of what are now the United States. For infant settlements the plan was sufficiently unobjectionable; but no statesmen could have expected or desired the continuance of a relation which could not fail to enervate the colonial mind. And one after another our provinces began to outgrow this maternal coddling. Demands were made for more and more of the powers of self-government without any corresponding relaxation of the demand for protection, and after a short interval we drifted into the transition period with which Lord GREY's name is so largely associated. Constitutions were granted freely framed on the English model, but in two important respects they all differed from their prototype. In the first place, the power and influence of the Crown, which had been constantly dwindling in our own Constitution, was represented in the case of the colonies by the far from unobtrusive action of an English Minister, while, on the other hand, the colonists, though greedy for self-government, still claimed as of right to be relieved by England from the duty of self-defence. There was a sort of balance in this arrangement, and Lord GREY considered that England might well afford the rather considerable military expense entailed upon her, in consideration of the substantial control which she still exercised over her half-emancipated children. And during this period a large leaven of the old protection theory remained. Colonial ships and colonial goods were favoured by discriminating privileges, and the colonists certainly did not submit to what they would now regard as dictation without getting a very substantial equivalent. But this, like the former system, was essentially transitory, and though the Crown (represented by the Colonial Office) still exercised its authority more energetically in their affairs than in those of Great Britain, it has for many years been abating its pretensions, and allowing the provincial Legislatures to assume an almost complete independence. The adoption of free trade largely increased this tendency, and the present policy of withdrawing British troops and looking to the colonies to defend themselves in the absence of special emergencies, is a natural consequence of the now-prevailing policy, though not always recognised as such by even the most independent of our colonial possessions.

Mr. ADDERLEY raises the question, what is to be the [illegible] of all these changes? Increasing strength and a growing desire for complete self-government can have only one of two goals. Either the colonies will become, at some future and probably distant day, independent of the Crown of Great Britain, or else they must assume the position rather of allies than dependents, with something in the nature of a federal bond to unite them to the Mother-country. This alternative is beginning to be understood in the North American provinces better than it is at home; and, while the idea of an actual severance is repugnant to their feelings, the necessity for some better link than the Colonial Office supplies is becoming apparent to many of their leading statesmen. Something of this sort seems at one time to have commended itself to Mr. ADDERLEY, but he fears that, however acceptable it might be to Canadians and Australians, any participation by such distant kinsmen in the conduct of Imperial affairs would be too great an innovation to commend itself to Englishmen. Practically contradicting his own condemnation of Lord GREY's policy, Mr. ADDERLEY assumes that the only possible bond that can permanently unite England and her colonies must be supplied by the ultimate supremacy of a purely British Parliament. There is not much assurance of permanence in such a system, and the best-disposed colonies are apt to resent this kind of home control as almost an impertinence. It would be otherwise if they had a voice in the central body, and though a change of this kind is not to be anticipated at present, we are by no means satisfied that some form of confederation between England and the principal colonies may not be the ultimate issue of the constitutional government which has been conceded to them. Mr. ADDERLEY has persuaded himself that colonial self-government, subject to a continually decreasing measure of English control and influence, may go on for ever without either ripening into a Constitution which shall embrace the whole Empire or culminating in ultimate independence. We believe that to one or other of these conclusions our whole colonial history is pointing; and now that Canada is as near in time to London as Edinburgh once was, there are no physical difficulties which can be regarded as insurmountable in the way of a closer and more equal political connexion. But for the present these are mere speculations, and though we may foresee that the tide must in course of time drift us into the one haven or the other, Mr. ADDERLEY is probably right in assuming that the existing relations may last for many years to come without material alteration. In the form which they have already nearly reached, and which they are certain soon to assume, they will be in many respects advantageous to both parties to the bargain. The colonies, practically self-governing and taking their own share of the duty of defence, will no longer impose unreasonable burdens on this country, while something a little closer than the most intimate alliance will continue to knit their fortunes with ours, both in peace and war. Mr. ADDERLEY's mistake is, we think, assuming that a union so very little more than one of sentiment can be expected to sustain itself in all emergencies without some more definite political connexion. If we are destined to lose what little remains of English supremacy, it will become a necessity either to acquiesce in the loss or to replace it by some form of confederation; and the ultimate dismemberment or perpetual union of the various parts of our Empire as it exists will turn upon the question, which another generation may have to solve, whether federal relations in some shape may or may not be found to be practicable. If not, the present phase of colonial government seems not less transitory than those which preceded it.

REACTION.

In various ways we hear a good deal of the Reaction against the Irish Church Bill. It were strange if we did not hear of it. Reaction makes noise enough to be heard. In every variety of tone, and with every conceivable and inconceivable oddity of gesture and gesticulation, Reaction now howls and roars, and now pipes and whimpers and screams. In Ireland, as befits Ireland, Reaction roars in 'Ercles vein, threatens civil war, and rejoices in the revival of the savoury memories of the Boyne and Aughrim. Mr. JOHNSTONE shouts Ha, ha! and neighs for the battle. But Ulster has lately flowed over into Middlesex, and a band of Ulster Protestants have fraternized with Mr. COLQUHOUN and gentlemen of his set, and the National Club, Whitehall Gardens, echoes with the genuine brogue and bluster of Orangeism. The deputations from Ireland do not earn our English hospitality for nothing, and the first appearance of Mr. MACROLY and a good many other decidedly Ulster names on English platforms, at great City meetings, great meetings at the various large towns, great meetings in Protestant Tyburnia and Westbournia, and still more Protestant Cheltenham, let us know, if we are disposed to know, what manner of men the HAMILTONS and BUTLERS and GROGANS and VANCES and VANDELEURS are. We can hardly understand that all these meetings and deputations mean more than this. The Irish Orangemen and Protestants of the peculiarly Irish Protestant type have come over to England, and have made many speeches. The old No Popery blusterers familiar to us in England have also been equal to the occasion. Dr. TRESHAM GREGGS has poured out the lava floods of his fiery vituperation in Dublin; the babbling springs of the eloquence of Mr. CHARLEY and Mr. HARPER have been perennial about Hanover Square. But there is nothing new in all this. It hardly comes up to the notion of Reaction. There might be a reaction, but upon the plainest notion of the word, Reaction means that somebody or somebodies, or some considerable section of the community, have changed their minds. Is it so? How do we stand differently from where we stood last autumn? Then, as now, there was a very considerable, and in a certain sense important, majority, not only in the English counties, but in several large towns, against Mr. GLADSTONE; and in many other places there was an active, though not a large, minority in the elections, as in the metropolitan boroughs. What exists now existed then. Mr. MORGAN HOWARD made many speeches about Lambeth last year, as he is making many speeches about London generally this year. The sentiments of Mr. R. C. L. BEVAN and Mr. FOWLER were well known, and certainly were appreciated by a good many City men during the elections; neither those opinions nor the appreciation of them have changed. We have now the same men in the same attitude. But Reaction, if it means anything, ought to be able to point either to its converts from the opposite faith, or to some distinguished names borne by those who twelve months ago were inactive or irresolute or uncertain about the Irish Church Bill, or who had declined to pledge themselves, but who now are openly with the No Popery and Protestant Ascendency party. Is it so? Is it not rather the other way? Is there not a significant absence of notables from the echoing halls of Willis's Rooms and St.

James's Hall? Last year, if we remember rightly, a fervid, but astute, Archbishop, who thinks that he knows the beats of the popular pulse, announced that "We in the House of "Lords should know how to deal with the Bill when it got "there." Well, the Bill has got there, and we in the House of Lords do not seem quite to have made up our minds what to do with the Bill. At any rate Dr. THOMSON has not made a political speech or stood on a political platform from that time to this. Last year the clergy assembled and pronounced and threatened. We do not observe at any of these London meetings the presence of any of the clergy of mark, although to a man, or nearly so, they dislike the Bill. Not that the clerical trumpet has not been solemnly invoked; we know that the sword of the LORD and of GIDEON has been specially appealed to. Last Saturday's Globe contained a long and serious admonition to the clergy to be up and doing during the present week—that is, to tune the pulpits; and copies of the Globe containing this authoritative mandate were sent about largely to the English incumbents, of course post-free; with what result their congregations may have had, or will have, the opportunity of judging. The Reaction seems to be that whereas last year a great many people thought it not impossible that Mr. GLADSTONE might get no majority at all, and not at all unlikely that the majority would be small, and were in consequence very active and energetic before the elections and in the elections, now that the verdict has been pronounced their agitation ceases. If there is a Reaction, it seems that, in many very important particulars, the Reaction is rather the other way.

It becomes, therefore, a curious inquiry to see what account the Orangemen and the English No Popery people give of the rise and progress of this imaginary Reaction of theirs—how it has come about, and what enlightenment has at last broken upon the general public. The only intimation of the reasons for this change which we have found are curious and recondite enough. The speakers at the recent meetings seem to put it in this way. The majority in Parliament consisted principally, besides the Irish Romanist members, of Scotch members, and of English members for constituencies where Dissent and principles akin to Dissent prevailed. These constituencies were deceived, and have now found out their mistake. The Scotch Presbyterians thought that their brethren and co-religionists the Irish Presbyterians were in favour of disestablishment and disendowment, and they now discover that the Ulster Presbyterians are very much in favour of the Regium Donum, whatever they thought last year, or think now, about bishops, priests, and deacons. But the Scotch Presbyterians are now with their Irish brethren; only, unfortunately, there are no hustings and no elections on which to show their change of opinion. So, again, last year the Dissenters voted for Mr. GLADSTONE's nominees because they thought that he was going to pull down, disestablish, and disendow the bloated English Establishment offhand and at once. They now find out, as they might have found out then, that he is only going to treat Maynooth and the Roman Catholic community with equal justice, and this they now, though very tardily, discover to be trafficking with the Scarlet Lady, bowing down to the abominations of Babylon and all the rest of it. Thus the Scotch Presbyterians and the English Dissenters did not know last year, but they do know it this year. Hence their altered sentiments. This is the real and important genesis of the Reaction, and this account of it deserves the credit of ingenuity. But suppose all this to be true, and it never can be proved, what does it amount to but that the constituencies at the late general election do not represent the national sentiment? And then the difficulty occurs that the great political party which opposes the Irish Church Bill is responsible for the new constitution of household suffrage, the very first result of which is the return of a Parliament which does not, ex hypothesi, represent the nation. To say that the constituencies last year were under a delusion, did not know what they were about, and were unable to understand what their votes meant—which is what we are now told —is but a sorry compliment to Lord DERBY and Mr. DISRAELI. If there is any party in the State to which this view of the situation pays a compliment, it is to that of Lord SALISBURY; but then Lord SALISBURY is not in favour of the unconditional rejection of the Bill. Altogether, this explanation of the Reaction only increases the complication for the Orangemen.

We are, however, perhaps wrong in attributing to Reaction this merely shadowy and conceptional existence. Reaction at any rate discharges some corporeal functions, and exhibits some of the outward signs of material and active life. Reaction eats and drinks. It has begun its ephemeral existence by a morning meal; and the déjeûner of Wednesday at Willis's Rooms is a sign that Orangeism, like love, cannot survive without corn and wine. The "supporters of the United Church of "England and Scotland in London" have feasted deputations from the Irish Church and the Hiberno-Presbyterian Church. But just as at the City meeting it was a Wesleyan who took the chair, so at Willis's Rooms the Church of England was not. The Dean of Ripon, Dr. M'NEILE, was the solitary representative of coldly sympathetic Anglicanism; but we must do him the justice to say that this "great and "good man" made up for the Laodicean indifference of his spiritual fellows and brethren. And then there was Dr. CUMMING, who of course hangs on to the coat-tails of Establishmentism wherever it is to be found, and probably agrees with Dr. M'NEILE that Holy Russia, where the CZAR is mixta persona, half king and half priest, or perhaps that the Lamaism of Thibet, is the true ideal of the union of Church and State. The House of Commons was not unworthily represented by Mr. NEWDEGATE, who saluted himself as the foremost Constitutionalist of the day, and all the available Irish Bishops were present to eat and to drink and to talk. Nobody can complain of this. But we must respectfully suggest that we cannot see the good of this sort of demonstration, except as regards the spread of the unwholesome practice of eating and drinking largely before dinner. The déjeûner is a sufficient symbol of what is meant by Reaction. It is a good thing perhaps, but comes at the wrong time of day. The speakers on Wednesday were quite equal to their old reputation; but now they seem out of place and time. All that they said this week they said last year. The very same arguments, the very same vague terrors and doubts, the old quotations about the Canon Law, the same pious and, in a sense, not unnatural, horror of Maynooth. The orators had months upon months for enforcing their views on the public mind, and all through last year they turned their tongues and pens consistently to the task. And with what results? A majority of 115 against them in the House of Commons. To go on with all this eloquence and vituperation now looks very much like flogging a dead horse. The speakers impress those who were impressed before and are impressed still, and who want no more impressing; but when they ask us to believe that they are impressing their opponents, that the tide is on the turn, and that the national sentiment is with them, we ask for some tangible evidence of their loose, hazy assertions, even from the Dukes of RUTLAND and ABERCORN and Lord HARROWBY. If noble lords and senators like to bask in a fool's paradise, it is idle to grudge them their sun or parhelion.

It is some relief at least to common sense to turn from the haze and afterglow of Willis's Rooms to the manly, vigorous, blustering talk of Orangeism when not on its pretty behaviour in Whitehall Gardens and Pall Mall. Commend us rather to the man, especially the spiritual man, of Killyman county Tyrone. At Killyman they don't talk of Canon Law, but of that ultima ratio of good Protestantism "ready to take the Minié "rifle and to march to the Boyne as their fathers were." This was the lay Chairman's keynote, as the reporters call it, and the drum ecclesiastic beat in unison. As the Rev. Mr. ELLIS remarked, "they were there to tell Mr. GLADSTONE that if he used brute force, so could they." Or, as the Rev. LESLIE CARTER expressed it with a difference, Orangemen of the North would know the reason why. And "as only the Channel "rolled between them, they would march to the House of "Commons, and compel their enemies to be silent." We trust this threat will not be lost on the Admiralty and the Channel Fleet. The Rev. HENRY HENDERSON declared that, if the Government pursued their present policy, they would have another Derry and another Boyne, and that eminent pastor of Presbyterianism and peace, the Rev. R. C. DONNEL, has gone so far in his martial preparations for rebellion that he sees his way to getting "those guns"—they must by this time be valuable pieces of ordnance—"which chased Papist JAMES from the walls of Derry, and they should have them to fight for the truth, for their GOD, and for their Bible." If we are to have threatened rebellion, and the glorious promise of civil war, we must say that we prefer it hot and strong, and with the genuine usquebaugh twang from "renowned Killyman," rather than spouted by gentle Lord HARROWBY in the mild and diluted tea-drinking at Willis's Rooms.

MAZZINI AND ITALY.

MAZZINI has lately addressed a letter, marked with his peculiar eloquence, to his "enemies," consisting of the Italian Government and of the supporters of the monarchy. For forty years his enemies, though they have differed in person and in nation and in character, have so far occupied the same position that they have been the constituted authorities of the whole or of parts of Italy. His earliest efforts were directed against CHARLES ALBERT of Piedmont, who, having abandoned his early Liberal professions, was excusably supposed to have become a vassal of Austria. The Dukes who reigned under foreign protection over central Italy, the King of NAPLES, and above all the POPE, were necessarily regarded by the enthusiastic advocate of national unity and freedom as objects of uncompromising hostility. Notwithstanding his many errors of judgment, and partly through the force of his passionate intolerance, MAZZINI did much to create a sentiment of national patriotism; but his sectarian fanaticism regarded the form of a republic as not less indispensable than the substance of unity and independence. It was in vain to remind him that regular troops could only be encountered by regular troops, and that, while Republican agitators were prating of knives and of daggers, the King of SARDINIA had the power of aiding the cause with a hardy and disciplined army. On the eve of the movement of 1848, MASSIMO D'AZEGLIO, in the name of a secret society of Italian patriots, obtained from CHARLES ALBERT a pledge, afterwards faithfully redeemed, that he would give his life, the lives of his sons, and the resources of his kingdom to the struggle with Austria, as soon as the fit moment arrived. When, in 1848, the KING invaded Lombardy and Venetia, MAZZINI held aloof; and even now he is not ashamed to designate the Royal adventurer as the betrayer of Milan. Ten years later CAVOUR resumed, by the acquisition of Lombardy and of the Duchies, the enterprise which had been interrupted at Novara. Naples and Sicily were next won by GARIBALDI, and the Roman Legations by CIALDINI; and, finally, Venice and its territories were annexed to the kingdom of Italy, in consequence of the events of 1866. It might have been thought that the all but complete attainment of Italian unity would have satisfied in some degree the most sanguine patriot; but MAZZINI hates a King of Italy as bitterly as if he were an Austrian Viceroy, and he denounces as treason the compulsory acquiescence of the Government in the French protectorate of Rome. "You have," he says, "abandoned "Rome to the Papal phantom, and silently submitted to be "told by a French Minister that she should never be yours." "You possessed a frontier line, unique in Europe, and almost "insuperable; and you have broken it by yielding up Nice and "Savoy to the foreigner who already held Rome." In other words, the Government and the nation have shrunk from engaging in a desperate conflict with a potentate of overwhelming superiority of force who was also an acknowledged benefactor. There is not the smallest reason to believe that an Italian Republic, even if it had adopted a bolder policy, could have offered effectual resistance to the power of France. The unique and insuperable frontier of the Alps offers no sufficient defence as long as it can be turned by troops landing on the South-Western coast. Any attempt of the Government to assert its independence would be hampered by the internal disaffection which is incessantly propagated by MAZZINI and his partisans. He states indeed that he opposed a rising which had been prepared at Milan for the 18th of April; but he boldly announces that, when occasion serves, his party will meet force by force. As if with a consciousness that the chronic prosecution of the business of conspiracy requires an apology, he offers to abstain from secret machinations if he is allowed to propound his Republican doctrines in the press and at public meetings; and he even intimates that he would relinquish the agitation for political changes if his country were not dishonoured by the Roman occupation. There are generally concessions which would satisfy malcontents and rebels; but no established Government can allow a private man to dictate its policy, with the alternative of insurrection if his views are not adopted.

The Federal Council of Switzerland, on the demand of the Italian Government, has lately induced the Council of State of Ticino to refuse MAZZINI permission to reside within the limits of the Canton, and, as might be expected, the subservient timidity which refuses hospitality to exiles affords an excuse for indignant remonstrance. As a general rule, it is perhaps expedient that political refugees should be allowed an asylum in neighbouring countries. French Republicans, from time to time, plot in Leicester Square, and Irish Fenians in Paris; but small neutral Powers, such as Belgium and Switzerland, are compelled to pay some deference to the complaints of neighbouring Governments. Although it is probable that the sympathies of a Republican people are on the side of MAZZINI, it is not the business of the Swiss to remodel the political institutions of Italy. MAZZINI's arguments for a Republic are legitimate, though not conclusive; but they have no bearing on the right of conspiracy and rebellion. If he were contented to trust to reason alone, or rather to boldness of assertion, he might perhaps persuade his countrymen that in America "public offices are bestowed on merit and virtue." The Americans themselves, if their all but unanimous testimony can be believed, have found by painful experience that under their political institutions merit and virtue are fatal disqualifications for office. In the greatest States the votes in the Legislatures are habitually sold, and private and public character are equally disregarded in the choice of Federal Representatives. The "stratum of corruption" which the Italian monarchy is "superimposing on the many, with which the heart of the "nation is burdened," can scarcely be denser or grosser than the similar formation which is annually deposited by universal suffrage as a burden on the heart of the city of New York.

It is not altogether improbable that MAZZINI may be justified in his anticipation of a future Republic in Italy, and in some other European countries. Spain has lately found with surprise that it is becoming difficult to establish a new dynasty after the overthrow of a throne; and it is nearly certain that if the French Empire is destroyed, a Republic will be preferred to a constitutional monarchy. It would seem that the confident expectation of success ought to supersede the necessity of Republican plots and rebellions, and, according to MAZZINI, the Roman question would be easily settled by the national will operating under Republican institutions. In the meantime it is hardly worth while to quote a tirade of LAMENNAIS, to the effect that those who win back their confiscated rights are likely to be denounced as rebels—"Rebels against whom? "There is no rebellion possible, save against the true Sove-"reign, and how can the people rebel against the people?" Revolutionary logic always disregards history as well as probability. LAMENNAIS died before the people of the Southern American States rebelled, as their act was described, against the people of the North. The not impossible case of a monarchy approved by the great majority of the people would not disturb the convictions or the policy of a genuine revolutionary agitator. In 1848, the most earnest and consistent French Republicans opposed the convocation of a National Assembly, on the express ground that the majority would probably be opposed to the Republic. If it were possible to ascertain whether MAZZINI's opinions are held by the greater number of the whole population of Italy, the question would still remain whether the monarchy may not more truly represent the real interests and the genuine will of the nation. The revolution which has liberated Italy was organized and completed by the educated classes, when the Lombard peasantry was tolerant of Austrian dominion, and while the BOURBON tyrant was popular with the rabble of Naples. The Piedmontese, who alone contributed a serious military force, are, notwithstanding their discontent with the removal of the Court from Turin to Florence, still warmly attached to the ancient Hous of Savoy. If the Southern provinces and Sicily were polled, it is possible that the fallen dynasty might be preferred both to the reigning family and to the unknown Republic; and the majority of the clergy throughout Italy prefer the supremacy of Rome to the greatness and the unity of the nation. Intelligence and discipline have, with the powerful aid of France, and afterwards in concert with Prussia, prevailed over local prejudices and indifference; and even if MAZZINI were to succeed in establishing a Republic, he would but inherit a national unity created by his present antagonists. He may indeed boast that, with GARIBALDI and other gallant associates, he once occupied, in the name of the Republic, the capital which is still out of the reach of the KING and his Government. The Triumvirate is not to be blamed for yielding to the irresistible force of the French army; but it is idle to reproach the monarchy with inability to retrieve the loss, or to impute to the Government as crimes the melancholy results of revolutionary folly which were attained at Aspromonte and at Mentana. Errors have undoubtedly been committed in domestic and foreign policy, and more especially in naval and military administration; but conspiracy is a clumsy and mischievous remedy for political mistakes.

The constant refusal to acknowledge the difficulties which surround the Roman question is characteristic of MAZZINI and his sect. The POPE himself, in his Allocutions, scarcely exceeds the Republican zealots in habitual disregard for existing facts. Even if the French garrison were withdrawn from Rome, the violent overthrow of the temporal Papacy would involve Italy in dangerous internal dissensions, and perhaps in the grave inconvenience of a religious schism. Sooner or later the risk must be faced by any Government which may at the time represent the Italian nation; but the wisest statesmen will not be hasty to precipitate the conflict. A Republic might possess some advantage over a monarchy in the contest, inasmuch as it would oppose political to religious fanaticism; but the destruction of the power of Rome would not be accomplished without serious internal convulsions. Although MAZZINI earnestly, and no doubt sincerely, disclaims the wish to found his Republic on terror or on anarchy, he would, in attacking at the same time the Church and the actual institutions of the State, be forced to rely on the aid of the professed enemies of property and of order. The extreme Republicans of France and Spain have loudly proclaimed the wildest doctrines of revolution, and some Italian democrats took part in the most extravagant discussions of the Peace Congress which undertook at Geneva to promote universal war. The Italian Government would, perhaps, display prudence as well as boldness if it were to accept MAZZINI'S challenge by permitting him to propagate his opinions by public discussion; but it is difficult for those who are accustomed to unlimited license of speech to judge of the danger of rhetorical appeals to an inflammable population. In the United States the law recognises no political offence short of insurrection; and English practice is almost equally liberal. In Ireland it becomes from time to time necessary to impose a certain restraint on oral sedition, although, as a general rule, speakers as well as writers indulge with perfect safety in the propagation of treason. As Englishmen are but spectators, with no right to interfere in Italian disputes, it perhaps matters little that they are incapable of understanding how Italy can derive advantage from plots against the Government.

THE MOLD RIOTS.

IT is so seldom that we have riots attended with loss of life in this country, and the sight of soldiers firing on an infuriated and violent mob is happily so rare, that it is only right that an occurrence like the fatal affray at Mold should be scrutinized with great jealousy. Colliers are everywhere a turbulent and ignorant set of men, and in Wales the wild, violent character of the people, added to the coarseness of a rude class, produces a very savage compound. The Welsh collier stands alone. He is rude, jealous, ignorant, and easily provoked. The Mold colliers had, or fancied they had, a grievance against an English manager, and proceeded to exercise very summary injustice against the object of their hatred. They deported him and his goods, and also committed an assault. For this offence six or eight of the colliers were arrested and punished, not very severely, two only being sentenced to imprisonment. The evil spirit of Mold was fairly roused, and it was determined by the colliers that the prisoners should not go to gaol. This determination became known to the local authorities, and a small military force was despatched to aid the police in getting the convicted rioters off by railway. Everything was prepared on both sides. On the side of order were the magistrates, police, and soldiers. On the other side were ranged a mob of two thousand people, full of rage and vengeance. It was not furor arma ministrat, but the provident care of the road surveyor, which provided an inexhaustible store of the choicest pebbles and small rocks, which the brutal insurgents availed themselves of to the uttermost. They riddled the railway station; they put the police and soldiers, or at least most of them, out of all fighting powers with great celerity. And the summary of the scene described by the Chief Constable is this:—Volleys of stones darkened the air; the police and soldiers were knocked over on every side; Captain BLAKE, the officer in command, was appealed to for an order to fire; he refused; the mob only got more violent, and the lapidation more severe; the railway was assaulted and mastered, and the civil and military force surrounded. The soldiers, maddened with their wounds and the fall of their comrades, of course wished to fire, but Captain BLAKE, though himself wounded, gave no sign; so far did this tenderness to the savage mob prevail, that it is in evidence that the officers clung to their men who were levelling their rifles, and prevented their firing. Matters got worse and worse, as the rioters saw that they were treated with such entire impunity, till at last Captain BLAKE ordered his men to fire. They fired over the heads of the people, and the result was killing an innocent looker-on, though it seems that at length the soldiers took some aim and killed four people. All this lasted at least a quarter of an hour. Fifteen minutes is, perhaps, a short time; but just let us picture what fifteen minutes means with some hundreds of very willing hands dealing lumps of stone into men whose order, position, and uniform made them the easiest of marks.

We are told to admire the patience of the soldiers, and the admirable fortitude and courage of their officers; and we are, we believe, also commanded to survey with sympathy that respect for human life which was displayed by the Mold magistrates in declining to read the Riot Act, and in putting off to the last moment their call on the military to use their rifles. Our hearts may be as hard as the stony pebbles which the Mold colliers used with such deadly effect, but we entertain no such feelings. Rather we own to a very distinct and solid indignation against both officers and magistrates for their foolish and long-suffering abstinence from doing their duty. No doubt there is a sort of justification for them. That old superstition of reading the Riot Act had not been complied with. And here we venture to ask how many of our readers know what the Riot Act is, and can recite its provisions, which we trust are not sixty seconds long? Captain BLAKE was waiting for the magistrate's order; and the magistrate was waiting perhaps for this bogey Riot Act, perhaps for his spectacles. It was the old story of the Earl of CHATHAM and Sir RICHARD STRAHAN. But, as Mr. Secretary BRUCE observes, it was not necessary to read this precious Riot Act; in point of fact, after all it was not read here at Mold, perhaps for the best of reasons, because it was not there to be read. And now to apportion the blame. Captain BLAKE would not suffer his men to fire because he had not received the magistrate's order. This is the military superstition that soldiers in the presence of civil authorities and a breach of the peace are no longer ordinary citizens with all the rights, duties, and responsibilities of citizens to quell a riot, to arrest rioters, and to use such arms, if any, as they happen to have in hand for those objects and for their own personal defence. Military men think that when summoned by the civil power they are under the orders of the civil power, and cease to have any duties except those which the magistrate calls upon them to discharge. The distinction is this, that soldiers may do all these things on their own military or even private responsibility, but that when called upon by the civil power they must do

Just as in a street we may collar a pickpocket or a garotter; we may, or may not do it, according to our own sense of duty; but when called upon by a police constable, we must aid and assist in securing the QUEEN'S peace and arresting felons. Such is every private soldier's duty as a citizen in the eyes of the common law. But a soldier is subject to another authority. He cannot while on duty do any one of these things without orders from his commanding officer. On Captain BLAKE, therefore, devolved the double duty, first of quelling a riot, as he and everybody else ought to do, and next, as by military law he had acquired a special responsibility, of preserving the lives of his men, and of using such means, and with such despatch and energy, as should disarm those who were wounding and disabling his soldiers by scores and every minute. We regret to say that by a mistake, perhaps a venial one, Captain BLAKE discharged neither duty. He did nothing for at least fifteen minutes to keep the public peace; rather he did everything to encourage the rioters, by allowing them for a quarter of an hour to make a target of the supposed defenders of order; and he did nothing because he was not asked to do so when there was no necessity that he should be asked. This was his mistake as a citizen; and as a military man, we should rather be disposed to a suspicion that he might, under military law, be made responsible, if any charge for neglect of duty and needlessly imperilling the lives and limbs of his company were to be brought against him.

The result is, that Captain BLAKE did less than his duty because he was hampered by the superstition—as we have already called it—of the necessity of a military force being empowered by the magistrates to defend their lives; and that the Mold magistrates again did less than their duty, because they were hampered by the other old superstition about reading the Riot Act. On the whole, it may be considered that these twin superstitions have their value in putting a wholesome antecedent check on military zeal, and what perhaps may be the dear delight of pulling a trigger against a noisy and turbulent crowd; but in our careful regard that a riot should grow into very portentous dimensions before we attempt to deal with it by force, it may happen, as it did on this melancholy occasion, that we have done great wrong to the unfortunate policemen and soldiers who, while guardians of the peace, were restrained from defending either the peace or their own lives and limbs.

THERE are few topics which furnish more fruitful material for conversation and discussion of all kinds than literary style. It is a subject on which every reader thinks himself entitled to have an opinion, and with respect to which few see any reason why one man's opinion should not be as good as another's. If your neighbour at a dinner-party chooses to remark that he (or she) thinks Mr. Tupper's style incomparably superior to Tennyson's, you accept the remark with the same unruffled tranquillity with which, a few minutes earlier, you may have heard the preference given to peas over asparagus, or mackerel over salmon. It is generally esteemed a dilettante, indolent sort of topic. Concurrently with this, two other notions are commonly held—first, that the style of an author can be criticized independently of his matter; secondly, that a good style is the result of luck, or chance, or genius, or something equally inexplicable and unamenable to rules and laws. And thus it is not unusual for a person to say that he regards a writer as contemptible in intellect, in knowledge, in truth, but as having an admirable style.

We do not entirely hold with this way of looking at the subject. True, the positive material, the amount of thought and experience which an author contributes to the world, is the chief thing to be considered in estimating the value of his work. With bad material, or with lack of material, a writer is at once condemned; while it would be much too bold a thing to say, having the examples of Kant and Bentham before our eyes, that a bad style necessarily means a bad book. But yet we are quite sure that style is a much more solid and important thing than is often supposed, that what are held to be superficial beauties, pleasing to the ear or to the imagination, do, if genuine, indicate some mastery over realities unknown to those who have not such grace or beauty of language; and, in fine, that the subject is one practically useful to discuss, not merely with a view to the increase of literary enjoyment, but also with a view to the increase of knowledge, and the classification and development of experience.

Style is of least importance where the subject-matter is naturally clear and definite, as is the case in most branches of physical investigation. In botany or geology, no such subtlety of reasoning is implied in the fundamental conceptions as would necessitate conspicuous powers of illustration and exposition. To make discoveries in these sciences does indeed need fertile and profound imagination; but the discoveries, once made, are communicated to others with less difficulty than is the case with the speculations of history or philosophy. And yet even here the results of a good style are considerable in this way, that the theories thus communicated take a far greater hold of the general mind, and spread themselves much more widely through the nation, than where they are not recommended by similar advantages. Thus the style of Sir Charles Lyell would generally be considered as admirable—a praise which would hardly be given to Sir Roderick Murchison, profound geologist though he be. And has not the consequence been that Sir Charles Lyell's conceptions have taken possession of the non-geological world to a much greater extent than those of Sir Roderick Murchison? Common people reverence Owen from a distance, while they apprehend and take the highest interest in the writings of Darwin and Huxley. Granting that the novel views of the two last-named inquirers may have something to do with this, has it not also resulted very much from the fact that they have stooped, as Owen has never done, to the ordinary intelligence, and fitted in their doctrines to the sentiments of mankind? For this is the test and almost the definition of a good style, that the thoughts sought to be conveyed are rendered applicable to as large a number of different dispositions as the nature of the thoughts renders possible. And thus a good style implies (and will often supply to others) considerable knowledge of mankind. And though it i[illegible] th[illegible] [illegible] superficially better style by lowering their thoughts, by emptying them of their difficulty, and, with their difficulty, of the best part of their substance, yet this does not diminish the merit of such good writing as does not swerve from the height of a genuinely noble conception. For example, the late Hugh Miller had a more poetical, and what some might think a more striking, style than Sir Charles Lyell, but it would not be just to put him above Sir Charles Lyell in this respect without taking into account the much less difficulty of the conceptions which Hugh Miller undertook to expound and illustrate. It should, however, be added, that Hugh Miller's works have a source of interest apart from geological speculation, as the record of a man who rose to a very considerable point of excellence by his own ability, without any of the helps which society supplies to those born in the higher or middle ranks.

It is, however, when we leave physical and scientific writings, and come to those which involve knowledge of and sympathy for man, that style attains its highest influence and development. It is, in fact, one of those inexplicable things, like the tones of music or the colours of a picture, which have a power of conveying in a moment thought and feeling which no laborious effort at explanation could possibly convey. It is distinct from rhythm, and yet closely allied to it. How can we express what such a power is? We speak of chords in the human mind, and the metaphor appears to be not far from the truth. It would seem that, as in material things there is a certain arrangement and collocation of particles such that, when one chord or piece of glass is struck and gives a ringing sound, the vibration will be communicated to all of similar texture, and they will return the sound, so there are in the human body collocations of nerves, and in the human soul unnoticed, but not slight or transient, dispositions of feeling, whence influences are communicated by a mutual interchange—influences which form their own end, and are not, like words, merely the means of propagating other influences. And if the object of an historian is, as it is, to make us understand men—and not merely men, but man, the common human nature—then that surely is no superficial merit in an historian which adds to his power of expressing that which is the very subject of his study. And we have mentioned historians because of all forms of study which have man for their object history is the most definite and material; and what we have said is even more true of philosophy, of poetry, and of painting. Yet in all these there is a certain contrariety and discrepancy of object, as regards the style, which does not exist in scientific writings. No fulness of matter is any impediment to clearness of style in a scientific writer; but there are delicate chords in man which are of themselves unintelligible to many, and the writer who tries to express these must, without any fault of his own, lose that universal intelligibility which he cannot but desire. And what happens in consequence of this is, at times, even worse; there are writers who, finding that others will not understand their noblest thoughts, give up the effort at universal intelligibility, and make the expression of their thoughts bizarre and needlessly difficult. This has, we think, happened to two most distinguished writers of the present day—Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Browning. No living writers have a greater compass of material in the knowledge of human nature; and the early writings of both—Paracelsus, for instance, and the essay on Burns—had in them, necessarily, something remote from common apprehension, but yet nothing of wilful obscurity. It is hard not to think that, together with that more powerful flow which characterizes the later writings of both, there has not been mingled that contempt for the common reader which displays itself in a carelessness of being understood at all by the vulgar. And we fear that in his contempt Mr. Carlyle has by this time advanced so far that his writings of the present day are no longer understood by persons even of more than vulgar capacity. When Mr. Carlyle points to the English peerage as the salvation of the country, we suppose we must believe that there is some valuable meaning at the bottom of his utterance, but for the life of us we cannot make out what it is. Mr. Browning has of late recovered himself from that abyss of profound unintelligibility into which he at one time plunged, but we would appeal to any one whether he had not, at the time when he wrote the following stanza, a very considerable contempt for the ordinary understanding—whether he did not laugh in his sleeve at the thought how he was bothering and bamboozling the simple public:—

> Hobbs hints blue—straight he turtle eats;
> Nobbs prints blue—claret crowns his cup;
> Nokes outdares Stokes in azure feats,
> Both gorge. Who fished the murex up?
> What porridge had John Keats?

This stanza occurs at the end of the poem entitled "[illegible]pularity," which is one of those chosen by Mr. Browning [illegible] for the volume of his selected poems, and therefore one, we suppose, peculiarly calculated to edify the general reader. And the worst of it is that the general reader is sometimes a person who looks upon these oddities of style as something exceptionally splendid, and adopts them on his own account in productions which, as they have none of Mr. Browning's sense and cleverness to support them, are marvellous and lugubrious in the extreme.

It is, however, for the sake of future ages, rather than for our own, that such eccentricities as these are to be deplored. The novelty of the thing serves to carry it off at first; the very fact that many cannot understand it lends it the greater zest in the eyes of those who fancy they do understand it, and even if the enthusiasm of the few cannot extend itself to the many, which however it often does, yet it offers in itself much compensation. But as for future ages, though we of this present age should feel bound to assure them that the Latter Day Pamphlets or "Christmas Eve" contain matter most worthy to be read and studied, we tremble to think of the possibility there is that the difficulty of the task may prevent their testing our judgment.

The truth as respects Mr. Carlyle is, we are inclined to think, that his greatness has in no way diminished throughout his literary career, it is not that he is the decay of his former self, but that his genius, instead of being wrought up and elaborated with the care and constant attention to the understanding of mankind which is necessary for the permanence of its influence, now displays itself only in those misty, gigantic forms which more fitly belong to the birth and first origin of genius. It ought to be with genius as, according to La Place's hypothesis, it was with the creation of the solar system. At first a nebulous mass, loose and chaotic, with no form, with nothing inherent in it but matter and power, it gradually solidifies, becomes concrete and visible, divides into various parts with various functions, sends out ever new manifestations of itself (that hidden self which is the power that existed in it originally and endures throughout), becomes continually more complex, more apparent, fixed and diversified. But in that miniature solar system of which Mr. Carlyle has been the framer it is as if some foreign force, some wandering planet or star, had entered and shattered his matured combinations into their original and elementary atoms; so that his intellect produces no distinct shapes, but hovers ghostlike about our world of human thought, an enormous spiritual force, yet not directed towards any determinate end. For all that, the melody which was one of the earliest impulses that he gathered up into his being still remains and gives occasional signs of its presence. It is impossible to read even the wildest of his recent writings and not to feel that here there is a true poet; the marvellous music remains in sentences from which every other trace of form and definiteness has vanished. Such music belongs certainly not to Mr. Browning; the only writer of the present day who can at all be thought to equal it is one whose genius has undergone a similar change with that of Mr. Carlyle himself—Mr. Ruskin. But Mr. Ruskin has, we think, suffered more real deterioration than Mr. Carlyle, or at least his works have suffered this. His recent works have concerned subjects which he has not proved or measured, and thus, while the vagueness of Mr. Carlyle is the vagueness of the prophet, the vagueness of Mr. Ruskin has in it much of the vagueness of ignorance. And as we have said something against obscurity of style, we may conclude by remarking that the opposite error, that of too great simplicity, is at once more common and, as less rarely seen to be an error, more injurious. Man is mysterious and not simple, and any attempt, historical or philosophical, to treat of man in a style that contains nothing of mystery is sure to fail, even if not recognised to be a failure. It has always struck us as most instructive that Mr. Mill—who, of all writers, endeavours most to combine profundity with intelligibility, but with a leaning to intelligibility—should have been obliged in that one of his works which preeminently treats of man as man, the Essay on Liberty, to lay down at the outset an exception to his great principle, more extensive than the principle itself. For, after advocating the entire personal liberty of every one not an offender against the public good, he adds that of course there must be excepted all children and all nations that have not reached the civilized stage, who together make up a larger proportion of the human race than we should like to reckon. Without practically dissenting from the main thesis of Mr. Mill's book, this largeness of exception makes it evident that there is a mysteriousness in the subject which he has not cared to recognise, and that plain and intelligible terms cannot compass the whole nature of man. So that the end of the whole matter is, that while historians and philosophers should endeavour to push back the bounds of obscurity and mystery as far as possible, yet these qualities cannot be entirely dispensed with, and the attempt entirely to dispense with them—to treat of man (as Mr Mill seeks to do) in a style containing none but clear and distinct terms—results in inadequacy.

NATIONAL ANTIPATHIES

THE late quarrels between England and America have brought into prominence certain considerations which may be of more than merely transitory interest. They have revealed, not by any means for the first time, a fact which it may perhaps be salutary to remember; the fact, namely, that a considerable number of persons consider it in the light of a duty to regard us with something like persistent hatred. They do not confine themselves simply to feeling a resentment, justifiable or foolish, against certain acts of our Government which were held to be unfriendly, but they proceed to draw the general inference that Englishmen, as a nation, are proper objects of antipathy. An American will occasionally tell us, as if it were rather a gratifying and wholly a creditable circumstance, that whilst he makes many distinctions in favour of individuals, he regards us en masse with the same sort of feeling which Nelson cherished towards Frenchmen. That simple-minded hero, if we remember rightly, summed up the whole duty of his subordinates in two great commandments—that they were to obey orders, and hate Frenchmen as they hated the devil. Of course, when the feeling is directed against ourselves, we recognise its exquisitely unreasonable character. We are conscious of many faults, and are by no means in the habit of concealing them; but we cannot admit that we are so destitute of compensating virtues as to justify any people in taking us to be indiscriminately hateful. It may be that we are not guilty to the same extent of any such unreasoning sentiments ourselves. Englishmen, at any rate, are not so much inclined to follow each other like a flock of sheep, and to adopt a universal creed of any kind without exception or moderation; if some of us are foolish enough to cultivate blind prejudices against foreigners, they always find compatriots ready to take the opposite side of the question, and to rebuke them with sufficient energy. Yet individuals are often enough to be found who regard particular classes of foreigners with bitter hostility. If the old hatred of the French has died out to some extent, it still works in many provincial towns; and there are people who are ready to retort upon our American detractors with a hatred which, primâ facie at least, is equally unreasonable. It is perhaps worth asking what is the real value to be attached to such manifestations of national sentiment.

The first remark which occurs upon the subject is that it seems to be absurd to hate people for displaying peculiarities which are the natural result of the circumstances in which they are placed. It would be ridiculous in an American to condemn us for retaining many old prejudices, foolish though some of them may be, considering the strength with which the whole course of our history has tended to fix them in our character; and equally ridiculous in us to condemn the inhabitants of a new country for the want of certain refinements which are the slow product of an ancient and continuous civilization. The remark, indeed, is not sufficient by itself. We hate a thief and a murderer, though the circumstances under which he was raised may have put it almost out of the question that he should be anything better. As Christians, indeed, we are bound to hate nobody; and moralists have argued that if it were possible to place the vilest of mankind on some desert island, where they could do no harm either by practice or example, we ought to wish them to be as happy as their condition would admit. As a matter of fact, however, very few people are sufficiently good Christians to distinguish between a man and his qualities; we cannot contrive to love a criminal and hate his crimes; if we loathe cruelty and vice, we equally loathe the concrete embodiment of those tendencies; and therefore, if we could say of any nation that it was intrinsically worse than its neighbours in a moral point of view, it would be excusable, if not strictly justifiable, to regard it with disgust, and that without taking into account the causes to which its demoralization was owing. Here, however, we are met by the obvious facts. No one can say that the difference between civilized nations is so marked, and marked so distinctly in one direction, as to justify one in regarding another with simple contempt. We have passed the time at which we could summarily set down the French as a frivolous and immoral people, whose gaiety was explained by their natural fitness for slavery, and whose manners and customs resembled those so tersely summed up by a proverbial navigator. We allow that many of our prejudices were founded on the most profound ignorance, and that probably no living man could give an impartial verdict as to the general question of the relative merits of Frenchmen and Englishmen. In the same way we often hear an American detailing the string of commonplaces which he has learnt from his party, and naively explaining our indifference to them by the innate stupidity and wickedness of our nation; meanwhile we know perfectly well that the same man in England would have run over another set of phrases with equal glibness, plagiarizing from the Daily Telegraph instead of the New York Tribune. The character and intelligence of the man would have been essentially the same; but he would have worn a different set of colours. The amazing moral superiority which he arrogates to himself depends simply on his having happened to learn certain political formulas by heart, and is so far purely superficial. There are, it is true, certain marked differences of national character, but they are not such as to establish a distinct superiority on either side, nor do they supply the grounds on which that superiority is claimed. If an American claimed to be quicker-witted than an Englishman, we should have to inquire into the truth of the supposed fact, and see what is to be set against it on our side. But when he claims to be the exclusive possessor of certain political truths, he is really boasting that he happens to read a different set of newspapers from other people, and might as well pride himself on shaving his upper lip instead of his chin. It is, indeed, a matter of the utmost importance what political principles are current in a nation; we only deny that, as matters are at present, the difference of opinions on such subjects corresponds to any distinct difference in the moral or intellectual standard of those who hold them. The British shopkeeper is not intrinsically better or worse than the shopkeeper on the boulevards or on Broadway. We can see many profound differences between them, but we cannot place them with any confidence in order of merit.

If civilized nations are on the whole approximately at the same level, we feel it to be as foolish to hate savages or the semi-civilized races as to dislike animals or children. They are at an imperfect stage of development, and in fact excite no antipathy, unless in some few exceptional cases. And this suggests what is the real cause of such national antipathies. It is not that we seriously believe another race to be less moral or less intelligent than ourselves, for in that case we should hate the Chinese or the negroes more than Frenchmen or Americans. We really hate nations because they are so nearly our equals. It is felt to be intolerable that people who do not enjoy the blessings of the British Constitution, and who cannot even talk intelligibly, should be in many ways as good as ourselves. A wretched being who, with unaccountable perversity, says oui when he means yes, shows himself to be capable of building towns and making railways, and even fighting battles, as well as we could do it ourselves. This is the inexpressibly provoking thing about foreigners; and it is to relieve ourselves from the uncomfortable sensations which the circumstance produces, that we brag so loudly about our supposed points of superiority. Our ostensible reason for the antipathies we cherish is the belief that our neighbours are really degraded beings; but the real cause of the antipathies is the uncomfortable sensation that, however superior we may be in some points, they manage to keep tolerably abreast of us in the race for national excellence. Englishmen were hated on the Continent so long as they presumed to interfere in Continental matters, and were hated by their allies at least as much as by their enemies. If we consent to reduce ourselves to insular insignificance, and allow our commercial supremacy to be entirely upset, we may take such comfort as may be in the thought that people will begin to do us justice, as they would to specimens in a museum, or monkeys in a zoological garden. Even the Americans, when they have taken Canada, exacted four hundred millions of compensation from us, and set up an independent Republic in Ireland, will begin to be a little sentimental about the old country, or such fraction of it as may still be left on its legs.

National antipathies, then, are likely to be strong in proportion as they are unreasonable; that is to say, in proportion as they are founded on no real superiority. There are, however, other elements in the dislike which we feel for another nation which tend to disappear with increased means of communication. What we may call errors of mental perspective tend to distort the idea which each nation forms of its neighbour. If we endeavour to appreciate the conceptions which a commonplace half-educated man takes of a foreign country, we must begin by narrowing and confusing our intellects. In the first place, he thinks of the whole nation as of a single unit, which is embodied in some such conventional figure as John Bull or Brother Jonathan. Every peculiarity handed down by [illegible]

John Bull is supposed to be always humbling himself before a lord, and Brother Jonathan to be perpetually whittling a stick and chewing tobacco. This kind of anthropomorphism, by which the type is put for the whole, is natural and convenient enough. But, in the next place, as the foreign nation is generally heard of in its relations to the [illegible]

Englishmen who get up every morning, eat their breakfast, do their daily work, and go to bed without ever remembering the existence of the Atlantic ocean. We have succeeded in impressing upon our minds with more or less distinctness that there are a good many people in France and Germany, and that they have other things to do besides following the details of English politics. But this is a comparatively modern discovery, which can hardly be said as yet to be generally understood. During the preceding period of ignorance it is a natural tendency to exaggerate enormously the interest with which we are regarded by others [illegible] deal of ignorance, directed by occasional outbursts of passi[illegible] our interests happened to be visibly concerned, foreigners have kindly attributed to us designs of profound and perfidious policy which are totally beyond our capacity; and we are only too ready to repay the misconception in kind. If this source of confusion tends to disappear, and we come to realize the fact that nations take up a larger space than is represented on the map, and have more opinions than those uttered through their Foreign Ministers, the most fertile source of irritation will disappear; and if we also come to believe that the differences of virtue are not so enormous as we sometimes fancy, national antipathy may in time be replaced by a more healthy kind of national emulation. It has always had this ingredient of good, that it has been the means by which nations have been encouraged to develop their own characteristic excellences, and the imaginary foreigner has supplied a useful background as a kind of foil to set off our supposed merits. The reaction between the intellects of different countries has been amongst the most potent causes of progress; and it is desirable, not that it should be destroyed, but that it should be accompanied with as little as may be of unreasonable dislike.

BORED HUSBANDS.

THE curtain falls on joined hands when it does not descend on a tragedy, and novels for the most part end with a wreath of orange-blossoms and a pair of high-stepping greys, as the last act that claims to be recorded; for both novelists and playwrights assume that with marriage all the great events of life have ceased, and that, once wedded to the beloved object, there is sure to be smooth sailing and halcyon seas to the end of time. It sounds very cynical and shocking to question this pretty belief, but unfortunately for us who live in the world as it is, and not as it is supposed to be, we find that even a union with the beloved object does not always ensure perfect contentment in the home, and that bored husbands are by no means rare.

The ideal honeymoon is of course an Elysian time, during which nothing works rusty or gets out of joint; and the ideal marriage is only a life-long honeymoon, where the happiness is more secure and the love deeper, if more sober; but the prose reality of one and the other has often a terrible dash of weariness in it, even under the most favourable conditions. Boredom begins in the very honeymoon itself. At first starting in married life there are many dangers to be encountered, not a shadow of which was seen in the wooing. There are odd freaks of temper turning up quite unexpectedly; there is the sense, so painful to some men, of being tied for life, of never being able to be alone again, never free and without responsibilities; there are misunderstandings to-day, and the struggle for mastery to-morrow—the cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, which may prove to be the tempest that will destroy all; there is the unrest of travelling, and the awkwardness of unusual association, to help in the general discomfort; or, if the happy pair have settled down in a vale and a cottage for their month, there is the "sad satiety" which all men feel after a time when they have had one companion only, with no outside diversion to cause a break. But the honeymoon at last draws to a close, and the relieved bridegroom gets back to his old haunts, to his work, his friends, and his club; and though he takes to all these things again "with a difference," still they are helps and additions. This is the time of trial to a woman. If she gets over this pinch, and is sensible enough to understand that human nature cannot be kept up at high pressure, even in love, and that a man must sooner or later come down from romance to work-a-day prose, from the passionate lover to the cool and sober husband—if she can understand this, and settle into his pace, without fretting on the one hand, or casting about for unhealthy distractions on the other—she will do well, and will probably make a pleasant home, and thereby diminish the boredom of life. But, unfortunately, not every woman can do this; and it is just during this time of the man's transition from the lover to the friend that so many women begin to make shipwreck of their own happiness and his. They think to keep him a romantic wooer still, by their tears at his prosaic indifference to the little sentimentalities once so eagerly accepted and offered; they try to hold him close by their flattering but somewhat tiresome exactions; their jealousies—very pretty perhaps, and quite as flattering—are infinite, and as baseless as they are infinite; all of which is very nice up to a certain point and in the beginning of things, but all of which gets awfully wearisome as time goes on, and a man wants both a little change and a little rest. But women do not see this; or, seeing it, they cannot accept it as a necessary condition of things; wherefore they go on in their fatal way, and, by the very unwisdom of their own love, bore their husband out of his. Or they grow substantially cold because he is superficially cooler, and think themselves justified in ceasing to love him altogether because he takes their love for granted, and so has ceased to woo it.

If they are jealous, or shy, or unsocial, as so many women are, they make life very heavy by their exclusiveness, and the monastic character they give to the home. A man married to a woman of this kind is, in fact, a house prisoner, whose only hours of freedom lie beyond the four walls of home. His bachelor friends are shut out. They smoke, or entice him to drink more than his wife thinks is good for him; or they induce him to bet on the Derby, or to play for half-crowns at whist or billiards, or they lead him in some other way of offence abhorrent to women. So the bachelor friends are shouldered out, and when the husband wants to entertain them, he must invite them to his club—if he has one—and pay the penalty when he gets home. In a few years' time his wife will be glad to encourage her sons' young friends to the house, for the sake of the daughters on hand; but husbands and sons are in a different category, and there are few fathers who do not learn, as time goes on, how much the mother will allow that the wife refused. If bachelor friends are shouldered out of the house, all female friends are forbidden anything like an intimate footing, save those few whom the wife thinks specially devoted to herself and of whom she is not jealous. And they are very few. There are perhaps no women in the world so exclusive towards their husbands as are Englishwomen. A husband is bound to one woman only, no doubt; but she thinks him also bound to have no affection whatsoever outside the house and family. If he meets an intelligent woman, pleasant to talk to, of agreeable manners and ready wit, and if he talks to her in consequence with anything like persistency or interest, he offends against the unwritten law, and his wife, whose utmost power of conversation consists in putting in a yes or no with tolerable accuracy of aim, thinks herself slighted and ill-used. She may be young and pretty, and dearly loved for her own special qualities, and her husband may not have a thought towards his new friend, or any other woman, in the remotest degree trenching on his allegiance to her, but the fact that he finds pleasure, though only of an intellectual and æsthetic kind, in the society of any other woman, that he feels an interest in her life, chooses her for his friend, or finds community of pursuits or sympathy in ideas, makes his wife by just so much a victim and aggrieved. And yet what a miserably monotonous home is that to which she would confine him! He is at his office all day, badgered and worried with various business complications, and he comes home tired, perhaps cross—even well-conducted husbands have that way sometimes. He finds his wife tired and cross too; so that they begin the evening together mutually at odds, she irritated by small cares, and he disturbed by large anxieties. Or he finds her preoccupied and absorbed in her own pursuits, and quite disinclined to make any diversion for his sake. He asks her for some music; she used to be ready enough to sing and play to him in the old love-making days; but she refuses now. Either she has some needlework to do, which might have been done during the day when he was out, or baby is asleep in the nursery, and music in the drawing-room would disturb him—at all events she cannot sing or play to-night; and even if she does—he has heard all her pieces so often! If he is not a reading-man, those long, dull, silent evenings are very trying. She works, and drives him wild with the click of her needle; or she reads the last new novel, and he hates novels, and gets tired to death when she insists on telling him all about the story and the characters; or she chooses the evening for letter-writing, and if the noise of her pen scratching over the paper does not irritate him, perhaps it sends him to sleep, when at least he is not bored. But dull, objectless, and vacant as their evenings are, his wife would not hear of any help from without to give just that little fillip which would prevent boredom and not create ceremony. She would think her life had gone to pieces, and that only desolation was before her, if he hinted that his home was dull, and that, though he loves her very dearly, and wants no other wife but her, yet that her society only—toujours perdrix—without change or addition, is a little stupid, however nice the partridge may be, and that things would be bettered if Mrs. or Miss So-and-So came in sometimes, just to brighten up the hours. And if he were to make a practice of bringing home his men friends, she would probably let all parties concerned feel pretty distinctly that she considered the home her special sanctuary, and that guests whom she did not invite were little else than intruders. She would perhaps go willingly enough to a ball or crowded soirée, or she might like to give one; but that intimate form of society which is a mere enlargement of the home life she dreads as too much like the supplementing of deficiencies, and thinks her married happiness safer in boredom than in any diversion from herself as the sole centre of her husband's pleasure.

The home life stagnates in England, and in very few families is there any mean between dissipation and this stagnation. We can scarcely wonder that so many husbands think matrimony a mistake as we have it in our insular arrangements, that they look back regretfully to the time when they were unfettered and not bored, or that their free friends, who watch them as wild birds watch their caged companions, curiously and reflectively, come to share their opinion. Wife and home, after all, make up but part of a man's life; they are not his all, and do not satisfy the whole of his social instinct, nor is any one woman the concentration of all womanhood to a man, leaving nothing that is beautiful, or in its way desirable, on the outside. Besides, when with his wife a man is often as much isolated as when alone, for any real companionship there is between them. Few women take a living interest in the lives of men, and fewer still understand them. They expect the husband to sympathize with them in the kitchen gossip and the nursery chatter, the neighbours' doings and all the small household politics, but as a race they are utterly unable to comprehend his pleasures, his thoughts, his duties, the responsibilities of his profession, or the bearings of any public question in which he takes a part. But even if this were not so, and granting that they could enter fully into his life, and sympathize with him as intelligent equals, not only as compassionate saints or loving children, there would still be the need of novelty, and still the certainty of boredom without it. For human life, like all other forms of life, must have a due proportion of fresh elements continually added to keep it sweet and growing, else it becomes stagnant and stunted, as everything else would be. And daily intercourse undeniably exhausts the moral ground. After the close companionship of years no one can remain mentally fresh to the other, unless indeed one or both be of the rarest order of mind, and of a practically inexhaustible knowledge. Save these exceptional instances, we must all of necessity get worn out by constant intercourse. We know every thought, every opinion, and almost every square inch of information possessed, we have heard the old stories again and again, and know exactly what will lead up to them, and at what point they will begin, we have measured the whole sweep of mind, and have probed its depths, and though we may love and value what we have learnt, yet we want something new—fresh food for interest, though not necessarily a new love for the displacement of the old. But this is what very few Englishwomen can understand or will allow. They hold so intensely by the doctrine of unity that they are even jealous of a man's pursuits if they think these take up any place in his mind which might else be theirs. They must be good for every part of his life; and the poorest of them all must be his only source of interest, suffering no other woman to share his admiration or obtain his friendship, though this would not touch his love for themselves or interfere with their rights. But this is a hard saying to them, and one they cannot receive, wherefore they keep a tight grasp on the marital collar, and suffer no relief of monotony by judicious loosening or by generous faith in integral fidelity. The practical result of which is that most men are horribly bored at home, and that the mass of us really suffer from the domestic stagnation to which national customs and the exclusiveness of our women doom us as soon as we become family men. It must, however, in fairness be added, that most men obtain some kind of compensation, and that very few walk meekly in their bonds without at times slipping them off, with or without the concurrence of their wives.

RESPONSIBILITY IN TIME OF WAR.

AMID the shame and indignation which accompany unexpected defeat, it seems vain to require from any people a cool judgment on the causes of the national disaster. Let a system palpably break down, or let statesmen be ever so much in fault, it is easier to condemn the general than to look beyond; and the political death of an unlucky commander is the favourite way, in modern days, of appeasing the popular cry for vengeance on those who brought the humiliation. It is but eight years ago that we saw a great republic sending forth a mass of undisciplined battalions, without organization, almost without a staff, to reconquer revolted provinces including millions of inhabitants; and when Bull Run came to prove that numbers in arms do not alone make an army, M'Dowell, because he failed to achieve the impossible, was practically ostracized for the rest of the war, whilst those who directed or served under him lived on to become trusted and honoured. M'Clellan was condemned in turn, because he strove, by making war slowly of set purpose, to gain the time for organizing his troops which he was denied before opening his campaign. We can claim but little advantage over our kinsfolk in this matter. The black winter of 1854-5 found Parliament and people chafing under our check before Sebastopol, and looking for a scapegoat as eagerly as in the days of Byng. If the reputation of the Alma victory and his own high personal character saved Lord Raglan from supersession, this was only at the cost of a change of War Ministers, and of a practical belying of all confidence in our commanders, by giving the Field-marshal a sort of keeper as Chief of Staff, and removing the only engineer who understood the work before us, whose prophecies as to the mistakes we were committing in the direction of our attack were destined to prove of bitter truth in Redan failures long after. The French appear to be even less wise under such trials than ourselves, if we may judge either by the way in which they guillotined unfortunate generals when the guillotine was in fashion, and shuffled commanders successively into power in the days when the star of the Republic [illegible] before Suwarrow in Italy, or by the persistent in-teaching led them to connect with that great disaster. A fresher instance than any of these, of the disposition to saddle national calamities upon luckless generals, has just come under the notice of all Europe in the Austrian Official History of the War of 1866. The main object of the writers would appear to be to prove Benedek's incompetence to have been the sole origin of the Bohemian defeats, and this in the face of the opinions of all other critics. The worthy veteran Jomini declared, in the last essay which flowed from his fertile pen, that the causes of the Austrian collapse were the better organization, the better armament, and the better strategy of Prussia. If this assertion of a disinterested and skilled observer be accepted as true, it follows that, however completely Benedek failed, he is not by any means to be held singly responsible for the fall of Austria's military power, and that bad administration or false principles of government may be as fatal to the reputation of an army as the worst mistakes a captain can make.

Libraries have been written on strategy and tactics, and oceans of pamphlets on military organization, but without any systematic attempt, so far as we are aware, to define the limits of the responsibility of those who are concerned in the great transactions of war, and to assign to the general, the Government he represents, and the subordinates who obey him, their respective functions in the military hierarchy in such a manner as to give the State the fullest advantage of the services of all. This question, hitherto left untouched, yet so important in its bearings on all military reform, has been at last approached in a liberal and philosophic spirit by one of the most practical soldiers and successful generals of this age of war, the Archduke Albert of Austria, a personage whose functions and character seem to be so completely misunderstood by some of the most important of our contemporaries that we shall endeavour later to say a few words upon them. For the present our task is to glance at his remarkable essay on the subject already referred to, Ueber die Verantwortlichkeit im Kriege, which, though brief, is so clear and masterly as to show that he has not only inherited the rare military qualities of his father, the Archduke Charles, but, like him, is a profound thinker and lucid writer.

The excuse which the Archduke makes for his work—which, though published anonymously, has been from the first unhesitatingly attributed to the true author—is twofold. The immense responsibility which attends all who stir up hostilities is proved by the anxiety always shown in modern days, by each party to a war, to prove that it was forced upon it against its will; and so confused are men's minds on the subjects of international politics, that the guilty party (it is needless to point out the reference here to the events of 1866) too often imposes its own defence on the world as truth. And again, as to the events of an unfortunate campaign, popular passion frequently errs most widely in its estimate of the true causes, and the very knowledge that it does so weighs upon brave men beforehand, and may dangerously enfeeble them action in the hour of trial.

The greatest of all human responsibilities must ever be that of the general-in-chief in a decisive campaign. To understand what its actual degree is, and from the study of the question to learn not to demand what is impossible, is the duty of every statesman aspiring to the first rank of power. It is even more the duty of the historian, and the subject has the highest interest of all for those who have held, or who may live to hold, such commands as are spoken of. And to study it with any good effect, it is needful to remember that a generalissimo is but a man, of like weaknesses with other men. He cannot control his own health, nor the weather, nor the involuntary mistakes of others. A telegram wrongly deciphered, a message miscarried, an attack of physical weakness, may be the cause of a lost action. Soldiers in the field understand this better than persons removed from it, and make more allowances for mishaps, as they are less prone to create an idol of a chief for a single stroke of success. Hence the memory of really great generals lives in the affections of the grandchildren of those who followed their standards, and their names become household words from this genuine attachment, when the popular adulation which follows isolated successes is long forgotten.

On a careful review of the realities of the problem, as observed in past history, it is apparent that the commander of a popular army raised suddenly for a popular cause (we may instance France in 1792-3, or America in 1861-2) should have little demanded from him, for his real responsibility can, if honestly judged, be but small. But if such an army be maintained and trained for years (as were those of America towards the close of the civil war), the powers of the commander necessarily grow larger and his responsibility increases. Lastly, where a general has for years commanded and trained a disciplined force ready for combat (Radetzky, in Italy, is cited by the Archduke), the greatest demands are justly laid upon him when war breaks out, and, if he proves equal to them, he has the opportunity of winning immortal renown. The circumstances should, however, have been completely in his favour; for if he has had beaten troops to reorganize in too short a time, or political difficulties have hindered his free action, he is not to be charged—as historians are too apt to charge him—with a failure which may be the inevitable result of causes beyond his control. Similarly, a generalissimo may be charged with any lack of the preparations which he has had the power to complete after receiving his command; but too often he is blamed for the want of equipment and training which should have been furnished long before, as well as for that resulting from a deficiency of his own executive powers of supply, before active operations invest him with that supreme local authority which cannot then be denied. Unfortunately, the world judges of men so placed chiefly by the results of the campaigns; except in the case of those who, like Napoleon, have already established their claims to genius. Then, indeed, it is discovered that a general in a lost campaign, such as that of the French Emperor in 1814 in the East of France (and, let us add, of Soult in the South at the same time, and of Lee in 1864), may show more courage, energy, and resource than in the most brilliant days of success. Finally, it must be observed that statesmen must not only bear the responsibility of the proper preparation for war, but must give their chosen commander full confidence during its course. War, in fact, is but a violent form of policy for the supposed good of the State, and during its continuance the operations of the field should form an integral portion of the general combinations, and the well-being of the army must not be made subordinate to any supposed independent advantage.

As to the division of responsibility between the commander and his staff, it is enough to say that the former must needs be accountable for all orders issued in his name. Yet, as many minor decisions must be made by the departments without consulting him, it follows that he is bound to keep himself informed of all that are really important, and either to choose proper assistants for himself, or to refuse absolutely to employ those nominated by others, if not fully trustworthy. How little this principle has guided our own administration, even at the most important crises, will best be understood by those who read the Waterloo volume of the Wellington Despatches.

As to the subordinate generals, those in the higher posts, whilst owing implicit obedience to their chief's orders, should have large independence within proper limits, and must often be responsible in a high degree for their method of interpreting their instructions. The larger the army and the more numerous and considerable its subdivisions, the higher becomes this responsibility, and the less of detail should be attempted in the instructions of the general-in-chief. He should take care that his lieutenants fully understand the general purpose of his orders, and the end to be attained by their execution. This known, a considerable freedom of action should be reserved, with a proportionate responsibility as its consequence, for the chiefs of corps, or even divisions. And this principle of independence (as will appear presently) within certain limits should be carried down in the army to the rank of non-commissioned officer. As the grade is higher, so the responsibility and the accompanying range of action should become wider. Orders should be clear, but all useless details should purposely be excluded. The forgetfulness of this true principle will of itself invariably hinder the activity and force of an army; and the burden of self-imposed responsibilities which high commanders are apt to assume has the double evil, in time of real service, that it both weighs them down with useless work, and deprives their subordinates of the energy and independence of thought necessary to the success of the whole machine. The evil which the Archduke attacks he traces developing itself at various times in the last century in overladen books of drill, martinet training, useless show parades, and the devotion of generals to the most insignificant and formal details of the service. With these errors he classes the ordinary peace manœuvres, "carried out on open plains, prepared from the book beforehand, and conducted with no more regard to the features of real war than if performed by so many puppets on wires." These monstrosities he believes to have almost disappeared from Europe. We confess to some uncomfortable feeling that the Archduke must have been over here lately in disguise, witnessing certain reviews of our own, and that, under cover of the past, he may be satirizing the present. Upon this subject the illustrious writer takes occasion to point out the opposite error, into which the press so readily falls, of running down the necessary discipline of a national force as useless. Pedantry he believes to be virtually all but extinct. Good discipline may be fully maintained without it, and good discipline is absolutely necessary to make any troops valuable. The Archduke cites instances witnessed by himself where well-trained soldiers, when shaken by fire, were rallied at once on their commander giving them an ordinary parade order in a calm but audible voice.

As to the lower officers of an army, the principles already laid down should, as before said, be carried out in all grades, the limits of independent action naturally lessening, as the charge grows smaller, down to the simple implicit obedience which is required from the private sentinel. It is the business of commanders in time of peace to act on such a system that the vigour and energy of each fraction of an army may remain intact from undue dependence upon superior authority for each trifling decision. It is only by practising this habitually in peace that the full military power of a national force can be reckoned on in time of war. To attain this end it is necessary for the higher authorities to reverse certain practices formerly too common in European armies, and especially to discountenance thoroughly the abuse which superior officers are apt to make of their power by taking to themselves duties and decisions which belong not to them by right, but lie strictly within the sphere of those below them. All useless references for authority should therefore be discouraged. Mistaken and arbitrary decisions on the part of officers in high posts may be severely visited upon them if necessary; but such errors should never be made—as is too often the practice—the excuse for limiting the responsibilities proper to their positions. Routine returns and the like documents should be chiefly the work of very subordinate commanders, so as not to occupy the time of those whose duties are rather to direct and decide for others. And as in the higher grades, so throughout, orders should be brief, clear, and to the point, and should have regard rather to the end to be attained than to the means—the substance, in fact, and not that form which officials so often mistake for it. If, by a constant attention to these principles in the quiet days of peace, the regeneration of a discouraged army be steadily carried on, there will be a gradual growth of a spirit of activity and life in its members; and, when war comes, superior officers will not find themselves overweighted with the care of petty details, nor those below them be found timorous and unfit to face the unusual responsibilities which war is certain to bring with it.

Such are the main thoughts to which the Archduke has given utterance. How far much that he says might have been suggested by our own organization, how far the remedies he would have applied in Austria, the maintenance of discipline combined with the extinction of the old martinet and pedant elements, are needed among ourselves, can be merely suggested here to the consideration of the thoughtful. This is no theoretical essayist that speaks, but a successful practical soldier, whose words carry with them more weight because they are in some sort a protest against a system of administration with which he himself is mixed up. Appointed generalissimo of Austria in the dark hours that followed Königgrätz, as was his father after Austerlitz, he voluntarily resigned his commission in order to smooth the course of the Emperor in his new career of liberalism, by transferring the army to the charge of a constitutional Minister. He remains employed solely in the capacity of Inspector-General, outside the War Office, which is independent of and separate from him. The essay we have followed shows that he is far from believing that all that might be done has been done to regenerate the national forces of his country, and it reads like a warning beforehand against making a future general-in-chief responsible for an organization he has in no way controlled. We dwell on this because the Archduke's position seems strangely misunderstood in this country. It is hard, indeed, that journals of the class of the Pall Mall and Spectator, not to mention the Daily News, should, in their notices of the now famous despatch of Bismark, charge an alleged mistake of judgment, or want of honesty, on the part of the Austrian War Chancery, to the very man who has long since resigned his charge there, and is clearly at issue with the present administration of the office.

MR. SPURGEON'S PROVERBS AND JINGLES

MR. SPURGEON has published a book. By a long list of advertisements subjoined to this publication we learn, what we did not know before, that Mr. Spurgeon is a magazine editor, and a very voluminous author, not only of sermons, but of all sorts of things in print. The book now before us is called John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Advice for Plain People. Its eulogists assure us that it is a very racy volume; and a critic who writes in the General Baptist Magazine, and affects the alliterative and the antithetical—this itch of the letter is catching—describes it as "vivacious, but not vulgar; caustic, but not cynical; witty, without any wantonness; racy, but yet never running into mere rattle; full of the best counsel, but signally free from any article of cant." To borrow a pen feather from this Baptist goose—we mean swan—we should, if we were inclined to be cynical and rather unfair, be rather disposed to say that Mr. Spurgeon's John Ploughman is pert, and yet puerile; vulgar, but not vigorous; bumptious, but not brilliant, forced, but not forcible; egotistical, and yet empty; dull, but not deep, pretentious, but not profound. What Mr. Spurgeon strives after is a combination of Sancho with Poor Richard, and the result is Tupper without his metre, and Franklin without his matter. The volume is a collection of what the author calls semi-humorous articles from Mr. Spurgeon's magazine called, we know not why, the Sword and Trowel, and assumes to be proverbial talk delivered in the person of a rustic ploughman, who discourses about all things in general and nothing in particular—divine and human, secular and profane, social and domestic. But we may as well give some specimens taken at random from Mr. Spurgeon's comic philosophy.

About Hope:—

He pulls at a long rope who waits for another's death. He who hunts after legacies had need have iron shoes. He that waits for dead men's shoes may long go barefoot. He who waits for his uncle's cow need not be in a hurry to spread the butter. Jack Shiftless was told that he was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, and that made a spoon of him, so that he is no more use at work than a cow at catching hares. . . . Hopes that grow out of graves are grave mistakes.

A good word for Wives :—

Jack is no better than Jill as a rule. . . . Where hearts agree there joy will be. United hearts death only parts. They say marriage is not often merry-age, but very commonly mar-age.

On Thriving :—

Always at it grows good cabbage and lettuce where others grow thistles. Plod is the word. He who plods on, the clods on, rods on rods will turn of the sods while laziness nods. . . . . Little expenses, like mice in a barn, when they are many, make great waste. Hair by hair heads get bald. Straw by straw the thatch goes off the cottage, and drop by drop the rain comes into the chamber. Small mites eat the cheese. When you mean to save, begin with your mouth, there are many thieves down the red lane.

Things not worth trying :—

Dip the Mississippi dry with a teaspoon ; twist your heel into the toe of your boot ; send up fishing-hooks with balloons, and fish for stars ; get astride a gossamer and chase a comet, choke a flea with a brickbat, but never attempt to coax a woman to say she will when she has made up her mind to say she won't.

This last remark Mr. Spurgeon credits to an American joker, but it is the model of much of his own platitudes. Artemus Ward is the best specimen of this kind of fictitious humour; but, ingenious though it looks, and grotesque, it is the very easiest of all writing. Shakspeare laughs at it when he talks of the butter-woman's jog to market; and it was prevalent in Shakspeare's days, and he often practised it himself, and some of the old Puritan writers whom Mr. Spurgeon has certainly read were great hands at it. As Jaques would say, Mr. Spurgeon is full of pretty answers, he has been acquainted with goldsmiths' wives, and conned posies out of rings; he answers right painted cloth—that is, he is rich in mottoes, sententiousness, proverbs, and dainty devices. His morality is as sound as a copy-book, and his quibbles and conceits are quite worthy of Touchstone. Not that Mr. Spurgeon does not say occasional good things, though whether they are his own, or genuine old proverbial lore, we cannot venture to pronounce, as his practice is to mix up borrowed and original jests higgledy-piggledy.

About Thoughts :—

An arrow may fly through the air, and leave no trace, but an ill thought leaves a trail like a serpent

Which, by the by, a serpent does not, though a slug does. This again has a seventeenth-century twang about it:—"Thoughts are toll-free, but not hell-free." But we believe that Mr. Spurgeon quotes himself when he says, neatly enough, "a man with a great deal of religion displayed in his shop window keeps a very small stock within"; and there is something of homely wit and wisdom in the genial saying, "Don't go to law unless you have nothing to lose; for lawyers' houses are built on fools' heads" "Beware of no man more than of yourself; we carry our worst enemies within us." In a word, as in all these bundles of conceits, the verdict must be that which Martial gave as to his own epigrams:—

Sunt bona, sunt quædam mediocria, sunt mala plura.

Were it not that Mr. Spurgeon occasionally breaks out with passionate insolence against all other teachers of religion as, ipso facto, knaves and hypocrites and impostors, because they do not conform to the Tabernacle type of teachers, we should be almost disposed to part with him in good temper. But what can be said in sufficient condemnation of the narrow-mindedness and bigotry of the little shabby sectarian spirit which says of all Churches—Latin, Greek, and Anglican—not to speak of the unattached Oriental communities of Christians, or of the diffused historical Christianity of sixteen centuries?—

Never believe in any priest of any religion, for before a man could be bad enough to pretend to be a priest, he must have hardened his heart and blinded his conscience to the most horrible degree. Our governors imprison gipsies for telling fortunes, and yet they give fat livings to those vagabonds who deceive the people in much weightier things. "Bad company," said the thief, as he went to the gallows between the hangman and a priest; a very honest speech, and a very true word.

It may be worth while to consider how it is that the sort of proverbial literature which Mr. Spurgeon has tried to revive is so much out of date. It survives, if at all among us, only in its worst form, in the melancholy productions of the weekly comic press, and in the burlesques of our modern London theatres. The emblematists of old Teutonic art have of late years been looked at, but they have met with little approval. The fact is, that quibbles, verbal or pictorial, irritate sound taste. Hobbes spoke of laughter as a sudden glory; but puns and forced antithesis and mere verbal joking are addressed to the lower faculties. It is the mere ear, or the mere eye, which is affected; and the inward man rebels at this pandering to the senses rather than the faculties. It is not a sudden glory, but a sudden contempt, which is provoked by the acrostic-mongers, punsters, and the writers of travesty. As we listen to a burlesque of the present day, we feel, or fancy that we feel, something of the ineffable smallness of intellect, the minute misery which it must cost a professor of the art of quibble to torture and contort words, and to debase thought, by grinding articulate speech into puns. We resent the affront, and scorn the tedious ingenuity. This sham humour addresses only a barbarous, or at the most a half-educated, stage of the human mind; or—which it is to be feared is our own case—it flourishes in the Lower Empire age of popular intelligence. A taste for burlesque is a sure sign of intellectual decay. And proverbs, as we all know, are invented, and are rife where the powers of mind are not rightly adjusted. There is scarcely a common proverbial saying which may not be capped by its contradictory, and in either case the proverb only expresses a half-truth, and is the result of a coarse and inadequate generalization of human life and manners. The moral which a popular proverb conveys is usually worthless, because it is unbalanced, and its morality becomes valueless, if not, as it usually is, mischievous, because it is not weighted and checked by an opposite and compensating truth. A proverb exactly hits the mental level of a shallow thinker or a narrow dogmatist; and while an aphorism is the result of measured and balanced thought, a general proposition in morals is usually fallacious, and therefore misleading. In generalibus latet falsitas; and one service which the schoolmen rendered to thought, and which has been lost since their labours have been ignorantly proscribed and idly ignored, was in their system of distinctions, qualifications, and abatements of a proposition. A proverb is the refuge of the unargumentative, and if a pistol will not fire, it may be used to knock a man down. There is no arguing with a proverb-monger, because he only deals with assumed universals. A common ground is lacking to the disputants, and the proverb, instead of being the result of philosophic experiment, is rather the expression of vulgar empiricism and half-knowledge.

To turn for a moment to Mr. Spurgeon. His John Ploughman's Talk confirms our view of what goes to make up the success of a popular preacher. As is the book so is the man. Mr. Spurgeon, we believe, exaggerates and intensifies the popular style. He deals in broad sayings, in plain speaking, in strong, vigorous, unqualified expressions This is what an effective sermon should be, and is the essence of a proverb. A preacher cannot waste—if it is wasting—his time in looking out for counter views, in making allowance for qualifications. He scorns limitations and distinctions. The proverb and the preacher are here at one. Hence it is that people preach best in their youth, and that many a good preacher gets afraid of the pulpit, and in mature age suspects his old telling talk, and the confident, decisive, and therefore attractive matter and manner of his earlier years, as a larger experience of men and things makes him reflective, cautious, and, as his hearers say, timid and uncertain and hesitating. A man with ripe views, or rather whose views are getting constantly modified and checked as he sees more of life, cannot preach well. It requires a certain narrow-mindedness to preach what is called effectively Youth is the season for vigorous language and earnest convictions, and for confidence and decision. And as it is with intellectual, so is it with æsthetical, qualities. A formed judgment revolts at the crudities and unmigating assumptions, and, in all senses of the word, the presumptions of the earlier stages of intellectual growth, and revolts also at an over-confident and blustering manner. A man must have something, perhaps much, of the feminine nature to preach well. A woman of good feelings and intentions feels it to be a moral duty to express exactly what is in her mind—what are her convictions—only because they are her sincere and honest convictions. So must the preacher, if he to preach well—that is, to preach sermons that will tell. His concern, he thinks, is not so much with what may be said on the other side, nor even to recognise that there can be any other side, but, because a thing is in him, to out with it, as he would say. This is Mr. Spurgeon's manner. It is in his book as in his sermons. It is simply unfaithful to suppose that there are two sides to any question, and to be in earnest is only to be quite certain of your own line, and immeasurably scornful of everything else. A preacher, to be very popular with congregations such as most congregations are, must be dictatorial and magisterial, contemptuous, violent, and addicted to strong language. Whether these qualities are faults or excellences far be it from us to say, but they are Mr. Spurgeon's, and he is a popular preacher, and he has published a book full of abrupt, unproved, and unargumentative assertions. And proverbial philosophy, as it is oddly called exactly because there is no philosophy in it, consists of assumptions of this coarse and impetuous, but telling, character.

COMPOUNDER WINS.

THE House of Commons is quietly proceeding to restore the Compound Householder to life, and it is likely to be diverted by more exciting topics from discussing the question of who killed him. Each leader of party has exclaimed by turns to the restless ghost which rose before his appalled eyes—

Thou canst not say I did it. Never shake
Thy gory locks at me.

The hand that did the deed was undoubtedly not the hand of Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Disraeli, and it is equally beyond controversy that Macbeth did not stab Banquo. The language of Ministers and ex-Ministers in the House of Commons rather leads, indeed, to the inference that nobody killed the Compound Householder, but that he perished by a lamentable fatality; but in hustings' speeches the same Ministers, or some of them, do not scruple to charge his murder against their adversaries. However, if he is coming back to life, it cannot be necessary to decide who killed him, and we think that the House of Commons upon warm evenings will not be disposed to pursue a barren and interminable inquiry.

The conduct of what is called the Assessed Rates Bill by Mr. Goschen has been a creditable, but necessarily unsuccessful, effort to imitate performers upon a tight-rope or a bicycle. A few years ago Mr. Goschen was invited to come and make a speech at an annual boating dinner, and it appeared that one of his claims to the attention of th company was that he had never been in a boat but o It may be thought that the difficulty which Mr Gosch felt in balancing himself in a sculler racing-boat was led to his mind when he undertook to restore the practice of compounding while preserving the principle of personal payment of rates. He assured the House of Commons that he approached this subject with the most anxious desire not to interfere with the electoral machinery established by the Reform Act of 1867. The man who walks along the greasy pole at a seaside regatta has the most anxious desire not to tumble into the water before he reaches the leg of mutton at the end Mr. Goschen desired to avoid reviving the political discussions which were so active about two years ago, but nevertheless he would be compelled, in fact if not in word, to invite the House to dest y that which it was then supposed to be particularly desirous to preserve. Mr Goschen told the House, when he introduced his measure, that the change which he proposed was not at all violent, but went on the acknowledged principle that payment by the landlord was payment by the tenant, if the former was authorized by the latter The House had solemnly declared that the tenant must pay the rates, but if the landlord paid them it would come, said Mr Goschen, to the same thing In order to understand Mr Goschen's proposal, it must be remembered that by the Reform Act of 1867 it was enacted that where the owner was rated, at the time of the passing of the Act, in respect of a dwelling-house in a borough instead of the occupier, his liability to be rated in future p rates should cease, and the occupier was t ated in r the dwelling-house he occupied. Th the legal liability to pay the rate would rest upon the occupier Th portant safegu of the Constitution, which was called personal payment rates, being thus embodied in the Act, it passed seers of the poor proceeded to collect rates from small occupiers in pursuance of it The small occupiers being called upon to pay rates, stated in strong, and often in profane, language that they could not or they would not Hereupon the overseers issued summonses by thousands, and the defaulting occupiers sent their wives to answer for them, who surrounded the bewildered magistrates and demanded, not without inarticulate shrieks, exemption or indulgence. The Committee of the House of Commons which sat last Session upon this subject received a good deal of evidence, but we do not find that they were attended by a deputation of wives and mothers from Bethnal Green If they had been, they would perhaps have seen that the economical arguments against compounding, however forcible in the closet, will not bear contact with the realities of English life The Reform Act was passed as a concession to the class of small householders, and yet it was so framed as almost to drive those hou cholders, where they were most numerous, into resistance to the law.

We are almost tempted to wish that Mr Disraeli had remained in office, in order that we might have seen how his Government would have manipulated their own Reform Act. If there be a person capable of at once maintaining and abrogating a principle it is Mr Disraeli, and we really should have liked, if quite agreeable to him, to have seen his performance on the greasy pole. But the task devolved Mr Goschen, and he bega vith confident alacrity. Th nall occupier must be rated and must pay the rate, but he might be allowed to deduct it from his rent. Further, it was considered that the small occupier usually occupies by the week, and it could not be right that he should be called upon to pay rate for a prospective period, during which h might be ejected from the tenement It was accordingly proposed to divide the rate into instalments, so that a weekly tenant should not be called upon to pay an amount of rate greater than two weeks' rent. This proposal, it must be allowed, did not affect the principle, or supposed principle, of the Reform Act, and it was a partial adoption of the view of those opponents of compounding who maintain that if the rate be collected in sufficiently small instalments, it can be paid as easily as the rent—which is manifestly true. Mr. Goschen further stated that he did not intend to interfere with voluntary arrangements by which the landlord paid the rate. Legal compounding was, for high constitutional reasons, abolished by the Reform Act, but illegal compounding was to be encouraged by the Legislature. As things stood, the landlord would not agree to pay the rate for the poorest class of tenants, because he calculated that if he did not do so, they would get excused by the proper authority from paying it. But if the poorest class of tenants were empowered to deduct the rate paid by them from their rent, then, as the landlord would know that he must pay the rate ultimately, he might as well agree to pay it in the first instance. Thus the Bill would not interfere with voluntary arrangements, but it would rather render it more probable that landlord ould adopt them." The inducement to landlords to enter into these voluntary arrangements, even independently of the Bill, was, however, considerable; for parish officers came to Mr. Goschen, and told him that owners were indemnified for undertaking to pay rates by lower assessments of their property, which were of course illegal. Thus Mr Goschen told the House of Commons, when he introduced his Bill, that the law was habitually broken, but that he proposed to afford some additional encouragements and facilities for breaking it. Let readers bear in mind that the small class of occupiers who are concerned in these arrangements are the class for whom opportunity was to be provided of developing fine moral qualities under the system of personal payment of rates. They were invited to pay their rates in the sight of Heaven and of men, but they seem to prefer that their landlords should pay and charge it in the rent. On the 25th of February Mr. Goschen had advanced as far as this, that compounding was and remained abolished, and that it would be convenient that it should be more generally practised. He was beginning to walk on the greased pole with commendable steadiness, and he might have reasonably expected, after further practice, to reach the leg of mutton, when he seems suddenly to have bethought himself that it would save a great deal of trouble to scrape off the grease.

On Monday last Mr. Goschen moved the second reading of his Bill, which has undergone considerable amendment. I announced that the Government propose to re-authorize the practice of compounding, by permitting agreements between owners and overseers for the payment of rates, in consideration of a definite commission to be allowed to the owners. Thus the owners will take upon themselves the liability to pay rates, and the occupiers will be relieved from it. There may be differences of opinion as to the limit of yearly value of tenements to which the new system of compounding should be applicable, and as to the percentage of the commission to be allowed to owners. But the principle of personal payment appears to us to be irrevocably gone, and we can only hope that the small occupiers will be able to develop their moral qualities under some other stimulus The British Constitution will have to do as it best can without the much prized safeguard of personal payment of rates, and the prophets vho laid odds upon Compounder may congratulate themselves on the gacity. Mr. Goschen has endeavoured, as he says, to ffect conomical reform without reviving a political con- But overwhelming necessity compelled the measure, and it must be allowed to produce its full result, nor will people outside the House of Commons be prevented from mentioning what that result is Within the House it is proper to speak of the coming to life of the Compound Householder with the same sort of indirectness with which people are apt to speak of death But although we would not be so exacting as to require an admission from the Opposition that the Compounder is alive, we really do think they ought to abstain from further discussion of the ques- t who killed him. Mr Bright's account of the matter is that the Compounder became the victim of the difficulties of Parliament But notwithstanding the concurrence of all parties in his extinction, he has the audacity to continue to exist, and indeed we may venture to predict that he will live as long as the British Constitution, with or without safeguards. The Compounder, however, is not by nature presumptuous or intrusive, he desires to respect everybody's feelings, and he merely asks permission to remark, "No offence to anybody, but here I am again!"

MAGAZINE-WRITING AND DIGNITARIES.

THE Poetry Chair at Oxford was recently commented upon with great discrimination by a wise and experienced critic. He began by welcoming the innovation of adopting an English instead of a Latin dress for the lectures of the Professor But, although admitting that the late occupant of the chair might be reasonably accepted as a law unto himself, he expressed a hope that future Professors would use their position with a considerably different aim. He regretted the chance of their contenting themselves with the production of merely brilliant essays, that find "a not inappropriate future in fashionable serials." And he pointed out that works of a consecutive and permanent character would be more in keeping with the dignity of both the chair and the University.

A similar train of thought naturally arises when we observe the extent to which various titled persons, and especially Church dignitaries, are just now deeming it advisable to contribute to magazine literature. As in the case of the Poetry Chair, there are two sides to this new development It is something to witness the spectacle of several Heads of cathedral Chapters violently rebelling against a life of picturesque repose. It is something to find that a Prime Minister in posse (and now in esse) has read Ecce Homo with much interest, and that the MacCullum More has distinct views on "Christian Duty in Matters of Religious Difference." But could we not enjoy these causes of satisfaction without being made to wince under a feeling, we do not say of the ludicrous, but of the singularly mal-apropos? For there assuredly is an incongruity when a man who has deservedly risen to a high place in his profession, and who may naturally be supposed (if he does work at all) to be working at some grave and permanent task, steps down into an arena of literary competition where the prevailing tone is light and transitory, and in which he might be thought to have won his spurs long ago. There is the same sort of unfitness in this as if a man who had been a good football player in his youth should not know when to leave off as he grew older. A man should not play at football too late in life. He may escape hacking or shinning. He may find things move smoothly enough. But it is not pleasant to observe that things are being made smooth for him out of deference, and that meantime the game is interfered with.

To justify the literary incongruity of which we have spoken, two things ought to be made out. It should be clear that signed articles by titled persons are for the advantage of the public, and also that they are consistent with the proper dignity of place and office. But are such articles for the advantage of the public? We are not speaking of this or that highly exceptional article, though for our own part we do not see the necessity of drawing any line of distinction at all. But we are treating the question generally, and the view we should feel disposed to take of it is that writings of this nature are not eminently likely to be for the public advantage. Whichever side we adopt, however, it is clear that we must look to the nature of things, and to the articles themselves. It is not in the nature of things that literature of the sort now under discussion should be particularly useful. When a gifted prelate, who has been writing sermons all his life, and preaching them with the utmost success, finds that sermonesque papers from his pen will be unusually acceptable in a magazine, it is not likely that he will take any extra pains, anything that can be called serious labour, in the preparation of them. Will he not choose an easy, elastic subject, and treat it currente calamo easily, popularly? That he will do so it would seem natural to expect, and this is corroborated by the evidence of a paper now before us. It is the work of an eloquent Bishop, and it bears his signature; the subject is "Jacob," and Jacob comes sixth in an alliterative series of "Heroes of Hebrew History." Now it is, we should think, quite impossible for this right reverend author to compose anything devoid of a certain graceful movement and easy flow. Nor are such characteristics wanting in this semi-biographical memoir of his sixth hero. But what are we to say about the quality and texture of this article? There is one word, and only one, in the language which will come near a true description of it. We do not think that the very able author of "Jacob" will mind our using it, and we are almost certain that he will agree with us in its application. The article is mild. It is so mild that we should have been puzzled to explain how it got into its place at all had we not perceived that it was a mitred article. The old delusion that a "rose by any other name will smell as sweet" has been long since exposed. And, when you come to investigate the aroma of an article, it will be found that the name goes a very, very long way indeed. We can scarcely regard it as a state of things likely to prove essentially beneficial to readers of magazines that archbishops and bishops contribute to them.

In the same periodical that contains "Jacob," there is a paper forming part of a series of "Pamphlets for the People," by a Dean. The prominent feature of this article, called "Right Views of Life," is a very successful mastery of the popular tone and style. We do not make out that the paper is a particularly useful one. The contrast between ideal and fact is made much of. We are told of the top of a cliff, breezy and open, good for sea views and many more things—that is the stratum of opinion. Presently you come to a "fault" in the cliff summit, the stratum breaks off suddenly; "you look down, down, down, and you find it (the stratum) again with some difficulty in the gutter, fouled and obliterated"—this is the stratum of action. Now, whether this is useful or not, it is at any rate smart with the smartness of magazines. When we read such writings, and see advertised by the same author in a recent magazine list "A Week on the North Coast of Cornwall," and presently after, "Cornwall Again," we feel that there may after all be some things less suitable than picturesque repose is to great place and office.

For, to turn to the question of suitableness and dignity, this ...oderate activity in minor penmanship, if not imperatively called for by strong and distinct reasons, has an unpleasant air about it. To begin with, it looks like pushing, and that is never dignified. We dare say that an undue use of the prestige of position was the very last thing that occurred to the minds of the excellent writers we now have in view. But we are speaking of appearances—of literary tone and manners. It is recorded of Sir Lancelot and the King that they

> In open battle or the tilted field
> Forbore their own advantage, and these two
> Were the most nobly-mannered men of all.

Now when, in one year and in the same magazine, there appear no fewer than twenty-seven articles, about twenty of which are by bishops and deans, and the rest by a great Minister and a great duke, all bearing their authors' signatures, it certainly does look as if, in the tilting field of monthly literature, King Arthur's rule were not quite strictly observed. There must have been a great many young knights of the pen "killed in the tilt" that year. no matter how "full of lustihood" they might be, the great old warriors with their prestige of armorial bearings and the Dragon of the Pendragonship did not bate one jot of their advantage, but drove them all back neck and crop to the barrier. That, at least, was the look of the thing.

But what are bishops and deans to do then? If they have something useful to say, and wish for a large public to read what they have to say, are they to hold their peace for no other reason than that they are great officers of the Church? Is it not a thing both lawful and expedient that they should utter themselves in a magazine, and give to what they utter the imprimatur of their name and office? These are questions which it is best to meet by another question. What is to prevent men of great place, who wish to deliver themselves for the benefit of the multitude, from writing anonymously in journals, or from writing a book? A man in high ecclesiastical office might write in an anonymous journal, as many such men do, and might gain as wide a hearing as heart could wish, while at the same time he would completely avoid the undesirable appearances which have been touched upon. There is no silencing the "foolish vulgar"; and the foolish vulgar will persist in wondering what a writer with a distinguished appendage to his name may reckon on getting for his magazine article. That is a question which we should no more think of asking than we should be curious to know how much a bishop would give for a new mitre, supposing he wanted to buy one. But mitres and coronets and shovel-hats should be serenely removed above all possibility of dubious reflection, even when it proceeds from the guesses of the foolish vulgar. For these inquisitive people do not confine themselves to the single inquiry mentioned above. They go on to ask what are the duties of the offices which admit to so free an extent of the pleasing task or relaxation involved in the production of slight literature, and a good many questions besides into which we shall not attempt to follow them.

It is worth while to add, however, one word more. If the graver departments of anonymous literature will not suffice to exhaust the superfluous activity of dignitaries, do not books supply the more fitting alternative resource? The books, deserving the name and place of English Classics, now produced by the foremost officers of the most learned Church in Christendom, are not so many but that we could well afford to have their number added to. We should not have liked to ask the Dean of St Patrick's what his candid literary estimate might be of a paper like the "Heroes of Hebrew History", nor to put the witty Canon of St. Paul's on the scent of that apologue about the "cliff and the gutter." For we have no doubt that the ecclesiastical magazine-writers do, after all, approach nearer to the ideal of earnest Churchmen than either of those their famous predecessors in Church office. But we should have been much interested in asking a man like the late Dean of St Paul's whether the design of the Latin Christianity would not have been injuriously risked, and its style and execution materially interfered with, by the frequent production of such ephemeral and flimsy writing as will often pass current in a magazine, and will certainly pass current with the aid of a well-known name and office to back it up. We should be the very last to insinuate of any of these industrious, though as we think mistaken, writers that,

> Eager of a name,
> He thrusts about, and justles into fame.

Of more than one of the number that satire could not be true, possessing as they do reputations which the most brilliant magazine success could do nothing to enhance. But we do not hesitate to submit to their consideration that they are damaging their chances of usefulness in higher literature, and placing great office in a seemingly false position, for the sake of a public advantage which to us appears uncertain in the last degree.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

V.

WE propose to devote the present article to portraits and to foreign pictures, after which we shall conclude the series by a paper on genre paintings and landscapes. It was usual to vote the portraits in Trafalgar Square a nuisance, but in the new building the number is no longer too great to preclude the possibility of easy and pleasing distribution. It were absurd to decry a portrait simply because it is a portrait, for some of the most consummate works known in the whole range of art history are portraits and nothing more, such as the so-called Gevartius in our National Gallery, by Vandyke, Leo X, by Raffaelle, and La Bella of Titian, severally in the Pitti: Innocent X in the Doria Palace, Rome, by Velasquez, the Daughters of Earl Waldegrave, and the Duchess of Devonshire with her Infant Child, by Reynolds. Therefore, if people grow disgusted with the portraits in the Royal Academy, the cause must be either that their knowledge does not reach to the appreciation of such simple art elements as form, character, light, shade, and colour, when dissevered from incident and story, or else that portrait-painting in our day has sunk beneath the dignity of a noble profession. We believe that neither of these causes separately, but rather both combined, have led the public generally to decry the portraits of the Royal Academy.

The Academy has sometimes been designated a private Society of portrait-painters, and it has now, for the fourth time, a portrait-painter for its President. Sir Francis Grant has been known to warn students against contemporary criticism, perhaps he and others would prefer to be judged by posterity. And yet we do not see that his eight contributions to this year's Exhibition have much to fear. For example, the full-length of "Mrs. Gathorne Hardy" (142) possesses rare art qualities; the bearing of the figure is ladylike, the whole treatment quiet and refined; indeed, in the management of greys and the use of silver tones, this work has somewhat in common with Reynolds. We also have been accustomed to admire such clever sketchy facility as is apparent in the portrait of Lady Madeline Taylour (310); it needs a true artist thus to throw off a likeness with the free play of the pencil. Again, it is known that Sir Francis has a special vocation for subjects such as the Equestrian Portrait of the late Earl of Harrington (202), and "The Belvoir Hunt" (143). Perhaps we can seldom expect a profound reading of character, yet the President has a graceful pleasant way of showing off the ladylike and gentlemanly traits in a figure. There are other Academicians who bring into portraiture—to borrow a thought from Reynolds—the noble intent, the large manner, caught from a higher sphere. Among these may be ranked Mr Elmore, Mr. Millais, and Mr. Watts, all three secure for portraiture colour, and it may be questioned whether a great portrait-painter can exist who is not a colourist. The truth of the conjecture may receive illustration in the failure of two otherwise admirable portraits—that of "The Master of Trinity College, Cambridge" (72), by Mr. S. Laurence, and that of "Mr Robert Browning" (370), by the same painter, there are here present most of the qualities essential to a good portrait except that of colour. The flesh is, in fact, opaque and colourless. A certain hardness and dryness of manner afflicts Mr. Poynter occasionally, as, for example, in the head of "Alexander Walter, Esq" (269). There are painters, indeed, who would do well to remember the satire once spoken, that for a portrait the first requirement is that it shall be a good picture; the second, that it shall be fairly like the sitter. We should imagine that supreme colourists such as Mr. Millais and Mr Watts are almost inevitably led to sacrifice the likeness to the pictorial effect, and yet those great masters of the art, Titian, Tintoret, and Moroni, seem to have reconciled literal facts with rapturous harmonies. Mr. Millais has turned the portrait of "Nina, daughter of Frederick Lehmann, Esq." (127), into a charming fancy picture; his treatment of "Mr. John Fowler" (225) does not strike us as fortunate, yet the canvas reflects colour from Venice. Mr Watts, who through study of the old Italian Masters, together with a noble conception of the aim and scope of modern art, has thrown into portraiture more than common significance, is this year not at his best. "A Portrait" (327), indeed, shows unexpected allegiance to the modern French school; the manner is strong by reason of the loading of pigment in the lights, the colours glazed into the shadows are but stains, the just relation between colours in light and shade is lost. Mr. Richmond, R A, since he forsook black and white, has made strenuous though abortive efforts after colour. He contributes eight pictures which for the most part are at once ruddy and black; to gain red the painter will, in default of more rational devices, intrude even a red curtain. We give preference, among a rare choice of dignitaries, to the "Venerable Archdeacon Bickersteth" (734), chiefly because the head and figure recall those inimitable studies in light and shade the absence of which in the Academy we have to deplore. For the intelligent reading of character, the subtle and tender modulation of form, we know nothing more admirable than the crayons by Mr. Richmond in former years, such, for example, as the study of the head of Mr. Keble.

The Academy, fortunately for the varied tastes, features, and figures of sitters, is able to present divers styles of the portrait-painter's art. The Academician who succeeds in painting a lady of sixty is scarcely the man for a girl of sixteen, and the artist who can indent lines of thought on the ample forehead of a philosopher, may not have the smooth sweep of pencil most agreeable to the polished man of society. Mr Wells, A R A, may, we fear, be ready to yield to the temptations which beset the fashionable portrait-painter, among his present efforts we lack that solid, sober, student work which gained him entrance to the Academy on the strength of one of the most masterly portrait compositions we remember, "Volunteers at Firing-point." Yet are we inclined to assign little short of the highest position to the picture of "Charles Magniac, Esq., M.P." (68). The head is finely modelled, the figure poses easily within the canvas, the accessories, including velvet coat, cabinet, objects in lapis lazuli, &c., are painted with sufficient realism, and the whole composition, sustained in active yet quiet colour, is brought together into balance and repose. Mr. Sant, A.R A, is another painter who makes his sitters rejoice under brilliant blandishments of the brush. Yet the portrait of "Mrs Henry Bevan" is simple, grey, and quiet, while the full length of "Madlle. Helda de Bunsen" (173) has a grace in carriage and a gleam of sunlight glancing on the face, which seldom fail to gain general applause. As a companion to the last picture hangs one no less attractive, the portrait of "The Duchess of Athol" (169), by Mr. Buckner. The drapery is silvery and fluffy, the form unsubstantial, the whole picture is evanescent and artificial. There are, in fact, in the Academy portraits upon which we gaze with the same sort of admiration that we bestow on the dressy shop-fronts in Regent Street. The milliner verily is an artist, and there are artists who are milliners. We would commend for refinement and finish portraits by Mr Lehmann and the Hon. H. Graves. Mr. Weigall too, though he has failed in painting men, is to be praised for a "Portrait" (356) of an old lady; this quiet, thoughtful picture is a careful study of character; the head and the hands are brought into accordant expression. Among the eccentricities of genius may be mentioned a "Portrait" (489) by M. Legros, dry and leathery in skin, repellent in character; also "Liszt" (771), by Mr. Healy; the musician-monk carries a candle—symbol perchance of light in a dark world; the large brain—skull rather than face—seems burdened with thought and intent on a mission. The picture has more individual character than direct art merit. The Scotch school of portrait-painting is not extinct with the death of its great exponent, Sir Watson Gordon. Mr Macnee, R.A, has a simple, firmly-painted picture, "William Jackson, Esq." (177), Mr. Macbeth brings vigorous vengeance upon "the late Sir David Brewster" (222), while, in a style of romance and colour, Mr. Herdman places "Lady Clinton" (486) gracefully in the midst of green fields and trees. We must not forget "Mrs. Barstow" (714), a remarkable achievement by Mr. Sandys, admirable for fidelity, and even for flesh tones. Other portraits in the Academy may be thought to recall Titian, Vandyke, or Reynolds; this work, which after its kind is unsurpassed, can be compared only with Van Eyck or Memling.

Foreign pictures have this year become a distinguishing feature in the Exhibition. In a recent review of the French and Flemish Gallery we spoke of several of the masters who again appear here. Our present notice must be brief. We have marked for observation twenty-seven painters represented by thirty-eight pictures. Of these we can speak only of the chief. M Alma-Tadema, the Dutchman, has become familiar even to Englishmen; he is taken up by the dealers; there has been an extensive importation of his works to this country. The artist received a second-class prize in the Paris International Exhibition; in our Academy, the comparative standards being different, he naturally rises to the foremost rank. Certainly nothing after their kind can be finer than "Un Amateur Romain" (154) and "Une danse Pyrrhique" (421). The classic revival, of which signs are springing up, not only in England, but throughout Europe, receives in these realistic yet imaginative pictures, powerful manifestation. They are remarkable for conception, drawing, handling, and colour, and what was at one time eccentric and repulsive in the artist's manner is abated. We think it fortunate that the English public has not to endure more than one specimen of the kind of thing that passes at the present moment for religious art on the Continent. "The Evening of Good Friday on Mount Calvary" (439), by M. Victor-Louis Mottez, years since a pupil of MM. Ingres and Picot, serves as a painful example of what is weakly, spasmodic, affected and false in the spurious schools of sacred art. Such a work can teach only those qualities which it is the duty of every honest painter to avoid. M. Mottez belongs to the past, he was born at Lille as long back as 1809, and became Chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1846, but he obtained no place in the last Exposition Universelle at Paris. Madame Jerichau does not obtain admission for more than two pictures; and really the "Italian Girl spinning" (166) is fairly good, nothing new can be said of an artist who exhibits wholesale everywhere; the persuasion each year grows stronger that such works must be multiplied by machinery. To the same rude Scandinavian school belongs "Jalousie," by M F Fagerlin; a capital rustic picture, which stood well in the Swedish department of the Great Paris Exhibition. We find in our catalogue of that Exhibition a note commending the truthful transcript here given of national peasant life, the plain honesty of the painting, and the independence of the style. The picture is evidently allied to the school of M. Tidemand, the Norwegian. Neither M. A. Legros, who may be said to represent French naturalism, nor M Rudolph Lehmann, who blends the schools of France and Germany, can be any longer classed among foreigners; each appears to advantage in the present Academy. It is scarcely needful that we should speak in detail of the works of M Frère, M. Baugniet, M. Merle, or Madlle Rosa Bonheur, the English public cannot have too many opportunities of testing the distinctive traits of national schools thus represented by rare master-works. By less well-known artists we note two works, rare in quality, "Grace before Dinner" (841), by M Michael, of Berlin, and "The Room of Antiquities in the Louvre" (825), by M Navlet, also we must not overlook water-colour drawings and lithographs remarkable for power, movement, and mastery, by M Theodore Horschelt, the Bavarian who gained, in Paris in 1867, the distinction of a "Premier Prix."

Landscape-painting, as practised on the Continent, is this year represented within the Academy by three, if not four, distinctive schools. First, the great French school is present in two of its most famous masters, M Corot and M. Daubigny, each distinct from the other. We cannot pass over that strongly characteristic work by the latter, "Un Passage sur les bords de l'Oise; soleil couchant" (158), the treatment is broad and intentional; there is conscious presence of colour in the deepest shadow; within somewhat circumscribed limits of light and colour the relations are true; a solemn unison of tone is studiously maintained. Then, again, "Les Nymphes" (152), and "Figures with Landscape" (422), are excellent examples of M. Corot, an artist singular in genius, supreme in eccentricity. These pictures, which stand at the antipodes to our English landscapes, show how much motive and expression may reside in monotone. Variety of colour, sparkle of light, accident in detail, are all sacrificed for unison of tone, balance in composition, and oneness of expression. The sacrifice thus made may be deemed too great for the good attained. We doubt whether a distinctive national school for Italy can be made out of the landscapes of Signor Vertumni, Signor Borgia, and Signor de Tivoli; the style is obviously allied to the French, and strangely divided, wide as the poles asunder, from the historic manners of Salvator Rosa, Gaspar Poussin, or Claude. Signor Vertumni's "View in the Pontine Marshes" (845) is solemnly impressive. These Italians seem proud of their malaria districts; they have sent three of these pontifical swamps to the Academy. Again, among the national schools of Europe, it is pleasant to recognise the pastorals of Holland, dewy and green, emerald touched with gold, in that capital landscape of a "Dutch Meadow, with Cattle" (232), by M De Haas, an artist deservedly of high repute throughout Europe. This Dutch manner, it will be observed, is distinctive; different from that of Troyon or Bonheur in France or of Cooper in England. Historically speaking, the style is derivative from Paul Potter and Karl du Jardin. Lastly may be distinguished, in three Mountains, California" (309), by A. Bierstadt, the American—the heroic and melodramatic landscape of Germany. We do not stop to inquire what right the Americans have to Mr. Bierstadt. The fact is, the painter is German by name, parentage, and education; his art, which could not possibly have originated in America, was learnt in Dusseldorf. These distinctive national schools of landscape are now brought, almost for the first time, within the arena of our English art. In our next and concluding paper we may institute some comparison between foreign and English modes of delineating nature.

The precise policy which should govern the Academy in the admission of foreign pictures will require anxious reconsideration. The advantages to be derived by the immediate presence of Continental schools is obvious; indeed, Sir Charles Eastlake and others advocated the creation of a special class of honorary members, to be chosen from the most distinguished artists of the Continent, and we find a recommendation from the Royal Commissioners that such "honorary foreign members" "should be entitled to send a certain number of pictures to the Annual Exhibition of the Royal Academy." In fact, measures thus generous, not to say politic, have been urged among the advantages likely to accrue from a new building. But then we have to observe that it was always assumed that the foreign artists thus privileged should be illustrious, not obscure. Now how stands the case at present? what is the quality of the pictures which have driven out the works of our native artists? We have already shown our appreciation of these works, yet, if collected together, they would make a poor show in the dealer's Exhibition in Pall Mall, known as "the French Exhibition." Let us submit these pictures to another test—the standard supplied by the awards made in the last International Exhibition. Thus the recipients of the "Grands Prix" were Cabanel, Gerôme, Meissonier, Rousseau, Kaulbach, Knaus, Leys, and Ussi; yet one and all are wanting to our Academy. Again, conspicuous only by absence are such great painters as Breton, Français, Fromentin, Millet, Robert-Fleury, Hamon, Hébert, and Comte, among the French; Piloty, Achenbach, and Leu, among the Germans; and Gallait, Leys, Stevens, Willems, and Israels, among the Dutch and Belgians. Thus we are scarcely astonished to find that it is the unillustrious who have met with favour in England; so insignificant indeed are some of the painters who seek among us honours denied to them at home that, though possessing a tolerable knowledge of Continental schools, we have been driven to dictionaries and catalogues, and still these foreigners can give no satisfactory account of themselves. The Academy is in a dilemma; it is to be hoped that it will not be duped a second year. On the one hand, it is evident that the new building is not greatly in excess of the growing requirements of our own painters, and moreover it is manifest that the rejection of two or three thousand English pictures implies prospects blighted, and the hopes of long years indefinitely postponed. On the other hand, we think it cannot be questioned that for the sake of interchange of national courtesies, and for the removal of what may possibly be narrow and exclusive in our insular art, it is wise to provide for the reception of choice and representative works from the schools of the Continent. The Academy seems to have been actuated by the best intentions; and self-interest may be found a sufficient safeguard in the future against the wholesale admission of second-rate products by unknown foreigners.

THE GRAND PRIX AND ASCOT.

DESPITE the value of the great Paris prize, and the increasing number of entries for it, it has quite failed hitherto to attain to that importance, as an international event, which was contemplated by its founders. The first hindrance to its success was the magnitude of the forfeits, but that has been obviated by permitting nominators to pay 4 sovs. only, if they declare by the first of May. The prudence of this proceeding is shown by the fact that the entries, which had fallen as low as 77, rose this year to 170, while for next year they amount to 211. Another objection that has been made, on account of the race being run on Sunday, is probably more affected than real; but the true cause of its failure to attract the best English horses is the time of the year that has been chosen for its celebration. There is only an interval of one week between our own great meetings of Epsom and Ascot, affording but just sufficient breathing-time for our three-year-olds engaged in the valuable stakes at either place. Heavily taxed as are the energies of horses nowadays, it is too much to expect that they can be deprived of this short and necessary rest, and endure a long and tedious journey, as well as a sea passage—in itself enough to knock up the majority of horses—and then hurry back, the day after the Grand Prix, to be in time for Ascot. Most of those who have attempted this over-work have failed. Lord Clifden failed; the great Blair Athol failed; and The Earl did not run at Epsom, and so went over comparatively fresh. Gladiateur succeeded, but, then, what could Gladiateur not do? Whether he was trained or untrained, whether his leg was swollen to twice its natural size or was reduced to proper dimensions, whether he lost the start or gained it, signified but little. When once he got into his mighty stride, nothing could live with him. Besides, Count Lagrange's horses have acquired a happy knack of crossing backwards and forwards between France and England without suffering ill effects. From their youth up they are taught to travel by land and sea; but the trip from Dover to Calais generally incapacitates our horses from showing their best form for days afterwards. Thus we are not surprised at so few representatives of England being found among the entries for this year's race, and next year there is a similar falling off. The increased number of subscribers testifies to the rapid growth of Continental racing. Only three horses went over from England on this occasion—The Drummer, Ryshworth, and Tim Bobbin. The French horses were Consul, winner of the French Two Thousand and Derby, Curieuse and Boulogne, his stable companions, Glaneur, Péripétie, Ostrogoth, Clotho, Cerdagne, and Wild Oats. On public running the race seemed to be a certainty for The Drummer, for he beat Perry Down a long way in the Derby, and Perry Down was tried superior to Consul, who in turn beat Glaneur easily in the French Derby. It was whispered that Wild Oats was quite sound again; but if Matthew Dawson could not train him, it was hardly likely that any one in France could do better, and the Longchamps course does not at all suit horses with doubtful legs. Nothing need be said of the remainder of the field, except Glaneur, as it was obvious that they could have no chance. Though Glaneur was, as we have said, beaten by Consul in the French Derby, he has run so well since that his friends were confident that that defeat was accidental, and on the Grand Prix day he was by far the most popular candidate of the twelve. It was no secret that The Drummer, like Lord Clifden and Blair Athol, had suffered from the journey, and was by no means so well as could be wished. But, despite that, he would probably have proved himself to be good enough to beat all that were opposed to him had he not met with an accident at a critical point of the race. Boulogne struck into his heels, and The Drummer as nearly as possible went down on his nose. He was of course knocked completely out of his stride, and Fordham had to ride him hard to get him to work again. For all that, he ran with such unflinching gameness that he gained upon Glaneur (who had taken every advantage of the accident) at every stride, and in ten yards more would have passed him; but, as it was, he just failed to get up, and was beaten by a short head. Ryshworth, who must have run with unwonted spirit, was only a neck from the second, and Consul was a moderate fourth. Wild Oats was lame before the race, and walked in with the crowd. Fordham thus just missed winning this great race for the third year in succession, he having carried it off last year on The Earl, and the year before on Fervacques. Glaneur is by Buckthorn, once the property of Lord Palmerston, and belongs to M. Lupin, who has frequently run horses on the English Turf, and who won the Northamptonshire Stakes and Goodwood Cup a few years ago with Dollar. The issue of the race shows that the French three-year-olds are a long way behind the best English three-year-olds, for, but for his accident, The Drummer, though coughing, must have won, while in England he has yet to prove his claims to a place in the first rank.

There was, as usual, a brilliant programme for the first day of Ascot, though the Ascot Stakes can no longer be considered the race of the meeting, the number of subscribers having gradually dwindled away from 218 in 1848 to 40 in the present year. The numerous other attractions in the way of weight for age races, to which such large sums of money are added, have brought about this result, as well as the institution of the great autumn handicaps, for which so many animals are annually reserved. The Prince of Wales's Stakes, worth nearly four thousand pounds, must have the first claim to notice, although the number of runners was lamentably small. There were in fact only five—Pero Gomez ([illegible] lbs extra), King Cophetua, Consul, Typhon, and Martyrdom. Pretender was in the paddock, looking none the better for his exertions in the Derby, but he would have had to carry 9 lbs. extra, and at the last moment it was decided not to start him. We may mention, by the way, that Pretender very nearly met with the fate of Klarikoff on his journey southwards, the train being delayed for several hours in consequence of his box being discovered to be on fire. With the St. Leger in prospect it was doubtless prudent in Mr. Jardine to withdraw his horse, particularly as Pero Gomez was looking uncommonly well, and, as it happens, he would probably have been neither first nor second.

The Duke of Beaufort was also an absentee, having several other engagements during the week. King Cophetua was started [illegible] make the running for Pero Gomez, and Consul (who looked none the worse for having been racing at Paris two days before) and Typhon went, we suppose, on the chance of getting the money allotted to the second or third. The race was run at only a moderate pace, King Cophetua making such running as he could. Pero Gomez lay throughout in a good position, and Martyrdom was kept in the rear. Three-quarters of a mile from home they were all nearly abreast, but before coming to the turn for home Fordham took a judicious pull at Martyrdom, and steadied him. Half-way up the straight Wells was obliged to ride Pero Gomez, and for an instant Typhon looked dangerous, but at the distance Martyrdom was brought up, and, fairly outstaying Pero Gomez at the finish, won very cleverly by a length, thus recompensing Lord Calthorpe and Captain Machell for their previous disappointments with him. He certainly showed to much more advantage over a longer course than we could have anticipated, and unless Pretender is a better stayer than Pero Gomez, of which we have considerable doubts, the St. Leger presents a much more open appearance than was anticipated. We do not think that, without the extra 4 lbs., Pero Gomez would have won on this occasion, and it is probable that a mile and a quarter is as much as he cares for Only four ran for Her Majesty's Gold Vase, the distance, two miles, quite frightening horses of the present day. These four were Morna, Lancet, St. Mungo, and Thorwaldsen. The latter was ridden in blinkers, and was started with the assistance of a large hunting-whip, from which we infer that his temper is not of the most placable. The pace was, as usual in these races, miserably slow, and St. Mungo unfortunately broke down badly in the moment of victory. Lancet was beaten at the distance, and Thorwaldsen fairly wore down Morna, who does not look at all like a two-miler. Indeed, with all their quality and racing-like looks, there is a certain deficiency of substance about nearly all the Beadsmans that suggests absence of staying power. Not only had Sir Joseph Hawley the mortification of running second in both these races, but for the third great race of the day, the Ascot Stakes, as again on Thursday in the Gold Cup, he was second also, There was a very fair field for the Ascot Stakes. Ambitious and The Dean, the respective schoolmasters, or assistant-schoolmasters, of Pero Gomez and Pretender, Cecil and Sycee, noted handicap horses, Ruric, second for the Ascot Stakes last year, King Alfred, whose performances require no recapitulation, Make Haste, Our Mary Ann, and Choral, were decidedly a string of competitors above the average for a race of this kind. There was also an animal called Bête Noir, of whom very few people appeared to know anything, where he came from, how he was bred, or what he had done. The handicapper, we presume, must have been in a similar state of blissful ignorance, for he indulged him with the lenient impost of 5 st. 7 lbs. But this Bête Noir, when known as the colt by Marsyas, out of Leprosy, won two Nurseries at Stockton last year, carrying very respectable weights, and beating animals of some pretensions, such as Good Hope, the colt by Carnival out of Allington, The Clipper, and others. And this Bête Noir, being now treated as if he were a plater of the lowest order, had no difficulty in winning very cleverly at the finish, after a pretty fast race, in which nearly the whole of the running was made by Ambitious. King Alfred was third on sufferance, and the rest were widely scattered. It ought to be a maxim with handicappers never to admit at a feather weight an animal that has won a good Nursery. Sir Joseph Hawley has thi[s year been] second for the One Thousand, the Derby, the Oaks, the Prince of Wales's Stakes, the Gold Vase, the Ascot Stakes, and the Gold Cup—rather a heavy list of disappointments.

Notwithstanding these reverses, the cherry jacket was twice successful on Tuesday, with Vagabond in the first race, who went twice as fast as any of his twelve opponents, and won in a canter, and with Wait in the Maiden Plate, who won a good race by a head from Flyaway Jack, and twenty-one others. Sir Joseph Hawley won this same race, for which there is always a large field, in 1866 with The Palmer, and the year after with Rosicrucian. The Twelfth Biennial was the principal two-year-old race of the day, and the eleven starters included Countryman (brother to Rustic), a powerful but somewhat heavy looking colt, Nobleman, by The Marquis, Mont Blanc, and the winner, a colt by Thormanby out of Bluebell. This was a great day for the Thormanbys, the Gold Vase and both the two-year-old races having been carried off by his stock. The Fifteenth Triennial was left to Formosa, Restitution, Blueskin, and The Laird, and the beautiful daughter of Buccaneer won cleverly from Baron Rothschild's horse. We must add that two once celebrated horses appeared to-day after a long retirement. Plaudit and Rosicrucian ran for the Queen's Stand Plate, which attracted an excellent field, including King Victor, Normanby, Lumley, Honesty, and Mahonia. The winner turned up most unexpectedly in Gertrude, who ran second to Guy Dayrell for the Newmarket Two-Year-Old Plate. King Victor was second, only a head from Plaudit. Indeed, Rosicrucian and Plaudit both looked formidable opposite the Stand, where the former gave way, and was at once eased. He is as handsome as ever, but looked very big, and, it is to be feared, cannot stand really hard work. Plaudit, however, ran so well that there is no reason why he should not win some races over short courses. Normanby, first favourite for the Derby of 1870, was amiss, and could only get fourth place, while Lumley, who could do anything last year, can do nothing now, and finished the absolute last.

Ascot is too important and too popular a subject to be exhausted [in a] single paper, and the remarkable racing for the Cup on Thursday, which is of course the centre of the attraction of Ascot, and the conclusion of the meeting on Friday, will give sufficient materials for a second article.

REVIEWS.

VEITCH'S MEMOIR OF SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON.*

(Second Notice.)

WHEN we turn from the social, external life of Sir William Hamilton to his intellectual life, we find it full of a peculiar interest. It is, indeed, to the student and the scholar that it most directly appeals. But even the practical and the busy will not look upon this silent and secluded, yet energetic, existence without some of that "loyal respect" by which Mr. Carlyle was touched before his personal acquaintance with Hamilton began. The house in Howe Street, in a fine silent neighbourhood, with a North light which was economized by having no curtains to the study, and quartos lying about on the window-sill, were the outward symptoms of the inhabitant who was gradually revealed to Mr. Carlyle as > a man of good birth, though of small fortune, who had deep faculties, and an insatiable appetite for wise knowledge, who was titularly an advocate, but had no practice, nor sought any; had gathered his modest means thriftily together, and sat down here with his mother and cousin and his store of books, frankly renouncing all ambitions except what I well recognised to be the highest and one real ambition in this dark ambiguous world (p. 122).

It may perhaps be thought that the controversy about Sir W. Hamilton's merits is too recent, and has been too unfriendly, to allow an impartial estimate to be made, or, if made, to be attended to. It seems to us that such an estimate is not only possible, but that it has been facilitated by the previous debate. And a true diagnosis of Hamilton's intellect is a full and sufficient answer to the sentence of degradation as a "philosopher" which has been passed upon him since the publication of Mr. Mill's Examination.

There have been—nay, even still are—scholars, in the widest sense of the word, men who have a universal acquaintance with the fine literature of all ages. But scholars are usually not only not philosophers, but have a secret aversion to what seem to them the arid and thorny wastes of speculative discussion. Men of the Erasmus type have a horror of metaphysics. On the other hand, the typical metaphysician is seldom a man of much reading. Hobbes, Locke, Reid, Whately, were not scholars—nay, were content with a very limited knowledge even of what had been written on the subjects they discussed. Minds which have any degree of inventiveness are usually too much enamoured of their [own specula]tions to care to know what others have thought, as great talkers are apt to be bad listeners. Each type of mind has its weakness. The weak side of the scholar type is that the scholar omits from his reading the strongest and most original books. The defect of the original thinker is that he exaggerates the importance of the merely new, attributing a value to that which he excogitates for no other reason than because he has thought it.

The characteristic distinction of Sir W. Hamilton's mind is the equilibrium in which the acquisitive and inventive faculties held each other. No professed metaphysician in our time has known so much of past philosophical opinion. No one so deeply read in philosophical literature has retained so much vigour of judgment and ingenuity of original thought. When occupied upon any subject, it was a necessity of his mind to ascertain all that others had said upon it. His appetite for books was insatiable, and his love of them for themselves was great. Yet he never fell into the [miser's] delusion of substituting the gold for that which the gold can purchase. Books were to him always a means, not an end. He looked upon reading as an aid to thinking, and he read, not to remember, but to know. "My acquaintance with Sir William Hamilton," says De Quincey, "soon apprised me that of all great readers he was the one to whom it was most indispensable that he should react by his own mind on what he read." The intelligence was ever active to vitalize the passive process of reception. What he read he digested and subordinated by the judgment. His logical cast of mind compelled him to place and arrange as he read. He even carried it so far that in the study of any subject he did not read books as he got them, but divided and arranged its points before beginning his researches. Intense attention and thought, the power of referring each thing to its class and place, had been at work in the first process of storing, hence each impression remained clear and distinct, the more recent not obscuring the more remote, but all lay side by side, capable of ready recall and immediate application. This fulness and orderliness of methodical knowledge was specially tested in the class-room in those days when students rose to give voluntary [acco]unts of men or tenets of which no notice had been given previously. This necessity of knowing all that had been thought on a subject before writing on it was an impediment to the readiness of his pen. When he had once begun to write, he could write with great rapidity, but it was a difficulty to begin. The love of research led him so far that he would amass more material than he could use. Hence his finished productions are few, and are contained entirely in the volume entitled Discussions. Even in the papers in this volume there is a great difference in point of elaboration. Out of sixteen articles which the volume contains, only some four or five can be regarded as fully adequate to that ideal of exhaustive treatment which the author set always before him, but seldom had the time to exemplify. The articles entitled "Philosophy of the Unconditioned," "Philosophy of Perception," "Logic," "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum," besides their other merits, may be pointed to as having for the first time in this country set the example of writing up to the level of the information extant on the subject.

If this is a just account of Hamilton's mental habit, the censure so commonly passed upon him, that he has added no new truth to philosophy is seen at once to be inappropriate. Instead of denying the truth of the censure, and attempting to refute it by alleging the doctrine of the quantification of the predicate, or any other of his logical theories, we are willing to admit that it may be true. Yet, even admitting that he struck out no new truths, properly so called, the services rendered by Sir W. Hamilton to the cause of philosophy may justly rank with those of a the most eminent names in its history. His friends and advocates may well be content to rest his claims on what is indisputable—his philosophical learning, in the sense in which it has been explained above. Exhaustive possession, methodical arrangement, and intelligent appreciation are what is meant by the term "learning." These are precisely the elements in which speculative philosophy in this country, including Scotland, was weak. If we look back to the early years of the century, that generation seems brilliant with the names of poets, thinkers, talkers of surpassing genius. Strong, masculine, original conception marks even their fragmentary utterances. But knowledge they had none. Anything worthy of the name of study or work was unknown to them. Hence the want of catholicity of view, the note of provinciality, which we now find in their writings. They see no subject as a whole, but take a magnified view of some one of its parts. In our own day we have another phase of the same mental defect—a defect which almost appears to be a national characteristic, so persistent is it under a variety of forms. The practical readiness with which Englishmen undertake to do, to say, and to teach, without any adequate information on the matter in hand, is strongly marked in our art and literature, and is nowhere more apparent than in our leading philosophical writers. The term in current use well expresses the quality of this staple commodity. It is "thought," and the writer is complimented as a "thinker." Against this tendency of philosophical speculation in this country, which places its ideal in "originality," Sir William Hamilton may be regarded as a reaction and a protest. Instead of that superficial knowledge of the past, and that disdainful attitude towards it, which is the characteristic of "modern thought," he stood up to show that it is only in the light of the past that a true apprehension of the present is possible. For the narrow world of contemporary impression, dignified by the name experience, which bounds the horizon of our "thinkers," Hamilton aimed to substitute the experience of the race, as recorded in books. The conceited neglect of the historical aspect of philosophical questions throws away the only data for a solution of the questions themselves, as the very terms in which the questions must of necessity be stated depend for their meaning on their history. Hamilton may be justly said in this respect to have restored and vindicated the true method of philosophical inquiry. The unlaborious interrogation of consciousness which had constituted the method of the Scottish philosophy of the last century sank at once on Hamilton's appearance. For the first time in the history of British speculation an encyclopædic enumeration of the departments of intellectual philosophy, a statement of their mutual relations, and of the questions appropriate to each, was brought forward. This habit of mind has not yet become, as it has in Germany, a law rigorously incumbent on all who undertake to write, but that the existence of such a requirement is no longer unknown among us, even in the walks of speculation, is in great measure due to the precept and example of Hamilton.

In vindicating, however, his merits as a philosophical teacher, and defining their kind, we must be careful not to fall into an exaggeration of their degree. We ought not to correct an exaggerated depreciation by its opposite. When we find so eminent a critic as Mr. John Mill contrasting Hamilton with Whately, and assigning to Whately the superiority in the origination and diffusion of important thought, it is but justice to point out the partial stand-point from which alone such a judgment is possible. No doubt Whately was, as Mr. Mill says, "an active and fertile thinker." He is also an eminent example of the confusion which is inevitably imported into philosophy by "active and fertile thinking" not grounded on knowledge. Whately's services to logic as an instrument of education should always be gratefully acknowledged. But no competent person ever read Hamilton's article on "Logic" (reprinted in the Discussions) without feeling that Whately is a child in the hands of a giant. It is not merely that the one has more reading than the other, but that complete knowledge gives him a mental grasp of the subject which "fertile thinking" can never confer. In Hamilton's article on "Logic" we feel that we are once more on the great highway of philosophical tradition, coming down in steady descent from Aristotle and the Stoics, instead of in the flowery by-paths in which the "thinkers" on logic had lost themselves. In Whately we admire ingenious suggestion on isolated points, and lucid statement of received doctrines. But no sooner do we approach, under Whately's guidance, any of the involved and controverted questions, than we are aware of a confusion of vision and an imbecility of grasp which leave us groping in the dark. The contrast is great indeed with the complete comprehension of Hamilton, in which every difficulty and every question has its proper place assigned to it, and where, though we may admit that problems are not always successfully solved, yet all the recorded solutions are brought up before us for comparison and judgment.

But, in attributing to Hamilton complete knowledge, it may be as well to say we do not intend to attribute universal knowledge. Learning is not omniscience. It is not to detract from any man's honours to say that he is subject to the conditions of humanity, and that he cannot live long enough to possess himself of the whole of any of the greater branches of learning. There are limitations to Hamilton's philosophical acquirement, simply because the accumulated stock of historical facts is too great to be appropriated by any memory, however capacious. He does not seem to have been in full possession of the recent German schools—Hegel, Schelling, Fichte. Of Kant he seems to have had more, but not a familiar, knowledge. Plato and the Platonists were, to say the least, not so well known to him as Aristotle and his commentators. His knowledge of Aristotle is evidently subject to considerable limitations. He had not the advantage of that vast growth of German monograph which, since Trendelenburg edited the De Anima, has illustrated so many dark corners of Aristotelian lore. These are considerable deductions from the whole cognoscibile, yet there are more to be made. He had studied for the medical profession, and with that view had attended classes in natural philosophy, chemistry, &c. But this was in his youth, and before going to Oxford. Though he was learned in the history of medicine, there is no evidence that the principles of physical inquiry had ever taken hold of his mind. To what extent mathematical processes were familiarly known to him we do not find any direct evidence, but it may be indirectly inferred, from his criticism of Whewell, that he saw in them rather an instrument of mental discipline than an organ of thought. Hamilton's biographer dwells upon the parallel between Hamilton and Leibnitz. The resemblance is one that must occur to every one. Yet Leibnitz's mathematical and physical acquirements not only count as an additional province of knowledge possessed by him, but gave him an undoubted superiority when he turned his mind to metaphysical speculations.

When all these deductions are made, what remains constitutes a vast possession of learning, understanding by the term not mere acquisition, but acquisition impregnated by a living mind, and subordinated to a rational judgment. We cannot trace—his biographer does not attempt—a complete outline of Hamilton's knowledge, but we may indicate its extent by scattered portions of his reading. The literature of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was a favourite study with him. He made collections for the history of Luther, or Luther's opinions—collections which, if published, would occupy a large volume. The constitution and history of European Universities was a subject to which he had devoted much time, and the problems of the higher education were always present to his thought. Of the seventeenth century he perhaps knew less. Yet he had studied the Thirty Years' War, and had lectured upon it, and the theological controversies connected with the names of Petavius, Salmasius, and Blondel engaged his interest. The modern Latinists, Buchanan, Balde, Sannazaro, Vida, Fracastorio, are familiar to him, and he is reported (by Professor Baynes) to have matched Dr. Parr on one occasion in this field, which Parr had selected for conversation in the hope to reign alone. He read two papers before the Royal Society of Edinburgh on the Greek aorists, in which he is prodigal of reference to the grammarians, Greek and Latin. His Commonplace Book bears witness to a course of reading as varied, inquisitive, and resolute as was ever accomplished by man. In this folio of some 1,200 pages two-thirds are filled with references on metaphysical topics, and the remaining third with logical references. There are indications in it of the thoughts of the men of nearly all times and nations who have risen above the common routine of life to an interest in the great questions of speculative philosophy. It is not, like most commonplace books, a chaos, but is planned in exactly logical divisions and subdivisions. It must be, from Professor Veitch's account of it, a transcript of Hamilton's own mind, and we should think capable of publication. Next to this Commonplace Book his library may be regarded as the reflex of his mental tendencies. He did not collect as a book-collector, but bought for his own uses and necessities. Naturally the strongest part of the collection was the philosophical. The collection of Logics numbered over 400 volumes, and, in addition to the older and rarer treatises, included every work of importance which had recently appeared at home or abroad. Among the Greek classics appeared a valuable collection of the Scholiasts on Aristotle, bought at Heber's sale in 1834. The collection of modern Latin was also richly stored. Biographies, ana, dissertations, mélanges, had been industriously sought out, and there was a special collection of books on the theory and history of education.

In assigning to Hamilton the distinction of being the learned philosopher of this century, we have been careful to include that quality without which learning ceases to have intellectual value—namely, that it be thoroughly informed and governed by the critical faculty. A charge has been pressed against Hamilton which, if proved, would be a serious abatement of his claims to this highest kind of learning, even if it did not compromise them altogether. Mr. Mill has brought forward passages from Hamilton's writings in which the contradictions and inconsistencies are, or appear to be, irreconcilable with the supposition that he had so far mastered the matter of what he read as to be in possession of a matured and uniform scheme of thought. And this internal contradiction is not confined to subordinate topics, on which the memory may be forgiven if it be treacherous. If there are any principles which Hamilton urges as important, and which he considers as characteristic of his philosophy, it is the two doctrines known respectively as the Relativity of Knowledge, and Natural Realism. Nearly all those writers who have commented upon the clash of ideas thus signalized by Mr. Mill in his Examination have resigned the seeming contradiction as unmanageable, and have accounted for it in various ways, but all more or less damaging to Hamilton's reputation as a philosopher. Mr. Grote proposed the solution that Hamilton held both the opinions in their natural sense, and enforced them at different times by argument, his attention never having been called to the contradiction between them. Professor Veitch, in an appendix to the Memoir, undertakes the position that there is no inconsistency between the two doctrines.

The theory called by Hamilton "Natural Realism" conceives us as knowing the external world as it is really and in itself, and the qualities of matter as absolute attributes or modes of a not-self. It is the theory supported by Hamilton in contrast to "Idealism," which conceives what we call the external world as a phenomenon of consciousness, a mode of self to which habit leads us to attribute externality. Natural Realism thus makes us cognisant of absolute qualities. It supposes the mind to have knowledge of an object as it is in itself, and not in relation—of an object which would remain what we know it to be, if our knowing faculty were taken away and annihilated. Thus the human intelligence is in contact with an absolute object. We may well ask, How is this theory reconcilable with that of the Relativity of all knowledge? Professor Veitch's explanation is as follows:—There are two real objects—sensible reality and supersensible reality. Natural Realism asserts or assumes our cognition of sensible reality. The doctrine of Relativity denies our cognition of supersensible reality. There is thus no contradiction between them. Whether or not this be Hamilton's meaning we cannot pretend to say. But if it be so, it seems to leave the inconsistency between the two opinions as wide as ever. Mr. Mill had suggested, in palliation of the discrepancy, that Hamilton had used the phrase Relativity of knowledge in some extremely narrow, or some non-natural, sense; in fact, that he did not hold the tenet of the Relativity of knowledge at all. Professor Veitch's defence of Hamilton consists in adopting for him the other horn of the dilemma. It amounts to saying that Hamilton did not hold the doctrine of Natural Realism in any true sense of the word. Professor Veitch seems to admit that Hamilton did not consider that we know any object as other than what it appears to be to our faculties. If this be so, what becomes of the antithesis, so much insisted on by Hamilton, between Natural Realism and Idealism?

Should this volume reach a second edition, as we have little doubt it will do, we would suggest for consideration the omission of the Appendix (Note A), the angry polemical tone of which jars not a little unpleasantly with the calm record, and the even tenor, of the life of the student and the scholar.

CREASY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.*

(Second Notice.)

SIR EDWARD CREASY begins with the Phœnicians. It is a certain satisfaction to learn that he has "a high admiration for the learning and abilities of the late Sir G. Lewis," but he believes in the Phœnicians all the same. From the Phœnicians he gets back to the Stone Period, and the primeval antiquaries come in for a patronizing nod. "The ancient burial-places and the relics contained in them . . . of late years have been examined and compared one with another, with remarkable industry and sagacity." On these matters Sir Edward's great authority seems to be Dr. Latham; he does not tell us whether he believes on Dr. Latham's authority that the Brittia of Procopius is somewhere else and not Britain, or whether he sees in the by of Tenby a sign of Scandinavian occupation. But if he has read Dr. Latham, he has not read Dr. Petrie; we only suppose that he has not read Mr. Keane, because Mr. Keane would doubtless have come in for a pat on the back if he had. The following passage is indeed amusing to read in 1869:—

Whether the Phœnicians communicated to the rude Celts, whom they found here, other arts, and whether they imparted to them aught of the science and of the religious ritual of Asia, is and must ever be mere matter of speculation. We have no certain evidence on the subject. Many have thought that the ancient architectural structures that are found in the British isles, and especially the round towers of Ireland, were raised by men of Eastern race, or, at least, by disciples of Oriental teachers, and that these mysterious edifices were designed for the services of the same creed, that prevailed in lands beyond the remotest waters of the Mediterranean. The supporters of these theories refer to some fragments of old poems (one of which purports to be copied from a Carthaginian writer), and which speak dimly of "Ionian Islands," of "holy headlands," and of mystical orgies, in the far North-Western Atlantic. The truth of these speculations is possible, of some it is probable; but of none can it be demonstrated by such proof as is sufficient to make history. With the immense mass of indisputable English history before us, which we must abridge so closely, we cannot linger on these imaginative legends, however much they may attract the ethnologist, the antiquary, and the poet.

After some talk about Nebuchadnezzar and the Battle of Chæroneia we come to another patting on the back of "one whose authority on historical subjects is of the highest order," and who from a note turns out to be no other than Niebuhr. By him "it has been well said" that "the history of all modern nations will be found to have grown out of the Roman." "This," Sir Edward Creasy thinks, "is emphatically true with regard to our country, which once formed part of the Roman Empire, and the consideration of who and what our conquerors were forms an essential part of the history of our island." Now have we really to explain again for the ten thousandth time that though our country once formed a part of the Roman Empire, yet our nation never did, and that, however essential a part of the history of the Island may be the consideration of who and what its conquerors were, that consideration has only an indirect and incidental bearing on the history of our own people? In short, in exact opposition to what Sir Edward Creasy says in his margin, "English History" does not "grow out of" Roman History. Instead of growing out of it, it supplants it; a knowledge of Roman Britain is indeed needful for a knowledge of English History, not however because the Romans were "our conquerors," but just because they were not. A knowledge of Roman History and Roman Law is indeed important to the student of English History, but mainly because, as Sir Edward Creasy begins to see a little later, of its indirect influence through Roman missionaries and partially Romanized Normans.

Again we may say that this sort of confusion would have been pardonable a generation back, and Sir Edward Creasy's book really belongs to a generation back; the fault is the palming off upon us of the thoughts and the knowledge of a generation back as if they were fit intellectual provender for the present generation. After all the labours of Mr. Kemble and others, it is really too bad to give us such a paragraph as the following:—

The existence of nobles deriving their rank, not from birth or property, but from the personal grant of the sovereign, is clearly traceable in the Roman Empire during its latter centuries, and it is from the Romans, and not from the Celts, or Germans, that modern Europe has derived this remarkable institution. In other words, the branch of royal prerogative by which a modern king confers nobility on a favoured subject is of Roman origin.

No doubt there is a Roman element in feudalism. The fully developed feudal relation arises from the union in the same person of the Teutonic relation of the comitatus and the Roman relation of tenure of land by military service. But it was precisely because in England we had from the beginning the Teutonic element in feudalism apart from its Roman element, that feudalism was in England a plant of so much later and so much more stunted growth than it was in countries where Roman influences had freer play. In short, throughout this part of his book, when Sir Edward Creasy is right, he is right, as it were, by accident. For instance he gives its true meaning to the phrase of the "Saxon Shore," but he actually adds that "for the purpose of the present text, it is immaterial whether we so understand it, or suppose that the Shore was called Saxon from Saxons having settled there." When Sir Edward Creasy wrote his lectures, it was no doubt creditable to hit on the right meaning anyhow, but at this time of day we know very well that the difference between the right and the wrong meaning is not at all "immaterial," but is just the gist of the whole matter. Here again:—

The Germans, who settled in this Island during the fifth and sixth centuries, are usually spoken of as Saxons, Angles, and Jutes. The collective name of Anglo-Saxon has been given to them by modern historians, for the sake of distinguishing them from the Saxons of Continental Germany, and it is a name which it is convenient to employ.

Sir Edward Creasy then looks on "Anglo-Saxon" as a modern name which it is convenient to employ. In truth, as many people know by this time, it is an ancient name which it is inconvenient to employ. If Colombo contained a copy of the Codex Diplomaticus or of the Monumenta Historica Britannica, Sir Edward Creasy might find out that "Rex Anglo-Saxonum" is a perfectly good and lawful contraction for "Rex Anglorum et Saxonum." And a moment's thought might teach him that it is not convenient to employ it, both because its correct use is so very narrow that it is practically of no service, and also because modern writers have chosen to use it in the inaccurate and misleading sense which Sir Edward Creasy thinks is convenient.

It will be seen that Sir Edward Creasy here calls the English "Germans"; we have already spoken of the way in which his whole talk in this part of the book is about "Germans," "Germany," "Germanic." In the following passage he is feeling his way in an amusing fashion:—

There has been, and there continues to be, much learned controversy as to the exact localities on the Continent whence the Germanic conquerors of Britain came, and as to their precise degrees of affinity one with the other. Without entering into these deep (though very valuable and interesting) discussions, we may be safe in adopting the general statement, that the Anglo-Saxons were Germans of the sea coast between the Eyder and the Yssel, of the islands that lie off that coast, and of the water-systems of the lower Eyder, the lower Elbe, and the Weser. It is important to observe that these are all parts of Germany with which the Romans were less acquainted than was the case with the parts of Germany that lie near the Rhine and the Danube, the two boundary rivers of the Roman continental empire in Europe.

That is to say, in plain words, they were Low-Dutch and not High, but it is clear that Sir Edward Creasy does not know the difference. Some way on he tells us that, at the time of Augustine's coming into Britain "the German then spoken by the Franks differed little from the German then spoken by the Anglo-Saxons." The exact amount of difference between English and Frankish in the sixth century would require a first-rate philologist exactly to expound; it is plain that Sir Edward Creasy has not mastered the A B C of the matter.

In Sir Edward Creasy's eyes "the term Heptarchy is so familiar and so well-understood that there is no risk of the use of it misleading any one into the idea that the number of independent Anglo-Saxon kingdoms in this island before Egbert's time was always exactly seven." We need not stop to point out that "Heptarchy" is just one of those misleading words which no accurate writer ever thinks of using; it is more important to mention that Sir Edward Creasy actually quotes with approval Milton's famous saying about the "kites and crows." Starting from this text, the whole story of the English Conquest, the whole story of the fluctuations of power between Wessex, Mercia, and Northumberland, all the details which in the hands of so many living scholars are at last growing up into a breathing and moving picture, are by Sir Edward Creasy utterly wiped out. He has found a great deal to tell us about Phœnicians and Babylonians and Greeks and Romans, and he assures us that "the conquering advance upon Persia of the Macedonians under Alexander the Great, though ultimately beneficial to mankind, brought heavy calamities on the generation then in being." But of the calamities brought on the generation then in being by the advance of the English under Hengist and Ælle and Cynric and Ceawlin and Ine, ultimately beneficial as that advance undoubtedly was to mankind, Sir Edward Creasy has not a word to tell us. The grand drama of Anderida and Badbury and Deorham and Fethanleah—the process, in short, by which England became England—might, as far as he is concerned, have as well never happened. This again was pardonable when the lectures were first written, but there is no excuse for cooking them up again now after such a flood of light has been thrown on this portion of our history, but a flood of which no rays seem as yet to have found their way to Colombo.

In the same spirit the great war of Cnut and Eadmund is cut short in two or three lines, and the reigns of the sons of Cnut are cut shorter still, without a word as to the mysterious and disputed fate of Ælfred. The last serious attempt at dividing the English Kingdom is perhaps referred by Sir Edward Creasy to his kite-and-crow land. Of course the excuse will be that there is no room for everything, but surely, in a History of England, Cnut, and even Cnut's sons, are of more importance than Nebuchadnezzar.

With all this, we need hardly add that the crop of particular blunders is not small. Very few people can spell the name of our primitive Parliament, though where the great difficulty is it is not easy to see. But Sir Edward Creasy has a form of his own which we do not remember to have seen elsewhere—namely, "Witangemote." Would he, in writing Latin, call it the "Sapientes concilio"? We trow not, but then ignorance of Latin is confessedly mortal sin, while ignorance of English hardly venial sin. Elsewhere he talks of "the Witans," on the same principle on which our translators of the Bible talk about Cherubims. Then we have the common blunder of "Earldorman," through the vulgar confusion between "Ealdorman" and "Eorl." The blunders of fact are endless. Cnut, for instance, "had inherited" the Crown of Denmark before he won that of England, and he also "conquered Sweden." "William de Jumiège" [sic], a very respectable monk, is a "Norman lord"; the young William's faithful guardian Count Gilbert, who was murdered for his faithfulness, tries, in Sir Edward Creasy's version, "to seize on the sovereignty for himself." William's fleet is "collected between the mouths of the Seine and the Orme [Orne]," which is true, but it is rather like saying that the battle of Senlac was fought between Lewes and Dover. Nearly every detail of William's great campaign is wrong, but it is due to Sir Edward Creasy to say that he has a clearer notion of the nature of the spot which he oddly calls "Mount Senlac" than most people have. The battle itself he fairly understands, but even here we have such careless slurring over of things as to hide Gyrth among "some of Harold's officers." This is queer, for the one thing that Sir Edward Creasy can do, when he tries, is to understand and draw a personal character, and one would have thought that the dramatic scene in Waco, whether true or false, would have struck him. But then there was most likely no copy of the Roman de Rou in bookless Colombo. "Prayers were read" in the Norman camp, as if they had read "Dearly Beloved," and we venture to guess that they were read by William Fitz-Osbern, whom Sir Edward Creasy a few pages on oddly consecrates Bishop of Hereford. And so the thing goes on. Everybody of royal birth is "Prince" or "Princess"; Ælfred in the ninth century, Edward in the thirteenth, are alike talked of as if they had been Brunswick Royal Highnesses. Ælfred especially, by some more mysterious process than all in

of his uncle being his natural heir, and elsewhere he is described as "Edgar, son of the dead Prince Edward (commonly known in history as Edgar Atheling)." We presume, then, that Sir Edward Creasy thinks it his special business to correct the rude Court Circular of the eleventh century by the more polished pattern of the nineteenth. Elsewhere we hear of "the Godwin sway" and the "Godwin family." Sir Edward clearly thinks that Godwin is a surname, or perhaps the title of an Earldom. We did once, in another book, see the words "Harold, Earl Godwin," just as one might say "John, Earl Russell."

Sir Edward Creasy in one chapter crosses the sea to talk about "Pepin le Bref," so we suppose that he thinks that French was the language of Germany in the eighth century. Some centuries later, Lewis the Eighth, in his father's lifetime, appears as the "French Dauphin" (p. 333). This blunder is a test alike for writers and mingles up his confusions with glimmerings of truth :—

> Clovis (who reigned from A.D. 481 to A.D. 511), extended his rule over nearly the whole of Gaul; and he may be regarded as the founder of the French monarchy, though it was repeatedly subjected to temporary dismemberment, and though the country was not known by the collective name of Francia till a much later period.

Undoubtedly not—not for some seven or eight hundred years. But Sir Edward Creasy does not seem to know that "Francia" is from a very early time a perfectly good word, though of course not a word translating the modern "France." If Sir Edward Creasy had a library to refer to, he might perhaps find out something about the "Francia" of Eginhard, about "Francia Teutonica" and "Francia Latina"—things which are understood now, though perhaps they were not understood when Sir Edward Creasy used to lecture. Presently "Rolf becomes Rollo," as if he had changed his name. He did change his name at his baptism, but as Cnut is never called Lambert, as Swegen is hardly ever called Otto, as Guthrum is but rarely called Æthelstan, so Rolf is never called Robert. But surely one need not tell anybody that Rollo is simply the Latin shape of Rolf, and that Sir Edward Creasy might just as well talk about Cnut becoming Cnuto. Why modern French writers talk about Rollon, instead of the grand old French form Rou, it is not for us to guess.

It is a pity that Sir Edward Creasy has done his work in so careless and slovenly a way, or rather that he attempted it at all under circumstances under which it was impossible to do it well. For ever and anon we see glimpses of better things even in points of detail. For instance, he quite understands that shires are older than kingdoms, that the kingdom is not divided into shires, but that it was formed by aggregation of independent shires. He therefore properly enough rejects the notion of England being divided into shires by Ælfred or by any other one man. But then he fails to see the wide difference in this matter between different parts of England. He does not see that in Wessex the old shires abide to this day, while in Mercia, which was at first far more than Wessex the land of independent shires, the old shires out of which the Kingdom was formed have been utterly wiped out and have given way to shires which really are artificial divisions of the Kingdom. Northamptonshire was made by some man, most likely by Eadward the Elder. But Dorsetshire never was made. Mr. Barnes, we have no doubt, "'specks it growed."

So again we hail such glimpses of the Obvious as that "the Anglo-Saxon and English are essentially the same language," and even as "the Anglo-Saxon stage of English." They are signs that, if Sir Edward Creasy lived somewhere where there is "a copious historical library," he might soon come to learn a good deal. His notes, the eagerness with which he seizes on any new light, show that he is not above learning. And that is a great deal to say; readiness to learn to the end was perhaps the noblest feature in the noble character of Hallam. We trust that either a copious historical library may soon be translated to Colombo, or else that Sir Edward Creasy may soon be translated to some other place where there is a copious historical library. We feel sure that if he only had the chance, he would make good use of it. We take kindly to him in many things. He tries to be fair, and he commonly succeeds. His account of Henry and Thomas is shallow enough, but there is a visible attempt to do justice to both sides which is thoroughly praiseworthy. His account of Edward the First is really worth reading. But we must at the onset set forth the plain truth, lest either Sir Edward Creasy or anybody else should think that this book fills up the gap of which Sir Edward Creasy complains in his preface. We do not know whether his book has "unity and entirety of organism and purpose," because we do not know what "unity and entirety of organism and purpose" may be. But when he says that such a history must have "artistic proportions," that it "must have animation as well as accuracy," we can answer that to our taste Sir Edward Creasy's book has no artistic proportions, that it has very little animation, and no accuracy at all. It is probably as good a book as its author could put together without the needful pains and without the needful materials. But history ought not to be trifled with in this way. Bricks, at least of the Egyptian sort, cannot be made without straw; but if a man goes of his own free will into a land without straw, and there of his own free will sets about making bricks, then, if his brick-making proves an utter failure, he has no task-master to blame but himself.

SPECTRUM ANALYSIS.*

SCIENCE advances by singularly irregular steps. Sometimes it is one department, and sometimes another, that seems to monopolize for the moment the spirit of progress. Of late, to borrow a sporting phrase, spectrum analysis has been making all the running. So beautiful and so startling, so delicate and so far-reaching, have been the recent developments of this method, that a broad margin of thought outside the world of science proper has been busying itself about it, and striving to get some insight into this new channel of discovery. And this has not been easy for the outsiders. The researches of Kirchhoff and Bunsen, Angström, Huggins and Miller, Lockyer and Frankland, are to be found in the papers of scientific societies; but a compendious account of the whole investigation, fitted for popular reading, was wanting, and even those who moved within the genuine scientific circle had begun to feel the need of a manual which should lead them to the latest sources of information on the subject.

Mr. Roscoe has been the first to supply this want, and the task could scarcely have been committed to better hands, nor could his work have been produced in better style than it has been by his publishers. The illustrations—no unimportant part of a book on such a subject—are marvels of wood-printing, and reflect the clearness which is the distinguishing merit of Mr. Roscoe's explanations. The fact that the book is remarkably opportune in its appearance implies that it has the defects which are inseparable from pioneer treatises on progressive subjects. Precisely because spectrum analysis is the specially advancing subject of the day, it is incapable of being presented in a complete and finished shape. Even while Mr. Roscoe's book was going through the press, new discoveries were falsifying some and superseding others of the conclusions which he treats as established, and we must look for a second edition, after this branch of science has reached a stage of comparative repose, to give a thoroughly connected and systematic narrative of what spectrum analysis has done. The method which Mr. Roscoe has followed has, we think, aggravated the defects to which we refer. He has taken as the basis of his book a series of very excellent lectures which he delivered about a year ago. In some instances (more especially with reference to some portion of Mr Huggins's work) he has introduced corrections, bringing his text into harmony with the knowledge of to-day, but for the most part he has left his lectures unaltered, adding at the end of each an appendix of subsequent discovery. Possibly it might have been difficult to rewrite the text by the light of our present knowledge without an amount of delay to be deprecated alike in the interest of publishers and readers, and we are glad to welcome the book as it is, as an instalment of the more perfect treatise which we may expect hereafter.

Some of our readers may want to know what spectrum analysis is, and most of them will probably be glad of a slight sketch of the subject as Mr. Roscoe has dealt with it. In his first lecture the author describes the well-known discovery of Newton, that the white solar light is composed of a bundle of differently coloured and differently refrangible rays, which, when dispersed by a prism produce the rainbow-like band which is known as the solar spectrum. The dark absorption lines which traverse this spectrum, first observed by Wollaston, and afterwards mapped by Fraunhofer, are the foundation of all the subsequent discoveries worked out by spectrum analysis. A dark line at a particular position of the spectrum could only mean the presence of some substance capable of absorbing that particular kind of light, and when that inference was recognised, the science of spectrum analysis began to exist. But another step had to be made before this interpretation of the Fraunhofer lines became fruitful as a method of analysis. It was noticed some forty or fifty years ago, by Herschel and Talbot, that various substances, when heated sufficiently to give off incandescent vapour, produced a spectrum just the reverse in kind of that obtained from the sun. Instead of a bright band of rainbow crossed by dark lines, there appeared a few bright lines on a background of dark [illegible] and several of these were soon affiliated on [illegible] alkaline and metallic salts. Later on, Wheatstone and others, by using the intense heat of the electric spark, identified the bright lines which indicate several of the metals when in a state of incandescence. One specially characteristic line which was seldom missed in the spectrum of any incandescent vapour was traced, first by Swan, and afterwards in more detail by Kirchhoff, to the presence of sodium, and was found to be identical in position with [illegible] well-known dark line in the yellow part of the solar spectrum. This was the dawn of the great discovery by which spectrum analysis was made applicable to solar and stellar investigation. The question suggested itself at once whether the same substance which produced the bright line in the one case could be the cause of the dark line in the other, and by pursuing this track of investigation Kirchhoff arrived at the famous law (now requiring some little modification) which lies at the root of the cosmical branch of spectrum analysis. Every substance, when interposed between the eye and a luminous body, absorbs precisely the same kind of light which it emits [illegible] heated to incandescence. Solids and liquids, as a rule, give [illegible] nuous spectra, and consequently are capable only of causing general absorption. Gases and vapours, as a rule, give out, when heated, discontinuous spectra composed of one or more bright lines, and each gas or vapour absorbs precisely the same light which it produces, and makes on the solar spectrum a dark line ranging with perfect accuracy with its own characteristic bright lines. It was only necessary to compare the Fraunhofer lines with the bright lines produced by different substances in the electric arc, to determine at once what the substances were which caused by their absorption the dark lines observed in the solar spectrum. In this way the presence of hydrogen, as well as sodium, magnesium, and a great number of other metals was detected in an absorbing condition in the sun. But what was the sun, and how were these absorbing substances placed in relation to the luminous surface? The first hypothesis of Kirchhoff, and indeed of almost every one else, was the very natural one that the sun was surrounded first by a layer of incandescent matter assumed to be solid or liquid, because it gave out a continuous spectrum, and that outside of this floated a comparatively cool absorbing atmosphere containing vapours of all the substances whose characteristic lines were seen upon the sun. This hypothesis is now utterly displaced by Mr. Lockyer's recent work, but it served its turn, and did an immense amount of good work in leading the way to riper knowledge. Rival theories about sun-spots—all of them perhaps destined to be modified—were founded on this common hypothesis, and until the chromosphere made itself known it never occurred to any one to doubt the existence of the supposed cool absorbing atmosphere surrounding the solar photosphere. Long before any bright lines had been obtained from the sun, the spectra of comets and nebulæ had been observed by Donati, Secchi, and Huggins, and found to give the isolated bright lines which indicate the presence of incandescent gas or vapour. Hydrogen and nitrogen were especially identified by comparison with the spectra produced in the laboratory from these substances, but for a time the scientific world rested content with the theory that the sun was a molten mass with only cool absorbent vapours round about it. The eclipse observations and the work of Mr. Lockyer have demolished this provisional hypothesis, and the spectroscope now tells us that the solar photosphere is surrounded with incandescent gas, chiefly hydrogen; that the substances which produce the absorption lines are not in general mixed with the hydrogen or, as was universally believed, floating in a circumambient atmosphere, but are intermingled with the mass of the photosphere; and that, as these give the characteristic gaseous lines, the photosphere itself, in its upper region at any rate, must also be made up of gas or vapour. It would have been a puzzle to understand how anything but a solid or liquid could give the continuous light emitted by the photosphere, but an opportune discovery of Dr Frankland's had some time since removed this difficulty. He found that the rule that incandescent gases give discontinuous spectra is not of universal application, and that a gas under certain conditions may produce a continuous spectrum. Nor is it at all necessary to suppose that the light of the photosphere (varying as it does in brilliancy in different parts of the spectrum) is the product of a single substance. What it is the spectroscope will probably soon reveal. But these remarkable facts are far from all that the spectroscope has recently told us about the sun. The researches of Dr. Frankland and Mr. Lockyer upon the spectra of hydrogen and other substances have exposed some very prevalent errors. It was imagined by almost all previous observers, and indeed is assumed throughout in the text of Mr Roscoe's lectures, that each substance always gives out the same spectrum, with only some variations, due, as was generally supposed, to greater or less intensity of temperature and consequent brightness. A good [illegible] of these changes noted by Plucker and Hittorf had been ascribed almost entirely to temperature, though these observers had also taken variations of pressure into account. The most recent experiments—those of Frankland and Lockyer—have shown that the spectra of all or nearly all the substances observed vary with pressure, and it has been found practicable by comparison with these results to show that the hydrogen in the chromosphere must be in a state of extreme tenuity. One more revelation of the spectroscope is too interesting to be passed without notice. It had been suggested some time since, by Mr Maxwell, that light coming from a luminous body rapidly approaching the earth would be more refrangible than if the radiating source were at rest, and the change in refrangibility affords on this theory an easy means of estimating the rapidity of the approach. Some singular appearances in the spectrum of the solar chromosphere and prominences observed by Mr. Lockyer have established the fact of extremely rapid motion in the hydrogen of which it is composed. Sometimes the single line bulges out into two lines, one more and the other less refrangible, representing the approaching and receding sides of a cyclone of blazing hydrogen, and the velocity has been found to reach in some instances more than a hundred miles a second—that is to say, a speed some thousands of times greater than the rate of any terrestrial hurricane. Uprushes and downrushes on a similarly grand scale have been detected in the same way, and each day seems to add to our knowledge of the constitution of the sun.

Part of what we have been describing is unfortunately too recent to appear in Mr. Roscoe's book, and much more of it has of necessity been added in appendixes after the text was completed, but there are many scarcely less interesting results of spectroscopic work which were ripe enough to take definite shape in the lectures when originally delivered. The remarkable delicacy of spectrum observations in detecting the faintest trace of any known substance is beautifully illustrated, and the practical use of the method made, at Mr. Roscoe's own suggestion, in the manufacture of Bessemer steel is one of the most interesting applications of new scientific discovery to the service of mankind. There are many other sides of the subject on which we have not space to dilate, and for which we must refer our readers to the work itself, always, however, with this caution, that if they desire to know with accuracy the point to which science has at this moment advanced, they must look beyond the text into the appendixes, and sometimes, when they have the opportunity, a little beyond them.

THE LIFE OF EDMUND KEAN.*

FIFTY-FIVE years since, on the 26th of January, 1814, a needy and almost friendless actor made his first appearance at Drury Lane Theatre, and showed to the playgoing public at one stroke almost, and certainly by a single performance, that a new luminary then and there had risen on the theatrical horizon. The success commenced by Shylock was confirmed and surpassed by rapidly succeeding representations of the highest and most arduous characters of the English drama, characters on which John Kemble, Henderson, and George Frederick Cooke—to go no further back in stage annals—had respectively set their seals, and in which, until that memorable evening, they were imagined to be secure from rivalry. In tragedy at least a Garrick redivivus had come to light, and so long as the names of great actors are held in remembrance, that of Edmund Kean was on that January evening granted a patent of perpetuity.

Seldom, if indeed ever, has a player served so severe an apprenticeship to his art as Edmund Kean did. From his infancy to his twenty-sixth year his days were passed in struggles with toil, want, uncertainty for the morrow, and recurring disappointment. For this poor waif and stray the comforts of home and the tenderness of parents were unknown. Endowed, as his acting showed, with an irritable and susceptible temperament, his feelings were constantly on the rack, his irritability was almost chronically excited. He was in bondage to his mother—a greedy, disreputable woman, who used him as if he had been her serf and not her child. He was in bondage to managers, who with few exceptions oppressed or cheated him; in bondage also for the bare necessaries of life—"food, clothes, and fire." Sometimes the cup of better fortune was held in mockery to his thirsting lips, and then proffered to some one born under a less malignant star. The light thrown on his path on one or two occasions served only to render the darkness in which he wandered more visible. It may be true that many brother-strollers may have undergone as much, but they were at least not companied in their misery by the consciousness of genius. They had probably forsaken some calling, or disobeyed some duty, in taking to the stage. But Kean's inward monitor prompted him rightly, his calling, his duty, were scenical. He had a vocation, but apparently the exercise of it was denied to him. And in those twenty-four years—he had been brought on the stage in his third year—when he probed every recess of vagabond life, when he was browbeat by actors who, post fortunam, would have tied his shoe-strings, and rejected by managers who afterwards walked unbonneted before him, were laid the foundations of that excess which ruined him in fame and self-respect, impaired his intellect, made his great gifts vain, and at the age of forty-six years sent him prematurely to the grave, an infirm, poor, and really aged man. None of the tragic scenes in which he played with such pre-eminence equalled in terror o pity the real scenes of Edmund Kean's earlier and later years.

Our present business, however, is with the latest biographer o this most gifted but unhappy man. Of such a man a good Life would be most welcome, as Mr. Barry Cornwall's, meritorious as it is in many respects, does not contain more than a mere record of the man himself, whereas the career of Kean is an important and interesting episode in stage-history. When Mr. Hawkins's volumes were first announced, we had some hope that this void was at last to be supplied. Nearly everything, contemporary or posthumous, likely to be written about Kean was already in print. The prejudices or passions that swayed contemporary opinion were long ago dead. A generation that knew not the great actor had sprung up, and might desire to learn how he looked and moved; what the secret was of his undoubted influence, how he held in bondage the eyes and the ears of the spectator; what manner of man that was who, by general consent, stood level with Kemble and Sara Siddons, and was admitted to be, even by Garrick's widow, the only successor to her beloved David.

Our hopes have been completely disappointed by Mr. Hawkins's volumes. With the exception of a few particulars of Kean's last illness, derived from Dr. James Smith—"clarum et venerabile nomen," henceforth, to every one taking interest in the actor—the 840 pages we have waded through have told us nothing that we knew not before we read them; have generally "marred a curious tale in the telling," have thrust improbabilities upon us, have perverted facts, have exhibited ignorant prejudices to an amount we had fondly believed impossible. These pages, in short, compose one of the most useless and unnecessary book that it has ever been our ill luck to meet with.

Mr. F. W. Hawkins puts forth in his preface what may appear to the unwary reader of his Life of Edmund Kean a modest and becoming plea for indulgence:

> As this Life bears internal evidence of an inexperienced pen, I hope that my deficiencies in literary art will be ascribed to their actual source. But subscribing as I do to Goethe's maxim, what have I to fear? As one servant cannot serve two masters, so my readers cannot condemn this book and share the opinion of the great German poet at one time, for I have performed my task con amore, and has not Goethe said that enthusiasm is the one thing necessary to history?

It is not very easy to construe this sentence, which reads like an oracle drawn up by some inferior priest at Delphi or Dodona, but let that pass. Mr. Hawkins's style is not, like Master Froth's face, "the worst thing about him." Before admitting his appeal for his "Virgin Tragedy," his "Orphan Muse," it is necessary to look into the appellant's claim for allowance. "The actual source" of his "deficiencies" is the writer's utter incompetence for his least as Goethe has told us that the historian should write "sine ira et studio," especially when, as he adds of himself, "quorum causas procul habeo"—when the passions of the moment and the caprices of fashion are long since passed away. Now the enthusiasm which Mr. Hawkins hopes will protect him against gainsayers is singularly made up of passion (ira) and purpose to disparage great names (studium). The Kembles he never mentions without some covert or open sneer. He records with evident relish Kean's hasty remarks on that "Jesuit Young," and that "player, but no actor, Macready"—remarks that were most probably made in some moment of irritation, or perhaps when the maker was in his cups. Mr. Hawkins has indeed a little more charity for Mrs. Siddons than for her brother John, but he doles it out very penuriously, much as a miser deals out his halfpenny to the church-plate. Indeed one might suppose, from Mr. Hawkins's tone in writing of them, that every one of Edmund Kean's distinguished contemporaries, and even some of his predecessors also, must have been the actor's natural enemies. He is delighted to record Kemble's failure in Sir Giles Overreach, and Cooke's inferiority in the wooing and winning of Lady Anne. The souls of the once celebrated Wolf Club would seem to have all entered into Mr. Hawkins's bosom. The members of that by no means "highly respectable society" determined, in their day, that their idol should be guarded against every rival that threatened him, and none but decidedly third-rate merit be permitted to second him on the stage. Perhaps, as Mr. Hawkins scarcely knows the alphabet of stage-history, he may never have heard of the name of Me[illegible] whom the Wolves howled off Drury Lane boards, and whom, had the name been known to him, he would doubtless have ranked with John Kemble or Charles Young.

We are really embarrassed by the number of notes made on the margin of our copy of this Life of Kean—notes of interrogation, notes of surprise, together with sundry monosyllables which its author might not thank us for transcribing. But we must afford our readers a sample or two of his quality. In his first volume, at page 332, he writes:—

> Upon the [illegible]ncement of his third season we find Kean occupying the house for[illegible]rly [illegible]nited by Lady Rycroft, in Clarges Street, Piccadilly. The house in Cecil Street, in which Kean had exchanged the comfortless [illegible]t for more cheerful apartments, had been abandoned at the instance of [illegible] Kean, whose tastes were altogether at variance with those of her husband. The lady wished to divest her new station of the slightest colouring of less exalted associations, and delighted in entertaining company at Clarges Street, "persons of distinction" finding especial favour in her eyes. Edmund had no affection for such an atmosphere, and sought more congenial society at the Coal Hole, where he contributed a little to the duty upon brandy, and enjoyed his favourite repast of a rumpsteak the more because it was not served up in the "style" insisted upon by Mrs. Kean in Clarges Street.

There is some truth in these sentences. The "atmosphere" of decency, let alone "persons of distinction," was not congenial to Edmund Kean. "Mrs. Kean's tastes," fortunately for her, "were at variance with those of her husband." The society at the Coal Hole would probably not have improved either the furniture or atmosphere of Clarges Street. But Mr. Hawkins is among the writers who, when they get hold of facts, cannot use them, or discern their meaning or their connexion. He thus writes of Mrs. Kean (vol. i. p. 78):—"Miss Chambers was a member of a highly respectable Waterford family, who had forsaken the scholastic profession for the stage." Was it not natural for a woman so bred, and apparently well educated, to rejoice in her rescue from the Bohemian sort of life to which her husband's career as a strolling player had subjected them both? Would she have stood better in the biographer's estimation had she, like her husband, preferred to live en Bohémienne in London, after she had obtained the means of living in more decent fashion? Ought she to have made a Coal Hole of the house in Clarges Street, or accompanied him to his rumpsteak and brandy at his club?

Mr. F. W. Hawkins is so enamoured of this statement as to repeat it in his second volume, p. 294, only with a difference for the [illegible]orse:—

> Whether Mrs. Kean were a party to this extravagance I cannot speak [illegible]ith certainty; but this I know, that for years before the breaking up of the home in Clarges Street, she had maintained considerable control over money matters, and her love of display, and her prodigality, and her desire to keep up a fine establishment may be referred to as additional reasons for the comparative poverty to which the tragedian now found himself reduced.

Again Mr. F. W. Hawkins shall be his own commentator:—

> In thirteen years [he says] 200,000*l* had been expended [in 1826-7 he had not a hundred left]. How he had contrived to make away with such a [illegible]m—for he never gambled—is problematical. The fact that he never turned [illegible] deaf ear to a tale of distress; his peculiar and magnificent generosity to [illegible] poorer members of his profession, the liberality of his subscriptions to [illegible]nevolent institutions; his exertions on behalf of public charities; his gratuitous performances for needy managers, and his writing cheques when under the influence of drink, and when he knew not what he was doing—these [illegible]nt to a certain extent for the rapidity with which his piles of gold dwindled down.

When a man in drink signs cheques we see very little that is "problematical" (in whatever sense Mr. F. W. Hawkins may employ that word) about the cause of his gains disappearing; and the expenses of the house in Clarges Street, about which he knows so much, need hardly be included as an item in the account. Whatever may be the source of Mr. F. W. Hawkins's knowledge, we have ascertained from very good authority that it was not Mrs. Kean's housekeeping or her love of fine company that in any material degree contributed to this "prodigality that cannot be extenuated." With regard, indeed, to Kean's open hand to real or feigned distress, Mr. F. W. Hawkins is in the right. Kean dispensed his bounty as readily and indiscreetly as Timon of Athens.

The biographer, indeed, like Caliban, has "two voices—his forward voice is to speak well of his friend; his backward voice is to utter foul speeches and to detract." Poor Mary Chambers at least might have been spared his "ærugo mera" and "nigræ succus loliginis" in consideration of what she underwent in either fortune—of her loneliness during years of separation, of her generous oblivion of deep wrongs at the last.

It would weary our readers were we to repeat the hymns of triumph chanted in these volumes over the decline and fall of the Kembles. Mr. F. W. Hawkins is in one respect indeed generous; he allows that classic John played one part well—Penruddock. Leaving this hapless family to their fate, our next remarks apply to his account of Kean and Young when acting together at Drury Lane. As he pleads inexperience in extenuation of his deficiencies, we will give him the benefit of supposing him too young to have been an eye-witness of their joint performances in 1822-3. If he did witness them, his plea falls to the ground, and his book is even more incorrect than we think it. In the table of contents there are the following entries – "Inequality of Kean and Young," "Second Defeat of Young," "Termination of the Contest between Kean and Young." And he thus describes the incompetent Mr Young in Iago. He indeed fortifies one part of his description by a very fine sample of Hazlitt's criticisms on Othello; but Hazlitt, though he colours highly and sometimes unfairly, at least understood what he was writing about (vol. ii. p. 245). After a passing compliment to John Kemble, whose acting we are told was "utterly soulless," and something dubious about Barry Cornwall as "a favourer of the classic school of acting,' he proceeds with infinite glee:—

> Well, Young did venture into the lists, and he did learn a lesson which was useful to him as long as he remained on the stage. His Iago partook of that scowling blood-thirsty aspect which Kean had virtually banished from the stage. All the intellectual activity, all the fascinating gaiety with which Shakspeare has clothed Othello's ancient, were lost to view in Young's performance, in which, adopting the old established tragic fashion, he carried his purpose in his face and brought out all the villany into the foreground. Was this Iago?

Certainly not, neither was it Charles Young's version of Iago. In spite of this idle rant about "scowling blood-thirsty aspect," "absence of all intellectual activity, fascinating gaiety," &c., Young represented Mine Ancient as a blunt soldier, more at home in the tented field, in camp or barrack, than in the company of magnificos or ladies, and displaying the beauty, if somewhat cynical, humour of an unpolished soldier. Of the ordinary melodramatic villain of the stage there was no trace in Young's impersonation. Such villany as he did exhibit was reserved for the soliloquies, and even in them very sparingly used. If Young drew from any one in this character it was not from the classical school of Kemble, but from the natural school of George Frederick Cooke. In the great scenes with Othello, Young was cool and calm as a gamester who knows that he has the game in his hands, and there was a plausibility in his manner that almost justified the easy credulity of his unfortunate general.

Mr. F. W. Hawkins's account of Young in Pierre is even more incorrect than his description of him in Iago. He is in the right in saying that Kean in Jaffier displayed "great beauty and tenderness, and some coruscations of a proud and noble spirit", but we need neither Mr. Hawkins nor his ghost to tell us that Kean excelled in tenderness and coruscations of a noble spirit. In this play Young, in the estimation of the spectators at least, divided the applause with his competitor. In Pierre also, as in Iago, his soldierly bearing, his noble voice, his spirit and full comprehension of the character, were conspicuous. The same can be said of his Clytus and his Iachimo, and in both these parts he shared and shared alike the honours of the night with Alexander and Leonatus Posthumus. When Young's "second defeat" took place is known only to Mr F. W. Hawkins, and how he profited by the "lesson" which is said to have been "useful to him as long as he remained on the stage," appeared when he returned and when Kean migrated to Covent Garden in 1828, where Young repeated his failure in Iago—with great and general applause—but without any signs of conviction or penitence.

One more instance of the biographer's ineptitude, and we close his volumes —

> Kean's second season at Covent Garden was brought to an abrupt close early in 1829. Having been obliged in consequence of illness to suspend his professional labours, the tragedian found himself once more encamped on the banks of his favourite Loch Fad.

There is no medium in Mr. F. W. Hawkins's likes and dislikes. When he writes of the Kembles, of Young or Macready, his words are very swords; but they are softer than butter when he encounters a failing of poor Edmund Kean's. His account of what really took place on the abrupt close of the Covent Garden engagement—which, as we shall see presently, was not really closed, but merely suspended to a more convenient season—is the perfection of euphemism, as perfect as George Frederick Cooke's allusion to his "old complaint." Mr. Hawkins has apparently put too much trust in Genest, who says under "January 12. Richard II revived. Richard—Kean, &c The play was changed to the Beggar's Opera owing to the indisposition of Mr. Kean"; but he seems to have overlooked that the word "indisposition" is significantly underlined. Genest knew, what Mr. F. W. Hawkins, to all appearance is ignorant of—indeed, though usually minute enough wherever his hero is concerned, he does not mention the play on that occasion at all, or any circumstance connected with the "illness"—that Kean, in the interval between the morning rehearsal and the intended evening performance, got (in plain English, and not in euphemistic phrase) dead drunk. Repentance indeed came with the morning. He was thoroughly ashamed of himself, spoke of soon repairing his fault; but Mr. Charles Kemble, seeing how ill he was, and how unable he must be to appear again during the season, insisted on his departing, as soon as he was able to travel, to the Isle of Bute, and offered to suspend—not to cancel, with Mr F. W. Hawkins's good leave—the remainder of his engagement until the reopening of the theatre in the following October. The version of the story conveyed in the volumes before us is a pure perversion of the real fact. So far as regards Kean's offer to give his services for three nights gratuitously to Covent Garden, his biographer may be in the right. Miss Foote was at the same time performing for six nights "gratuitously," and we believe other performers did so also, for the theatre had very recently been on the verge of the Bankruptcy Court, and was rescued from that abyss only by the exertions of Miss Fanny Kemble. Now, either Mr. F. W. Hawkins is ignorant of the fact, or he has suppressed it. Kean owed the residue of his engagement. His absence from London, from January 12th to the following May or June, had inflicted a severe loss on the theatrical treasury, since his place could not be supplied, and even had Mr. Macready been disengaged, he could not, in the public estimation at least of those days, have filled the room of Kean in Shylock, Overreach, Richard, and Othello. Why, as Mr. F. W. Hawkins asserts, "Mr. Charles Kemble did not come out of the matter with credit" is a mystery, as well as many other statements in this biography. The services of Edmund Kean were morally, and, but for a defect in the law, legally also, the property of Covent Garden Theatre, so long as his contract was unfulfilled. Mr. Kemble was only protecting the rights of the management. Mr. Kean broke faith and forgot his promises, and before he reached, not as Mr F. W. Hawkins says, "on arriving in London on the 22nd of November," had signed another contract with Mr Price, then manager of Drury Lane.

We close our remarks on this very unsatisfactory record of a great actor with a friendly hint to those who may intend to read it. All that relates to Kean's early struggles, and until he came to London in January, 1814, is deeply interesting, and on the whole a respectable compilation. After that date the reader will do well to look out for such passages as are marked by inverted commas, for they consist of extracts from the journals of the time and the notices of Kean by writers competent to report of him during his six or seven years of unimpaired vigour. By attending to these extracts a great deal of instruction will be gained, and a great deal of weariness avoided by passing lightly over the biographer's own dissertations. In spite of these disappointing volumes, we are still of opinion that there is room for a short Life of the greatest tragedian of this century, but it must be executed by some one less "enthusiastic" and better informed than Mr. F. W. Hawkins.

AS the constitution of the English Universities is a standing puzzle to foreigners, it is no less a standing puzzle to Irishmen. The relation between the University and the Colleges is, on the first blush of it, a profound mystery to both. The one cannot understand a University containing many Colleges, the other cannot understand the existence of Colleges at all. We have known very intelligent foreigners talk about a "Fellow of the University of Oxford," and they may be forgiven when we remember that there are such mysterious beings as Fellows of the University of Durham, and that Oxford itself does, or lately did, contain Vinerian Fellows who were not Fellows of anywhere in particular. We remember trying to explain the matter to a Swiss friend by likening the Colleges to the Cantons and the University to the Confederation, and, to express their practical relations to one another, the illustration did fairly well. But we had to guard against new misconceptions by further explaining that our illustration, while practically true, was historically false—that while the Confederation was formed by the union of Cantons older than itself, the Colleges have grown up within a University older than themselves. An Irishman's difficulty is not the same as the difficulty of the Continental, but it is a difficulty which he finds quite as puzzling. The difference between the University of Dublin and Trinity College, Dublin, is one so subtle that he has not tried to master it, and indeed why should he try to master it, when a vote of his own House of Commons talks about the "University of Trinity College"? But there are Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and there is a Trinity College in each. But whereas Trinity College, Dublin, is the whole of the University of Dublin, and can hardly be distinguished from the University of Dublin, it is plain that Trinity College, Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge, are far from being the whole of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge respectively. This is very puzzling to the natural Irish mind. We have known an Irishman, anxious to do the right thing, and used to the formulæ "S.T.C.D." "F.T.C.D." "S.F.T.C.D.," direct a letter to a Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, as "F.T.C.O.," without stopping to think how many sets of letters he would have to devise if he wished to do equal honour to the Fellows of every College in Oxford and Cambridge. But there is at least this comfort, that the puzzledom is mutual, or rather that the puzzledom on the English side reaches higher. The Irish difficulty of understanding the English Universities is a mere popular difficulty. We have no doubt that every Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, perfectly understands the difference between his own position and the position of his homonyms at Oxford and Cambridge. But the better a man understands the system of Oxford and Cambridge, the more mysterious does he find the relations between the University of Dublin and Trinity College, Dublin. It is not that he is puzzled at the mere fact that the University of Dublin contains only a single College. Dr. Todd, the learned editor of this Catalogue, need hardly have gone about to prove that a University which contains only one College, or which contains no College at all, may still be a full and perfec University. Colleges are a mere accident in [any University There was a time when the Universities of Oxford and Cambridg contained no Colleges at all; there must have been some momen in the thirteenth century when they contained only one Col lege each. But the puzzling thing about Dublin is the mysteriou way in which the University and the College are mixed u together. It is not merely that they accidentally consist of th same persons, which would be quite consistent with perfect dis tinctness as corporations. It is the two institutions themselve which seem so strangely intermingled. What can be strang than the power which the Provost and Senior Fellows—th Board, as we believe it is called—of the College exercise, as Pro vost and Fellows, in purely University matters? According t Oxford and Cambridge notions, the Provost and Fellows of th College would, in any University matter, be simply so man Doctors or Masters, differing in nothing from Doctors or Mas ters who are not members of the College corporation. Wha if another College should be founded in the University? Woul the Head and Fellows of one College retain an exclusiv power not shared by any of the members of the other? Legisl tion would doubtless soon settle the difficulty, but it does n seem that, without special legislation, it could anyhow settl itself. Now we need not say that in Oxford and Cambridge ne Colleges have been founded, and new Colleges may still be founded without any difficulty of the kind. The members of the ne societies hold, as a matter of course, exactly the same position i the University as the members of the old societies. Then, whe from the constitution of the University and the College, we tur to their history, we find that the College is actually the older o the two. Trinity College, Dublin, is solemnly and formally described as the Mother of the University—"Mater Universitatis" It seems that the learned men of Dublin have, as they well might, disputed a good deal as to the exact force and nature of this singula motherhood. To an Oxford or Cambridge man the one idea which it conveys is that Trinity College is its own grandmother.

These things are a puzzle to us. We understand a University without any Colleges; we understand a University with several Colleges, we understand a University with only one College because as yet one College only happens to have been founded. But we do not understand a University whose corporate being seems to be irrevocably mixed up with the corporate being of one College. It is plain that, if every College in Oxford and Cambridge were suppressed, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge would go on all the same. They would be simply brought back to the state in which they were before the Colleges were founded. But if Trinity College, Dublin, were suppressed, what would become of th University of Dublin? We suspect that something would happen nearly as awful as what would have happened if Speaker Abbot had really named a member. Would it not be something like the case of the German Primate who, as an Elector, cursed and swore? When the Devil took the Elector, what would become of the Archbishop? Now here we think that we have a fair right to complain of Dr. Todd, whose name is put at the end of the preface to this volume. Dr. Todd is well known as one of the chief living lights of his University; he has made him-self a name in more branches of learning than one. He could have told us all about the whole matter, and he has not told us. And it is the more provoking, because he has gone so very near to telling us without telling us. His preface reminds us of the books which one sometimes comes across written by Free-masons. They tell us everything about Freemasonry except what Freemasonry is. So Dr. Todd tells us everything about the rela-tion between the University and the College of Dublin except what the relations between them are. This is a great pity, because he so evidently has the whole matter at his fingers' ends down to the minutest details. We could wish that the space which he has given to refuting the errors of a certain Dr. Miller had been given to a full and clear setting forth of the matter in his own person. But we gather that Trinity Col-lege, "Mater Universitatis," was founded before the University; that its Provost and Fellows received from their foundress, Queen Elizabeth, the power of making statutes (under certain restrictions) for the University as well as for the College; that Elizabeth also gave them the power of electing the Chancellor; that the power of electing the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors, vested by Elizabeth in the whole body of the University, seemingly Undergraduates and all, was transferred to the Provost and Fellows by Charles the First; that the Provost is ex-officio a member of the Caput, with a veto on all Graces; lastly, that a Charter of the present Queen has incorporated, not the University but the Senate of the University, leaving Bachelors and Undergraduates no one can tell exactly where, and that, notwithstanding this incorporation, the Senate can only entertain such matters as are brought before it by the Provost and Fellows. This, it is plain, amounts to much more than the mere accident of there being only one College in the University. The University and the College are throughout con-founded; the College, not the University, elects and legislates in matters which are of purely University concern. Those Doctors and Masters who are not Fellows are shut out from various rights which belong to all Doctors and Masters of Oxford and Cambridge as a matter of course. If other Colleges were to be founded in the University, there would be a still greater anomaly in the Provost and Fellows of one College electing the Chancellor of the University and discharging other purely University functions.

The notion that other Colleges besides Trinity might be founded in the University of Dublin seems to have been entertained from its foundation. But no attempt appears ever to have been made to establish a second College really independent of Trinity College. Dr. Todd mentions several abortive attempts at University exten-sion made in the course of the seventeenth century; but the insti-tutions which were set up were not independent Colleges, but rather what we should call affiliated Halls—houses for students the freehold of which remained in the College. Of one institution called Trinity Hall, which fluctuated between a Bridewell, an academical Hall, and a College of Physicians, the history is some-what amusing. In the other case, in Charles the First's time, some suppressed Roman Catholic institutions, a Capuchin convent, a Jesuits' College, and a parochial chapel, were turned into a house of students called New College. But New College vanished in the rebellion of 1641, and during the few years which it existed it was mere dependency of Trinity College; that corporation settled ome of its graduates as tutors and governors for the outlying students. That these should be the only attempts ever made at setting up new academical institutions only shows how completely Trinity College is identified, or rather confused, with the Uni-versity. If the College be "Mater Universitatis," it is a parent of the school of Kronos, which swallows up its own child.

Dr. Todd confirms a remark which we have often made—namely, that some of the worst doings of James the Second had abundance of precedent. It was nothing new for the Crown to interfere with free elections in Colleges and other bodies by recommending candidates for vacant offices. What was new was recommending a man at once legally unqualified and personally scandalous, like Anthony Farmer. James acted at Dublin in much the same way in which he acted at Oxford. Dr. Todd says:—

> It is only fair to say that the power of nominating and restoring Fellows by mandamus was exercised without question by King Charles I. on several occasions, but those so nominated were men of education, and generally fit for the office, whereas the nominees of King James II. were men of bad cha-racter, illiterate (with perhaps one exception), and who refused to take the oath prescribed by the Statutes.

In 1708 Dublin seems to have been much disturbed by a speech of one Edward Forbes, of which Dr. Todd tells us as follows:—

> At a later period the Masters of Arts seem to have acquired, or usurped, a ower, not recognised in the University Statutes, of addressing the Senate, d making motions, or proposing resolutions. This was a serious innova-ion, and led to disastrous consequences. A remarkable instance is on record. A Master of Arts, one Edward Forbes, at the Summer Commence-(12th of July, 1708), the same day on which he was himself admitted o the degree of M A, took occasion to give utterance to some very disloyal ntiments respecting the title of Queen Anne to the throne. He is reported have said that she had no better right to sit on the throne of Great Bri-n than her predecessor, using the offensive phrase that the title of both " We ave no means of knowing what pretence Forbes had for addressing the sembly at all, or why he was allowed to do so. He seems to have spoken Latin, as the University Statutes required; and his words gave the reatest offence. They were regarded as an open defiance to the loyalty of e nation. Forbes was expelled from the College by the Provost and Senior ellows, and suspended from every Degree, suscepto vel suscipiendo, and then fterwards at a meeting of the Vice-Chancellor, Doctors, and Masters, 2nd ugust, 1708, deprived and degraded by the University.

On the process of expulsion Dr. Todd comments:—

> It will be seen that Forbes was first expelled from the College by the Pro-ost and Senior Fellows, and suspended from his Degrees, afterwards de-prived and degraded by the University. It was necessary that he should be irst expelled by the College, by which expulsion he ceased to be a student, nd lost the right to a Degree which the Charter of Elizabeth gave him. The ersity was therefore free to deal with him as if he had never been a member of the College.

We read of much ado about this matter, of protestations of loyalty made by the College, and of resolutions of the House of Commons n honour of the College. Yet after all, unless Forbes said some-thing which Dr. Todd does not mention, where was the great offence? Where was the wickedness of "those wicked words odem nititur fundamento"? Surely the title of Anne rested on just he same grounds as the title of William, and those were the best grounds on which any title could rest. William and Anne and ll their successors have reigned by a good Parliamentary right, which it is clear that the Jameses and Charleses, succeeding in the eeth of Henry the Eighth's will, never had. Where the wicked-ness of Forbes's words lay is altogether beyond us.

MR. CALVERLEY'S THEOCRITUS.*

THEOCRITUS is a poet so thorough, so various, and in many points so much to be admired and studied, that it were a thou-sand pities to cavil at the form of any attempt to turn him into English. The more so when, as with Mr. Calverley, great gifts taste, scholarship, and fellow-feeling with the Syracusan bard brought to the task. Whatever may be thought of blank verse as an equivalent for Theocritean measures, it was supererogatory Mr. Calverley to offer any justification for what his own success does so much of itself to recommend. A first-rate performer pon an ordinary instrument commands greater favour than a ere strummer upon one that is better chosen, and besides this, y the wholesome interfusion of other metres, especially when terlocutors in the blank-verse idyls vary the narrative or ialogue with song, the present translator successfully escapes monotony, and presents to English readers a delightful poet in guise almost as easy, changeful, and graceful as his own. This saying much, seeing that we rate very highly the genius of Theocritus; yet not too much, if we institute a candid comparison between the translation and the original Chapman translation, which was reviewed in these columns some year ago, left little to be desired; but Mr. Calverley is a nicer and exacter scholar, possessed of a wonderful aptness at squaring things old and new, and imparting to his version an air of modern life which bespeaks the man of the world grafted on the scholar. As we turn over his pages we meet at odd corners little features and touches that remind us of his earlier poems and translations, and recognise sparkles of the same happy humour and perception which at once gave him a rank above mere translators. The same quaint fancy for odd analogies crops out in his Theocritus. The ancient poet is brought near to us, and seems more like life, when his translator ventures, in Id. v. 83, to translate τὰ δὲ Κάρνεα καὶ δὴ ἐφέρπει, "the Carnival is near," and καλὸν κρέας (ἀμνίζοι), ibid. 140, "an elegant lamb's fry." So, in xiv. 17, the much discussed words βολβὸς τις κοχλίας look very natural as "we'd oyster-soup"; and in the next idyl we realize the garotter of Alexandria (48), παρέρπων Αἰγυπτιστί, "creeping Thug-like up." Gorgo's name for her spouse Diocleides, φθόρος ἀργυρίω, "that pick-pocket," might perhaps have been more fairly "that dip-pocket," and though it is quite in Mr. Calverley's own vein, few translators would have been bold enough to render the play on words in Idyl xxvi. 26 ("The Bacchanals"), > ἐξ ὄρεος πένθημα καὶ οὐ Πενθῆα φεροίσαι.

> And planted not a king but aching there

But this is characteristic; and, while there is nothing else so fanciful as this, there are a hundred other niceties of fancy and resemblance pressed into the translator's service with the happiest effect.

But it is not in these minutiæ alone that Mr. Calverley displays congeniality with his original. Much time has been spent by commentators in discussing how many and which poems of Theocritus are strictly pastoral. To us it seems that to go too carefully into such a question is to limit his genius. There is infinite variety in his subjects, and in their treatment. They are far from being all bucolic in character, indeed not all can be designated as "idyllic," "The Praise of Ptolemy," "The Hiero" and the poems in commemoration of Hercules being manifest exceptions, but perhaps we may say that in each and all there are idyllic features, e.g., in xvi. 90-2 ("The Value of Song"), where we find such as the following:—

> And fair and fruitful may their cornlands be!
> Their flocks in thousands bleat upon the lea,
> Fat and full-fed their kine, as home they wind,
> The lagging traveller of his rest remind

There is hardly a poem extant of Theocritus which does not enshrine some such gems of description; and it is safe to say that, with scarcely an exception, they are pictures or scenes, painted in vivid words, and peopled with dramatis personæ that are mute or voiceful as the case may be. To represent these pictures and persons we want a translator skilled alike in pictorial and in dramatic effects, and such a one indubitably is Mr Calverley, uniting as he does, to high powers of description and a keen sense of natural beauty, much perception of character and skill in portrayal of the serious as well as the ludicrous. Into description he throws not only the life, but also the grace, with which Theocritus clothes it. Thus, in the beginning of that exquisite idyl ("Harvest-Home, or the Thalysia"), the Seventh, he has completely realized "Byrrhina's rill," and the avenue beside it, where,

> Poplar and elm
> Shewed aisles of pleasant shadow, greenly roofed
> By tufted leaves, and further on in it "the sombre boughs," where "sweet cicalas chirped laboriously." Some portions of the Fifth Idyl ("The Battle of the Bards") present a field for descriptive talent, and that poem, being in thirteen-syllable rhyming couplets, affords Mr. Calverley full scope for doing justice to his author. Perhaps, however, the most quotable examples are to be found in the "Hylas," the description of the fountain in which strikes us as very nearly perfect in the translation before us. The metre, which is Southwell's six-line stave, is used by him with remarkable felicity in turning also the Twenty-third and Twenty-sixth Idyls. Let the reader who has kept up his Greek compare vv. 41-4 of Id. xiii., κυάνεόν τε . . . ἀγρωστις, with what follows here:—

> There rose the sea-blue swallow-wort, and there
> The pale-hued maidenhair, with parsley green
> And vagrant marsh flowers, and a revel rare
> In the pool's midst the water-nymphs were seen
> To hold, those maidens of unslumbrous eyes,
> Whom the belated traveller sees and flies.

For this kind of idyl we can imagine no better metre, and it is as effective in representing the debarkation of the Argonauts, and the after-wanderings of the bereaved Hercules, as it is for the scenery of the fountain. The translation of the whole idyl is faithful, vivid, and picturesque. But in truth it is only want of space that bars the citation of other equally true descriptive passages from the First Idyl, from the Eleventh, and from divers others. Foreground and background in all of these mimic pictures have been carefully painted by Theocritus, and it would be an exacting critic that could find a flaw in this skilful copy. Even such minute particulars as the attitude of the Cyclops, as he pours forth his lay to Galatea, > καθεζόμενος δ' ἐπὶ πέτρας

> ὑψηλᾶς, ἐς πόντον ὁρῶν, ἄειδε τοιαῦτα·

are neatly reproduced in the words

> He sate him down
> On the tall cliff, and seaward looked, and sang.

But, to come to the dramatic aspect of Theocritus, it is curiously various and multiform. In one class of idyls we have the fervid utterances of the love-lorn sorceress (Idyl ii.), in another and larger class the amœbæan contests of herdsmen and shepherds for the prize of pastoral minstrelsy; and in yet another the mimetic and comic dialogues between Thyonichus and Æschines, the gossips Gorgo and Praxinoa, and the two starving fishermen who discuss a dream in the Twenty-first Idyl. In "the sorceress" there is something tragic, and still more that has pretensions to pathos. And it must suffice to say that what there is of these in Theocritus's model is preserved in the copy. Into the amœbæan raillery of the "herdsmen," goatherds, and shepherds in some of the earlier idyls Mr. Calverley throws plenty of life and spirit. Witness the mock strife between Cometes and Lacon, from which the following is a snatch:—

> COMETES. There's some one ill of heartburn. You note it, I presume, > Morson? Go quick and fetch a squill from some old beldame's tomb.
> LACON. I think I'm stinging somebody, as Morson too perceives—
> Go to the river and dig up a clump of sow-bread leaves

And again how, in Idyl iv., Corydon rates the heifer that will not keep away from the olive-shoots (46-9):—

> Back to thy hill, Cymætha! Great Pan! how deaf thou art!
> I shall be with thee presently, and in the end thou'lt smart
> I warn thee, keep thy distance Look, up she creeps again!
> O if I had my cudgel, I'd lay about her then.

The "Gossips"—or, as Mr. Calverley calls them, the "Two Ladies of Syracuse"—are far too good company for us to tantalize our readers by a bare specimen of their conversation. But our translator will, if they list, take them in Gorgo's and Praxinoa's company to the grand spectacle of the Adonis, after the preliminary gossip about their husbands, their pelisses, the baby, and so forth has been duly gone through. Life is the same in the nineteenth century after, as in the latest centuries before, the Christian era, if only we look at it in the same ranks, and even those who have no Greek learning will find abundant interest in the talk and tribulations of these sightseers. It is the same with the quaint idyl of "The Fishermen"—in which, by the way, are two lines which have puzzled annotators, but to which the translation before us gives, without going out of the way, a plausible interpretation Asphalion, after describing his own rough bed in his cabin by the sea, adds

> φαντὶ γὰρ αἰὲν ἄγραν τόδ' ἔχειν·

and he seems to make the remark by way of contrast to the enforced leisure which darkness and night-time vouchsafed to him and his comrade. It was otherwise, he says, in the public halls, where there were funds for lighting up the hours of darkness:—

> In rich men's halls the lamps are burning yet;
> But fish come always to the rich man's net.

The last line is simply an illustration drawn from Asphalion's calling. There are some good samples of monostich dialogue to be found in the idyl which comes next after "The Fishermen", and we commend the completeness with which the Bebrycian King's retort on Polydeuces, v. 59, τῆς σῆς γε μὲν οὐκ ἐπιδαίνω, is rendered in the English "And I'm not trespassing." But the most striking achievement in this way of Theocritus is in an idyl which is not very often read in the original, and indeed requires a little shading off and refining in translation to be quite presentable. As Mr Calverley gives it, it cannot be found objectionable; and thus he confers a kindness upon the bard whom he has undertaken to present to English readers, by enabling them to see what skill, constructiveness, and reality Theocritus has displayed in this idyl, "A Countryman's Wooing." It may be doubted whether there is anything cleverer in what remains of the poet, clever though almost every line we possess of him undoubtedly is. The whole piece might be an illustration of the proverb that "twenty nay-says make one yea-say"; but the persistence of the rustic lover, and the squeamishness of the rustic belle, are represented with infinite adroitness and vraisemblance. We extract ten lines from the confabulation of Daphnis and the Maiden:—

> M. Many have wooed me, but I fancied none.
> D. Till among many came the destined one.
> M. Wedlock is woe. Dear love, what shall I do?
> D. Woe it is not; but joy and dancing too.
> M. Wives dread their husbands: so I've heard it said.
> D. Nay! they rule o'er them. What does woman dread?
> M. Then children—Eileithyia's dart is keen.
> D. But the deliverer, Artemis, is your queen.
> M. And bearing children all our grace destroys.
> D. Bear them and shine more lustrous in your boys.

The Greek of the last line is ἢν δὲ τέκῃς φίλα τέκνα, νέον φάος ὄψεαι υἷας; and it may fitly stand for a pattern of the neatness, spirit, and faithfulness of the rest.

Throughout this work, indeed, there is a judicious union of these qualities, mixed in sound and sensible proportions. Nothing, for instance, can be more true and faithful than the rendering of epithets, e.g. λιπαρόχρων, "the lustrous-limbed one," ii. 102; λευκίτας ὁ κορυπτίλος, "You with the glossy coat and dangerous ...st," v. 147; and the "Epithalamium of Helen" (an idyl so turned as to rival the late Sir E. Head's version of it in grace and spirit, while it outrivals it in faithfulness) will yield a whole crop of the happiest representative epithets to any reader who will note them. For Theocritean proverbs, on the other hand, Mr.

Calverley's way, and we think it a right one, is to substitute the nearest English current equivalent—e.g., in Idyl x. 11, χαλεπὸν χορίω κύνα γεῦσαι reappears as "If but the cat taste cream"; and so with the many other instances of cited proverb-lore which show that Theocritus, like Shakspeare, did not undervalue "the people's voice." By the substitution of modern saws Mr. Calverley evinces a kindred feeling and genius, and adds to the life and reality of the work he reproduces. His work strikes us as singularly free from mistakes. Taken from Briggs's text, it Englishes Theocritus as we were wont to read him in schoolboy-days; and we are glad to see that he has made very good and acceptable sense of passages upon which the latest German editor, Fritsche, has tried his emendatory hand with no great success, and with a too hasty condemnation of English editors and translators. A slip or two may be found; e.g. in Idyl iii. 50, "I envy Jason," which can hardly pass muster as an equivalent for ζαλῶ 'Ιασίωνα; and we suppose that, in the fourth verse of p. 10, for "in Dias" one should read "in Dia."

But it is rare to find an English translation as free from even slight errors as this is; and, inasmuch as we accept to the full Dr. Donaldson's estimate of Theocritus as a poet of the highest original genius, and as the taste of the day as regards poetry is for the idyllic rather than the epic or didactic forms of it, we felicitate the reading public upon having gained a new version of him by a ripe scholar and a poet of a curiously congenial taste for scenery and word-painting.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN INQUISITION *

A REALLY full and impartial history of the Inquisition, from its first origin in the thirteenth century till it sunk under the crash of the French Revolution into its dishonoured grave, is still a desideratum in our language. The volume by Dr. Harris Rule which we had occasion to notice last year suggests the deficiency rather than supplies it. It is difficult for a Protestant to write with any semblance of moderation on the one point of the indictment against Rome where it is next to impossible to exaggerate the facts, and quite impossible to make out even a plausible defence. Least of all could such reserve be expected from a Wesleyan minister who finds the Holy Office prefigured in every chapter of the Apocalypse. The present work is so far more satisfactory that it comes, not from an English Protestant, but from a South American, and apparently a Roman Catholic, born at Santiago, the capital of Chile. He gives us, from the original documents of the Inquisition itself, preserved in the National Library of Lima, a chapter of the history of that institution in the last century—in the days, that is, of its decadence and comparative mildness—so horrible in the bare recital that we wish he had not done his best to weaken its effect by the copious garniture of expletives and tirades which decorates almost every page. It is fair to say that Señor Mackenna has been singularly unhappy in his translator, who may or may not understand the Spanish language, but is conspicuously ignorant of his own. It is weary work to peruse a writer who is always talking about "the conspiration of silence," the "sackage of the record office," the "amount of illustration"—meaning, probably, enlightenment—among the people, and who speaks of "Llorente, the terrible historian of the same institution, of which, by his office, he was the depository of its archives"; not to add that Mr Duffy has improved upon the sufficiently vituperative comments of his author by a running accompaniment of still more vituperative notes of his own to point the moral against the "whole of the great body of the clergy of the Catholic Church." Still, after full allowance has been made for Mr. Duffy's blundering self-sufficiency, and his almost incredible ignorance of English and, we suppose, of Latin—for hardly a Latin word is quoted that is not misspelt—it is clear that the best translator could not have made his author other than prolix, pedantic, and wholly deficient in the first rudiments of literary composition. The book reads throughout like the essay of a precocious and absurdly egotistic schoolboy. The dedication to the memory of the first Archbishop of Santiago, who seems to have been a member of the writer's family, is but an average sample of the bombastic language of the whole volume:—

> To his immaculate virtue, his sublime humility, to his infinite charity and holy teaching, who guided us from our childhood in the path of tolerance and love, eternal base of true religion. These pages, which, by a sad contrast of past times, remind us of the execrable abominations of hatred and absurdity, I dedicate with profound and sincere veneration.

It is only on account of the importance of the subject, which survives in spite of every possible error of taste, style, and method in both author and translator, and the solid basis of authentic testimony on which the story is founded, that we have called attention to a volume in a literary point of view so utterly worthless.

Señor Mackenna tells us that he was led to put together this account of the process against Francisco Moyen from the original autos preserved at Lima, by the appearance of a work in vindication of the Inquisition from the pen of Saavedra, a prebendary of Santiago, and still more by finding that this work was selected by the directors of the Jesuit College at Santiago as a text-book to be read to their pupils during dinner, and had received the express approbation of the authorities of the archdiocese. He adds that the author is affirmed by all who know him to be "a learned man, a famous theologian, and a modest and Christian clergyman," which makes his uncompromising defence of the Inquisition, as "a natural expression of the nature of Christian society, and of the nature of man," the more unpleasantly significant as a moral fact. Señor Saavedra is content to trace the origin of the Inquisition to Theodosius the Great, but his critic reminds us that the Peruvian Bermudez had been even bolder in his claim of venerable antiquity, for he informs his readers that "God, as the first Inquisitor, tried the cause of Adam." Saavedra reckons among the advantages of the Inquisition, that it was not only established in defence of the Christian faith and of public order, but also "for the benefit and individual security of the heretics themselves," and it thus gave to the people a lesson of moderation and humanity, and pointed out to kings the path of mercy! This is rather startling, but one is still more surprised to learn that the Holy Office was a main agent in promoting the revival of literature and science. On that point the ingenious Prebendary shall speak for himself:—

> It is said that the Spanish Inquisition operated as an obstacle to science. But history says the contrary, for it was exactly only but a short time after it was established, and during the period of its development and while in its greatest vigour, that the sciences began to flourish, universities were founded, and the art of printing introduced; it encouraged the study of the classics, it favoured poetry and the fine arts, books were imported, men celebrated for their learning were invited from foreign countries, the nobles dedicated themselves to studies which had been for a long time neglected, and throughout Spain there reigned an activity for scientific investigation very remarkable. The epoch in which Spanish literature shone with its greatest splendour was from the latter part of the fifteenth century to the end of the seventeenth, and this likewise was the period in which the Inquisition displayed its greatest energy and power. Cervantes, Lope de Vega, Calderon, Fr Luis de Leon, Solis, Santa Teresa, Luis de la Puente, Rivadeneira, and the three greatest historians of Spain, Pulgar, Zurita and Mariana, belonged to this time, and their works were printed with the licence of the Inquisition

This is a curious parody of the old argument, post hoc, propter hoc. For the Spanish Inquisition is gravely maintained to have originated the very movement which it was established for the purpose of repressing, and which it did so successfully repress that for theology, science, history, and, in fact, all but the lightest literature, which alone could escape suspicion of heresy, Spain, during the period of its power, has no single name to show. Señor Mackenna may well observe that it would be as reasonable to trace freedom of thought and of the press to the action of the Roman Index, or to say that the gag was invented to increase our facility of speech. We will not say with him that poor Saavedra's "vertiginous ravings are unfathomable," because we have no taste for sublimated Billingsgate; but one is certainly rather taken aback to hear a cathedral dignitary in the nineteenth century openly defending the capital punishment of heretics on the Scriptural ground that God ordained it in the Mosaic law, and that our Lord told Pilate that his power over life and death was given him from on high. After this we are prepared to learn that torture is also a natural right which may be defended both on philosophical and historical grounds, and that exhuming the bones of dead heretics in order to strew their ashes on the burning pile gave "a salutary example" by inspiring in people's minds a greater detestation of the crime. It appears from an extract in the Appendix that the delation of heretics was accounted, under the sway of the Inquisition, one of the first of Christian duties; and that the first inquiry of a confessor to his penitent was as to his knowledge of any heretics. Indeed this edifying question seems only recently to have gone out of fashion in South America, if we may judge from the following note:—

> We have already mentioned that Stevenson had declared that he took from the secret archives of the Inquisition at Lima various denunciations of heretics made by their own confessors, but apart from this there exists at the present time a respectable gentleman in Santiago, who, having confessed himself in Lima, in 1817, when he was only seventeen years old, found himself obliged to hold a profound theological discussion with his confessor, who was a Father Porras, of St. Domingo, respecting whether he ought to denounce or not the ill-fated and clever Chilian Don Joaquin Eyana, at that time banished to Lima, and a great admirer of Voltaire and the French philosophers.

Father Porras, however, did not press the point, as the Holy Office had been abolished five years before.

We are not going to follow the author through the loathsome details of the capture and inhuman treatment of Francisco Moyen, a young Frenchman, seized on the idlest pretexts, and kept twelve years in the prisons of the Inquisition of Lima, when he was finally declared innocent, and sentenced to ten years more imprisonment in the dungeons of the Holy Office at Seville! Happily a shipwreck on the way to Spain released him from his lingering martyrdom. If our readers wish to know the kind of charges which the Inquisitors were unanimous in regarding as proof of formal heresy, we may mention that one of them was his calling a mule—which has no soul—"a creature of God," and another, his saying that, "in the Ave Maria, it should not be The Lord is with thee, but The Lord was with thee." Among the forty counts of the indictment against him, of which these are fair samples, there were, however, two of a more serious nature, which evidently contain the real explanation of the treatment he received. We will give them as they stand in the autos, with the accompanying decree of his judges:—

XV. The Pontiffs.

> Upon another occasion, in the presence of various persons, the said accused repeated the same proposition as in the last charge, added that the Pope canonized, or did any other thing for the sake of money, because it is known that his Holiness does not canonize many that are canonizable, because there is no money forthcoming.
> They said they were agreed: that the first part of the charge had the same censure as the one antecedent, and that the second part contained scandalous doctrine, temerarious, heretically blasphemous and formally heretical, and injurious to the Pontiffs and to the Church, constituting the accused a heretical blasphemer, and formally a heretic.

* Francisco Moyen; or, the Inquisition as it was in South America. By B. Vicuña Mackenna. Translated by J. W. Duffy. London: Sotheran & Co. 1869.

XXXIV.—The Luxury of the Clergy.

The accused, in a conversation about the ecclesiastics, several times spoke of them in general in a mocking and disrespectful manner, particularly of the pomp and ostentation of the Señors Bishops, Archbishops, and the Holy Pontiff, wondering that they rode in rich coaches and had large incomes, when St. Peter and the other Apostles and Evangelists went about covered with poor clothing, asking alms and preaching the Gospel.

They said they were agreed that this charge contained scandalous doctrine, offensive piarum aurium, insulting to the Pontiffs, to the Ecclesiastical Prelates, and to the State, temerarious, partaking of the heresy of Wickliff, and constituting the accused vehemently suspected in the faith and of the Wickliffian heresy.

The Appendix contains some painfully instructive extracts from the manual of Inquisitors used in Spain and Portugal, most of which, however, were given in Dr. Rule's volume already noticed in our columns. The revolting hypocrisy of "earnestly beseeching" the civil authorities not to punish the heretics delivered into their hands is expressly recognised and enjoined. The sole ground for this injunction is, that otherwise the judges would incur "irregularity" by the old Canon Law. Any civil officer who had acted on the formal recommendation to mercy would have thereby incurred suspicion of heresy himself, and have been dealt with accordingly. Yet Prebendary Saavedra is silly or audacious enough to appeal to this hypocritical formality in proof of the merciful character of the Inquisition. Those who wish to gain some acquaintance with a code of rules drawn up with admirable sagacity not so much to secure the conviction of the guilty as to preclude the escape of the innocent, will do well to study the extracts given here. One specimen passage from the chapter on the kind of testimony to be received against those accused of heresy is all we can find room for here. It will probably be enough for the digestion of ordinary readers:—

1st. In causes of heresy with respect to the faith the testimony of the excommunicated is received, as also that of the accomplices of the accused, of the infamous, of the criminals accused of any crim[illegible] in short, also that of heretics, always provided that these tes[illegible] against the accused but never in their favour

2nd The testimony of false witnesses against the accused is also admitted; so that should a false witness retract his first declaration favourable to the accused, the judges must attend to the second This law is peculiar to the process against heretics, because in the ordinary tribunals it is the first declaration that is valid. It is to be understood that the second declaration is only of value when it is to the prejudice of the accused, should it be in their favour, the judge must only admit the first. Let us suppose, for example, that So-and-so has said that the priests were the inventors of purgatory, and afterwards denies his accusation, the first declaration will remain good, notwithstanding the posterior retractation, if in case that the second declaration weakens the force of the first, and he that retracts must be punished for being a false witness. The judge must be careful not to give too much credit to such retractations, because in that might result the impunity of heresy.—Directory and Annotations, book iii note 122

3rd. Against the accused is also admitted the declaration of domestic witnesses, that is, of his wife, of his children, of his relations and servants, but never in his favour; and thus it has been ordered because these declarations are of much weight —Directory, part iii question 70

4th. It is an opinion agreed to by all moralists that in causes of heresy a brother can declare against a brother, and a son against his father Father Simancas wished to exempt from this law the father and the children, but his opinion is not admissible, because it would render erroneous the most convincing reasons, which are, that we ought to obey God in preference to our fathers, and that if it is lawful for one to take away the life of his father when he becomes an enemy to his country, how much more ought he to denounce him when he becomes guilty of the crime of heresy? A son, accuser of his father, does not incur the penalties fulminated by the law against the children of heretics, and this is the premium for his delation.—In premium delationis, Annot. book ii. note 12.

One word more, and we have done. The Tablet the other day made itself very merry—for to the Ultramontane mind heretic-burning is one of the liveliest topics of amusement—over the alleged discovery of the calcined remains of former victims of the Inquisition at Madrid, which it declared to be simply "the débris of an old building." Our contemporary gives no authority for its contradiction of the received account, and its own reputation for accuracy is not such as to enable its readers to dispense with proof. But the writer must be perfectly aware that it is not really of the slightest consequence whether or not the particular relics dug up at Madrid were the charred bones of heretics, for of the fact of their being immolated by wholesale there can be no shadow of a doubt. The simple fact that Torquemada alone burnt 8,000 of them at the lowest computation, and over 10,000 according to the more common reckoning, besides torturing and imprisoning some 90,000 more, is sufficiently eloquent without any additional illustration from the spectacle of exhumed corpses. To say that "it was the work of the State, not of the Church" is a mere subterfuge, though De Maistre originated it. The Spanish Government no doubt utilized the Inquisition for its own purposes, but it used an instrument ready made and put into its hands by the Church, and which has existed equally in every other Catholic country, the Roman States included, where the ecclesiastical authorities could get their way. In South America, as Mackenna tells us, it held its own, not by the good-will of the State, but in spite of it, though the civil power was none the less compelled to obey its behests and do its bloody work.

AUSTRALIAN VIEWS OF ENGLAND.*

WE have often thought that an amusing book might be made by a republication of the letters of some intelligent newspaper Correspondent. We do not speak of those accounts of campaigns or revolutions by qualified eye-witnesses which form useful chapters of contemporary history; they have merits of their own of a special kind; but it would often be interesting, after the lapse of a few years, to recall the impression made upon a sensible observer by a contemplation of the more ordinary course of affairs. It would be curious to remark how fallible are even the acutest prophets; how many events passed almost without notice which were destined to exercise a marked influence upon the time; and how many questions, on the other hand, attracted the liveliest interest which have sunk into profound and undisturbed repose. The collections of private letters, which illustrate former periods, have generally the fault that we cannot infer much from their silence; we do not know how much knowledge the correspondents may have assumed in each other, nor whether they have passed over significant incidents from a want of appreciation or from any merely private motive. It is common, for example, to remark upon the entire want of any perception of the coming changes in letters written from France in the years which preceded the outburst of the Revolution. The fact is, indeed, curious; but it may sometimes be due to the natural preference of a letter-writer for dwelling upon amusing personal interests, rather than upon general political speculations. A newspaper Correspondent, on the other hand, is bound to be more or less philosophical, it is his special duty to mark the signs of impending changes; and if he fails to dwell upon the most significant events, we may be sure that it is from absence of the ability to discern them, instead of absence of desire to record them. Moreover, we forget so rapidly the sentiments which were familiar to us only a few years back, that it is curious to have them recalled by unimpeachable testimony; and though the process may often be humiliating, it possesses some very palpable advantages.

For these reasons we should be disposed to welcome the little volume whose title we have quoted below, which is a reprint of certain letters written from England, in the years 1861 and 1862, to the Sydney Morning Herald. They should have the additional merit of showing us, what is seldom brought before us, the opinions, namely, which our colonists entertain of the Mother-country. The letters are indeed not very remarkable, and we fear that we cannot contradict the modest avowal of the author, that they "have no claim to literary excellence." Still it may be a good thing to see what an intelligent Australian had to say about England seven years ago. We do not know how large a section of his fellow-colonists he may represent, though, if the ordinary descriptions of colonial sentiment be true, we should infer that they were a decided minority. The Sydney Morning Herald, if we may assume that it was in general sympathy with its Correspondent, entertained very different views from those of its namesake in England. Mr. Parkes, so far as we can understand, for he does not express himself very decidedly, is a believer in Mr. Goldwin Smith's opinions as to the expediency of the complete separation of the colonies from the British Empire. He attended one of those depressing debates in which the House of Commons is engaged in discussing an abstract proposition concerning countries about which the majority knows next to nothing, and cares as little. As in duty bound, Mr. Parkes sat out the debate; and the House, which had been tolerably well filled at its commencement, dwindled, as he informs us, to twenty-seven whilst it proceeded, and was counted out directly after its conclusion. It we desire to keep up a close connexion with Australia, it is certainly to be hoped that as few reporters as possible may be present at Parliamentary debates on behalf of Australian newspapers. Their observations will hardly tend to increase the colonists' sense of importance in the eyes of the Imperial Parliament. Mr. Parkes, indeed, does not seem to have a very high opinion of the state of political knowledge in England. His visit taking place in the Palmerstonian epoch, he was struck with the indifference displayed as to such subjects as the extension of the franchise. He quotes a letter written by Mr. Miall in November, 1861, refusing to attend a Reform conference on the ground that the whole country had given itself up to a strong delusion, and cared little for any questions of the kind. "Since the outburst of the Russian war," said Mr. Miall, "political demoralization has been both wider in its sweep and more rapid in its action than in any like period of our modern history." The English nation, as Mr. Parkes declares, "cares nothing about politics in the abstract, or what is called political principle." A few people have hobbies, especially about matters in which their pockets are concerned; Nonconformists dislike church-rates; and commercial men are sincere in denouncing Protection; but the period, he thinks, is marked by a dying out of the strong passions of former days, though he admits that they may revive at some future epoch. As may be supposed from his general tone of sentiment, Mr. Parkes was a strong sympathizer with the Northern States, and records with much disgust the affectionate manner in which Mr. Gregory shook by the hand "the old slave-master," Mr. Mason, on a report of General M'Clellan's surrender. In short, Mr. Parkes's view of the country was pretty much what we are accustomed to expect in the more respectable part of the Republican press in America. There is, indeed, no animosity against England; but he evidently regarded us with a certain kindly contempt, as poor ignorant aristocratic people who had fallen aside from our old zeal, and showed a want of any ardent sympathy with causes which deserved our respect. We must leave to our readers to decide, according to their individual tastes, how far this criticism is well founded; only remarking, by the way, that it is curious to contrast the political apathy which struck our writer so forcibly seven years ago with the great changes which have since taken place. The fires have revived more quickly than Mr Parkes could have anticipated. Taking these remarks, however, for what they are worth, it is odd to remark what are the great subjects of interest for an ardent Australian democrat. In the opening letters we have some remarks on the death of the Prince Consort, for whom Mr. Parkes finds it difficult adequately to express his admiration. He dwells upon the many virtues of the departed Prince; he declares that from one end of England to another the effect was one "of universal visible grief." The loss is to be seen everywhere, he says, "in the grief-burdened faces of the people." The English working-men were specially suited, he thinks, to appreciate the services of the Prince Consort, because—whatever he may precisely mean—"there is a very kingliness in the true type of the English mechanic." As an outward and visible expression of the national sorrow, "England is becoming a land of statues" In a few years "every English child will have some local statue of Albert the Good, benignly crowning its earliest associations." Nor is his loyalty confined to this member of the Royal Family. He speaks affectionately of Albert Edward, who is now (that is, in 1862) "completing his princely education by a course of travel in the lands of classical and sacred story." The Prince of Wales, he believed—for newspaper Correspondents are fallible—was about to ascend the throne, in consequence of the expected abdication of our "idolized Queen." He pushed into a railway-station to catch a glimpse of Prince Arthur, and, though reluctantly admitting his likeness to "other little boys," was evidently much gratified by the glimpse vouchsafed to him.

This is perhaps the most characteristic part of the book. It is curious to see a gentleman who is evidently an ardent democrat, who speaks with profound admiration of Mr. Goldwin Smith's arguments on behalf of colonial emancipation, and declares that his opponents have entirely failed to meet them, express notwithstanding an involuntary loyalty to the Royal Family in which many Englishmen of far more Conservative sentiments would scarcely be able to equal him. We do not ask what is the precise value of this sentiment, for the question would be a very difficult one, but it is worth taking into account, when we discuss the relations subsisting between ourselves and Australia, that the loyal instinct survives in so much strength even amongst those who almost openly advocate a separation from us. When Mr. Parkes speaks of English pauperism, of English blindness to the merits of democracy, and of the generally effete character of much of our political sentiment, we might almost take him for a Massachusetts Radical. To all appearance he would listen with approval to a Sumnerian oration on the manifold crimes of Great Britain. When, on the other hand, he comes within the attraction of royalty, he speaks with a strength of sentiment to which we are scarcely accustomed at home. It would perhaps be unfair to suggest as a partial explanation of the apparent inconsistency that he lavishes most of his praises upon those members of the Royal Family who, in his opinion, will no longer exercise an influence upon our politics But it is evident that, whatever Mr Parkes's private opinions may be, the people for whom he writes have by no means become dead to the power of a loyal appeal.

We may mention one other criticism upon English manners which has by no means become obsolete, and to which we have lately had our attention called. Mr. Parkes went to the Oxford Commemoration, with a due respect for the historical associations of our ancient Universities. He expected to see the flower of the English youth of the upper classes, and to take a lesson in polite manners, of a refinement impossible to persons brought up in a new country. He expected—it was rash, if natural—to "see some classic turn given to the latest slang, some freshness of wit infused into the dispensations of popular displeasure!" We need hardly say what he did in fact hear—a wild and meaningless hubbub, which he kindly describes as the ebullition of animal spirits, a series of howls for "ladies in blue" and "ladies in pink," and the other time-honoured disturbances by which young gentlemen at our Universities show their right to be considered as the best specimens of English education That they cheered Jefferson Davis, hooted Mr Bright, and chaffed the Portuguese Ambassador because he had two Christian names, were matters of trifling importance, though they seem to have shocked Mr Parkes a good deal It did not show much literary cultivation that there should be a shout on the name of Mr. Henry Taylor, "Who is he?" These matters may be set down to political prejudices, good or bad, and to an ignorance which is not criminal, if it is not creditable; but the hideous roar of a crowd of undergraduates, permitted to insult University authorities and interrupt all proceedings for the whole time of the meeting, is thoroughly disreputable, and we hope that the remarks made upon it by unprejudiced foreign observers may come to the ears of those who are responsible for the insubordination exhibited.

MRS. HARDCASTLE'S ADVENTURES.*

TWO things are necessary for a good plot—a clever complication of incident, and an adequate basis to rest it upon. That nothing is stronger than its weakest part is an axiom as true in literature as in mechanics. It is a waste of power to pile up the agony, or the mystery, or the ingenuity, if the foundation on which it all reposes be flimsy, trivial, and insignificant. The organic weakness of the fabric only becomes more apparent. This is the mistake which Lady C. Thynne has made in this work. It reminds one of a pyramid standing on its apex. Three whole volumes are devoted to the elucidation of a mystery which proves after all to be nothing but a mare's nest. To say the least, such a result is disappointing. One submits to be mystified in a novel, and to grope from chapter to chapter in a twilight of vague surmise, on the implied condition that one is to be rewarded by something solid and substantial at the bottom of all this elaborate mystification. Nothing is more irritating than to find that one has been tricked into wading through three volumes of much ado about nothing. If there be such an offence as obtaining readers by false pretences, it is committed by the novelist who raises expectations, say of a murder or a bigamy, and then palms off upon the reader some peccadillo or trumpery entanglement. If mystery is imported, it should be a mystery with some stuff in it, not a mere cobweb which by the exercise of the smallest common sense would have been brushed away at the outset of the story. It is not only inartistic, but highly impolitic, to experiment on the reader's curiosity with a windbag. He will take care not to be duped twice.

Having indicated the principal defect of this work—namely, its want of a knot worth the labour of disentangling—let us at once say that it is written throughout in a pleasant and lady-like tone, and that the story is told with no little skill. The heroine is a fascinating governess, domiciled in the family of a Lancashire manufacturer, and endowed with a splendid soprano voice. The antecedents of Theresa Oliver were wrapt in profound obscurity, nothing being known of her but that she had come to Mr. Morgan's on the casual recommendation of a Paris banker. The presence among them of a young lady of great beauty and refinement, and a splendid talent for operatic music, could not fail to excite the curiosity of the small circle who frequented Branston Fold. By common consent it was agreed that Miss Oliver "had a history," but what that history was no one could make out, for on the slightest allusion to her past she enveloped herself in impenetrable reserve. The only frequent visitor at Mr. Morgan's house was John Hardcastle, a thriving young brother manufacturer, to whom he acted as a sort of commercial Mentor, and whom he would gladly have seen united to his daughter Jane In this hopeful little project he is encouraged by the wily Theresa, who artfully insinuates that these frequent visits are inspired by a tender interest in her pupil. Consequently the worthy man is rudely disillusioned when one fine morning John Hardcastle arrives to ask his consent to a marriage, not with Jane, but with her governess We may notice, in passing, the somewhat novel view of Lancashire character disclosed in these pages. The Manchester man is usually credited with an unusual amount of shrewdness. One can quite imagine, however, that in a matter of domestic tactics he should be outwitted by a designing woman What is less easy to understand, even making due allowance for the blinding effect of love, is the readiness of a Manchester man to marry a young lady of whose antecedents he was utterly in the dark, and without even venturing an inquiry on a subject of such vital moment to his happiness One would have thought that an equivocal position, and the possession of an exceptionally splendid soprano voice, were of themselves circumstances suggestive of caution. The guileless simplicity of her hero-manufacturer seems to us to show that our authoress wishes to exhibit the reverse side of the type of character popularly attributed to Lancashire Or perhaps she merely means to illustrate the omnipotence of female influence, and to show how the acutest dealer in cotton becomes the veriest idiot when pitted against a woman. However it may be explained, John Hardcastle's matrimonial leap in the dark proves, as might be expected, a mistake. Unluckily, it is not possible to sympathize very keenly with the sorrows of a man who deliberately, and without inquiry, marries a governess with a magnificent voice, and a past buried in mystery. Such an act of temerity puts him fairly beyond the pale of sympathy, except of the most gushing kind. Men of the world will think that he ought to have counted its cost beforehand, and to have been prepared with philosophic calmness to find himself the husband of an interesting murderess, or a bankrupt, or a bigamist, or in some other desperately unpleasant fix As it is, our authoress lets him off cheaply—rather too cheaply, we think—to enforce with proper emphasis the duty of circumspection in so momentous an affair as marriage. However, as it is only by degrees, and after inflicting on him much mental anguish, which ultimately brings him to an early grave, that the innocent character of his wife's prænuptial adventures is established, he may fairly be considered to have atoned for his indiscretion.

It is not long before he begins to discover that it has been an indiscretion. The old-fashioned home of the Hardcastles, and the society of his two maiden sisters, soon become insufferable to the aspiring ex-governess. She longs for a more fashionable sphere, and persuades her indulgent husband to buy a smart country seat in the neighbourhood. As the mistress of Walton Grange, she mixes in county society. But the inconvenience of mysterious antecedents is much more liable to be realized by a popular county lady than by an obscure governess. As before her marriage every one was sure that she had "a history," so after marriage she is perpetually falling in with persons "who fancy they have seen that face before," or still more vividly impressed with reminiscences of the splendid soprano. Almost every one starts, or turns pale, or shows confusion, on being suddenly introduced. In particular, a certain young Lord Blair, the great man of the neighbourhood, recognises in the lady Teresa Nardi, a beautiful opera singer with whom he had been desperately in love at Milan. Being a man of high principle, he is naturally surprised to find that Mr. Hardcastle has been kept in the dark as to his wife's former career, and it is with great reluctance, and after much good advice, that he consents to pledge himself to secrecy. A much more unpleasant recognition awaits Mrs. Hardcastle when she is identified at the Paris Opera House by M. Brissonet, a gambling adventurer who had been the impresario of the Milan theatre, and who held a promise binding the fair Teresa to marry him in three years' time. For a gambler, M. Brissonet is remarkably moderate in his demands. For the sum of 40*l.* he is willing to waive his claims for a time. On reflection, he discovers that he has asked too little, and follows his victim to Walton Grange to extort another hundred. In this strait, Mrs. Hardcastle has recourse for the money to Lord Blair, who vainly implores her to make a clean breast of it to her husband. Affairs are brought to a crisis by a further demand for 500*l.* We may remark, in passing, that the figure named in these repeated requests for hush-money indicates an amount of forbearance on the part of the needy adventurer for which we were not prepared. On his journey to enforce this last demand, M. Brissonet meets with a railway accident, which lays him on a sick-bed at Canterbury. There, Mrs. Hardcastle, taking advantage of her husband's absence from home, resolves to visit him; and, against his better judgment, Lord Blair, with his cheque-book, is induced to accompany her. For a consideration, M. Brissonet is persuaded to give up the compromising paper, and Mrs. Hardcastle returns to her home, only to find that in escaping from Scylla she has fallen into Charybdis. Finding her absent, and tracing her to London in company with the young lord, John Hardcastle jumps to the conclusion that she has eloped with Lord Blair, and with the only gleam of energy which marks the typical Lancashire man in his conduct, breaks up his establishment, and retires to the seclusion of an injured husband. With his characteristic tendency to implicit trust in appearances, he refuses to listen to a word of explanation; and it is not until Lady Blair, the mother of the supposed seducer, writes a long and temperate letter, clearing up the whole matter, that he can be induced to listen to reason. Of course Lady C. Thynne does not mean to imply that the Lancashire man is more amenable to reason from the lips of a peeress than from other less influential lips. Anyhow, this last appeal is successful, a reconciliation is effected, and Theresa returns repentant, and at last no longer reticent, to nurse her husband on the death-bed to which the worry caused by her concealments had consigned him.

After all, it is not very easy to see what the adventurous Mrs. Hardcastle was so anxious to keep from her husband, still less, why she was so bent on keeping it from him. The fact of her having sung in public was not likely to have damaged her in his estimation, the position of a prima donna being decidedly more brilliant than that of a governess. Nor was there anything in her relations with Lord Blair, and his boyish attachment to her, for which she need have blushed. Even the mysterious paper which gave M. Brissonet his hold over her fails to furnish any adequate motive for such perversely eccentric conduct. On the contrary, the existence of such a document was much to her credit, as no reasonable husband could have doubted, since it had been signed to procure for her mother the means of living. The utmost extent of her apprehensions could not have gone beyond the possibility of an action for breach of promise, and even this was an imaginary danger, since a promise of many years' standing made in Italy between two foreigners was hardly likely to become the subject of investigation by a British jury. Even the most helpless and weak-minded of heroines could hardly have sacrificed her own and her husband's happiness to so transparent a bugbear, much less a lady who is represented as the very opposite of such a character. There are, no doubt, people constitutionally secretive, capable of making mysteries of anything and everything, however trifling, out of the mere love of mystery. They cannot blow their nose without investing the proceeding with an air of mystery. Mrs. Hardcastle may have evinced this psychological peculiarity; but then a lady of a gratuitously furtive turn of mind is hardly the person whom a judicious novelist would adopt as heroine. One is provoked at being misled into a moment's speculation over actions prompted by such trivial and unintelligible motives. And this, as we intimated at starting, is very much the impression which this novel leaves. The puzzle is ingeniously dovetailed, but the key to the puzzle is wholly inadequate. Another, and perhaps a more serious, defect of this work is that the principal characters in it are depicted in such a manner as to preclude the reader from feeling a spark of sympathy with any of the three. John Hardcastle is such a very poor creature, that it requires a violent effort of imagination to accept him as the representative of the intelligence and independence of the North. Lord Blair is a nice young man, of excellent principles, but no great sense, thoroughly qualified to shine at the tea-table or upon the croquet lawn, but quite unsuited for such grave matters as lending married ladies money, and taking journeys with them to get them out of scrapes. As for Mrs. Hardcastle, she is unpleasant almost to repulsiveness. We hardly suppose Lady C. Thynne intends one to admire her heroine, but she writes as if she had a sneaking liking for her. Heroines of fiction are not bound to be virtuous; a dash of vice in them is quite admissible—witness Becky Sharp, who certainly had her little moral failings. But then Mrs. Hardcastle has none of Becky Sharp's delightful cleverness and verve. So far as we can pretend to understand her, she is merely sly, selfish, insincere, and silly. Her metamorphosis at the end into a devoted wife is a very imperfect atonement for her life-long distrust of her husband, and her utter want of self-respect in soliciting money from an old lover. Some of the subordinate characters are much more pleasing, and much better drawn. The two maiden sisters of John Hardcastle are natural and lifelike, and, to use a horrid phrase, very happily differentiated. There is real insight in making the elder sister, who is gentle and timid, acquiesce at once in the theory of her sister-in-law's guilt, while the younger, whose original prejudice against her was much stronger, from her own frank and candid disposition, stoutly maintains her belief in her innocence. If her brother had had more of Sarah Hardcastle's spirit, he would have been more interesting and more like what a Lancashire man is popularly imagined to be; but then there would have been comparatively little to write about "Mrs. Hardcastle's adventures."

The odd thing is, that Lady C. Thynne has overlooked the fact that the title of her book is a misnomer, and that her heroine was never Mrs. Hardcastle at all. Having been married under the name of Theresa Oliver, while her real name was Nardi, she was never legally married. This will serve to point the moral of the risk which young ladies with "historical" antecedents run, when they condescend to so commonplace and prosaic a formality as marriage. Of all "Mrs. Hardcastle's adventures," this strikes us as being by many degrees the most serious.

The Rev. Dr. BAILEY of Monaghan calls upon us to correct "a very injurious misrepresentation of his views" which appeared in the SATURDAY REVIEW of May 29, in an article on the "Belfast Meeting." Dr. BAILEY says that "the pious ejaculation of 'God grant it!'" uttered with reference to a contemplated civil war in Ireland, were the words, not of him, Dr BAILEY, but of the Fenian Mr. KICKHAM. That is to say, Dr BAILEY complains that we attributed to him language which he was quoting from Mr. KICKHAM. We are very glad that this is the case, and, though we are by no means called upon to do so, we allow Dr. BAILEY to make this statement. But if Dr BAILEY will be at the trouble of consulting the STANDARD of May 25, from which we quoted, he will find that the inverted commas in that journal's report of his speech at Belfast give the words "God grant it!" not as any quotation from Mr. KICKHAM made by Dr. BAILEY, *but as the words of the speaker himself—namely, "*Dr. BAYLEE *of Monaghan," which it appears ought to have been "*Dr. BAILEY." Dr BAILEY therefore ought to have addressed himself to the STANDARD, rather than to us.

THE DEBATE.

THE main question which has been debated this week with so much fulness and so much ability by the Lords was not whether the Irish Church should be disestablished and disendowed, but whether the Lords should pass the second reading of the Bill. It must be owned that the cause of those who were prepared to throw out the Bill on the second reading fell during the two first nights of the debate, so far as the lay Lords went, into singularly weak hands. The Peers who were ready to advise the House to run the enormous risk of quarrelling with the Commons and with the nation, who thought that the Lords ought to reject without further consideration a Bill supported by majorities so large and so unwavering in the Commons, were Lord HARROWBY, Lord CHELMSFORD, and the Duke of RUTLAND. It was thought politic by the Opposition to put forward Lord HARROWBY as the main opponent of the measure, in order to show that the attempt to throw out the Bill was not a mere party manœuvre; but the event showed that it is a mistake to hand over the conduct of a case to a weak advocate merely because his antecedents will gain him credit for impartiality. Lord HARROWBY's speech was simply deplorable if meant to act on the minds of men at such a crisis. It was an old-world tale, to the effect that PITT and PEEL and PLUNKET and GRATTAN never dreamt of such a Bill, but that a Mr. DILLON (who was either dead or alive, Lord HARROWBY did not know which) had bargained for it with Mr. GLADSTONE, and that its details had all been stolen from Mr. MIALL, and that it was contrary to the Coronation Oath and the Act of Union—which did not really signify, but yet was slightly material—and that the great thing was for the Lords to check democracy. These were actually the grounds on which, at this time of day, a peer picked out to give the keynote to a great party combination invited the Lords to enter on the most serious struggle their House has ever braved. The Duke of RUTLAND did certainly come to something definite. He wished the Bill to be rejected because by it the money of the Church was given to Maynooth. It is needless to say that nothing of the sort is done by the Bill; but even if it were, there would be nothing more necessary than to get the Maynooth compensation from some other source, and then the Bill would express the national will. To reject a Bill altogether on account of one clause in it which might be easily amended shows an appetite for a useless fight worthy of an Irishman at a fair. Lord CHELMSFORD took a much easier line, for he escaped out of argument into the recesses of his conscience. He avowed that he considered it quite immaterial whether the Bill expressed the national will or not; nor did he think it necessary to trouble himself about the future. The Bill was wicked, and he would vote against it. Exactly the same line was taken by those of the bishops who were for rejecting the Bill; but to be careless of consequences, and to go on recklessly for principles, seems suitable, and in a certain sense not discreditable, to bishops. An ex-Chancellor might be supposed to be capable of looking forward for a few weeks, and of thinking what was best to be done under a given set of circumstances.

The Ministerial speakers shone by the side of such poor opponents, and Lord GRANVILLE gave universal satisfaction by the neatness with which he made the best of a difficult position. It was perhaps a piece of superabundant frankness to own that the Ministry had rejected amendments in the Commons to which they were not really averse, in order to have something to yield in the Lords. These little games should be played perhaps, but not revealed. All the Opposition speakers, however, allowed that Lord GRANVILLE had put as much gilding on the pill as possible. Nor was there anything in the speeches of the other Ministerial speakers to awaken much irritation or to excite much comment, although Lord CLARENDON told the Peers a disagreeable home-truth when he reminded them that they really disliked Lord DERBY's Reform Bill much more than the Irish Church Bill, but swallowed it because it suited their party to get it passed. The only speaker who entirely failed to sustain the expectations formed of him was Lord PENZANCE, who laid down some extraordinary propositions in singularly senseless and inelegant language. There is a total want of anything like political logic and principle in the mind of a man who could avow that he would perpetuate what he called a "moral deformity" in Ireland, if he could believe that its removal would in any way tend to deprive England of having in its Established Church a happy medium between infidelity and enthusiasm. The true spirit of Protestant ascendency breathed in every word of what was equivalent to the old familiar declaration that Ireland ought to suffer any kind of evil the alleviation of which would sacrifice any good which an Englishman chooses to fancy he enjoys. It is not perhaps saying much to say that the palm of the debate on the first two nights rested among the lay Lords, with those who, belonging to the Opposition, took the wise and sensible line that the Lords would be extremely foolish if they did not pass the Second Reading. The best of these speeches was undoubtedly that of Lord GREY, because he put his main point with the greatest force and cogency. To his opinions on the Irish Church we cannot attach any value, for they amount to this—that the Irish Church is a very bad thing, but that it is a low, factious, unstatesmanlike course to touch it, unless at some undisclosed time and in some undisclosed way of which Lord GREY would possibly approve. But Lord GREY was treading on new ground, and on ground whither it was profitable for his hearers to follow him, when he invited them to consider how hopeless it was to suppose that the opinion of the nation would undergo a sudden change at the last moment as to the Irish Church, when this opinion had been slowly and silently growing for thirty years. It was also a useful parallel to remind the Lords that it was by rejecting the Reform Bill of Lord GREY that the Peers then lost all chance of mending it, and that the Ministers of the day found themselves unable in the face of a great popular excitement to concede amendments to which they had no real objection. Lord CARNARVON and Lord STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE added the weight of their authority on the same side, and the adhesion to their views of the Duke of RICHMOND was made in a high degree valuable by the courage in separating himself from old colleagues and friends that is displayed.

It was high time that Lord DERBY should come to the rescue when he opened the debate on Thursday night, but excepting that he spoke with great earnestness, and that his presence and example animated his followers, there was not much in his speech to change the opinions of any one. He went back in the strangest, most unpractical way into old historical reminiscences to show that the property of the Church had been protected by the Lancastrian kings. He took up ground abandoned even by Lord HARROWBY, and asserted that the Act of Union bound the Imperial Parliament irrevocably. Stranger than all, he revived Lord HARROWBY's statement that the Bill was an [illegible] scheme, as if it signified in the least [illegible] who first thought of its provisions, wh[illegible] passed through the House of Commons by enormous majorities. But Lord DERBY has held high office, and knows something of the working of the Constitution, and he was aware that he must do something a little more than merely indulge in historical quotations or insinuations that all the Cabinet is governed by Mr. BRIGHT, who, in his turn, is the mouthpiece of the illustrious arch-spoliator, MIALL. He had to explain to his colleagues why it was that he advised them to run the great risk of rejecting the Bill on the Second Reading; and he took the ground that it was hopeless to propose any amendments, because in the House of Commons the Ministry would listen to no amendments. Lord SALISBURY, on the part of that section of the Opposition which supported the Second Reading, answered this argument, and answered it in a manner that was, we think, perfectly conclusive, although he could not in his position urge one of the strongest reasons for seeing a difference between the amendments which the Lords may make and those which were made in the Commons. He could not so wholly separate himself from his party as to criticize Mr. DISRAELI's amendments, which were not amendments at all, but which amounted to a new scheme for increasing the endowments of a Church that was to be disendowed. But, as a reply to Lord DERBY, the answer of Lord SALISBURY was complete. Either the amendments to the Bill which the Lords may make will be rejected, or they will be accepted. If they are accepted, evidently the Lords will have done very much for the Irish Church; if they are rejected, then the onus of letting the Bill drop for this year will be thrown on the Ministry. Lord SALISBURY pointed out also that the Lords have a great power of driving a Government into a compromise; because the Lords can only be vanquished by something like a coup d'état, and the nation would neither understand nor support a coup d'état undertaken merely to uphold the opinions of the Ministry on some little question of detail. This is all quite true, and it is most earnestly to be hoped that the views of Lord SALISBURY may have prevailed with a number of Conservatives sufficient to secure the Second Reading, although it may be found difficult hereafter to make any other amendments in the Bill than such as will comfort the Lords with the persuasion that their efforts have not been wholly without fruit.

THE SPEECHES OF THE ARCHBISHOPS AND BISHOPS.

THE most powerful speakers against the Bill have been found among the Bishops, but then the Bishops had an enormous advantage. They had a kind of sacerdotal privilege of talking beside the mark. They left to CÆSAR the things that were CÆSAR's. They considered themselves to have nothing to do with the secular and earthly question whether the Lords can successfully reject a Bill heartily supported by the nation, and addressed themselves to the nobler and more abstract question whether the Irish Church deserves its coming fate. As the Archbishop of DUBLIN said, his remarks "moved in "another sphere" than that of calculations of the interests of the House of Lords. In their own line the Bishops opposed to the Bill spoke exceedingly well. There was vivacity in the speech of the Bishop of DERRY; there was energy, stir, and spring in the speech of the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH; and there was great feeling and much grace of language in the speech of the Archbishop of DUBLIN. Very few speeches among recent speeches in Parliament read so well, as regards language and the framing of periods, as this speech of Archbishop TRENCH; and although it was perhaps too studied and polished, yet it was irradiated with the play of a deep and earnest religious feeling. If it did not convey the impression of coming from a strong mind, it did convey the impression of coming from a mind sensitive, refined, and not unfitted for a crisis which will demand in the leaders of the Church, as the first qualification, the power of sympathy with others. Strong, however, as was the language used by the bishops who wished that the Bill should be altogether rejected as an unholy thing, and sincere as was indisputably the feeling that animated them, none of them produced so great and so immediate an effect as was produced by the speech of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY in favour of the Second Reading. The declaration of a man in such a position, that he believed that the Bill, if taken into Committee, might be made a good Bill, necessarily affected the minds of many. It must be owned that, if his speech is examined, it is difficult to gather from it what are the amendments consistent with the principle of the Bill which he thinks could be carried, and which, if carried, would make this bad Bill a good one. The amendments which the Archbishop actually suggested were that the glebe-houses should be given over free from the charge on them; that 1560, not 1660, should be taken as the date to which private endowments should go back, and that a little should be taken off the compensation to Maynooth, on account of the short time the students stay there. We suspect that these are very much the amendments which Lord GRANVILLE said the Ministry had cunningly left for the Lords to make; and if these are the amendments which would make the Bill a thoroughly good one in the eyes of the PRIMATE of the English Church, the Bill may be very easily improved. The speech of the Bishop of ST. DAVID's was altogether in a different tone and on a different level. It was the speech of a churchman whom experience and study and a patient searching into the foundations of things have made liberal and wise and courageous. It needed all these qualities in a bishop to announce that he was going to vote for the Second Reading, because he thought the present position of the Irish Church ought not to continue, although he would have preferred the concurrent endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. And scarcely less were all these high qualities needed when the Bishop denounced as heathenish the notion that to apply Church property to the best use was sacrilegious, and when he assured his hearers that they need not be afraid of the Papal power if only they would be true to Protestantism and leave off comparing the Protestant Dissenters of Wales with the Romanists of Ireland.

There were, it may be acknowledged, two points unfavourable, not to the Bill, but to the arguments generally used by its supporters, which the speeches of the Bishops brought into prominence. They showed some reason to think that the ease with which the new Church Body can be formed, and the success with which the voluntary system can be worked by the disendowed Church, have both been overrated. The Archbishop of DUBLIN pointed out very forcibly how many and how complicated would be the questions to be decided by men of different religious parties, unaccustomed to common action, and with their minds inflamed and irritated by recent defeat before the Church Body could be formed. The Archbishop most properly pledged himself to do his very best if the unwelcome task of having to aid in forming the new Church Body is imposed on him. But there can be no doubt that this task will be a very arduous one, and that many whose concurrence is essential will abstain, at any rate for some time, in assisting in doing what they will consider to be the work of those who have spoiled and wronged them. Rough things will not be made smooth by fine words, or by shutting our eyes to them, and it appears probable that the present great irritation in the Irish Protestants against the Bill will create a serious obstacle to the formation of a new Church Body in the time limited by the Bill. Like other obstacles, this may be overcome, but it is an obstacle [illegible]h before long may cause anxious attention. In the next place, there is, it must be allowed, some truth in what the Bishops said as to the chances of the Church under a voluntary system. There are two hindrances to the Irish Church as a voluntary Church; it is a mild, reasonable Church, and it will largely depend on the landed gentry. The surest way to get money is to get it out of the mass of the people, and the way to get it out of the ignorant and superstitious is to frighten them and preach a very terrible creed, and to keep it constantly before their minds that if the terrors of the creed are to be mitigated, money must be forthcoming. English Churchmen cannot do this, for the English Church deals with religion in a different spirit, and addresses itself to minds capable of b[illegible]nfluenced by anothe[illegible] of motives. Then, again, i[illegible]pleasant for a Church to have to depend principally on the landed gentry, of all clas[illegible]s the least willing to give to great objects, and with the least spare cash in proportion to their incomes to give in the cause of religion or charity. As the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH put it, with a contemptuous scorn of the Irish gentry and nobility that could not be surpassed, they will begin by keeping a tame Levite in their houses, and when they are tired of him, and grudge him his pittance, they will run over to England, where they can get the ministrations of the gospel of t[illegible]lvation for nothing. The fate of the Episcopal Church in Scotland is very much in accordance with these dismal prognostications. There the greatest landowners are Episcopalians, and sometimes, to show their grandeur, keep a tame Levite in the house, but the Episcopalian Church is left to starve. This is certainly a great danger ahead for the Irish Church. After it is disendowed, its members will have most abundant means to support it, but they will principally be of a class whose view of a Church is that it should be a safe, respectable institution, kept up for them by some sort of lucky accident. This is all true, but then it is impossible to suppose that the Church of a small minority is to be endowed largely with national property merely that it may give such people what they wish for.

The Bishop of PETERBOROUGH produced an effect on his audience which has rarely been equalled by any one who has spoken in Parliament for the first time, and he threw a heart into the Opposition which it scarcely had before, and which died out of it when the defence of the cause passed into other hands. But on the main question of the debate he had not much more to say than the other bishops who opposed the Second Reading. He even went further than most of the Bench would be inclined to go. For he owned that the nation had pronounced distinctly against establishment. He abandoned establishment, not willingly, but because not to abandon it was to fight for something utterly hopeless. But he thought that the nation had not pronounced in favour of disendowment, and that disendowment was so utterly wrong as to necessitate the rejection of the Bill. This view gave an opening for oratory which might have been impossible if he had pursued the conclusions of common sense, and asked what was the course by which the greatest amount of endowments could be saved to the Irish Church. The Bishops of RIPON and TUAM added little to the arguments or statements of their predecessors, except that the Bishop of TUAM could speak of Protestantism in the South of Ireland from the experience of a quarter of a century of parochial work. His experience proves to have been that the Protestant clergyman has a usefulness of his own as a poor but benevolent gentleman, and as a slight aid to Roman Catholics against the oppression of the priests. That a man doing such a work, although it may be a work different from what would naturally seem to be his especial province, should be lost henceforth to the South of Ireland, is a distinct national loss. But every one is perfectly aware that it is quite impossible to make great changes, and carry out great principles, without causing inconveniences and imposing sacrifices that are most lamentable. Does the Bishop suppose that, when Protestantism triumphed and monasteries were suppressed, there were not extinguished in many peaceful neighbourhoods centres of gentleness and piety and learning, or that, when the Presbyterians were turned out of their English livings, there were not many parishes which had to deplore the substitution of the roystering, swaggering Levite of a Cavalier landowner for a simple, austere, GOD-fearing minister. If the Bishop, and those who talk as he talked, would only ask themselves whether Ireland is to be governed in religious matters on principles which England would not permit for a moment at home, and which she applies nowhere else in all her wide dominions, in order that in remote Irish villages there may be a gentlemanly safeguard against Ultramontanism, we know perfectly well what the answer would be. The answer would be that this was not to be expected for a moment. But men like the Bishop of TUAM naturally speak under the influence of personal memories and local associations. It might have appeared unnatural, and almost unseemly, that a Bishop coming from such a part of Ireland should have argued on general principles. To speak and vote against the second reading is part of the character assigned to him. But he may be very glad if he votes and speaks as he ought to do, and yet does both ineffectually, and if the good sense of lay peers rescues him from having thrown away the last chance of making somewhat better terms for his Church.

MR. MOTLEY'S INSTRUCTIONS.

THE summary of Mr. MOTLEY'S instructions, which has been published with the sanction of the American Government, though it contains nothing unexpected, is thoroughly unsatisfactory. It would perhaps have been useless to resume negotiation at present, but the professed hope that the English Government will after a time take the initiative might almost be construed into a covert demand of voluntary humiliation. The passage in the summary which relates to the Proclamation of Neutrality is scarcely intelligible, except on the assumption that it is intentionally inconsistent; but it would seem that Mr. MOTLEY is at the same time to admit that the declaration of neutrality affords no substantial ground of complaint, and to urge that nevertheless it resulted in losses which require reparation. As England has already accepted the only form of convention which has been proposed by the American Government, it evidently rests with the Power which has contemptuously refused to ratify its own treaty to propose some alternative form of settlement. The PRESIDENT and his SECRETARY of STATE are fully aware that claims of redress founded on the declaration of neutrality will never be admitted as proper subjects for compensation or for reference, and it can scarcely be doubted that reasonable Americans have been satisfied by the recent discussion that the demand is wholly untenable in law and justice. It is perhaps not seriously intended that Mr. MOTLEY should do more than keep the question open until popular opinion in America has decided in favour of peace or of war. There is nothing to prevent a just and equitable arrangement but the almost universal hostility to England which, alternately ebbing and flowing but never permanently subsiding, is habitually watched and utilized by the managers of political parties. If at any future time the majority of the people should wish to terminate the quarrel which has been fastened on England, the Government of the day and the Senate can easily give effect to the general wish. The overbearing tone of the instructions to Mr. MOTLEY was probably necessary to suit the national taste, and they indicate no desire of an immediate rupture. His own cold and measured replies to the ill-timed Addresses of the Liverpool Chambers of Commerce have been sharply criticized in America on the erroneous assumption that they exceeded the narrowest limits of courtesy. On one point at least Englishmen may heartily agree with Americans, though from an opposite point of view. It would be a gross blunder to thrust public professions of goodwill on a Minister who could not reciprocate the simplest civilities without exposing himself to reproof and disavowal. Expressions of friendship to the United States are invariably received with insult, as proofs of timidity or of weakness; and it is not fair to expose a diplomatist to the alternative of being either rude or unfaithful to his trust.

The temporary reaction which was produced by Mr. SUMNER'S extravagance, and by the unanimous protest of all parties in England against his insolent demands, is rapidly disappearing; but it may perhaps leave behind it some useful results. Dr. WOOLSEY'S lecture at Yale College, Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH'S deferential speech at Ithaca, and Mr. FORSTER'S plain account of the history of the Proclamation, have convinced all candid and temperate Americans that the recognition of belligerency was a thoroughly justifiable act. An elaborate confutation of Mr. SUMNER'S speech, published in the Baltimore Southern Metropolis, though it is fuller and more conclusive than Dr. WOOLSEY'S lecture, will probably be repudiated as an exposition of American opinion, because it is tainted with the suspected air of Maryland. The same unanswerable facts and arguments had been repeatedly urged by English writers; but Mr. SUMNER has the merit of having for the first time, and against his will, secured a hearing for the truth. He was probably disappointed to find that the intelligence of the more respectable journals revolted against his formal repetition in the Senate of the monstrous accusations and pretensions which had been frequently anticipated in their own columns. Having repudiated and confuted Mr. SUMNER'S fallacies, the same writers are now reverting to their habitual tone of depreciation and scarcely suppressed menace. The Republican leaders are at the same time considering the comparative expediency of selecting enmity to England, or some domestic question, as the issue on which the autumn elections are to be contested. Mr. BUTLER, who hopes shortly to be chosen a Senator for Massachusetts, has already commenced the agitation by a characteristic proposal for the discontinuance of commercial intercourse with England. As becomes his character, he is careful to rest his case on general animosity, rather than on any special pretext. Admitting that the concession of belligerency affords no ground of remonstrance, and being estopped by his former devotion to slavery from taking up Mr. SUMNER'S philanthropic pretext for enmity, Mr. BUTLER candidly goes back to the good old legend of GEORGE III.'s Hessian mercenaries, and of the employment of Indian allies, which was ninety years ago denounced by CHATHAM. For these and similar reasons Mr. BUTLER recommends a commercial excommunication, which, as he cheerfully suggests, would starve the English poor, and so through bread-riots, ending in insurrection, cause a ruinous revolution. The immediate incidence of Mr. BUTLER'S amiable project deserves the notice of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, who thinks it consistent with his dignity to accuse his own political opponents in England of an imaginary crime before a foreign and unfriendly audience. Only strong prejudice could have induced an able and honest Englishman to tell his American hearers that the Tories would welcome a rupture with the United States, although Mr. DISRAELI and Lord STANLEY systematically discouraged during the war all expressions of sympathy with the Confederate cause. Even if his charges had been just, it is not on the Conservatives or on the aristocracy that Mr. BUTLER'S vengeance is in the first instance to fall. The artisans who endured the cotton famine with patience for the sake of the North are now, if the Republican leader has his way, to suffer a bread famine wantonly created for the avowed purpose of driving them to distress and despair. The proposal is of course insincere, as well as intrinsically absurd, because Mr. BUTLER knows well that the Western farmers and the Chicago corn-dealers will not in time of peace deprive themselves of their best market, even for the purpose of causing bread-riots among the Lancashire cotton-spinners. The significance of the speech consists, not in its substance, but in the proof which it affords that one of the most crafty and successful of political adventurers thinks that there is something to gain by expressing his desire to starve the people of England. If Mr. SUMNER, with the more decorous, though not more scrupulous, Republican leaders, adopts Mr. BUTLER's tactics, every village and town in the Northern States will within two or three months resound with denunciations of England. It must be said in Mr. BUTLER's defence against Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, that if a war of the last century is a sufficient reason for a new conflict, Mr. SMITH's apologetic statement that the American war was conducted by a demented King and a narrow oligarchy is substantially inaccurate. The English people, whatever may have been their political privileges, were unanimous in opposing the colonial demand for independence, and the KING, who had not then become insane, only represented the national feeling. It may also be allowed that Mr. BUTLER comes nearer the truth than Mr. SUMNER when he dwells on the misdeeds of the Hessians as well as on the exploits of the Alabama as a ground for the reprisals which he recommends. It is almost impossible to impress on the short memories of newspaper readers the undoubted fact that American animosity and vituperation had reached a height which it was impossible to transcend long before a plank of the Alabama was laid.

The duty of the English Government, if not agreeable, is fortunately simple. The differences of opinion which existed as to the policy of Lord STANLEY and Lord CLARENDON in their conduct of the negotiations have lost all practical importance. A pliability which might have been deemed both excessive in itself and inexpedient for its immediate object, has produced the incidental advantage of proving to the world that the ultimate failure was not the fault of England. Concession produced constantly increasing demands and a contumelious rebuff. There is no danger that the only remaining course of patient firmness will give any just ground for offence. Even American susceptibility can scarcely have found any pretext for resentment in Lord CLARENDON's cautious answer to Lord STRATFORD's prudent remarks; yet Mr. SUMNER and Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON would perhaps have been surprised to find that they were classed together as the two eminent persons who had done most to remove erroneous impressions. It is perfectly true that Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON elicited the friendly feelings of Englishmen to America, and that Mr. SUMNER gave them an opportunity of showing that, if they were willing to conciliate, they were determined not to yield to insult or to menace. No similar triumph, voluntary or involuntary, awaits the present American Minister. Even if he shared the desire of his predecessor to renew friendly relations with England, recent circumstances have shown how limited is the effect of his commission. Although no envoy from the United States would command more personal respect or esteem than Mr. MOTLEY, there is no disrespect in saying that in political position he is not yet the equal of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON. The late leader of the minority in the Senate was so universally respected by his colleagues, that they publicly resented an insult which Mr. BUTLER, in the conduct of the impeachment, had offered with his usual coarseness to the Democratic Senator for Maryland. The confirmation of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON's appointment as Minister to England, at a time when the PRESIDENT's other nominations were almost uniformly rejected, was a proof of personal confidence as well as a preliminary approval of the settlement which, as the Senate well knew, he would be instructed to negotiate. It is impossible that Mr. MOTLEY can receive from his own party so peculiar and exceptional a compliment; but, as it seems that for the present he will have nothing to do, his virtual want of full powers is not a cause for regret. If the Convention had been ratified, the probable rejection of the Alabama claims by an arbitrator who was guided by the rules and precedents of international law would perhaps have embittered the dispute even more effectually than Mr. SUMNER's speech.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

IT would be a curious though barren inquiry whether Mr. BRIGHT's occasional violations of propriety are unconscious or wilful. It is difficult to believe that a man of genius, practised in affairs and accustomed to associate with statesmen, should be unable to appreciate either the duty of official reticence or the utility of good manners. Perhaps Mr. BRIGHT may have persuaded himself that a certain bluntness of language is acceptable to the mass of his followers; or he may desire to assert, by indifference to the feelings of his colleagues, and by calculated rudeness to his adversaries, the independence of his present position. The late insult to the House of Lords is not perhaps in worse taste than his jeers against the Bishops at Fishmongers' Hall, nor is it as dangerous as his speech on the ownership of land in Ireland; but, if it had produced any effect, it would have tended to prevent the adoption by the House of Lords of the principle of the Irish Church Bill. In former times Mr. BRIGHT, in his anxiety to facilitate a great political reform, has so far imposed restraint on his own character and disposition as to recommend a liberal and conciliatory mode of dealing with the Irish clergy, and even with the Church as a corporate body. His proposal of awarding out of the reclaimed endowments a gross sum to each of the three great religious bodies was equally sagacious and just; nor is Mr. BRIGHT especially responsible for the omission of the provision in Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill. His speech on the second reading, while it was, as might have been expected, singularly eloquent, was entirely inoffensive. It seemed that a sense of responsibility inspired by a grave occasion had for the time superseded the instinct of pugnacity, which has since revived at the most inopportune of moments. Even if Mr. BRIGHT had offended the feelings of the House of Commons, he could not have alienated the compact majority which was returned for the express purpose of supporting Mr. GLADSTONE. It was not equally certain that he might not confirm wavering peers in their determination to prefer their own convictions to political expediency; but the temptation to affront the House of Lords when it was in a painful and embarrassing position was irresistible, and perhaps not unwelcome. The inhabitants of Birmingham are now satisfied that their patriotic representative has not been won over by the blandishments of aristocracy and fashion. If his coarse attack on the House of Lords had been less entirely wanton and unprovoked, it would not have served the purpose so effectually. It has been suggested on plausible grounds that Mr. BRIGHT wished to secure the rejection of the Bill, for the purpose of creating an agitation against the House of Lords; but it is equally probable that he may have desired to deprive the peers of the credit of a prudent conformity, by attributing their possible acquiescence to fear. The vanity and narrowness which are oddly combined with Mr. BRIGHT's great intellectual power prevent him from appreciating the motives or the capacity of his opponents. It is possible that he may mistake the dispassionate wisdom of the Bishop of St. DAVID's, or the vigorous sagacity of Lord SALISBURY, for hypocritical cowardice. Mr. BRIGHT deals with political controversies at home in the same spirit which inspires the SUMNERS and the BUTLERS of America in their treatment of international relations; yet experience shows that good manners are in the long run conducive to practical success.

A disputant who calls his adversary a fool has always the satisfaction of giving pain, and even of telling a portion of the truth. All men, and all bodies of men, are capable of some degree of folly, and the House of Lords includes some simpletons, a few unprincipled spendthrifts, two or three hundred commonplace gentlemen, and not a few theoretical and practical statesmen. An average peer is perhaps exceptionally liable to overrate his own importance, and, on the other hand, he has generally been trained in habits of courtesy and self-respect. If the peers were paired off with an equal number of the members of the House of Commons, on the principle on which boys choose sides at cricket, it would be found that there was little difference in the respectable mediocrity of the majority, or in the ability of the leaders. As orators, Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. GLADSTONE may happen to be superior to any competitors in the Upper House, but the speakers in this debate have, on the average, been fully equal to those who preceded them in the discussion. The statement that "the "House of Lords is not very wise" is only true in the sense in which the same proposition would apply to the House of Commons, or to any assembly in Christendom. If Mr. BRIGHT had not been blinded by prejudice, he might have inferred, from the existence of the House of Lords, that its traditional policy had been marked by extraordinary wisdom. A vessel which has lived through innumerable storms must necessarily have been managed with some regard to the laws of navigation. The habit of calculating the possibilities of resistance affords in itself a sound political training. The crude and insolent menace of a revolution in the event of the rejection of the Irish Church Bill would have been more effective if the threatened destruction of the House of Lords had not been obviously unconnected with the condition suggested. Mr. BRIGHT advises the constituencies to consider, if the Bill is thrown out, what is the use of a Constitution in which the will of the people as represented in the House of Commons is not immediately supreme; but, whatever might have been the fate of the Irish Church Bill, the same objection would remain as long as it was possible that the House of Lords might dissent from the conclusions of the House of Commons. The use of an existing Constitution is in well-governed States taken for granted, until on rare occasions it becomes expedient to recast political arrangements. If Mr. BRIGHT really holds the opinions which he expresses, he ought to be already prepared with a plan for abolishing the House of Lords. The contemptuous toleration which he offers, in case of submission, must be entirely inconsistent with his principles.

Mr. BRIGHT is perhaps deficient in sensitiveness rather than wilfully disloyal to his colleagues. Having notoriously entered the Cabinet against his wishes, he claims the right of remaining a demagogue, even though he has condescended to become a Minister. He has at different times propounded a finance scheme of his own, and an Irish policy of his own; and now, without consulting the convenience or the feelings of the members of the Government, he stirs up the passion of the multitude against the House of Lords. The jurisdiction of Cabinets, as of other select bodies, over their members limited by the sanctions of which they can dispose. To coldness and tacit disapproval Mr. BRIGHT would be wholly indifferent, and dismissal offers no terrors to an unwilling associate. As in many similar cases, a troublesome friend is tolerated because he would be more dangerous as an enemy. On three or four occasions Mr. BRIGHT has compromised the Cabinet by his independent action, but it is probable that his official position has interfered with many impulses of violence. The PRIME MINISTER is probably not unwilling to have in the Cabinet a powerful ally against the advocates of moderate counsels; and the advantage of ruling the Radical party through its acknowledged chief must be obvious to all members of the Government. After any outburst of violence or insult, it is easy to assure either House that the Government is not answerable for the unofficial language of a single Minister. Lord GRANVILLE's amiable and courtly apologies for such documents as the letter to the promoters of the Birmingham meeting have, on ordinary occasions, a pleasing and humorous effect, but on Thursday evening he betrayed the embarrassment in which Mr. BRIGHT had involved the Cabinet, by unaccustomed awkwardness and irregularity. Mr. GLADSTONE for once excelled his accomplished colleague in readiness and tact; and, it may be added, that Colonel NORTH's plain question was far more judicious than Lord CAIRNS's five-and-twenty minutes' speech.

It may be doubted whether the more prudent Conservative leaders would desire the exclusion of Mr. BRIGHT from a position in which, while his impetuosity is partially hampered, its periodical outbreaks must always be inconvenient to the Government. If he were out of office, his hostility to peers, to bishops, and to landowners would be more frequently and loudly expressed. It is possible that his ferocious virtue may be softened in time by contrast with the polished wisdom of statesmen who are, with one doubtful exception, assuredly not democratic enthusiasts. The half-dozen peers who are allowed to possess a certain degree of merit are probably the same who sit by Mr. BRIGHT's side in the Cabinet, and by degrees it may dawn on his imagination that there may be respectable qualities even in independent peers. The popular ANTÆUS cannot be prevented from occasionally touching the earth, and in the Cabinet he will find it comparatively difficult to use his giant's strength like a giant. If Mr. BRIGHT's Birmingham letter had any purpose except to please his constituents and himself, his calculation has been disappointed. There is no reason to suppose that his gratuitous provocation has induced a single peer to vote against the second reading, although it may have satisfied the party of resistance of the justice of their preconceived resolution. It may be lawful to learn from an enemy, but judicious belligerents consider his probable wishes and motives, instead of either following his ostensible advice or adopting the exact negative of his suggestions. If any member of the House had been weak enough to be afraid of seeming to be frightened, he could scarcely have failed to understand that, if he wished to set Mr. BRIGHT at defiance, he need not vote against the second reading. Any amendment of which the House of Commons was likely to disapprove would serve the purpose of provoking the threatened collision, though in a less dangerous shape. It is possible that some thoughtful members of the House may even have been capable of recognising the admixture of truth in an offensive taunt. As it is said, with a kind of paradoxical accuracy, that calumnies are always well-founded, insults also are pointed by an intuitive perception of the weaknesses which invite attack.

FRANCE.

THE riots which have followed the French elections, having no ostensible purpose, are naturally attributed by all parties to the section of their enemies on which they especially desire to cast discredit. Even the Orleanists, who have never been in favour with any mob past or present, have, it seems, bribed men in blouses with little packages of forty sous, which have or have not been found on the persons of some of the prisoners. It would be interesting to understand the mode of reasoning by which it is assumed that the friends of Parliamentary Government persuade themselves that it is worth their while to pay a body of noisy vagabonds for bawling out the name of a Jacobinical pamphleteer; but perhaps the relation of imaginary motive and alleged effect is not quite so remote as when PITT, according to the most approved Republican writers, paid the expenses of the September massacres. A more popular theory represents the EMPEROR himself or his Ministers as the real authors of the late disturbances; and the encouragement which was lately offered to anarchical speeches and to Socialist writings furnishes a pretext for an imputation which is nevertheless probably unfounded. It was intelligible that on the eve of the elections the middle classes should be reminded of the dangers from which, if official assurances are true, they were saved eighteen or nineteen years since by the suppression of the Republic. Since 1851 no shopkeeper has been obliged by a tumult to close his shutters, nor have the aspirations of artisans for the destruction of capital been until lately publicly expressed. It is not known how far the experiment of tolerating agitation succeeded in influencing the votes of capitalists and traders. The electors of the great cities are counted by tens of thousands; and the large majority are workmen, who perhaps regard the prospect of a political convulsion with indifference or complacency. The owners of property and the employers of labour may possibly have supported the official candidates, or they may have abstained from voting, although it is generally believed that they incline for the most part to the moderate Opposition. If their passive or active adhesion to the Imperial Government is thought important, it cannot have been deemed expedient to disturb their confidence in the permanence of order and security. An Emperor who allows mobs to assemble night after night in the streets of Paris and Nantes runs the risk of being thought no better than a constitutional King. The least that an absolute ruler can do is to give protection in exchange for liberty. It is highly improbable that the Government should deliberately tamper with the dangerous element of a riot in Paris. It is true that the garrison is a formidable army, that the strongholds of former insurgents have been demolished, that the new streets are open to the movements of cavalry and artillery, and, above all, that NAPOLEON III. is not likely to follow the example of CHARLES X. or LOUIS PHILIPPE; yet it is not forgotten that two successive dynasties have been overthrown by the rabble of Paris, which has never forgotten the more famous epoch of its own disastrous domination.

The investigations which have already commenced will probably prove that the mob of rioters was simply a riotous mob. The cries which were uttered in honour of M. ROCHEFORT seem to indicate the absence of conviction or serious design, for the ingenious libeller who has lately become notorious represents no political opinion. If the troops had been withdrawn, or if the EMPEROR, like his predecessors, had run away, leaders would have been forthcoming to profit by a casual revolution; nor is it impossible that a few obscure journalists may have remembered how in 1848 the writers of two newspapers coolly assumed to themselves the Government of France. Even in England Mr. BEALES and his associates proved two or three years ago that a great city can always furnish the materials of disorder; and the traditions of Parisian insurrection are far more popular and exciting than the memory of Lord GEORGE GORDON. Two sons of M. VICTOR HUGO, who have, it seems, thought it prudent to retire to Belgium, may perhaps have employed themselves in propagating the hereditary doctrine that it is always meritorious to rebel against Governments and to shoot policemen. The heroes of M. HUGO's most voluminous romance exhibit a noble patriotism by sacrificing their lives on a barricade in an absolutely hopeless struggle, after putting to death many soldiers who were discharging their duty. The rioters of last week were happily less bloodthirsty and less bold, perhaps because it is not easy to barricade an open boulevard in the face of three or four squadrons of cavalry. Their intention was probably to do as much mischief as was compatible with the circumstances, and, in the improbable contingency of success, to proclaim the Red Republic. If it should appear that police spies had a share in instigating the disturbances, it would not be surprising that those respectable functionaries have, as usual, laboured in their vocation. A Minister or Prefect would have shown himself even more imbecile than perfidious if he had taken a part in the organization of a riot.

As the Legislative Body will not, except for formal purposes, meet for some months, the EMPEROR will have time to [illegible] whether his policy is to be modified in consequence [illegible] the elections. [illegible] the dismissal of M. ROUHER are founded only [illegible] conjecture, and it [illegible] improbable that a change should be hastily effected which would almost amount to an admission of Ministerial responsibility. Mr. DISRAELI, with strict propriety, [illegible] when the [illegible] stituencies had decided [illegible] his opponent. The retirement of M. ROUHER, followed by the accession of Prince NAPOLEON [illegible] M. EMILE OLLIVIER, would be an act of deference to the Opposition, which only constitutes one-tenth of the Legislative Body, and yet it is not certain that either of the [illegible] candidates for office would be more popular than the [illegible] Minister of State. The adverse elections have imp[illegible] want of confidence, not in any member of the Cabinet, but in the EMPEROR, or in the Imperial system. If it is intended that the Legislative Body shall be elevated into a Parliament, M. ROUHER would be one of the most efficient of Parliamentary leaders. If the [illegible] tutional tradit[illegible] England were [illegible] cable to France, it [illegible] tively easy to [illegible] govern the country [illegible] three to one [illegible] Lower House, with the [illegible] of a Senate, but [illegible] certain that represe[illegible] pared to [illegible] would [illegible] if they were [illegible] sovereign power, be proportionally [illegible]. The majority is returned to support the absolute [illegible] of the EMPEROR, and not to share his responsibility. In one of the clever apologues which purport to represent political facts, the [illegible] of rural districts are represented as finding fault with the EMPEROR for not choosing his Deputies himself, instead of giving the people the trouble of voting. The Opposition, as far as its different sections have a common purpose, is bent on asserting the right of the Legislative Body to control the choice of Ministers and the general policy of the Government. If the majority found that the principle of representative government was admitted, its members would find a difficulty in understanding the nature of their own mission and doctrine. On the whole, it seems probable that the EMPEROR will persist in maintaining personal government. Before the next election his son will be of an age to take a part in public business, and if he should display the ability and vigour of his family, he may [illegible]sibly [illegible] the popular enthusiasm which hailed the [illegible]blishment of the Second Empire. A dynasty which has maintained itself for [illegible] considerable time may alter the character of its administration with comparative impunity. When Austria adopted a Constitution, there could be no question of removing the ancient House of HAPSBURG. If a constitutional government were restored in France, political critics would inquire what was gained by substituting the BONAPARTES for the liberal Princes of ORLEANS.

The controversies suggested by the late returns have not yet subsided. It is certain that nearly all the principal Orleanists have been defeated, although the election of M. THIERS on the second ballot was anxiously desired by the entire body of the Opposition. On the other hand, it is perhaps true that the numbers of the Socialist voters were too highly estimated in consequence of their success in some of the great towns. The actual supporters of RASPAIL, of GAMBETTA, of ROCHEFORT, and of the other chief revolutionists, may perhaps not have been more than a hundred thousand, or one per cent. of the whole constituency. How many advocates of [illegible]narchy may have been scattered over the electoral districts where there was no Socialist candidate, it is impossible [illegible] ascertain. The populace of the cities is probably inclined to Jacobinism, while the rural departments still prefer [illegible] Empire to a Republic. There is no reason to believe that [illegible] constituency in France has returned a member for the express purpose of representing the system of regulated liberty under Parliamentary government. M. THIERS finds favour with the Parisians, not as a former Minister of a constitutional King, but because he is the most formidable opponent of the EMPEROR and his Ministry. If the second ballot had followed the riots, it might possibly have appeared that the Government had recovered a portion of its former popularity. The unity of the Opposition is proved to be a fiction as often as the legitimate consequences of revolution assume a visible form. The most discontented father of a family prefers the EMPEROR, with all his shortcomings, to the ruffians who affect to imitate the exploits of 1848. [illegible] possible that, under the influence of immediate alarm, the Duke of PERSIGNY may have found readers for the curious letter in which he illustrates recent history by the examples of BRUTUS, of PUBLICOLA, and of DEMOSTHENES at Chæronea. The timid shopkeeper has a confused association of quotations from the French translation of PLUTARCH with the terrors of the great Revolution.

BANKRUPTCY.

THE Bankruptcy Bill has passed through Committee, and approaches much more nearly to what such a measure ought to be than it did in the shape in which it was at first introduced. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL has shown judgment and temper in his consideration of the various proposals which have been made both by lawyers and merchants, for the improvement of the Bill, and though there still remain [illegible] defects to be remedied, there is everything to encourage the hope that further progress towards sound principles may be made before the Act receives the Royal Assent. The alterations, however, have not all been improvements, and the worst feature of the Bill, the hard and fast line drawn between bankrupts who do, and those who do not, pay [illegible] pound, remains as yet unchanged, to await the further [illegible] which it may receive in the House of Lords. The original proposal was that a bankrupt, [illegible] should receive his discharge [illegible] of two events—if he [illegible] paid ten shilling in the [illegible] special resolution of creditors were passed expressing their opinion that the bankruptcy had arisen from unavoidable misfortune, and their desire that a discharge should be accorded. The discharge, when so given, was to free the bankrupt from all provable debts, with the invidious though traditional and not very important exception of debts to the Crown. These provisions were accompanied by a clause, novel but thoroughly sound in principle, by which a bankrupt who failed to obtain his discharge was to be free from the attacks of his creditors for a term of five years, and if within that time he succeeded in making up the ten shillings in the pound, was to be discharged as completely as if his estate had realized that amount in the first instance. It was pointed out, in our pages and elsewhere, that indulgence of the kind granted by this last clause to an undischarged bankrupt was all that any man who had not paid his debts could fairly ask for. It is one thing to give time and opportunity to an insolvent trader to redeem his fortunes, and quite another to confiscate one half of the debt due to an honest creditor for the benefit of a person who may or may not be an honest bankrupt. Inability to pay is the only conceivable plea for relieving a defaulting debtor from the obligation of returning what he has received in money, or money's worth, from a too confiding creditor, and when the inability ceases the relief ought to cease with it. Policy and mercy equally require that a man without property shall not be persecuted all his life by claimants whom he has no means of satisfying, and this end is completely assured by allowing a reasonable respite in time for the bankrupt to recover himself, and by depriving creditors of the power of inflicting imprisonment. But honesty and justice equally demand that, whenever a bankrupt shall acquire the means of paying his unsatisfied debts, he shall apply his newly acquired wealth to that purpose, instead of living in luxury on what is really the property of others. All reason and fairness pointed to the excision of the clause which granted a discharge to any man who paid only half his [illegible], and it was fully brought before the mind of the House of Commons that continued liability for the full amount (relieved only by personal protection) was the rule in almost every civilized country, and had been the rule in England also until comparatively modern legislation had [illegible]dulged bankrupts with a discharge in full as a sort of set-off against the severity of the law which sanctioned imprisonment for debt—a law which is now almost entirely [illegible]pealed, and before this Session is over will be completely [illegible]rogated. The House of Commons, however, appears to [illegible] not quite ripe for so large a reform, and the unanswerable arguments of Mr. JESSELL and Mr. RATHBONE in support of it failed of effect, though not without evoking considerable support. We take this principle to be rather postponed than rejected, and we are satisfied that until it is accepted and applied in its integrity, though with every possible consideration and protection for a bankrupt who remains unable to satisfy his creditors, we shall not have a bankruptcy law that will survive more than a very few years. This is just one of the matters on which the acumen and judgment of the House of Lords may be usefully brought to bear, and we do not yet despair of seeing a principle substituted for a mere expedient before the present Bill assumes it final shape.

Another glaring defect to which we directed attention has been removed with the ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S concurrence. It so happened that, when the Bill was introduced, the country had in Mr. Commissioner BACON a public servant who by common consent was better qualified to discharge the duties of Chief Judge in Bankruptcy than any other man in the kingdom. It also happened that the existing Court of Appeal for Bankruptcy was a Court which enjoys ample leisure, and which has for many years disposed of the Bankruptcy business with an amount of despatch and efficiency which could not be surpassed. In this state of affairs every one was astounded to find that the Bill contained clauses transferring the appellate jurisdiction from the Court of Appeal in Chancery to the much more fully occupied Judges of the Common Law, and so restricting the choice of the Chief Judge as to exclude the best possible selection. The singularity of the proposal was aggravated by the fact that it involved the continued payment of Mr. BACON'S salary, without retaining the benefit of his valuable services—an excellent arrangement for him, but a very bad one for the country. Mainly on the suggestion of SIR ROUNDELL PALMER, but with the hearty concurrence of every lawyer in the House, SIR ROBERT COLLIER consented to modify his Bill by accepting as Chief Judge Mr. Commissioner BACON, and by retaining to the Court of Appeal in Chancery its old Bankruptcy jurisdiction.

The most important of the other discussions in the Committee were those which arose on the composition clauses. Both commercial and legal opinion are somewhat divided on this subject. That there are some cases in which the interests of creditors and debtors alike are better served by an inspectorship or composition deed than by a bankruptcy is not disputed. Neither can it be doubted that the great majority of these arrangements by deed are corrupt and unjust contrivances for the purpose of defrauding the general body of creditors, and too often of securing a secret bonus for the influential friends of the bankrupt, who figure as the leading creditors at the meetings called together to sanction a composition. How to escape the mischiefs of these deeds without abolishing them altogether has always been a great crux, and neither the clauses of the Bill nor the amendments proposed to them have solved the difficulty. The proposal of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL was to allow of liquidation by arrangement without bankruptcy on the vote of a large proportion of creditors, but only on condition of a cessio bonorum, which would make the arrangement equivalent to bankruptcy in everything but the stigma of the name. If a case occurred in which a valuable business would be sacrificed by a compulsory liquidation, the Bill afforded no opportunity to the creditors to get the benefit of it by continuing the trade under inspection, or by striking a bargain with the bankrupt and his friends to grant a release in consideration of a certain percentage of their claims. The abuses that had attended arrangements of this kind were, it seems, considered (and we are not prepared to say wrongly considered) so flagrant as to outweigh the occasional advantage of such proceedings when conducted with exceptional fairness. The discussion closed with a promise of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL to meet the case if possible by a new clause. It will not be easy to frame an enactment which will reconcile the conflicting views that prevail on the question, or satisfactorily deal with the serious objections either to a system of arrangements at all like that which now exists, or to a Bankruptcy Bill entirely devoid of any such provisions. If inspection and composition deeds can be freed from the frauds which ordinarily taint them, they ought not to be utterly excluded from any system of compulsory liquidation of the affairs of insolvents, and we shall wait with some interest for the clauses by which the ATTORNEY-GENERAL hopes to cleave his way through this formidable obstacle. With or without them, the Bill is a decided advance on any previous measure, and promises to mitigate, if it does not remove, the many defects which have marked every successive stage of our Bankruptcy Law.

THE AGITATION MEETINGS.

IF we have sought in vain, even in the Lords' debate, for an intelligible account of what is meant by the alleged reaction and change of opinion in the country on the Irish Church Bill, it is futile to attempt to discover it in the fervid oratory of the speakers at the monster meetings which are now of daily recurrence. But there are certain facts to face, and to harmonize and account for as we can. Before the General Election the principle of the Government measure was, very distinctly and intelligibly, disestablishment and disendowment. For ourselves, though it is superfluous to go back into such old-world matters, we never concealed the fact that, with the Bishop of ST. DAVID'S of the present time, with Earl RUSSELL and Earl GREY of two or three years ago, with PITT in the old time before us, we should have preferred the statesman's policy of a triple endowment, and, for the matter of that, were it not a sort of contradiction in terms, of a threefold establishment. But let that pass. Mr. GLADSTONE, under whatever influence, pertinaciously resisted the policy of levelling up, chiefly perhaps because it was known to be, to some extent at least, that of his rival, Mr. DISRAELI. Mr. GLADSTONE went to the country on the conjoint and inseparable issue of Disestablishment and Disendowment. And we must say that the Irish Church, by its authorities, played into his hands. The great Dublin Conference would not consent, to use Bishop THIRLWALL'S language, to be an Established Church; they desired to remain the Established Church, or to be extinguished. All or none was their choice. Here at least both parties understood each other; the point itself was of the most primary simplicity—and so was the decision of the country. And where there is reason, or the power of reasoning, in the opponents of Government, this point is at least admitted. The Bishop of PETERBOROUGH himself admits it, and with commendable frankness. He cannot deny that the constituencies expressed themselves with the most indubitable certainty and explicitness on disestablishment. It could not be otherwise. Disestablishment is a single, simple, and unconditioned idea, and admits of no qualifications or modifications. To disestablish can be answered but by a simple Yes or No. One-half of the controversy is therefore got rid of by merely enunciating the terms of the question. Not that the speakers at the meetings have the sense or the honesty in all cases to admit that the voice of the constituencies decided even thus much. It is a curious fact that every one of the speakers who protest against disestablishment either uses the word as equivalent with disendowment, or, in talking against disestablishment, argues against disendowment. The fallacy is an obvious one, and we need not go back to our WHATELY to expose it. However, we may satisfy ourselves that it is not even pretended that the elections have not pronounced very emphatically on disestablishment. "I distinctly recognise the fact that the "nation has pronounced—and I believe irrevocably pronounced—in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish "Church." After this admission of Bishop MAGEE, it is superfluous to pursue the wrangle.

It is granted, then, however unwillingly, that there is no reaction in the country against disestablishment; is there any change in the popular sentiment as regards disendowment? The argument, so far as we can winnow any argument from the rhetorical chaff that is flying about, stands thus:—Mr. GLADSTONE has deceived the country. The Bill is not in accordance with his promises. He promised one thing, he has given us another. He undertook to disendow the Establishment; he is endowing Maynooth. He undertook to take away the property of the Irish Protestant Establishment; under cover of bestowing it on any or every thing except religious institutions, he is in fact giving it to the control of Papist authorities—to Guilds, Confraternities, and Sisterhoods, who must in Ireland have the management directly or indirectly of all these Lunatic and Blind Asylums, and the rest of it. At the elections the constituencies perhaps consented that PAUL should be robbed, but they were not told that PETER was going to be subsidized. The Lord CLAUDS and the Lord GEORGES owe us, what they will not pay, some thanks for putting their argument into an intelligible shape and manageable form, but this must be their meaning. How do we answer them? First, that they cannot show that this distinction between what Mr. GLADSTONE was supposed to have undertaken to do, and what he has done, has possessed itself of the popular mind. Here and there a small Wesleyan says that had he but known that Maynooth was to have its debt forgiven, or to be presented with a lump sum to start with, he would never have sat on the Chelsea or Lambeth Committee which helped to return one of Mr. GLADSTONE'S followers. This only shows that the aforesaid Wesleyan Committeeman could not, or would not, see quite so far as his nose last autumn. But about this notable distinction which is now so clearly seen at the monster meetings, how comes it that it is not seen among the Liberals of the House of Commons? To say that they are so universally blinded, so generally unfaithful to their Protestantism, so bound and manacled by Mr. GLADSTONE, that they cannot see or will not see what is so plain and clear to the Wesleyan and "No Popery" talkers on the platforms, is not to say much for the intelligence either of the senators or of the constituencies who elect them. But this is beside the question. The argument now so clamorously urged requires the production of a large class of politicians, out of Parliament at least, who are in favour of disestablishment, in favour of disendowment, but object to the particular kind of endowment—which we are told is in fact Papal endowment—proposed by Mr. GLADSTONE. This is the class we ask to see in the flesh, to have their names and numbers and personality pointed out. Because it is of no use to talk about reaction and the changed voice of the country, or of those simple souls who never had the issue fairly before them. These are impersonalities. We want to know who is reacting, whose voices are changing, who the men are who have been deceived and taken in by Mr. GLADSTONE. And in answer we get our old friends, who all along and from first to last were opposed to the whole thing—disestablishment, disendowment, and all the rest of it—and who desired the continuance of Protestant ascendency, and in their heart of hearts wanted the repeal of Emancipation, and secretly hankered after the revival of persecution and the Penal Laws. Reaction, therefore, when hunted back to its last earth, means that they who disliked the principles of the proposed Bill last year naturally enough this year dislike those principles when embodied in the terms of an enactment. This is really what the alleged Reaction comes to. So that, after all, the arguments on the monster platforms, when most favourably stated, amount to a strong suggestion for discussing the details of the Bill strictly, and even stringently, in Committee, but, so far as they are sound, also go to the full extent of proving the necessity of giving it a Second Reading.

In what we are saying we by no means admit that there is the shadow of injustice, or the suspicion of favouritism, in the proposed dealing with Maynooth; but we do admit the existence in the country of a headlong No-Popery prejudice; and the fact that there are so many people, to use the expression of one of their own prophets, who "refuse to stand by quietly while Antichrist is robbing "the Established Church," would at least justify the Lords, as it might have justified the Commons, in dealing more generously and liberally with the Establishment in the matter of disendowment. The proposed bonus to Maynooth might justify a larger bonus to the Establishment. If that were the aim of the meetings, as it is the aim of the Bishop of ST. DAVID'S and the Duke of RUTLAND, we should say that such an argument deserves most careful consideration. But unfortunately it is not the tone of the Reactionists and the monster meetings. As before, all or none. It is not that the Presbyterians and the Wesleyans and the Ulsterites love the Establishment much, if they love it at all, but that they hate Popery more. They care nothing, or next to nothing, for Archbishop TRENCH, but they care very much about Cardinal CULLEN. The organists and vergers of Armagh might fast, and fast for ever; but what they grudge is that the Christian Brothers or the Sisters of Charity should have any bread and onions. An appeal, forcible if not quite unanswerable, has been made by such men as the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, the Duke of RICHMOND, and the Bishop of ST. DAVID'S for treating the disendowed Establishment with something more of generosity and liberality; but this is not what the great meetings want. They want Irish Romanism to be proscribed and starved, and, if they dared, openly persecuted and kept down. They object, as they say, to "Maynooth being permanently endowed with "funds taken from a Protestant Church"—this is now the language of the Wesleyan organs; but this is only half the truth. "They have always objected to the Maynooth "Grant," as they add. Here is the real pinch. They are only using the Establishment as their stalking-horse against old game. The worst aspect of the present noisy agitation is that the Irish Church, as it stands, and still more as it will stand as a disestablished community, is likely to be inextricably entangled with a blundering, noisy, turbulent, No-Popery faction. If it is to continue to exist at all, it ought to exhibit distinctive claims on the old solid ground which its best friends claim for it, not as a mere Protestant faction, but as equally removed from Popery and Puritanism. This is just the character which the monster meetings deny to it, and which they seem likely to prevent it from ever developing. If the Irish Established Church is only what its new allies and defenders represent it, it has no raison d'être, it ought to be absorbed by its more energetic sister, as for their own purposes they call it—the Presbyterianism of Ulster and Aughrim and the Boyne. And the chances of its coming to this are not likely to be decreased when it comes to be only a voluntary institution.

THE LIFE ASSURANCE BILL.

THE enormous frauds committed by so many of the managing bodies of Joint-stock Companies have again and again suggested the remedy of a compulsory system of returns. Already the existing law has a multitude of provisions directed to the object of making wilful fraud and concealed insolvency impossible in these cases, but little success has hitherto attended these laudable attempts. The ingenuity of the framers of Acts of Parliament has been baffled by the greater ingenuity of the conductors of bubble Companies. One more effort is now being made to enforce honesty by legislative provisions. A Bill is passing through Parliament the purpose of which is to enable assurers to know whether the Company which they trust with their premiums is likely to redeem its promises, and to pay the sum assured when the contingency of death arrives. If there is any class of Companies to which stringent regulations ought to be applied, it is to Insurance Offices. From the nature of their business they are necessarily paid in advance, and the answer to the all-important question whether is it safe to rely on the solvency and honesty of those who undertake to provide for the needs occasioned by the death of the assured, rests at present upon little else than general reputation. And the mischief is fearfully aggravated by the fact that an insurance office may be really insolvent and incapable of meeting the liabilities hanging over it, and yet go on for many years with an abundance of ready cash at command. For the first twenty years of its existence any insurance office which has a moderate amount of business must be receiving in premiums far more than it has to pay in losses, and the semblance of solvency may be kept up long after it has become certain, to all who are in the secret, that there is no chance of its engagements being ultimately kept. It is only after a long existence that the ratio of losses to premiums attains its normal amount; and when the insufficiency of the assets is at last disclosed, it is too late to save some thousands of victims who have entrusted the office with the most important investments they can be called upon to make. Nor is this postponement of liability the only thing which cloaks the insolvency of many assurance offices. Their whole system of accounts is based upon the estimates of actuaries, and there is nothing more unsound than the principle on which too many of these officers calculate the assets at their command. Future business is assumed to supply the means of covering expenses properly chargeable against the assets actually realized, and statements of profits are often put forth which have no foundation but the hope of future prosperity. That these are not imaginary evils has been unfortunately demonstrated by the number of Companies of this description which have been wound up by the Court of Chancery; and all the reputable and established offices must be quite as anxious as Parliament or their customers can be to enable the world to distinguish between offices which really assure, and offices whose function is limited for the most part to the receipt of premiums. Probably very few even of those who were well informed on the matter were prepared for such a return as has recently been made to the House of Commons on this subject. In the last twenty-five years 272 Insurance Companies have been formed. Of these more than half (152) have been wound up or have discontinued business, and the cessation of business means, of course, the non-payment of policies. Besides these, 44 more have been absorbed by other offices, leaving only 76 out of 272 still subsisting as independent Companies. Nor is this perhaps the whole of the dismal story. The proportion of Companies formed before 1862 which have broken down is 85 per cent., while of the more recent Companies only 53 per cent. have as yet come to grief. Of course the older Companies have lived long enough to reach the period of trial, but it cannot yet be said that those formed under the Act of 1862 will ultimately show a better percentage, though any one who is so minded may indulge the hope that recent Companies are more prudent and honest than those of twenty years ago.

Whether the Bill which has been introduced will suffice to cope with this serious evil may, by the light of past experience, seem doubtful, but no one can question the importance of the object which it has in view, or the zeal with which its framers have sought to ensure success. No measure approaching this in its searching stringency has ever been proposed, and, though it may possibly raise objections in the minds of economists of the laissez faire school, we have seen enough in the last few years of the policy of letting dishonesty alone, to justify almost any interference, which promises to check the tide. Returns, in forms which appear to exclude the possibility of evasion, are proposed to be annually required from every Life Assurance Company. If the forms given in the schedule of the Act are found to be insufficient to elicit the requisite information in the case of Companies doing special business, the Board of Trade is empowered (though only with the consent of the Company concerned) to alter them so as to make them more effective in carrying out the objects of the Act. If the returns are false in any particular to the knowledge of any one who signs them, the offence is to be punished by fine and imprisonment. In addition to this the Board of Trade is authorized on the requisition of twenty or more policy-holders of three years' standing for amounts not less in the aggregate than 20,000*l.*, to direct an examination into the affairs of a Company. Probably the Board of Trade will in this matter do nothing, with its accustomed energy. Still these provisions are on the face of them sufficiently stringent, and though it is impossible to gauge beforehand the powers of evasion which necessity may develop in Boards of Directors, we are bound to say that, short of absolute falsehood involving penal consequences, we cannot see how a Company can under the proposed system contrive to misrepresent its position. The first return is to state the income and expenditure of the past year, showing the balance at starting, the premiums on policies, the consideration received for the grant of annuities, the income from invested funds, and the aggregate receipts from all other sources. On the other side are to be given the claims under policies, the payments for annuities, commission and management expenses, the dividends and bonuses which may have been paid, and a list of all miscellaneous payments on other accounts. A second account is to be the balance-sheet up to the date of the return, and it is so framed as to include among the assets only sums actually due, without any entry for prospective and contingent premiums, unless the Directors have the hardihood to include this, which is often the most imposing item to their credit, under the entry of "other assets to be specified." On the other side of the balance-sheet the prospective liabilities for future deaths are equally excluded, so that the Companies will not be compelled to disclose in their annual accounts the possible discrepancy between the amount of the liabilities which they have undertaken and the assets on which they can depend to meet them. This of course is the most essential point of all, and, if it were not provided for, the official accounts would be quite as likely to mislead as to protect assurers. But this matter has not escaped the attention of the framers of the Bill. It seems, perhaps with reason, to have been thought oppressive to require an actuarial estimate of this character to be made every year; but once in five years in the case of future Companies, and once in ten years in the case of existing Companies, an actuary's report is to be made in the form prescribed by the Act. There is no provision as to the time when the first of these reports is to be made, and it would be a very beneficial amendment to require all Companies to comply with the regulation within a year after the passing of the Act. The interval of ten years allowed to existing Companies between successive returns is moreover unreasonably long, as no well-conducted Company ever fails to prepare such statements for its own use much more frequently than the Act would require it to be done. Under the clauses as they stand, an existing Company which is now hopelessly insolvent might go on increasing its liabilities for ten years more without ever disclosing its real position, and unless this clause is made somewhat more severe all the immediate benefit of the measure will be lost. If this defect is corrected, the actuarial returns, though they may possibly be so framed as to deceive the uninformed public, will be in a shape to enable any one who is familiar with accounts of this description to ascertain with certainty the solvency of the Company. Nothing is easier than to estimate the value of a mass of existing policies, subject to a certain small margin of error for bad selection of lives; and if sound life-tables are used, and a proper rate of interest taken, the present value of the policies of an office can be calculated with sufficient nicety. But then, in order that these policies may realize their calculated value, the office must be kept open at a certain annual outlay for management expenses, and it is a common practice with some accommodating actuaries (and the weak offices know well where to find them) to make little or no allowance for these expenses, on the assumption that they will be covered (as they may or may not be) by the profits of future business. In other words, the goodwill of the trade is brought in as an actual asset, and the result is falsified accordingly. To guard against this and similar devices, the Bill requires the actuary to state the principle on which he has worked out his results, what tables of mortality he uses, what rate of interest he assumes, and how he deals with future expenses. With these data honestly given, the returns will speak for themselves, and no ingenuity will enable a Company to conceal from skilled critics of its accounts the insolvency which may be its real condition. The schedules of forms have throughout been framed with the utmost care, and, difficult as it is to foresee the length to which evasion may be carried, we cannot feel much doubt that, with the slight alterations we have suggested, the Bill may turn out to be a genuine protection to a class (if assurers can be called a mere class) who have been more cruelly plundered than any other section of the community. We trust that the Bill may gain rather than lose in efficiency in its further progress through the Legislature; and we are satisfied that, if it does, it will conduce to the benefit of the many sound offices no less than to that of the public.

THE LIBERAL CATHOLICS OF GERMANY.

WE have lately given our readers an account of some remarkable articles which appeared three months ago in the Allgemeine Zeitung on the subject of the approaching Œcumenical Council. The writer explained with admirable clearness and precision the programme of the Ultramontane party, as it may be gathered from their chosen organ, the Roman Civiltà, and the inevitable results of their anticipated triumph. But he implied throughout that this triumph could not be achieved without strenuous opposition, though it seemed as if the weight of authority would preponderate on the side of the extreme Romanizers; and he especially insisted that the great body of German Catholics would feel such a result of the Council as an outrage on their deepest convictions of truth. No one who has any acquaintance with the recent intellectual history of Germany, and the present position of rival schools of religious thought in that country, could doubt that he was right. Between the leading minds of German Catholicism and those whose policy is represented by the Congregation of the Index, and freely uttered in the columns of the Civiltà, there is a great gulf fixed. But for a long time past the large party of what, for want of a better name, we may call without offence Liberal Catholics, have, with individual exceptions here and there which stand out in honourable isolation, been slow to give open utterance to their thoughts. They seem to have felt that it was almost hopeless, in the present temper of the dominant section of their co-religionists, to attempt to gain a hearing, and they have probably been confirmed in that impression by the torrent of rabid abuse which has overwhelmed the bolder few who have dared to call their souls their own. It was obvious, however, that, as a question of prudence, this reticence must have its limits, unless Catholicism and Ultramontanism were to be suffered to become convertible terms. Another proclamation of the Council, followed up as it has been by open-mouthed announcements of the uses to which they wished to put it from those who are supposed to have the Pope's ear, constitutes a crisis whereby the thoughts of many hearts seem likely to be revealed. At all events, the statements of the writer in the Allgemeine, already referred to, as to the mental attitude of his Catholic countrymen, have already received a striking confirmation in the columns of the same journal. A long address to the Bishop of Trèves, issued by a body of "orthodox but educated Catholics" at Coblentz, which is being largely signed by laymen of character and position in the diocese, is now before us. It contains, on the one hand, a vigorous protest against the leading principles of Ultramontane theology, while, on the other hand, it is an indignant assertion of the equal claims of the protesters to be regarded as good Catholics with those who are never weary of stigmatizing them as virtual apostates from the faith. Considering how very seldom any other aspect of Roman Catholic opinion is openly exhibited in this country than that of which Archbishop Manning and the Dublin Review are representatives, our readers may be interested to hear something of the views of a very different school as embodied in a document which they have themselves put before the world. There are of course many Englishmen to whom Popery is Popery, and who cannot see much difference between one Papist and another. But, to those who look a little further below the surface of things than Mr. Colquhoun and Lord Shaftesbury, the contrast between such a belief as that expressed in the address of the Catholics of Trèves and the current theology of Roman Catholic periodicals—for they are all now in the hands of the same party—in England, will probably appear not undeserving of notice.

The Address opens by assuring the Bishop of the profound sense of conscientious duty which has constrained the subscribers to make this public declaration of their sentiments, and the more so as he had himself observed in a recent Pastoral that, while bishops alone would have, as successors of the Apostles, the right of voting in the Council, all members of the Church, laity as well as clergy, would have a claim to be heard, and their experience and judgment would naturally exercise a weighty influence on its decisions. There is, they add, a considerable party in the Church whose leaders are not bishops, but laymen and members of religious orders, who are straining every nerve to give the future Council a particular direction after their own mind. And these men not only identify their own wishes and pet theories with the faith and needs of the Church, but denounce all who decline to accept their opinions as dogmas as "Liberal," in contradistinction to "real" (eigentlichen), Catholics. They have an organ in the Roman Civiltà Cattolica, where they ventilate their views, which are again copied thence into the newspapers conducted by members of religious orders in Germany. The passage we quoted from the Civiltà in a former article is then given, stating the desire of all true Catholics for the definition of Papal infallibility and the bodily assumption of the Virgin. And they point out that the importance of these statements lies in the fact of their occurring, not in an ordinary and unofficial newspaper, but in what claims to be a special organ of the Holy See, and is known to express the aims of a great and powerful organization (the Jesuits). Under such circumstances, it would be impossible for those who believe themselves to be no less true children of the Church than their opponents to pass over in silence the proclamation of principles which they regard as erroneous and fraught with the gravest danger. They feel bound to come forward and solemnly assure their Bishop that they "do not share these views, hopes, and wishes of the self-styled true Catholics, on the contrary, they are most decisively opposed to them." Their gratitude to the Holy Father for summoning the Council rests on very different grounds, which they proceed to explain. On looking, they observe, at the present condition of Christendom, we do not see the upgrowth of any specific heresy such as led earlier Councils to define the doctrine of the Church. The infidelity of our own day rests on philosophical opinions the falsehood of which has long since been clearly shown by reference to the great Christian verities, and union with our divided Christian brethren would hardly be facilitated by increasing the number of doctrinal definitions which divide us. The needs of our own time are of a different sort, and the inexhaustible resources of the Church are equal to coping with them. They are such as these—"the liberation of the Church from State control, the restoration of an independent and harmonious movement of the two orders (natural and supernatural) in which, according to God's will, the life of man develops itself, the organic regulation of the part to be taken by the faithful in matters of Church life, the reconciliation of our separated brethren to the Church, the overcoming of social distress, the ascertainment of the true attitude of the clergy and of individual Christians to general cultivation and to science"; those are the crying religious needs of the present, and we look, add the memorialists, for a solution to a Council inspired by the intelligence of the whole Church, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. It will hardly be possible for the General Council to enter on all these points; much must be left for the separate branches of the Church to develop for themselves. But it would be a matter of sincere congratulation if the Council should give new life to the common organization of the Church by restoring everywhere the regular action of national, provincial, and diocesan synods which has lain in abeyance for centuries. Such synods, when their decrees have been based on free and searching deliberations, and adapted to the requirements of real life, have always been most serviceable to the interests of the Church.

If we turn to the relations of Church and State, and the for conditions of modern society, it seems to the framers of the Address to be of the last importance, for the freedom and independence of the Church, that the Council should unmistakeably proclaim her sincere abandonment of all desire for a return to mediæval systems. The State, no doubt, has a religious basis, for all authority is based on the recognition of a living personal God, but its sphere is limited by the obligations of the natural and moral law, and that State is most truly Christian which accepts the limitation, and gives full liberty and protection in spiritual matters to the Church and the separated religious bodies which are content to respect its authority within its own domain. The Address proceeds to notice the relations of clergy and laity, and strongly deprecates any weakening of the bond of sympathy between them based on a common education. This is of course a protest against the policy of the German Jesuits in substituting theological seminaries for the training of the Universities. "A narrowing of theological education, and exclusion of theologians from the studies which lead to the original sources of faith and Church development, would be a grievous injury to the ecclesiastical culture and life." These matters are best left to the jurisdiction of national synods. The dangers which threaten the Church from the side of infidelity and the social necessities of the time are an urgent call for the closest union between pastors and their flocks, and hence "an organic association of the laity with the Christian and social life of their parish" is imperatively required. These considerations are strengthened by a reference to the ardent desire which animates the Pope, the Episcopate, and all the faithful, especially in Germany, for the reunion of the Protestant Confessions with the Church. For this desire can never be realized till the most decided steps are taken to disabuse Protestants of the prejudices and mistrust they feel towards their Catholic brethren. And, it is urged, how many of their prejudices would vanish if they saw the Church again quickened by a true corporate life, meeting the social wants of Christendom, and thus learnt to forget their suspicions of a grasping and tyrannical hierarchy seeking dominion over the purses and the souls of its people.

The Address here turns to "another weighty question," namely, the Index Librorum prohibitorum, and the attitude of the modern Church towards intellect. It is fully admitted that the ecclesiastical authorities have the duty of watching over purity of faith; but then it is added that the present practice of the Index in putting books supposed to contain some error into a condemned catalogue, and forbidding the faithful to read them without express permission, in no wise subserves that duty, while it is consistent neither with the dignity of the Church nor with the advance of knowledge. It wholly fails of its purpose, because it is impossible to classify all erroneous writings, the censure depending on the accident of somebody denouncing them; because the authors or books are condemned without specifying the particular error, so that no one is the wiser for the sentence; and, lastly, because the great majority of educated Catholics, as is notorious, neither can nor do pay any attention to it. It is inconsistent with the dignity and spirit of the Church, because good Catholics who, with the best intentions, have unwittingly fallen into some error, or have given offence at Rome without any error at all, are put into the same category with authors of the most scandalous works, and branded with a stigma, while they really deserve the thanks both of the Church and of science. It is injurious to the advance of knowledge, because the fear of having one's good name blasted by condemnation for [illegible] accidental slip, or perhaps through the officiousness of a theological opponent, presses like a leaden weight on the investigations of Catholic students. These objections might of course be copiously illustrated from the recent history of German literature, but the memorialists wisely confine themselves to a general statement of principles, adding, "We therefore entertain the hope that the approaching General Council will abolish the Index." The Address concludes in the following words:—

> These are the wishes our conscience constrains us to express. We think they have as good a claim to be heard as those of the other party. A sense of duty has led us to come forward with our names, quickened, on the one hand, by perceiving the widespread disgust excited in Catholic circles by the utterances of the Civiltà, on the other, by the deplorable timidity which keeps so many silent who ought to speak out. The unhappy schism of the sixteenth century was immediately preceded by a General Council, without its exercising any favourable influence on the result. If the Christian peoples of our own day are really to be won to the Church by this Council, the teaching and ruling Church must not be left to rest on the magisterial and one-sided dicta of a party, but be thoroughly informed as to the true state of men's minds by open and clear avowals, and thus put in a position to meet the real requirements of the time. And we, who, as true sons of the Church, are resolved to live and die in communion with her and the See of Rome, which is our centre, and in filial obedience to your Lordship as our Bishop, have felt it a sacred duty to contribute to the best of our ability towards this end.

It is not necessary to offer any long comments of our own on this remarkable document. Our main object has been to bring under the notice of our readers a powerful and growing phase of Roman Catholic opinion, which to many of those who are not familiar with the subject will perhaps be new. That the present Address emanates from only one diocese is true, but there can be no doubt that it strikes a chord which will reverberate through Catholic Germany, and find [illegible]ponse in the convictions of a large portion, probably a large majority, of the clergy, though, for obvious reasons of prudence, it is only signed by laymen. Two things will occur to every reader on the surface of the document—its studied moderation of tone, and the incisive clearness with which it negatives all the characteristic points of the Ultramontane programme. That the party of the Civiltà will be able to carry through their policy at the Council in the face of so strenuous and intelligent an opposition, supposing—as there seems good reason to suppose—that the German bishops are in harmony, as a body, with the sentiments of their people, is hardly conceivable. In any case it would be difficult to overrate the significance, for the future of the Roman Catholic Church, of the trial of strength which is imminent between the two parties within her pale. At a critical moment in her history Ultramontanism has put forward its extremest pretensions with a hitherto unexampled audacity, and with the avowed object of enforcing them on infallible authority upon all who profess her creed. Should the attempt be foiled, it must be long indeed before the party can recover from the effects of what could only escape being a fatal blunder by proving itself a

SPITE.

THE idea of malice occupies the mind long before the word, in all its terrors, is familiar. "'You did it on purpose,' whines the fretful child" under loss or vexation, experiencing at once an added bitterness and a sense of dignity in being the object of malignant design; and henceforth he realizes himself more distinctly as a citizen of the world, a sharer in its trials, already an object of spite, one that will in due time have enemies, who, if he fails, will be the cause of his failure. There are few people who, when things go wrong with them, do not attribute more than is probable to active ill-will on the part of others. Malice is no doubt a power in the world. To work towards a neighbour's downfall, for the disinterested satisfaction of seeing him fall, is the occupation of some persons; but such a solution of ordinary difficulties amongst ordinary people is seldom necessary in civilized society. Persons guilty of the tragic forms of malice are the highest or the lowest among men; on the one hand, kings and conquerors, statesmen pitted against one another at a crisis, heads of factions who must crush one another with a plot; on the other hand, the clown pulling up his parson's tulips or firing his neighbour's stackyard, the operative scarring the pretty jilt's face with vitriol, or blowing up the non-unionist's house and household. People's attention must be fixed long on a single object, their passions concentrated, their thoughts restricted to a narrow circle, for malice to achieve its triumphs, just as venom intensifies itself in dark holes and obscure corners among ruins and waste places of the earth. In the freer currents of social life, where there is a wide choice of interests and associates, where circumstances combine against the unwholesome fascination of antipathies, human nature is spared these temptations. Nor has it the needful strength and courage. Malice of the broad typical quality does not consist in mere malignity; there must be active mischief, a more than willingness to lend a helping hand. Like Thersites, "it will learn to conjure and raise devils, but it will see some issue of its spiteful execrations." And the opportunity to do mischief, vigilantly watched for, generally presents itself; but this watchfulness men are deterred from, if by no higher motive, by superstition, which reminds them that it is safest not to give the reins to ill-judging. Vindictive persons, says Bacon, live the life of witches, who, as they are mischievous, so end they unfortunate. And we see that it is so. There is the feeling that ill-wishes recoil, that our own good things are imperilled if we seriously set about diminishing our neighbour's stock, hence people are amiable in proportion to the interest they have in things remaining smooth and comfortable. Malice does not pay to common people; it is only magnificos and such great folks who find it the one lasting pleasure of life.

But society finds a substitute for malice—a domestic, creditable, neighbourly form of the great vice—in spite. We scruple to call anybody malicious except in history or the newspapers, but with spite we are on more familiar terms. We see traces of it on the faces of some of our acquaintances, in the speech of others, in the actions of some few; nay, we may even detect some grains (when sorely tried) in ourselves, if we are curious in our investigations. Spite does not care to ruin anybody; only it is apt to reverse the apostolic precept, and most especially makes no hand at rejoicing with those that rejoice. It draws unflattered portraits; it picks holes; it finds self-compensation in the misfortune of others. For here, again, it does not do to define spite as mere ill-wishing, even in its most trifling and restricted form, unless action comes in. Narrow sympathies are perpetually immersed in barren discontent with what interferes with one's own convenience—discontent which issues in positive gratification where another's pain brings relief to self. There are many worthy people, devoted to those nearest to them, helpful to their immediate surroundings, who will take cheerfully as a gift of Providence the news of a distant acquaintance's broken limb or fallen fortunes, if these disasters save them from an unwelcome guest or from the derangement of summer plans. In fact, most persons are made so. It is a sign of peculiar sweetness and nobleness of nature when it is otherwise. Yet we deny that these defective sympathies are spiteful, because their satisfaction arises solely from one's own relief, and not from another's pain; such people would be even better pleased if another's good fortune, rather than his ill luck, had delivered them from a quandary.

There are people distinct from these, who do like mischief for its own sake—people who are companionable, who have their good moral points, but who, as we often observe, seem to be not only indifferent to the evil which occurs to others, but actually pleased to find themselves the cause of transient human suffering. They like to abash sensitiveness, and exercise ingenuity to bring this about; when the humour is on them, they say things for the mere pleasure of giving pain, probing a wound, and curiously watching the deportment of the sufferer. There are many more who entertain a sort of general spite against humanity, and enjoy its smaller humiliations, losses, and vexations, who see something ludicrous in everything that alarms, disconcerts, and exposes, as though wit lay in the fact of one person being vexed while another looks on, to whom your being too late for the train, or breaking your horse's knees, or being put out of countenance, are exhilarating circumstances, although they are in no way benefited by your discomfiture; who from their own snug shelter will enjoy the spectacle of a wet, dripping holiday, when weeks of eager anticipation issue in the damp wretchedness of plodding thousands. This pleasure in witnessing disappointment is especially the diversion of spoiled and pampered youth, which has not yet realized the possibility that its own turn may come, and looks upon all misfortune, great and small, in the light of a spectacle in which it has no other concern than as spectator. Time bringing coward fears, if nothing better, does much of itself to cure this heedless and hardhearted malice. The smooth brow and rounded contour which told nothing of what passed within become vehicles of softer expression from the mere encounter with inevitable sorrow, the countenance which before was merely impassive catches the gift of pity, though self may still have the greatest share of it. But if otherwise, if the malice is anything more than thoughtlessness, then spite imprints a mark on the features which says more plainly than any other vice, Beware! For spite, even where it wishes no great ill and is kept in check by conscience, even where it consists in the mere soupçon of malevolence, is absorbing. It broods, and thus the features are moulded into a sympathy with the inner mind which no temporary transient misdoing imparts to them. It prompts thought to dwell most on what it hates or dislikes most, it dominates over reverie.

Happily, however, these are not common physiognomies. That particular malevolent cast of eye and twist of lip are distinctive marks as rare as, on the other hand, are natures that are wholly foreign to some touch of the infirmity. Some few persons we may all know so free from this gall of bitterness as not only never to our knowledge to have said an ill-natured thing or betrayed a spiteful bias, but of whom we are confident that such a thing never happens either in sport or under provocation; who never teased even in boyhood; for teasing is the domestic form of the vice which should touch the consciences of the majority. Teasing is undoubtedly a malicious practice where it inflicts annoyance designedly, though it may not be recognised as such because it constantly goes with liking, and is agreeable to the teaser in proportion to his interest in or attachment to his object. A pet son will tease his mother; a brother will tease his idolizing sisters, with the intention of vexing them, and will not stop till he has succeeded; yet all the while the entire party live in habitual ignorance of the motive at work, in a satisfied understanding that this is a sign of affection, and that the pain of the process is undesigned or inevitable; just as it was generally taken for granted that Tom Tulliver was fond of animals because he liked to throw stones at them. In some aspects of family life the illusion can scarcely be more than one-sided; but there can be no doubt that the bullying elder brother who torments his junior, finding the process more amusing with him than with a stranger, supposes in himself a fraternal fondness. Social as opposed to domestic teasing can hardly be wholly unconscious, but it is assumed to be legitimate—a necessary stimulant to the intercourse of friends, or a means of turning ill-humour to account. Thus Swift reports complacently to Stella how he had teased Prior the evening before because he himself was not in force:—"I dined with Mr. Harley, and came away at six. There was much company, and I was not merry at all. Mr Harley made me read a paper of verses of Prior's. I read them plain, without any fine manner. Prior swore I should never read any of his again, that he would be revenged, and read some of mine as bad. I excused myself, and said I was famous for reading verses the worst in the world." Of course this would be as good as a play to the bystanders, especially as there are two courses open to the victim of spite—the natural and the dignified; and curiosity is awakened. Prior may have done wisely to defend his verses at the expense of his temper, but he not the less followed nature's impulse and made the desired sport. When Lord Chesterfield warns his son against wit, the spitefulness which was then its social garb was probably in his mind. "A wit," he says, "is a very unpopular denomination, as it carries terror along with it, and people in general are as much afraid of a live wit in company as a woman is of a gun that she thinks may go off of itself."

All persons who for any reason preferred a quiet life had in those days to use much the same argument against the loud social aggressions of spite. Thus Barrow on the malignity of so-called zeal:—"A quiet sectary doth to most men's fancy appear more lovely than he that is furiously and factiously orthodox." In fact, wit was not wit without a dash of spite.

> Spiteful he w[...], though he wrote [...],

and we are led to suppose that not only in books, but face to face, the science of provocation was carried to its highest pitch of spitefulness, and that the teasing was of that rough order described as "unflinching frankness." And this is the most piquant form of joke still to a public-house audience, who like to hear an unpopular member reminded that "there's things folks 'ud pay to be rid on besides vermin." We would fain hope that such pleasantries are confined in our day to boors, but fiction is at pains to assure us that the drawing-rooms of fashionable life still echo to similar utterances. Novels which profess to represent the manners of society amaze us constantly with these complacent pictures of vulgar spite. It was only the other day that we met with a heroine who, feeling herself "sat upon" by three elderly ladies at an evening party, chose to mistake one of them for a man, looking her in the face as she did so, to pity another for the chill of her low dress, as she must be seventy years of age, and to talk at the third with such malignant point that her victim was driven from the field, leaving her witty opponent victorious, and receiving the congratulations of an eager circle of observers.

It is a testimony to the self-control which civilization confers that spite is not the universal salt of conversation which all literature represents it to be. The fact is that tone and manner can convey the shades of ill-will much more delicately than most pens. If we are not intrinsically more amiable than our forefathers, we have at least found out this more refined method of annoyance. People used to be thick-skinned, and could give and take in a way which would now be extermination. Uncivil things may be so curiously concealed and wrapped up that it is only when too late that the point is detected, and the retort which springs to the dawning intelligence dies in its birth. It is by such arts that the cynical member of polite circles knows how to keep his hold of intercourse with sensitive persons whom it amuses him to irritate. Courtesy, the show of pleasing, cannot be dispensed with in decent society, whatever novelists may say. Dr. Johnson must have mended his manners, must have suppressed many a sneer and ugly spiteful snub, had he lived in these days, and of course he would have mended them. Now, perhaps, the most effective theatres for such performances are the hustings for vulgar spite, and the House of Commons for refined exquisite malice. People may be civil to one another at home, without the assistance of Christian charity, when they have elsewhere a fitting arena for their spleen, and an antagonist at once worthy of their wit, and sensitive to its stabs. We hear of old maids and tea-tables, we see calm private spite now and then setting itself to some long-planned attack. But what can match in venom the scene when Greek meets Greek in the crisis of debate, when courtesies are flung aside, pungent recriminations take their place, and personalities set in." Then on either side quickened memory from "hiding-places ten years deep" drags forth the damaging fact, the broken pledge, the fatal periods of youth's heedless rhetoric. Then the blunders of a life are set in the glare of five hundred pair of eyes, exposed as a folly, magnified into a crime. And always the practised hand strikes where the nerves are most sensitive, the vigilant eye notes how each stroke tells, and gleams the keener as anguish betrays itself, while, in rapture's sympathy, "the many rend the skies in loud applause."

SPIRITUAL PHOTOGRAPHY.

THE Mayor of New York seems to suffer, like our own magistrates, under the affliction of being called upon to give advice. We read that a young man from the country, suspecting that he had been imposed upon by an artist of the town, went before the Mayor, and propounded to him this question, "Two men what ain't no relations can't have the same grandmother, can they?" The Mayor endeavoured to avoid answering, but the countryman was not to be put aside. He had gone to a person named Mumler, who practised in New York as a "spiritual photographer," and had paid him ten dollars for a portrait of his deceased grandmother. He was so much gratified with this work of art that he returned to Mumler's shop to order a portrait of another deceased relation, but he encountered at the door a man who was affectionately contemplating the features of his grandmother, which had just been produced by the same process and at the same price. The countryman found to his astonishment and disgust that not only the process and the price, but the features in the two portraits, were the same. Now we are quite aware that a man cannot marry his grandmother, and therefore the possessors of two shadowy likenesses of what appeared to be the same lady could hardly be regarded as rival candidates for her favour. We should not apprehend that what is usually called "a difficulty" would arise out of this competition for a grandmother, but we certainly had supposed that the only common relation of all men was an uncle, and it is rather aggravating to find that any man who happens to have ten dollars in his pocket, be he good-looking or ugly, genteel or snobbish, may make himself appear to be a member of one's family. The doctrine of universal brotherhood, however beautiful in theory, requires considerable limitation before it can be reduced to practice. The aggrieved countryman having stated his complaint, the Mayor expressed an unqualified opinion that Mr. Mumler's proceeding was a "swindle," and he directed a functionary who bears the formidable title of Marshal Tooker to visit Mr. Mumler's shop, and desire to be supplied with a spiritual photograph of the Marshal's father-in-law, who is yet alive. Mr. Mumler furnished the required portrait, and thereupon Marshal Tooker took him as a cheat and brought him before the Mayor. Mr Mumler, however, was not deserted in this emergency by his admirers, for in the number of the New York Tribune which notices his arrest we find a letter of a correspondent which declares him to be "a true man, a noble and beautiful specimen of our race," and as much above trickery or swindling as the editor of the Tribune is above picking pockets. The writer goes on to declare that the portraits of our grandmothers are "holy revelations," and that Mr. Mumler is "an instrument in the power of the honourable dead"—a statement which seems to have been made in oblivion of the fact that the father-in-law of Marshal Tooker is alive.

The examination of Mr. Mumler on this charge lasted several days, and was conducted with that latitude of evidence and exuberance of oratory which marks legal proceedings in America, especially when the public takes strong interest in them. The devotees of spiritualism rallied in support of Mr. Mumler, and Judge Edmonds, who is an enthusiastic believer in this new religion, testified that during the pendency in Court of an action upon a life policy, he had seen the ghost of the insured dimly hovering behind the back row of seats, and watching the trial of the question whether he committed suicide. It would be highly convenient, in an intricate discussion on the construction of a will, if the testator in the cause could be persuaded to appear and explain his meaning; and as every other point in connexion with our proposed Law Courts has been discussed, it may perhaps be worth while to consider which of the two sites is most convenient for communication with the world of spirits. But to return to New York. We cannot help thinking that a judge would do wisely to keep away from spiritual photographers, because the revelations which they are able to make may possibly prove embarrassing. It does not clearly appear whether these artists undertake to produce only spiritual photographs of deceased persons, for an assistant of Mr. Mumler swore that he told Marshal Tooker that the face dimly seen in the corner of the Marshal's own photograph would be that "of the person most in sympathy with him"—a description which hardly suits a father-in-law, and would be totally inapplicable to a mother-in-law. The Judge enjoys a wider range of sympathy than the Marshal, for he was twice photographed by Mr. Mumler, and on each occasion there appeared in the corner of the picture "a dim outline of a female face, sufficiently distinct, however, to show that the lady was very beautiful." The reporter goes on to remark that spiritual manifestations must have abounded on that occasion, for the faces were entirely different, although both were charmingly pretty. We cannot help thinking that even a Lord Chancellor, who is above all other Judges, and therefore is entitled to larger privileges, would feel that the number of charmingly pretty women who are competing for the honour of being most in sympathy with him must have its limit, and this feeling would perhaps remain even if he had the same offer as was made to Judge Edmonds, of an allowance if a quantity should be taken. The Judge stated that he was charged ten dollars for the first sitting, and only five dollars afterwards. The Judge further stated that he had resolved never to form an opinion without knowledge, for whenever he had done so "he had made an ass of himself." But he expressed the opinion that spirits have so much materiality as to be visible to the human eye, and this opinion was founded on knowledge, for he had seen in Court the spirit of a man whose death was the basis of a suit, and had been told by the spirit that the man had committed suicide. The first spirit he ever saw was that of Judge Talmage, who was leaning against a window-casement, and he saw the window-casement plainly through the body of his learned brother. Another witness produced a spiritual photograph which he had had done by Mr. Mumler. His own likeness was good, but the person most in sympathy with him was so shadowy as to be unrecognisable. After discussion, however, in Court, it was agreed that the face resembled that of Judge Dowling (who was hearing the case), only it was better-looking. We have heard nothing like this since an English Judge asked a shoemaker whether a certain pair of shoes were more fashionable than the Judge's own, and was answered, "Oh yes, my Lord, much more fashionable than those."

The celebrated Barnum was called among other witnesses for the prosecution, and he stated that he had devoted a portion of his life to the detection of humbugs. About seven years ago Mr. Barnum was composing a book on humbugs, and he wrote to Mr. Mumler that he wished to purchase specimens of his so-called spirit photographs for the Museum of humbugs established by him, Barnum. Spirit photographs were accordingly supplied by Mr. Mumler at two dollars apiece, and they were hung by Mr. Barnum on the walls of his Museum for three or four years. Among them were spirit photographs of Napoleon Bonaparte and Henry Clay, and the positions of the figures were exactly like the well-known engravings of these personages. The title of Mr. Barnum's book was The Humbugs of the World. All the chapter relating to spirit photographs referred to Mr. Mumler, who does not seem to have objected to the celebrity thus bestowed upon him. The spirit photographs which were hung upon the walls of Mr. Barnum's Museum were labelled "humbug," and the compliment thus conveyed was not repudiated by Mr. Mumler. It was attempted in cross-examination to obtain from Mr. Barnum an admission that he was himself a practitioner in the same line as Mr. Mumler, but Mr. Barnum treated the epithets "cheat" and "swindler" as wholly inapplicable to his own proceedings. He said that he had never been in any humbug business where he did not give value for the money. The woolly horse was a remarkable reality and curiosity. It was not a horse "woolled over," but was born exactly as it was exhibited. As regards the mermaid, Mr. Barnum only said that it was represented to the public exactly as it was represented to him, and we should like to know what Mr. Barnum was expected to say more. He never had reason to doubt that it was what he represented, nor could he have had reason unless he had entered upon a delicate and difficult investigation. We have heard that there was once exhibited in this country a merman who was declared by an Irishman who visited him to be a countryman of his own. But Mr. Barnum, so far as we know, had never heard that his mermaid was not a daughter of the sea. Among a people so polite as the Americans, it would be intolerable that the fair stranger should be troubled with questions as to her birth, parentage, or the reality of her scales and tail. You might just as well ask a lady whom you met in society as to the reality of her complexion or her hair. Mr. Barnum was not bound to put impertinent questions to the mermaid, and indeed we may go further and say that he was bound not to put them. When, therefore, it was proposed by counsel to ask Mr. Barnum whether the mermaid was precisely the same as he had represented, the presiding Judge properly ruled that this question could not be put. For how could Mr. Barnum have answered it if it had been put? He did, indeed, state positively that the horse was not "woolled over"; but he could scarcely state, except as matter of hearsay or belief, that the mermaid was not scaled over, and neither hearsay nor belief are admissible in a court of law. The Judge must reject what is called secondary evidence; but if the mermaid had returned to her watery or other home, it was no longer possible to investigate the reality of her tail. Mr. Barnum, being further asked whether he had ever taken money for the exhibition of spurious curiosities, admitted that he might have given the public "a little drapery" sometimes; but we feel tolerably certain that he gave no drapery in the instance of the mermaid. Mr. Barnum had doubtless learned to repress curiosity at an early period in his successful life; and therefore, when he bought the nurse of George Washington, and paid one thousand dollars for her, it was remote from his thoughts to inquire how old she was. To ask a female her age is as impertinent as to ask whether her head or her tail is real, and Mr. Barnum is a well-bred man. The statement in the bill of sale that this woman had nursed George Washington had never been disproved, and Mr. Barnum had accepted it, and bought the woman at the price put upon her by her owner. Mr. Barnum says, indeed, that "before she got through," he began to have some doubt whether she had nursed Washington, but he did not put himself out of his way to suggest this doubt to the public mind.

In order to get all possible talk out of a trial, it is the custom in the United States to allow both the defendant and his counsel to address the Court. Mr. Mumler made a clever hit by stating that the face which appeared on Marshal Tooker's picture was "the most villanous he had ever seen," and it was therefore necessarily the likeness of the person most in sympathy with the Marshal. The counsel for Mr. Mumler referred to spiritual manifestations in the Bible, particularly that which was perceived by Balaam's ass, and he thus drew upon himself the answer that the perception of such manifestations by asses was not confined to ancient times. Mr. Mumler was charged with obtaining money by a false pretence, and if it could have been proved that the dim face on Marshal Tooker's picture was produced by mechanical means, the charge would have been made out. But the numerous photographers who were called as witnesses could only prove that such faces could be so produced. It is difficult to see how the case could be carried further, unless the Court adopted the argument of counsel that the Bible was part of the law, and the Bible showed that spiritualism was false. The result was that the prisoner was discharged, and was hailed as a conqueror, by those who would have considered him a martyr if he had been sent for trial. We should expect that his business will be increased by this prosecution, and we would venture to suggest that he should devote a portion of his profits to augmenting his stock of grandmothers. Young men from the country may possibly help themselves to the redress which the law cannot afford them. It is prudent to tell every purchaser to take home his picture and keep it a little time, and then he will begin to see that the shadowy face is very like his grandmother. We have little doubt that the purchaser would begin to see this, provided that the growth of his opinion was not disturbed by finding that a neighbour had brought home a picture of his grandmother exhibiting the very same face.

PARISIAN CRIMINALS.

NOVELISTS have continually tried to enliven their pages by pictures of the enemies to society who lurk in the holes and corners of civilized cities. Since Fielding took Jonathan Wild for his hero, innumerable attempts have been made to describe the professional criminal, but for the most part with very poor success. Indeed failures are not surprising. There is some touch of the poetical in the ideal ruffian who maintains himself in the midst of us in defiance of legislators and police, we think of a bit of wild nature surviving in the midst of a highly cultivated country, and fancy that even the London pickpocket must have something of the grace of the outlaw with his foot upon his native heath. Unluckily the reality is too far from the fictitious personage; our criminals are for the most part as unlike their pictures as the drunken Red Indian of the present day is to Cooper's noble savages, or as the genuine cattle-stealer of the last century to Sir Walter Scott's Rob Roy. They are squalid, prosaic, and hideous beings, whose intellects are little more than animal cunning, and whose instincts are too gross for any decent veil of fiction. Therefore, for the most part, their describer takes refuge in sheer unreality, and gives us types like George de Barnewell in the model novel, or the charming highwaymen after whom that philosophical hero was portrayed. Yet the readers of a late article in the Revue des Deux Mondes by M. Maxime du Camp may perhaps be inclined to fancy that the school of writers who deal in the terrible and revolting might add a powerful chapter or two to the mysteries of Paris without straying too far into the regions of pure fancy. M. du Camp has evidently a close acquaintance with his subject; he has talked with some of the leading men in the criminal profession; he has visited their favourite haunts; he has picked up something of their language; and he gives us an elaborate classification of their favourite pursuits. If, in some respects, the French criminal is little above the wild beast in his propensities, he has yet a certain grim picturesqueness about him which would repay a careful student of human nature. There was, for example, a certain sense of humour about one Beaumont, who got himself up in splendid official costume, with a black coat, a white cravat, and a voluminous portfolio under his arm, and ordered a soldier to accompany him with an air of undoubting confidence. Placing him as a sentinel before the door of the chief of the service de sûreté, with orders to admit no one, M. Beaumont repaired to the official apartment, walked off with the valuables, and, dismissing the soldier, disappeared into utter obscurity, sending the same evening a civil note of apology for the trouble which he had given. M. Beaumont, we are almost glad to say, escaped with his plunder from all pursuit. The celebrated Jadin, again, appears to have acted the part of a Robin Hood in modern life. In following his profession of cambrioleur—a peculiar variety of burglar—he was in the habit of breaking into rooms, and when he found them specially poverty-stricken, leaving behind him a respectable contribution for the benefit of the fortunate inmate. The delicacy of feeling thus displayed did not imply that he was above doing his work in a more businesslike spirit when occasion demanded, for Jadin was unfortunately executed for murdering a young girl whom he surprised in one of his visitations. A slight touch of good feeling may perhaps be put to the account of another gentleman who was accused of complicity in a murder of peculiar atrocity at St. Cyr. He pointed out to the President of the Court that he was innocent of any premeditation, inasmuch as he had come without arms to the scene of operations, and had only picked up a stone on the way to help in demolishing the victims. "Why, then," said the President, "did you accompany men whom you knew to be intending a crime?" "Dame," was the reply, "entre voisins, il faut bien se rendre de petits services." Other stories are of a more unmitigatedly revolting character. We have lately been treated to discussions as to the intuitive sense of morality possessed by the whole human race. What sort of moral sentiment could lurk in the breast of the criminal who went to see his brother executed, and occupied himself in picking pockets of four watches and a purse? or of the horrible ruffian of twenty-one who, after murdering his mother with fifty-six blows of a knife, lay down on the bed by the corpse, and, in his own words, "passed a good night"? Much as the plea of insanity has been abused, we would be glad to think that it was possible to set down the crimes of such monsters to some irresistible moral disease.

The heroes of these stories were amongst the aristocracy of their profession. They rejoice in the proud title of escarpe, the name given to the genuine assassin who murders systematically by way of opening proceedings, and not as a matter of occasional expediency. Below them are numerous classes of criminals, each devoted to some speciality, and frequently displaying the same sort of skill which we admire in the artisan whose facility in his own branch of work has become an instinct. For the most part, we recognise them as analogous to English criminals of different varieties, though peculiarities of national custom open different modes of attack in the two countries. The faiseurs, who are the most intellectual members of the profession, are the swindlers, capable of anything from cheating at cards to getting up sham companies. M. du Camp mentions a certain Mutifian, who called himself Comte de Belair, professed to be the son of a general of the First Empire, and lived in the very best society on the profits of skilful thefts and gambling. Another, a certain Piednoir, is at the present moment living in great comfort in a large Dutch town. Far below these are the francs bourgeois, who get admission into houses as beggars for the purpose of stealing, the tireurs, or genuine pickpockets; shoplifters, who are subdivided into many classes, such as those who profess to buy, and take the opportunity of helping themselves under various pretences, and those who venture to break into shops at night; the roulotiers, who steal baggage off carts, and numerous others, whose special skill lies in robbing children, in changing mock jewels for genuine, in cheating restaurateurs, or in various other departments of business. Between this rabble and the true assassin there is a carefully graduated scale of malefactors. The burglars form the lowest stage. The highest rank of these is the caroubleurs, who use false keys. Above them are the sorgueurs, the descendants of the old highwaymen. M. du Camp describes one of the last survivors of these gentlemen, who is still in prison at Belle-Isle. His massive lower jaw, moveable eyes, retreating forehead, and long powerful arms give him, says M. du Camp, the appearance, of a huge chimpanzee. Between the sorgueurs and the escarpes there still intervene the assommeurs, who correspond apparently to the English garotters. They are, it seems, rather more objectionable than their analogues, from a habit of depositing their victim in the river. Another pleasant invention employed by these ingenious persons is an eel-skin filled with sand; with this they can strike a heavy blow, and then, emptying out the sand, they have the appearance of being totally unarmed. To read this description may give a nervous visitor to Paris the same sort of shock which an invalid sometimes receives from a medical work revealing hitherto unsuspected varieties of disease. The cockney will tremble as he walks along the boulevard and runs over in his mind the list of professional criminals who may be lying in wait at every corner.

Such a person, however, may more profitably reflect on the question whether we are at all better off than our neighbours. M. du Camp accounts for the numerous army of crime by a theory which we fear will hardly bear inspection. He says that it is owing partly to the want of emigration from France. To this we may reply, only too conclusively, that, in the first place, emigration is confined to decently honest people in England and Germany, and leaves the dregs behind, and, in the next place, that we to all appearance have as large a list of criminals in London as in Paris. It is indeed impossible to arrive at any satisfactory statistics on the subject. M. du Camp gives us a set of figures as to the number of arrests in Paris during the last few years. In 1867 it amounted to over 35,000, whereas ten years before it was only 20,726. This, however, only gives a very indirect impression as to the numbers of the classes living in crime. It includes apparently arrests for drunkenness and for simple vagrancy, and it would be difficult to compare it with English statistics of a similar kind, without knowing many facts as to the efficiency of the police, the causes which justify arrest, and other varying circumstances. The chief subject for remark is that the numbers have so rapidly increased of late years, and especially in the last two years. The absence of emigration can evidently have nothing to do with this, as emigration was no more active ten years ago than it is now. The true explanation would seem to be simpler. The increasing attractions of Paris and the great facilities of travel are constantly drawing a larger supply from the rural population in search of high wages and the various charms of the capital. A similar gravitation towards the large towns is conspicuous not only in France, but in England and America, though in France it has been more systematically encouraged. The natural result is, that many of the immigrants fail to obtain employment, and go to swell the ranks of the poorest, and sometimes of the criminal, class. Nothing is more common than to find poor people who have come up from the country to London from a vague hope of improving their position, and have only fallen into deeper distress. The same result is, we presume, at least as common in Paris, and the commercial depression of the last two years has no doubt increased the effect. The sudden swelling of pauperism in the English metropolis has been coincident with the increase of crime in Paris, and is due in great part to similar causes. The chief moral of M. du Camp's investigations would seem to be tolerably obvious. He shows with great force the enormous difficulties of dealing satisfactorily with the criminal class. A man or boy who has once acquired a taste for living on crime is, as a general rule, bound to an almost hopeless servitude. The Jews, according to M. du Camp, show a certain superiority in this respect, which is evinced by the fact that one Jewish rogue never preys on another, and still more by the Jew occasionally saving money and retiring on the proceeds of his profession. This is above the power of most persons who have once tasted blood. They become as incapable of leaving their trade as a tiger of living upon cabbages instead of deer. A thief who has made a successful coup immediately proceeds to spend it in debauchery. He may be recognised by a sudden outburst of tawdry finery, and throws away his money upon his mistresses and companions. He returns to his career as certainly as the savage who has received a superficial smearing of civilization throws away his clothes and takes to the bush as soon as it comes within sight. A human being becomes simply a machine for performing one special piece of roguery, and we can no more turn him to account in any other way than we can make a spade out of a skeleton key. The problem, therefore, comes to this — when a man has only one talent, which is prejudicial to society, and no virtues worth mentioning, how are we to make him useful? A versatile thief might give hopes of being fit for honest industry, but nothing seems to be more remarkable, in the French as in the English predatory animal, than the limited nature of his capacity. He resembles a wild beast, which can only get its living after a single fashion; the ant-eater can only subsist by inserting his long tongue into an ant's nest, and the thief has the one available talent of gliding his hand imperceptibly into the human pocket. The thief's pleasures are equally limited, the most mentionable being attendance at certain singing-halls and drinking-shops, which appear to be very similar throughout the world. If it were not for a certain soft-heartedness we might hang all the thieves or shut them up for life, and then make a fair start, though perhaps the vacuum would be speedily filled again from the surrounding masses of misery. As it is, the evil cannot be finally cured without raising the whole standard of life in the lowest classes. A strict and effective police supervision is evidently required to keep it within bounds, and there is little use in wasting sentiment over restrictions on the liberty of such barely responsible persons. Short terms of imprisonment are evidently thrown away; we want vigorous measures in dealing with a class in which even the rudiments of a moral instinct are almost indiscernible; and no means will be effective without a supplementary scheme for cutting off the supply of infant recruits who are constantly drifting into the ranks of crime from the vagabond population of the streets.

MR. CARDWELL AND THE ARMY RESERVE.

FOR nearly three years the Saturday Review has been the advocate of a consistent and definite plan for re-organizing the army in accordance with the spirit, the wants, and the examples of the time. In that period the progress made in the subject by public opinion has been rapid in comparison with the rate at which the mind of a people generally moves when great changes are contemplated, and when the matter does not, by its urgency or its exciting nature, exercise unwonted pressure. When General Peel effected his trifling and shortsighted contribution to the reorganization of the army, we believed, and said, that he had lost a great opportunity for achieving an important reform; and we still think that he might have done, as the leader of opinion, with safety and advantage to the country, and with infinite credit to himself, what Mr. Cardwell, as the follower of opinion, is now meditating. The problem was, how to combine efficiency with economy; and, confident of the conclusion to which the practical spirit of the country, when fairly roused, would tend, we ventured long ago to prophesy that the scheme of forming a main reserve of soldiers who had already passed a shortened period of service in the ranks would become the rule. This seems likely to be fulfilled in much less time than we had ventured to expect, and as, amidst the numerous and diversified modifications of this principle which have emanated from public speakers and writers, our ideas on the subject have become only part of a confused mass of thought, we are not sorry for the opportunity which the speeches of Lord Elcho and Mr. Cardwell on the Army Reserve afford us of again setting forth our opinions. But, while we may reasonably suppose that the consistent expression of those opinions has not been without its effect on the public and official mind, we must disclaim all absurd pretension to a monopoly of originality on a subject where the examples of foreign Powers, patent to the world, formed the common source of those ideas which required only a competent knowledge of our own military system, with its defects and its requirements, to mature into a practicable plan.

Lord Elcho is quite right in thinking that the main want of the time is that of a sufficient reserve. Other deficiencies, of organization, of administration, or of material, may be made good at need by energy, courage, and resource, though, it may be, at heavy cost. But the want of practised soldiers to meet a skilful enemy is what neither wealth nor numbers nor hardihood can remedy. When on the one side are arrayed training, confidence, coherence, and purpose, while on the other these are wanting, mere enthusiasm and patriotic spirit cannot redress the balance; and nobody, we presume, would pretend that our Militia and Volunteers have hitherto attained to such a degree of proficiency or of discipline as would render them equal in manœuvring to the troops of Prussia or France. Even the manner in which the different kinds of force should be employed, whether in the field or in garrison, as skirmishers, or general line, or reserve, is still matter of debate; and if an enemy's army were to land and aim at London by the route on which the advantages for defence are greatest, and the means of opposing it have been best considered, it is but too likely that the time for prompt action would be passed in confusedly considering how to act. So much of this formidable perplexity as would arise from the disparity in military efficiency of the various parts of the whole force would be obviated by the possession of a reserve equal in quality to the active army; while, in presence of the enemy, the value of fully trained over imperfectly trained soldiers is scarcely to be estimated by arithmetic. Even for defensive purposes, therefore, a reserve of regulars is of incalculable importance; while in a campaign on foreign soil we should have a force at once trustworthy and disposable, instead of being dependent on such precarious resources as volunteers from the Militia, or recruits from the general population of the kind that appeared in the Crimea in the second period of the war. But, while highly approving Lord Elcho's main design, we doubt, with Mr. Cardwell, the policy of the measure by which he proposed to effect it, derived from Sir Hope Grant, and consisting in an enlistment for twenty-one years divided into three equal periods — the first to be passed with the colours; the second in the First Reserve, with liability to be called to the ranks in time of war, the third in the Second Reserve, for home defence only. No doubt a prolongation of that limited degree of liability to service which depends on the chance of war arising in any given interval would be no great additional hardship, and could not seriously interfere with the industrial pursuits of the citizen soldier. But on the popular mind, the idea of enlisting for so long a period, and of accepting responsibilities which would seem much more burdensome than they really were, would certainly have a deterrent effect, and we should prefer to re-engage men for the third term of service, if it were desirable (which we doubt) to retain soldiers so long, while younger men were forthcoming. So far, then, we think Mr. Cardwell's ideas preferable to Lord Elcho's, and the reluctance of the Minister to state definitely the measures of reorganization which he may be ultimately disposed to adopt is itself of good augury, as showing his sense of the necessity of carefully deliberating on the whole scheme in all its bearings, before committing himself to any part of it.

Nevertheless, Mr. Cardwell did announce certain convictions of his own which cause us considerable misgivings. To us, and to most others who have discussed the subject, it has generally seemed a necessary condition of a shortened period of service that troops should be specially enlisted for service in India and the Colonies, while the regular army should be kept at home and in such neighbouring dependencies as may be considered home stations. In this way many great advantages might be expected. Large numbers of recruits would be attracted to the ranks whom the prospect of distant foreign service would deter. A uniform system of discipline and training might be established and maintained throughout the army. The health of the army would be unbroken by the vicissitudes of climate. And the great expense of frequent reliefs would be avoided. But Mr. Cardwell considers the importance of having no separate enlistment for India to be so great that he proposes to regulate the shortened period of service which he contemplates by that which will be sufficiently long to allow of reliefs for India. He thinks Indian service should last five years, and therefore appears inclined to make the first period of service in the army seven years, two of which, we suppose, would be allotted to the preparatory training of recruits in the regimental depots. This we think too long — needlessly long for the acquisition of soldiership, and likely to lessen the chances of success in trade or mechanical labour on returning to civil life. In fixing the period, he seems to have been mainly influenced by the consideration that five years' Indian service is as much as the average soldier can endure. We imagine it is more than the average soldier can endure without injury, and that the result will be a lowering of the average health and efficiency of an increased number of regiments. Mr. Cardwell says that to have a separate army for India would be a complete reversal of a policy recently and deliberately adopted. True; but it was adopted at a time when ideas totally different from those now dominant prevailed; the wisdom of it was gravely doubted at the time, and has been gravely doubted since; and though there are always difficulties in the way of retracing steps so important, yet that is a very inadequate reason for marring an entire scheme of re-organization by changing one of its main conditions. That men specially enlisted for India would, as Mr. Cardwell says, bestow their sympathies exclusively on the service to which they gave their lives, may be true, and would be, in its degree, an evil; but an evil by no means comparable with the disadvantages which, as we think, will in the other case be entailed on the whole army. Then Mr Cardwell grudges that the army should lose the benefit of that experience which, he says, five years of Indian service gives. So far as that service may be a period of war, it must of course impart experience of a right kind to the troops employed but so far as it is a period of peace, it is, we believe, anything but a benefit. It is a period when discipline is impaired by yielding to the conditions of the climate; when ideas and customs at variance with those which should prevail in a European army are acquired, and when injurious indulgence and excess are taught by example more general and pernicious than is to be found in home service. Another objection which Mr. Cardwell makes is that we ought not to have an army whose services the Queen could not command wherever they might be needed. But we see no reason why the terms of a separate enlistment for India should not be such as to admit of the troops there being employed elsewhere, and such a condition would, we imagine, be regarded as a boon rather than a hardship, as was lately proved when troops in India were required for service in Abyssinia. In fact, we see nothing in any of Mr. Cardwell's objections to a separate army which can be compared in weight to those which may be urged on the other side. To garrison India with troops from the regular army, reliefs must be frequent and costly. A large portion of the army will pass the whole of its effective service in India, and will more or less suffer in health and discipline; the uniformity of the system of training will be impaired, and the project of teaching trades to soldiers, which ought to be part of a good scheme, will be rendered in great measure abortive.

Another idea of Mr. Cardwell's which we think mistaken or exaggerated is the value he attaches to old soldiers. In the time of the First Napoleon, he says, there was the greatest desire to extend the period of service, while the Duke of Wellington thought the old soldier the mainstay of the army. But that was a time of long and destructive war, and the soldier of three or four years' service is, at such a time, a veteran. Even the few who survive in such a period of war to be what Mr. Cardwell understands by old soldiers, are very different from the old soldiers of peace. They are men who have been seasoned, not in barracks or parades, but in actual war; men who hand down the traditions of military sagacity and experience and embody the memory of former achievements, and who thus keep alive the spirit and the glory of their regiments. No wonder that these should have been considered of infinite value compared with the boy-conscripts or raw recruits whom the exigencies of the day hurried to arms. There is no reason why in time of war the whole service of the soldier, under the new system, should not be passed in the field, and his re-engagement for a further period encouraged. But in peace old soldiership means increased pay and pension; it too often means confirmed habits, not of war-like resource, but of intemperance and perfunctory performance of duty; it means marriage in the army, with all the evils it entails, and, too probably, an old age of uselessness and want. We hope, therefore, that this part of the scheme will be so framed as to exclude all re-engagements except those of non-commissioned officers.

We are not sure that we quite understand that part of Mr. Cardwell's speech in which he says that it is desirable not to abandon the present system of enlistment until we have tried the new one. To carry on the new and old side by side would tend to confusion, and would be no fair test of the soundness of the change. The alteration in the terms of enlistment would not affect the existing army further than that if plenty of recruits were obtained by the new conditions, some of our then superfluous older soldiers might be allowed to join the reserve. But if it is found (which we are far from anticipating should the plan get a fair trial) that recruits fail us, there can be no reason why, by reverting to the existing conditions of service, we should not re-establish our army on its present footing, and all chance of disastrous failure would therefore be speedily obviated.

THE NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.

IT would be worth while to inquire, if there were any chance of a result from the inquiry, how it is that in certain English towns special characteristics of political vice are indigenous. Nottingham is, we believe, a respectable sort of place in the knitting and hosiery way; but why should Nottingham elections be worse than any other elections? That the fact is so there is little doubt. It requires but a slight effort of memory to note down, even from the time when Nottingham Castle was sacked in the famous old Reform days, the scenes of riot and turbulence which Nottingham has witnessed. The older Mr. Walter's elections are still remembered as pleasant times when a good hand-to-hand fight was conducted by professional bruisers, hired by rival candidates, who day after day for weeks displayed a common savagery not only against each other, but against everybody else. Feargus O'Connor's turbulent representation of this riotous town was symbolical of its general character. The election in which Mr. Samuel Morley gained the seat only to lose it was not a very edifying exhibition. Neither Mr. Bernal Osborne, who has also represented this remarkable constituency, nor the late Sir Robert Clifton, did much to retrieve its grotesque and altogether unique public character. The election which has just taken place is quite worthy to rank with its many predecessors. The odd thing is that so many very extravagant and out of the way candidates gravitate by some sort of strange law to Nottingham. Feargus O'Connor, Mr. Osborne, Sir Robert Clifton, Mr. Handel Cossham, Lord Amberley—this is a curious succession of notables; and the series has just been completed by Mr. Digby Seymour, who has barely missed the seat. Mr. Digby Seymour's connexion with Nottingham is of the queerest. The late Sir Robert Clifton was not a very ordinary man. He was, as his biographical eulogist in a Nottingham paper informs us, descended from some dapifer or seneschal of the Conqueror; but the merits which recommended him to Nottingham were that he was odd, and considerably out at elbows. Horses, the Turf harpies, and losses at the rate of a thousand pounds a night, so we are told, ending in expatriation, endeared their late member to the roughs of Nottingham. They elected him once and again, and so great was his popularity that it appears that, by a sort of nuncupative will, he bequeathed the representation of Nottingham to his friend Mr. Digby Seymour. So Mr Seymour and Lady Clifton give us to understand. Mr. Digby Seymour issued his address—we use his own words—from this "House of Mourning," namely Clifton, on the day after Sir Robert Clifton's funeral; a proceeding nearly as comic as Mr. Macaulay's address to the Edinburgh electors from Windsor Castle. The other candidate—Mr George Potter, after the manner of the typical working-man's candidate, having collapsed—was Mr. Seely, a well-known Liberal, and bearing a name of terror in Admiralty circles. The issue was between ordinary Liberalism in the person of Mr. Seely, and Cliftonism in the person of Mr. Digby Seymour. The late Sir Robert Clifton was a Liberal of his own fashion—an independent Liberal—and returned chiefly by the votes of the electors added to the constituency by Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill Sir Robert Clifton voted against the Irish Church Bill, and Mr. Digby Seymour stood in his shoes. His confession of political faith consisted in one single solid article. "My views," he says, "on the great questions of the day are, for the most part, the same as those of the late Sir Robert Clifton." The Elisha was worthy of the Elijah. The election in any other place than Nottingham would be described as a disgraceful riot. Bands of notorious "lambs" paraded the streets, vehicles decked with party colours and filled with roughs paraded the streets, and the excitement was so great, as the report delicately expresses it, that it was found necessary to parade and arm the pensioners Mr Seely's committee-room was riddled, the Riot Act read, and charges with fixed bayonets on the mob was the order of the day. The polling was curious. Mr. Seely took the lead, but in the course of the day many Conservatives, though reluctantly, voted for Mr. Digby Seymour, and he was only defeated by a majority of a little more than a hundred Out of a constituency of 14,000, however, only about 9,000 votes were given.

We do not much believe in what are called typical elections. Elections, even at very critical moments, turn mostly on local and personal considerations We do not consider the recent Stafford election to prove the reaction of which we hear so much and see so little; neither do we say that this Nottingham election—which has ended, however dubiously, by the defeat of a candidate who was pledged, if to anything, to resist the Government measure on the Irish Church—shows that the Nottingham electors disapproved of their late member's opposition to it. What we have to say is, that for a constitutional candidate, or, indeed, for any other candidate, Mr. Digby Seymour is a very odd representative of anything but himself. We are not much surprised to be assured by reports from Nottingham that, "except on the Irish Church question, Seymour was not to the liking of the Conservatives, and that they came up very tardily to the poll." The surprising and notable thing is, that any 4,525 human beings should be capable either of such liking, or of such smothering of dislike, as to vote for Mr. Digby Seymour under any circumstances. We say nothing of Mr. Digby Seymour's personal acquaintance with the late Sir Robert Clifton, or of the extremely peculiar taste which induced him to attend his friend's funeral, and to write an elegy on him in the Nottingham papers chiefly as sharp hits of canvassing; but what surprises us is the short memories of these 4,525 electors, and the fact that undoubtedly Mr. Seymour was the popular candidate. The new Constitution, if it has favoured the country with many constituencies in which Mr. Digby Seymour, or the like of Mr. Digby Seymour, if he can have a like, could be all but returned as their representative in Parliament, may be a matter of happy retrospect to Mr. Disraeli, especially as Sir Robert Clifton used to dine with him, and as Mr. Digby Seymour would have entered Parliament as one of his supporters; but it gives rise to serious misgivings to those who are not constitutionalists and opponents of the Irish Church Bill.

For, again, we ask whether we have all forgotten all about this Mr. Digby Seymour? In June, 1859, Mr Digby Seymour was member for Southampton, having been returned by the Conservatives, to whom he had pledged himself not to vote against the Derby Government on the question of No Confidence. On the first night of the debate he spoke in support of Ministers; on the division he voted against them. The Morning Herald of the day accounted for this curious incident by connecting it with some

"promise of places and offers of rewards" on the part of the Liberals, by which—so the Morning Herald suggested—Mr. Digby Seymour had been swayed. Whereupon Mr. Digby Seymour applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a criminal information against the Morning Herald, which application was refused. Nor is this all that we are obliged to remember about Mr. Digby Seymour. In December, 1862, was tried an action for libel, Digby Seymour v. Butterworth, contained in the Law Magazine of May, 1862. Mr. Digby Seymour, it appears, had informed the Southampton electors that he had been made Recorder of Newcastle on account of his professional eminence. Whereupon, in a tremendous article, the Law Magazine commented on Mr. Digby Seymour's professional and political career, and openly alleged that Mr. Seymour received the Recordership as a reward for deserting the Conservatives, and that, as to his professional eminence, "he had, in fact, been censured, and almost disbarred, by the Benchers of the Middle Temple for unprofessional conduct in his relations with attorneys." We adopt the severe historical tone, and quote from that admirable remembrancer of forgotten things, Mr. Irving's Annals of our Time. The Law Review took the severe, but not the historical, tone, and disported itself with a contrast. Mr. Seymour, having alleged that he was persecuted on circuit because he was an Irishman, the Law Magazine drew a parallel between "the Irish gentleman" and "the Irish blackguard, swaggering, foul-mouthed and shameless; the most insolent of upstarts, the most unblushing of swindlers; never destitute of a quarrel, never at a loss for a lie"; and went on to say something about a "power of impudence" and a "fertility in fraud which defy all description." For this extremely provoking and alliterative libel Mr. Digby Seymour got a verdict with the moderate damages of 40s., and triumphantly proved that the Law Magazine had a very vigorous and very reckless and indiscreet writer. But what remained as the residuum of this trial, Seymour v. Butterworth, was that Mr. Seymour got two pounds out of Mr. Butterworth, that the charge about the Recordership of Newcastle was neither proved nor disproved, because it was incapable of proof, and that, as to the fact about Mr. Digby Seymour and the Benchers of the Middle Temple, why it was a fact, and, as Chief Justice Cockburn remarked, the writer in the Law Magazine "added nothing to the facts brought before the Benchers, added no facts of his own, and was not responsible for the facts, and that it was difficult to see how the facts could have been more fairly brought before the public." The facts being that the Benchers found it to be their "painful duty to state that they found much calling for severe condemnation, even on the most favourable consideration of Mr. Seymour's actions," and they lamented, to say the very least of it, that, in a certain matter, Mr. Seymour's conduct had a "tendency to introduce into, or maintain in the practice of, their profession, men more distinguished by the pliancy of their principles than by the gifts of nature, improved by an industrious and honest pursuit of eminence by honourable means."

Now what we said nearly seven years ago (Saturday Review, December 2, 1862), we here repeat. This is the judgment which the Masters of the Bench passed upon Mr. Digby Seymour. Mr. Digby Seymour published a pamphlet complaining of this judgment, but he did not proceed by action for libel against the Benchers. That judgment stands. What was true or false six years and a-half ago is true or false now. The Law Magazine was fined very properly for very improper language, and certainly it was never proved that Mr. Seymour ever entered into a directly corrupt bargain with any Government for his vote. But we have not heard that the Benchers have withdrawn their censure on Mr. Seymour, and with these historical facts before us we are not so much surprised that Mr. Seymour was not returned for Nottingham, as that 4,525 electors, including, we suppose, many sincere and honest defenders of constitutional principles and true religion, voted for him.

"RUSTICUS" AND THE TIMES ON CANONRIES.

THE subject of the Cathedral Chapters, at which we have been working, off and on, for a good while past, has been lately taken up in the Times in a letter and a leading article which seem to call for some notice. The letter, which appeared on Monday under the signature of "Rusticus," is decidedly above the common level of such productions. It betrays imperfect knowledge of the general subject, but it shows shrewdness of observation, and an apparently intimate knowledge of the facts of some particular case. The writer seems to be familiar with the affairs of some diocese—such as Winchester or Peterborough—where the Chapter is of the New Foundation, and where the Canonries are in the gift of the Bishop. This appears from his assuming the Bishop as the necessary patron. He says, what is certainly true, "that in proportion as Canonries are diminished in number the probability increases of their being ill-bestowed. Most Bishops," he continues, "have one friend, one relative to be provided for; after him, they will judge by merit, but in the event now contemplated they will seldom reach a second." This doubtless expresses a general law, but we conceive that it is not peculiar to Bishops, but that it extends to Prime Ministers, Lord Chancellors, and disposers of patronage of every kind. We might, indeed, strengthen the argument of "Rusticus" by describing at least one New-Foundation Chapter where the Bishop did not, as "Rusticus" charitably supposes he would, begin to look out for merit even on the second vacancy; where, save one stall, whose occupant obstinately refused to die, every place came into the Bishop's gift, and where every place was disposed of among the Bishop's near kinsfolk, till men said that, if the Bishop should hold a capitular visitation, he would be like to none so much as to the Patriarch Lot when he spake unto his sons-in-law which married his daughters. But the fact that "Rusticus" thinks only of Bishops, and not of patrons of other classes, shows that he cannot have examined the subject in all its bearings. The change, too, which he proposes is one which would not have occurred to a stupid or careless man, but only to one who had been carefully watching some one or more particular cases. But it is not a change which would have occurred to a man who had studied the whole subject; at any rate it would not have occurred to him as a novelty. Whatever there is of good in it would at once suggest itself to any one who had studied the history and constitution of the Old-Foundation churches.

"Rusticus" very properly throws aside the notion of "parochializing Canonries." "To speak of parochializing Canonries is a contradiction in terms. If they have any speciality, to parochialize is to destroy them." This is thoroughly true and to the purpose, but we cannot agree with "Rusticus" when, after setting forth his own scheme, which we shall presently discuss, he goes on to say:—

> I believe that it is thus, rather than in the somewhat Utopian conception of cathedral communities of profound thinkers and learned writers, that our canonical establishments may find their practical scope and use. To fix the home of a philosopher or a theologian amid the thousand distractions, important or trifling, of a cathedral city, is to throw before him every impediment to the calm pursuit of his calling. To secure the appointment of such men to such offices, while the prize is lucrative and the dispenser human, has been found by long experience practically impossible.

It is no doubt Utopian to expect that this scheme, or that any other scheme, would ever be carried out in its full perfection. But it is not Utopian to set up a high ideal and to try to come as near to it in practice as human weakness allows. No scheme of appointment will ever fill all our stalls with "philosophers and theologians." But if it be recognised that philosophers and theologians are the right persons to appoint, more philosophers and theologians will be appointed than if people are allowed to think that one appointment is as good as another. But this is what people practically do think. When appointments to Cathedral offices are discussed, one appointment is said to be good and another to be bad. But an appointment is hardly ever said to be good or bad with reference to the peculiar duties of the peculiar office. The appointment is said to be good when the person appointed is thought to have deserved a reward by service of some other kind. It is said to be bad when the person appointed is not thought to have any such claim to special reward. This way of looking at the matter silently implies that, as far as the office itself is concerned, one man, provided he be not in any way scandalous, is as good as another. And so people will think so long as a Canonry is looked on as a mere means of rewarding a deserving parochial clergyman or school-inspector. If it be once understood that Canonries are offices requiring special qualifications, that they ought to be filled by men of special thought, learning, or eloquence, if we do not actually attain our ideal, we shall at least come nearer to it. The appointments of conscientious patrons will be better, those of unconscientious patrons will not be so bad. One objection brought by "Rusticus" we really do not understand. Why is a Cathedral city so specially ill-suited as he thinks to be the home of a philosopher or a theologian? Even a philosopher or a theologian must live somewhere, and he will be a lucky man if he can find a home anywhere wholly free from "distractions, important or trifling." But we really do not see why these distractions should be more rife in a Cathedral close than in other places. At all events, we should think that they would be much less rife than in the case of an ordinary parochial cure. There are men in the Church to whom comparative leisure would be a gain both for their own sake and for that of others. There are offices in the Church which offer that comparative leisure. Truly the men and the offices are meant for one another. We do not believe that either Bishops or Prime Ministers or Lord Chancellors will always appoint absolutely the best man to each particular vacancy. But we do believe that, if it be understood that a particular sort of men are the right sort of men to appoint, the average of appointments will become much better than it has been hitherto.

The scheme of "Rusticus" he describes as "that of a considerable increase in the number of the Canons, and a consequent diminution of the separate emoluments." He would in fact abolish Residentiary Canons, as we understand Residentiary Canons, altogether, and would give each church a Dean with a body of non-resident Canons. But let him speak for himself:—

> At present the number of residentiaries in an ordinary Cathedral is four, and the income of each varies from 500*l.* to 1,000*l.* a year. Let us suppose the given Cathedral to have an aggregate income for its residentiaries of 2,400*l.* I would contemplate the establishment, in such a case, of 12 co-ordinate Canons, each with his 200*l.* a year, and each with a single month of statutable residence. . . . The Dean will be the officer in permanent charge of the arrangements of the services, except in so far as the assembled Chapter may resolve and order.
> The advantages of the change would be many. The strength of the Cathedral establishment would be sensibly increased by its being brought into a more intimate connexion with the popular working clergy of the Church. The Cathedral town would profit by the periodical presence and preaching of some of the chief parochial ministers of the diocese. The Canons themselves would, in many cases, regard their month of residence as the most marked and interesting portion of their year, varying their home life, enlarging the sphere of their influence, yet making no serious breach in the continuity of their parish duties. The united body would form a Diocesan Council of no slight weight and value, exercising the Cathedral patronage with a wider knowledge and a more disinterested judgment, bringing a powerful influence to bear upon works of local or national usefulness, and, on the whole, carrying a perceptible increase of energy into the operations of the Church at large.

When we read this, we cannot help thinking of the philologer whom we reviewed a week or two back, who invented a great part of Grimm's Law for himself, in seeming ignorance that anybody had found it out before him. In like manner "Rusticus" seems never to have heard of the Non-residentiary Canons of the Old Foundations; but he grasps very well and sets forth very well, as if it were quite a new idea of his own, most of the reasons which have always made us wish both to see the Non-residentiary Canons of the Old Foundations restored to their proper position, and to see the anomalous Honorary Canons of the New Foundations raised to something like the same position. The Non-residentiary Canons are commonly the pick of the clergy of the diocese, and their discharge of their duties on preaching turns and similar occasions, their restoration to their votes in Chapter on all occasions, would bring about exactly the results which "Rusticus" wishes for, and which we wish for also. And we think, with "Rusticus," that the men who discharge these duties should not be wholly unpaid. We should not at all grudge them the 200*l.* a year which "Rusticus" proposes for them, if it is to be had; but we should have thought that a smaller sum would cover the expense of their occasional appearances at the Cathedral. And this is really all that is wanted; in the actual residence of a month proposed by "Rusticus" we see no advantage at all, and alongside of the Non-residentiaries we should retain the Residentiary stalls as the proper provision for a certain class of men in the Church.

From the letter of "Rusticus" it is amusing to turn to the leading article with which his letter is followed up. "Rusticus," though his knowledge of his subject is imperfect, shows real observation and real good sense. The writer of the leader writes, as might be expected, in the big bow-wow style of utter ignorance:—

> Some years ago, the cathedral stalls were cut down to a paucity quite out of character with the evident idea of our cathedrals, and reducing the magnificent choirs to a "beggarly account of empty boxes." The Church protested vigorously, and actually did succeed in preserving the condemned Stalls, which still exist in a disembodied, or, as it is called, honorary form. How that works it is really hard to say; but we suspect the ordinary British parent would rather have one son a real Canon than ten invested with the title, and right to preach once a year. Judging from the history and the popular tastes of our Church, its Bishops should be few, its Canons and Prebendaries many, but yet substantial characters.

Nothing is plainer than that the writer of this kind of talk knows nothing of the difference between Old and New Foundations, between Residentiaries and Non-residentiaries, between a Prebendary of Lincoln and an Honorary Canon of Peterborough. The allusion to the "ordinary British parent" is a master-stroke in this kind of writing. It at once supplies the funny element so necessary in every discussion, and no doubt the reference to "substantial characters" at the end serves the same purpose, though its immediate purpose is not quite so clear. The "disembodied form" in which alone the writer seems to think that stalls still exist might be thought to be a misprint for "disendowed," only the word "disembodied" no doubt contains a hidden reference to the old phrase of a Prebendary's corps, which certainly has a somewhat startling effect when you hear a living man say, "My corps (pronounced corpse) lies in such and such a place." But the Times, we all know, is above misprints, and as there is (or was) doubtless some good reason, though we cannot see it, for writing "diocess" for "diocese"—an eccentricity, by the way, which the Times seems latterly to have abandoned—so there is doubtless some good reason, though we cannot see it, for changing "Prebendaries" into "Prebendiaries." The only thing that we can think of is the likeness of the form to "Stipendiaries," and if we are to take this as a sign that the Times is ready to accept our small scheme of re-endowment, we of course thankfully accept so mighty a helper.

A COUNTESS ON MANNERS.

THE chief point of interest about Manuals of Manners is the presumptive evidence which they afford of the existence of sane persons willing to invest in them. There is something touching in the thought of large classes of the community, morbidly conscious of their many awkwardnesses and anxious to amend them, longing to do things in the right way if they only knew how, and sanguine enough to believe that the secret of good breeding is to be found in a book. One pictures them waiting with wistful eyes for the avatar of some apostle of gentility, to come and enlighten their dark minds with his words of wisdom. And no teacher of authority gives any sign. The oracles of fashion are dumb. The great masters of deportment are mute. There is Lord Chesterfield, to be sure; but Lord Chesterfield is unpractical. He has left nothing on record about such thorny points as the graceful way of mounting a carriage, or the disposition of the hat and cane during a morning call. There is no Sir Charles Grandison in the flesh to explain the combination of stateliness and ease with which these little things should be done. Why was Beau Brummell so uncommunicative, or that more historical personage Beau Brummell's valet? Or why, oh, why! did not the First Gentleman of Europe himself condescend to bequeath a code of manners as a precious legacy to generations of Englishmen yet unborn? His matchless command of etiquette has perished with his multitudinous waistcoats; and posterity is left nervously twirling its hat, and awkwardly tumbling into its carriage, without any authoritative guidance in those important details. Worse still, it has been left at the mercy of any charlatan who chooses to vend sixpennyworth of manners, and whose false and unauthorized teaching may betray the unwary into a course of horrible solecisms.

But at last a better day has dawned. In the fulness of time, moved by pity for the mannerless masses, a Countess has broken silence. From the point of view of one "moving in the best circles," she unfolds to "the crême de la crême," as well as to "the great body of the middle-class public and that immense substratum of lower-middle class which interposes between the middle and working classes," the things necessary to deportment. Doubtless the grateful middle-classes would have liked to know the name of their benefactress. They will regret the modest asterisks in which it has been temporarily obscured. This excess of modesty is the more to be regretted because the profane and irreverent student of her work might be tempted to suspect, from internal evidence, that our Countess hailed from America. With a contemptuous glance at the incompetent quacks who have preceded her in the literary field, our noble instructress proceeds to redeem her pledge of providing her readers with a faithful and judicious guide in every "social emergency." Nothing can be more comprehensive than the scheme of her work. It includes everything from morning calls to marriage. Cards, dress, conversation, the ball, the promenade, courtship and engagement, all these points are not merely touched on, but for the most part fairly exhausted; and as if this were not enough, a crop of minor "social emergencies" is disposed of in a supplementary chapter of "Hints to Both Sexes." But when one comes to study the Countess's code in detail, one is struck by its general resemblance to those other unauthorized codes compiled by "incompetent" and "tasteless" persons, which its avowed object is to supersede. There is the same odd mixture of self-evident propositions, and sphinx-like utterances. Platitude alternates with enigma. If there are many things in it which will command universal assent, there are others of which few people have dreamed in their social philosophy. There is an esoteric and an exoteric doctrine to be enunciated. Take, for instance, the chapter on "Cards." Here is a caution which strikes us as decidedly superfluous. "Young unmarried ladies living with their parents do not require separate cards." Surely no middle-class parent, however benighted, would ever suppose they did. On the other hand, here is something very recondite. "The possessor of two residences should have one address engraved in the left corner, and one in the right." In our simplicity, we should have thought such an arrangement rather ostentatious, and savouring just a little of the "parvenu" whom our Countess regards with just horror. Besides, what if a person owns, like his Grace of Buccleuch, some dozen residences? Are these all to be inscribed on his visiting card? And would not the effect, however imposing, be, to say the least, slightly bewildering? Another dark saying follows. "Honourables do not affix their titles to their cards." No title under Sir or Lady should be taken by the bearer. Who are "honourables," and what are the "titles" which they are to abstain from announcing to their acquaintance? And how, if she extinguishes herself altogether, is a plain Mrs. to make her existence known to society? Here is a direction which we regard as a graceful concession, on the part of our Countess, to the customs of the middle-classes: "We inform our friends and acquaintance of the death of any member of our family by a card. These cards should simply state the name, age, birthplace, residence, and place of interment." The Dissenting grocer will be pleased to discover that his homely practice obtains in the lofty circles in which Countesses "move." The ceremonial of "a morning call" is defined in this work with great precision. It should be paid, says our Countess, "between the hours of three and five P.M. A gentleman caller is to discriminate carefully between his umbrella and his hat. The former is always "to be left in the hall." The hat becomes the subject of a separate treatment. It is never to be laid on a table, pianoforte, or any article of furniture. It must be disposed of in one of two ways; either held in the hand, or deposited on the floor. Here is a precept which displays amusing naiveté:—"Never take favourite dogs into a drawing-room, when you make a morning call. . . Being of too friendly a disposition, they may take the liberty of lying on a lady's gown. Besides, your friend may have a favourite cat already established before the fire, and in that case a battle may ensue." This picture of a morning call, ending in a terrific combat between two antipathetic pets, is a brilliant stroke of imagination, while the care shown in providing against so exceedingly remote a social emergency is a proof of the exhaustive character of her work.

Then she has something to say about Conversation. Perhaps the rules she lays down for its conduct, however, are a trifle too elementary to be of much practical use. One is not much the wiser, for instance, for being told that a perfect knowledge of English is indispensable, or that loud laughter is objectionable, or that a half-open mouth is a sign of ill-breeding, or that the proper thing is to look, but never to stare, at the person you are addressing. It is more worth knowing that the best accent is taught at Eton and Oxford. We had no idea that any particular accent was insisted on in these ancient seats of learning. Perhaps a Professor of Accent has been recently added to the academic staff, and a Pronouncing Master included among the latest "extras" at Eton. Despite the purity of their accent, Eton and Oxford are responsible, we fear, for a good deal of that "detestable slang" upon which our Countess animadverts. Certain phrases which she condemns as vulgarisms, such as "awfully hot," and "immensely jolly," have been heard before now from the lips of Eton boys and Christ Church undergraduates. Among other rules for "conversation," here is one which is at all events easy to follow:—"Do not be always witty." The difficulty which most people find is to be witty at all. The tone of the following directions for letter-writing is rudimentary:—"Never omit your name from any letter, whether of business or friendship. . . . I's should be dotted and t's crossed. . . . The stamp should be placed in the right hand corner of the envelope." A slanting stamp "evinces rudeness"—a nicety of which we were not sufficiently aware. Here is a canon the dark significance of which we are totally unable to fathom:—"An unmarried lady cannot address a gentleman as my dear sir, unless she is very old, and he too." Is there any lurking impropriety in the use of the possessive pronoun? If, indeed, it implies a proprietary interest in the gentleman to whom it is addressed, we understand the objection; and by waiving the rule in favour of septuagenarians, we suppose the Countess means to say that old gentlemen are so little worth having that they need no protection from etiquette. We are glad to perceive from her observations on "the toilette," that our Countess warmly approves of "tubbing." Ladies are enjoined to abstain from the onion, as "the forbidden fruit of the Eve of the nineteenth century"; and gentlemen are charged to keep their teeth and nails "scrupulously clean." Here is a more recondite suggestion as to jewellery. Opals, it seems, connote refinement. "No merely vulgar woman purchases an opal." The importance which the Countess attaches to dress is shown by her putting the tailor on the same footing as to profits as the Church. No man should spend more than "a tenth of his income on dress." Is this proposition to apply to a millionaire? Because a wardrobe must be "varied" indeed to represent an annual expenditure of 100,000*l*. "The Promenade" is the natural corollary of the toilette. Here is an instruction which reads like a direction to an acrobat or circus-rider, preparatory to his "great bare-backed act," or some other feat of gymnastics. The Countess is supposing the "social emergency" of an invitation to enter a carriage.—

> If there is but one step, and you are going to take your seat facing the horses, put your left foot on the step, and enter the carriage with the right in such a manner as to drop it once into your seat. If you are about to sit with your back to the horses, reverse the process. As you step into the carriage, be careful to keep your back towards the seat you are about to occupy, so as to avoid the awkwardness of turning when once in.

Nothing can exceed the mechanical precision of this, but, then, everything would be deranged by the simple accident of the carriage having two steps instead of one. In this case one would enter with the wrong leg, and as likely as not be betrayed into that unseemly pirouette which our Countess condemns with so much severity. The following rules demand less dexterity:—"Never call across a street," "In shaking hands, do not put out the hand till you are quite close to the person you are about to salute." "Nothing is more awkward," our authoress truly observes, "than to walk several yards with an extended hand."

The Countess's canons for evening parties are sound and orthodox. "General salutations of the company," she tells us, "are now wholly disused." Caution is suggested in singing comic songs. As a warning, the Countess mentions that she was once at a party given expressly in honour of "a lady of colour," and heard a "thoughtless amateur" dash into the "broadly comic" nigger melody of "Sally come up," which covered every one with confusion. If a "Parsee prince" is present, it is "unbecoming to follow him about and listen to every word he utters." You may be wrongly announced. In this case, "make your way at once to the mistress of the house, and introduce yourself by name", but the butler's blunder is to be repaired "with simplicity, and your rank made as little of as possible." "No one should accept an invitation to a ball if he does not dance." There is good sense in this, and in the interest of the many young ladies who habitually line the walls of fashionable ball-rooms we wish the injunction were more generally acted upon. There is probably less need for the following caution:—"All casino habits are to be avoided in a private ball-room. It is an affront to a highly-bred lady to hold her hand on your hip." It is to be hoped that the "aristocratic young men" whom the Countess has seen committing this enormity are not very numerous. Some of her hints to ball-givers are very valuable. Here is a thoughtful suggestion:—"Great inconvenience is often experienced through the difficulty of procuring cabs at the end of a ball. Unless more men-servants than one are kept, it is better to engage a policeman, with a lantern, to attend on the pavement during the evening, and to give notice in the course of the day at a neighbouring cab-stand." But is there not here some confusion between the function of the linkman and that of the police? If it is a general practice of ball-giving ladies to appropriate the policeman on the beat for their own private convenience, no wonder we hear a good deal about the insecurity of the streets. We commend the point to the notice of Colonel Henderson. In her remarks on dinner-parties, our Countess is careful, as usual, to adapt her instruction to babes in etiquette. "Peas," she tells us, "are eaten with the fork." "The knife is never to be carried to the mouth." "Hot soups and puddings are not to be tasted till they are sufficiently cool." By disregarding this caution, "you may be compelled to swallow what is dangerously hot, or driven to the unpardonable alternative of returning it to your plate." There is one "social emergency," and one alone, in which our Countess fairly admits her inability to prescribe a rule. Courtship, she observes, is a crisis when to act by rule is impossible. So she wisely contents herself with passing on to the order of toasts to be given at the wedding-breakfast, and an exposition of the philosophy of "no cards."

But this admission is fatal, we fear, to the pretensions of her "Complete Manual"; because, if courtship is a great "crisis," taking a seat in a carriage full of ladies is a small "crisis," and it is as difficult for any but an automaton to act by rule in one case as in the other. In all "social emergencies," great or small, the difficulty is first to get a rule which will exactly apply, and next to possess the presence of mind to act upon it. A man who would regulate his social deportment by the precedents in a book of etiquette, is like a man trying to govern his moral conduct by a pocket-treatise on Casuistry. The cases specified never quite tally with the cases as they actually arise. However ingeniously they be multiplied, a wide margin must still be left for the exercise of that "feeling and good sense" on which our Countess falls back in the last resort. In other words, good manners resolve themselves in a great measure into tact, and tact, unhappily, is a faculty not to be transmitted by book. An aid to a knowledge of "the thousand and one social observances" of modern fashionable life is not to be despised nevertheless, and we cordially wish our anonymous Countess success in her attempt to "level up" the manners of the masses to the standard of "the best circles." Only is it quite clear that "the best circles" are so very well mannered? Is it not a well-ascertained psychological fact that ill-breeding may be as congenital in a duchess as in a milkmaid?

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

VI.

PICTURES of life and of manners, known in France under the somewhat absurd designation of genre, form in our own Academy, as indeed in all Exhibitions whether at home or abroad, the most numerous class. And what strikes the observer as a little strange is that painters of this sort, whose name is legion, have in all countries attained to pretty much the same proficiency. Possibly it may not require any very distinguished ability to do justice to an old woman scraping a carrot or scouring a kettle, and thus in this humble sphere of art all the world is found on an equality. Yet we would not scoff at a school which in the past has numbered Wilkie, Leslie, and Hogarth, and at the present moment counts Faed, Webster, Hardy, and Horsley. An art, however, thus restricted in sphere is apt to repeat itself in thought and treatment, just as the ordinary events in daily life, from the cradle to the death-bed, fall into dull routine and hackneyed incident. Thus Mr. Thomas Faed, R.A., has so oft struck the chords of the domestic affections, has taken us so many times—and perhaps scarcely once too frequently—into the cottar's home of honest poverty, that, as in the songs of Burns and the tales of Crabbe, we know the refrain by heart. The painter, however, in his principal picture this year finds a new idea and a fresh model. "Only Herself" (119) is an old woman, who at the moment we write may probably be seated on a doorstep in Kensington; her face, which is well known to passers-by, has been worn by time and care into rugged masses eminently picturesque. Mr. Faed substitutes for the High Street a rustic stile and a hedgerow as the background to his picture; and he completes the composition by throwing in a couple of children painted to perfection. The pathos of the picture is simple and true, a praise, however, which it is impossible to extend to a sentimental street-sweeper, besom in hand, said to be "Homeless" (73). The catalogue informs us that "God tempers the wind to the lamb that is shorn." A short poem, apostrophising a street besom, seems all that can be needed to move spectators to tears as they gaze on this somewhat mawkish picture. The Academician's brother, Mr. John Faed, has never produced a better work than "John Anderson my Joe" (824). Wilkie could scarcely have hoped that his influence for good would have survived so long even in his native land. And yet curious visitors who crowd before this popular picture persist in praising most highly the teapot and tea-cups on the table—such is the fame that awaits the artist who appeals to the eye and not to the imagination. Yet the painter who in this day aims at realism seldom fails of reward. It may be worthy of note how opposed is the manipulation which Mr. Thomas and Mr. John Faed severally bring to bear on like scenes of humble naturalism. The handling of the elder brother is broad, the colours are broken, the textures sometimes rough. Mr. John Faed affects just the opposite qualities. Smooth, clean painting pleases ordinary people; a vigorous touch is the delight of artists. Genre painters, as we have said, are plentiful, for no less than three bearing the name of Hardy are here present, and a fourth is absent only because he has been driven to the select Exhibition reserved for the rejected. Mr. F. D. Hardy, as usual, comes out the strongest of the lot; indeed, "Baby's Breakfast" (484) would not be unworthy of M. Edouard Frere. It is long, too, since Mr. G. Smith has exhibited so good a picture as "A Game of Speculation" (54). A Fairy Tale (464), by Miss Stair, is perhaps the best picture by a female artist. The two Messrs. Burr, brothers, again after an interval of full four years gain a place on the line. These Scotchmen seem intent on emulating the bad example of their predecessor Sir David Wilkie; in other words, we behold them in the act of transit from low to high art; yet, unfortunately, what in their pictures they may deem low is high, while what would fain be high turns out low. "The Escape of Queen Henrietta" (854), by Mr. G. H. Burr, and "The Intercepted Letter" (875), by Mr. J. Burr, are tainted by melodrama; the style is a medley. In art, as in higher matters, it is impossible to serve two masters; it is hard to reconcile pictorially life in a cottage with the ways of rank or fashion.

Rustic subjects seek new developments. As soon as the arts in Europe became secularized, the whole life of man, and the entire world of nature, were thrown freely open to the painter; the carpenter's shop became scarcely less attractive when St. Joseph withdrew from it, and the landscape did not lose its beauty because the Three Kings were left out. Picturesque peasants now take the place of Holy Families, and some of the most popular of pictures are simple compositions of figures with landscape. Among the artists who thus succeed the best are Mr. Mason, Mr. Walker, Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Brennan, and Mr. Boughton. "A Wayside Cross, Brittany" (765), by Mr. Boughton, lies, as it were, on the boundary line between sacred and secular styles, and pleasingly combines figure incidents with landscape surroundings. There is quietude, pathos, devotion, in this rustic gathering round the wayside cross; the picture, indeed, in sentiment is not unlike the works of M. Breton, the colours are broken into sober tertiaries, the greens pass tenderly into greys Mr. Brennan, like Mr. Boughton, owes much to foreign schools; his two contributions, "Preaching in the Coliseum" (832), and "Il Tamburino" (783), are noteworthy studies of texture, quality of colour, and just relation between high sunshine, half-shade, and full shadow. In these last eminently artistic qualities our painters are taking lessons from the French. Among the styles which now shadow forth the future of our English school, that affected by Mr. Armstrong in "Hay-time" (375) is the most obnoxious to old-established prejudices Where on earth do such long and lanky ladies live in undisturbed contemplation of inner consciousness, rejoicing in a bodily presence ungainly, even ugly? These figures appear in size out of all proportion to any good they seem likely to effect in the realms either of nature or of art. The composition is defiant of established rules, the colour may be accepted as not an unpleasant mixture of chalk and water mildly flavoured But Mr. Armstrong has sufficient talent to attract attention; his picture, if not quite to be admired, may be wondered at, the artist is possibly but passing through a limbo of strange vision ere he reach the sanity of nature

Three pictures, holding prominent positions in one room—"Aurora in Romagna, Peasants from the Mountains on their way to Rome" (461), by Mr. W Linnell, "The Old Gate" (485), by Mr. F. Walker, and "Girls Dancing" (438), by Mr G. Mason—seem to point to that poetic unison between nature and the life of man which artists both in France and England are now intent upon making impressive. The pictorial method consists in bringing figures and landscape into mutual response and reciprocity of sentiment, so that there shall subsist a oneness in colour, light, shade, and expression. This treatment may be accepted as a reversion to the grand Italian manner The old painters sought to ennoble landscape by human interest; thus Salvator Rosa, in a grand woodland scene, introduced the Baptism of St. John, and in well-known pictures in our National Gallery, Poussin pressed into his service Dido and Æneas, while Claude brought to the shores of a seaport the Queen of Sheba. Our English painters, living in plain, naturalistic days, scarcely permit themselves like flights of imagination Yet Mr. W. Linnell loses little by painting what his eyes have seen in Romagna, the actual is often stronger than the ideal; here noble figures march solemnly amid woodlands glowing under the warm twilight of the Campagna. The execution is disappointing on close examination; the idea makes the picture. Three Linnells—the father and two sons—are present in the Academy. This contribution by Mr W. Linnell is alone up to the standard of former years Mr. Walker combines, in a way peculiar to himself, plebeian forms with poetic sentiments. "The Old Gate" (485) is scarcely a success The figures are scattered too far asunder, the centre of the picture is a void, the pigments are unpleasantly loaded and opaque, and a prevailing red in the colour may leave the impression that nature was originally made out of brickdust. But the work, of course, has redeeming merits, there are shadowy, quiet passages, delicious in harmony; the pencilling of the trees, too, against the clear sky is delicate and true, and the figures, as in the picture of "Vagrants" a year ago, stand in grand immobility; humanity thus, when least adorned, is noblest. The picture has power of colour, and a refulgence of light tempered by shade Another romance in thought as in colour is Mr Mason's lovely composition, "Girls Dancing" (438). The idea is akin to classic times and the land of Italy. A young shepherd, Pan-like, is seated with lute in the cleft of a tree, and before him maidens dance gracefully with arms upraised and castanets in hand. Beyond, as from many a headland round Amalfi or Castelamare, stretches the blue Mediterranean. This pastoral or idyl has music in it; there is a dying cadence in the colour, a plaintive melody in the sentiment. Yet Mr. Mason disappoints the expectations raised by the "Evening Hymn" of last year; indeed, several of his contributions to this Academy are woefully slight and sketchy—little more, in fact, than mere rubbings in, left in vague suggestion. The artist's manner will, it may be feared, shortly settle into irredeemable mannerism.

Landscape art becomes many-sided; styles are multiplying in variety; schools are growing distinctive and pronounced. At one time there was a danger that so-called Pre-Raffaellitism would swallow up the whole of nature, but having accomplished its revolutionary mission, artists are now left in freedom, according to individual talent, to do the best they can with outward creation. Yet there always will remain two distinctive, if not opposing schools, the one of small detail, the other of largeness and of breadth; the one literal, blindly loving, doting on simple foreground flowers, the other imaginative, far-seeing, embracing in one wide circuit plain, mountain, and sky. It is scarcely needful that we should stop to criticize styles which never change even over a period of ten or a dozen years. Little new can be said of the works of Mr. Creswick, Mr. Lee, Mr. Sydney Cooper, Mr. Ansdell, or even of Mr. John Linnell. We turn to younger men—Mr. Vicat Cole, Mr. Leader, Mr. Peter Graham, Mr. MacWhirter, Mr. Raven, and others. Mr. Raven we remember as Pre-Raffaellite, and in proof of the good schooling he got from that creed may be taken a woodland scene (268), with water below, and slumbering reflections, and chasing sunshine and shadow among the silent hills. The artist's handling is still a little hard, yet this thorough student work has intelligent purpose. Mr. Vicat Cole and Mr. Leader, we believe, are still supposed to stand in that foremost rank whence possibly the Academy may make its next elections. Of course the contributions of these artists are at least equal to the ordinary run of Academic landscapes, yet perhaps of late men less known have advanced more Still "An English Riverside Cottage" (63), by Mr. Leader, is solid, considerate in form and effect, thoroughly mature and deliberate. In passing, we would call attention to a work singular for mastery and originality of manner, "The City and Fortress of Lerida, Spain" (248), by Mr Anthony. Mr. Vicat Cole exhibits a scene dramatically wrought, "A Pause in the Storm at Sunset" (412). Perhaps the artist is almost too confident of his ends, and not over careful in the use of his means, the foreground is rather slight and hasty, and the sky somewhat coarse in the laying on of colour Still the conception is fine, there is fire in the sky and shadow upon the earth, and light and colour play into, break, and modulate the slumbrous shade. There is a warm blush even in the coolest recess. The successive distances lead off into space till the hill-top is reached where the sun has sunk into rest. "The Great Pyramid" (888), as painted by Mr Dillon, is also poetic; it is not easy to bring so much colour and sunlight into tone and relative keeping The brothers Danby, sons of the great Danby of "The Deluge" and "The Opening of the Sixth Seal," have naturally the poet's inheritance. But they seldom perpetrate anything more terrible than a sunset or a sunrise "North Shields, Sunrise" (842), by Mr. J. Danby, is supreme for high-wrought harmonies. Mr. Brett has been so badly served in the Academy that he seeks refuge among the rejected in "the Select Supplemental Exhibition." There it is worth while to go to see "Evening off the Menai Straits," which was the best work the "Supplemental" found to hang. This picture is one of the most subtle and lovely studies of cloud strata and of opalescent sea we remember to have seen, Vandervelde is comparatively without atmosphere or colour. Altogether, this is the most accurate study of sky and cloud brought this year for exhibition; some four species of clouds, such as cirrus, stratus, cumulus, and nimbus, may be distinguished in relative aerial perspective with correspondent tones and colours. For surface-texture, and for balanced relation of iridescent colour under light, this picture has scarcely been surpassed either in ancient or modern times. Also remarkable is that tender poetic study of complex sky, "Looking Eastward at Sunset" (369), by Mr. Hering. Perhaps Mr Cooke, R A, is rather violent in contrasts "On the Lagune of Venice; Evening before Bad Weather" (885), the passages in quiet half tone have most value. Altogether the Academy gives evidence that our artists look more into the sky than formerly; atmospheric phenomena, thanks in some measure to the progress of science and to the observations of meteorologists, are better understood and delineated with more truth of detail by modern painters than by the old masters. There are studies both by Mr Davis and by Mr. Henry Moore which indicate an eye ever watchful over the fleeting aspects of earth and sky; what is hard and motionless in the permanent articulation or anatomy of landscape receives, as the features of the human countenance under passing emotion, intelligent expression, when the wind moves among the trees, or sunshine glances brightly across valley or moorland.

Landscapes more than usually noble in motive and comprehensive in wide imaginative sweep we owe to Mr Peter Graham, Mr. MacWhirter, Mr. MacCallum, Mr. Bierstadt, and Mr. Hook. "On the way to the Cattle Tryst" (76) is the best justification yet given by Mr. Graham of the high expectations raised by "The Spate in the Highlands" Grand are the mountains in shadowy gloom, bold the rocky summits mingling with mists. Mr. MacWhirter—another Scotchman whose mind seems burdened with dark visions of black mountain solitudes the cradle of wild storms—has an impressive picture, "Loch Coruisk, Isle of Skye" (23). There is an echo of the wild wail of Ossian in this northern landscape art; the serrated outline of these mountain masses cutting sharply against the clear sky is savage. Such pictures support the theory that terror is the element of the sublime. We have hinted at the comparisons which may be instituted between the divers treatments of sky and cloud; not less interesting are the thoughts suggested by the varied management of mountains; indeed, the pictures here exhibited are illustrative of truths in physical geography, such as structure of the earth's crust, influence of climate, character of vegetation, &c. From this point of view, there is a marked opposition between northern Scotch landscape as painted by Mr. Graham and Mr. MacWhirter, and that scenic and sunny panorama, "Among the Sierra Nevada Mountains, California" (309), by Mr. Bierstadt. The former is, to borrow a favourite alliteration from Mr. Ruskin, grand in mountain gloom, the latter in mountain glory. Equally opposed too are divers national styles in manipulation and technical quality. Mr. Bierstadt has naturally acquired the mechanical touch and somewhat too vivid contrast of colour which signalize the school of Dusseldorf. Reverting to Scotchmen, we find almost a disdain for detail, their handling is as negligent as the scenery they paint is rude. Mr. MacCallum has studied so much abroad that his style is less national than cosmopolitan; thus that forcible and brilliant transcript of "The Black Wood of Rannoch, Perthshire" (276), recalls at first glance the large scenic manner of M. Gustave Doré. Lastly, never to be forgotten is the delight which Mr. Hook has given by that fresh and breezy scene from ocean, "Caught by the Tide" (332) The children cling to the rugged rocks tremblingly, as the rising waves swell to the shore. The tide has onward movement, the artist, with a free hand and wholly unconventional manner, has given to the ocean its transparent depth, its translucent colour of blended grey, blue, and green. On the whole, we have never seen landscape-painters in greater strength or ... iety, partly because our essentially national art now for the first time receives fair t... atment. These and other benefits we owe to the handsome and ample building in which the Academy is at length happily housed. We close our review of this year's Exhibition with bright hopes for the future.

RACING AT ASCOT.

THOUGH the Wednesday in the Ascot week is considered somewhat in the light of an "off" day, it was relieved on this occasion from anything like insipidity, not only by some real good racing ... d some real good riding, but also by a continuance of startling surprises ... milar to those which created so much excitement the day befo... In the first place, Lord Falmouth's candidate for the Derby of 1870, Kingcraft, came out with an immense reputation, and having been tried vastly superior to Gertrude, the winner of the Queen's Stand Plate on the preceding day, was regarded as an absolute certainty for the Seventeenth Triennial, for he was only opposed by Mahoma and Claudius, and Gertrude beat Mahoma out of sight in the race referred to. Yet now, in Fordham's hands, Baron Rothschild's filly always had the best of Kingcraft, and as he could not quite get up at the finish he suffered defeat by a head. Another instance this of the incomprehensible in-and-out running of Baron Rothschild's horses to which we have frequently drawn attention Both Mahoma and Kingcraft are by King Tom, and the defeat of the latter, who is one of the finest looking two-year-olds that have been seen this season, is excusable on account of his not having been as yet thoroughly trained. He will show to much greater advantage at a later period of the year. Immediately after this upset came another, for which we can offer no possible explanation. Martyrdom, Ryshworth, Alpenstock, Scottish Queen, Lord Hawthorn, and brother to Ravioli, met at even weights in the Eleventh Biennial over the Old Mile. After Martyrdom's easy victory over Pero Gomez the day before, it seemed impossible that he could be beaten by any of this lot; but beaten he was, and easily too, by both Alpenstock and Ryshworth, the victory of the former so totally upsetting all public form as to make it hopeless to attempt a satisfactory estimate of the relative merits of the three-year-olds, which will, we fancy, cause much trouble and bewilderment to handicappers. Even the Ascot Derby, in which Pero Gomez had only to beat Consul, Good Hope, and Scottish Queen, was no bloodless victory for Sir Joseph Hawley's horse, who ran in difficulties all the way up the straight, and only won by sheer gameness. After the race he appeared so very shaky on his legs that it is no certainty that he will be able to stand a preparation for the St. Leger, unless, indeed, complete rest does wonders for him. The Fernhill Stakes, for two and three year-olds, at weight for age, fell to Frivolity, who beat a good field of winners, Pâté, Perfume, Atlantis, Bosworth, and Vagabond—Verdure alone of the seven being a maiden. Taking into account the great performances of Perfume over half-mile courses, and the good form recently shown by Atlantis and Pâté, the easy victory of Frivolity—by four or five lengths—stamps her as quite the flying filly of the year. There were twenty-two runners for the Royal Hunt Cup, one of the prettiest races of the meeting, and why Plaudit was handicapped to give Hermit 4 lbs. we are unable to understand However, it did not much matter, for neither of them had a chance, and it was melancholy to see three horses—Hermit, Plaudit, and Suffolk—whose names were once on every one's lips, finishing, under fair racing weights, the last three in a mile race. The issue was left to the two four-year-olds, See-Saw and Cock of the Walk ... ho were well handicapped at a difference of 21 lbs. Blue Gown gave Cock of the Walk 29 lbs. last autumn and beat him, and again See-Saw, in receipt of 12 lbs., beat Blue Gown in the Cambridgeshire, so that on these data the difference between See-Saw and Cock of the Walk could be pretty accurately estimated. It was a fine race between these two, and Fordham, whose horsemanship was never shown to better advantage than last week, just landed Lord Wilton's horse the winner by a neck, after a most brilliant finish. See-Saw, about the most mercilessly abused two-year-old, except The Earl, of modern times, has somehow survived the treatment to which he was subjected by his then owner, has carried off as a three-year-old such valuable prizes as the October Handicap and the Cambridgeshire, and has now begun his four-year-old career by winning the Royal Hunt Cup. We need not give the names of all that were behind the leading pair. Border Knight looked formidable opposite the Stand, but refusing to struggle at the finish was only a moderate third; Argyle, much talked of, was not at all conspicuous; and the bulk of the field were ... idely scattered. It is a speciality of the Royal Hunt Cup that the favourites nearly always finish in front, and a good many of the outsiders only run for the exercise, and in the hope of finding favour in the eyes of handicappers on future occasions. The Coronation Stakes wound up the day, and Martinique had no difficulty in securing this rich stake from four moderate opponents, though she fell lame immediately after the race. The ground, in fact, was rather hard going than otherwise, and the horses' legs suffered considerably during the week.

The Cup day is, of course, the great day of the week, and was, no doubt, duly enjoyed by all those who love to stare or be stared at The Royal party drove up the course in the usual manner, and with the usual attendants; but Lord Cork's showily-actioned horse, which he handled with considerable skill, ple... than anything else in the procession. The Windsor ... anything but elegant, and some of the appointments, notably the saddles, boots, and stirrup-leathers of the postilions, and portions of the harness, proved convincingly that the responsible official in the department of the Master of the Horse took things easily. A show like this depends for its success as a whole on the exact accuracy of all its parts; but unfortunately the effect of State and official celebrations in England is increasingly marred by the dowdiness of the details The ladies—or their dresses—commanded the undisguised admiration of the populace, but the gentlemen of the party did not appear to be adequately appreciated, if we may judge from the remark of a worthy yeoman which we happened to overhear. As the fair occupants of the Royal Stand accepted, one by one, the arms of their escorts to the luncheon-room, this estimable p... expressed his astonishment, not unmixed with displeasure, that they should allow the servants to hand them out in that familiar manner The racing was good enough for a day when not one person out of ten even looks at the horses, and it commenced with another Ascot surprise Duke of Beaufort, fourth in the Derby after being nearly knocked down at Tattenham Corner, had only to beat Tasman, Strathnairn, and Dunbar, and could not accomplish it, the last-named, who is half-brother to See-Saw, but has never hitherto shown more than plating form, making all the running, and winning in a canter. Then Pandore, the celebrated Caller Ou's first foal, beat Badsworth, and Typhon beat Antietam, better known as brother to Chattanooga, though, had the latter been able to get through at the distance, the result might have been different. After this came the Cup. There were only five runners out of the seventeen entered, but they were a very select quintet They were Formosa, winner of the Oaks and the St. Leger last year, Brigantine, winner of the Oaks this year, Blue Gown, a winner of the English, and Trocadéro, a winner of the French Derby, and Thorwaldsen, winner of the Gold Vase. Blue Gown looked far the fittest of the five, being full of muscle, and in fine condition, albeit he has not grown much since last year. Formosa was much admired in the paddock, but we missed that brilliant burnish on her coat which was her characteristic last year. Instead of shining like polished metal now, it looked dull and faded. Brigantine looked light and thin, and pleased but few, and Thorwaldsen we did not see. The competitors were paraded as usual in the Royal enclosure, but as Thorwaldsen could not behave decently, he was removed elsewhere, not, however, before he had nearly killed a policeman. Trocadéro made the running at a wretched pace for a mile and a half, and Brigantine made a waiting race of it till within half a mile of home. The result was a well-contested match between her and Blue Gown, and both ran with great gameness; but the weight was all in favour of the three-year-old, and she won cleverly by a length. Thorwaldsen ran most ungenerously throughout, and lost ground at every turn, yet he was only a neck behind Blue Gown, and the winner would have had hard work to beat him from the Ditch in at Newmarket. Formosa was never dangerous at any point in the race, and Trocadéro was eased, with a view to his engagement in the Alexandra Plate. Blue Gown by no means disgraced himself, for Sir Joseph Hawley is reported to have said, after the Oaks, that Brigantine would have won the Derby had she been in it, and Blue Gown fairly stretched her neck. It is a pity that she is not in the St. Leger, for she would have had an excellent chance of rivalling the triumph of her half-sister, Formosa. The New Stakes, the principal two-year-old event of the meeting, came next, but though there were fourteen runners, they were mostly of the second-class, and Sunshine must have beaten them all had she started. The colt by Thormanby out of Blue Bell, who won on the Tuesday, was considered the best public performer, but he carried 5 lbs. extra, as also did Roquefort and Moonstone, while Atlantis carried 9 lbs. extra. Yet Lord Falmouth's filly only lost the race by a head from Temple, who, it will be remembered, was third to Sunshine and Green Riband at Epsom. Remembering how easily Mr. Merry' filly won the Woodcote Stakes at the finish, we are not incline to attribute much importance to this performance. Moonston never showed in the race, but we think nothing of that, and it would have been all the better for him if he had not bee brought out at all before the autumn.

Of Friday's racing we need not say much. Five started for th Alexandra Plate—Restitution, Trocadéro, Romping Girl, Bluckskin and Tabouret. Not a very grand field for a valuable prize, but Restitution, from his make, was the best adapted of them to carr 10 st., and he won cleverly from Trocadéro, who occupied a simila position last year. As times go and as horses go, it is a mistake to give a thousand pounds for horses carrying 10 st. and upward over three miles, and it is more clear every year that the race is a failure, and had better be abandoned, and the money otherwise expended. Duke of Beaufort did just manage to beat Standard Bearer for the last race of the meeting; but if that is his best, it is bad indeed, and the truth appears to be that the three-year-olds this year are wretchedly mediocre. The other runner for the Sixteenth Triennial was Vestminster, who broke down during the race. It is curious that all three were bred and nominated by the Duke of Beaufort.

On the last day of the Ascot week the first sale of the Middle Park yearlings took place at Eltham. Mr. Blenkiron must hav had much anxiety as to the results of his sale this year, on accoun of the depreciation in blood stock, owing to the glut in the market and the ruin and retirement of so many racing men. He was doubt less agreeably surprised at getting rid of fifty-two out of fifty-five youngsters for 12,640 guineas, or an average of 243 guineas each. This leaves a very handsome profit to the breeder, to which he is well entitled for his enterprise and judgment. That the days of high prices are not altogether gone was proved by the fac that a half-sister to See-Saw fetched 1,800 guineas, and a colt by Newminster out of Battaglia 1,000 guineas. It was generally considered that a better-looking lot of yearlings was never turned out, even from this celebrated nursery of thoroughbreds, and the young Gladiateurs, the first of his progeny, attracted in particular great attention. It is curious that while the Buccaneers are winning so many of our great races, his stock in Austria are selling for a mere song. At the recent sale of the Imperial yearlings a son and a daughter of Buccaneer went for 65 and 37 guineas respectively, and the highest price given for one of his get was 220 guineas. Yet this was from no deficiency of money, for a colt by Bois Roussel fetched 440 guineas, and a few days previously a colt by Blair Athol was sold for 500 guineas. It would be curious to know why, when our breeders would give any money to get Buccaneer back again to England, the Austrians themselves seem to care little or nothing about him as a sire.

REVIEWS.

THE SUBJECTION OF WOMEN.*

THE first fruits of Mr. Mill's retirement from Parliament are to be found in the essay whose title we quote, which will be studied by his more ardent followers with enthusiasm, and by all his readers with interest. It displays in a high degree many of the qualities for which he is distinguished—the power of logical arrangement, the capacity for compressing into a few pages the essence of a long train of thought, and a fulness and weightiness of style, giving dignity to many reflections which in other writers might appear to be commonplace. It shows in an equal degree a quality for which inattentive readers would not, until lately, have given him credit—an almost passionate enthusiasm in the cause which he advocates. People who know Mr. Mill only from his Logic or his Political Economy generally failed to recognise the hints, which might be occasionally detected even in those writings, of a certain fervour of temperament which we do not expect to find in a philosophical speculator. Everybody has now had the opportunity of observing it in his political career. The zeal with which he attacked Governor Eyre, and proposed a revolutionary scheme of Irish reform, must have convinced those who disagreed with him that the last fault with which he could be plausibly taxed was that of a cold-blooded indifference to human interests. It is only fair to say that no man is more ready to denounce in the most generous spirit anything which in his opinion savours of injustice, and to throw himself, regardless of consequences, against every kind of social or political tyranny. He may be very wrong in his opinions, but at least his faults are due to an exaggerated generosity; they are not the faults of a mean or cynical nature, but of one which forgets even logic in its hatred of oppression. If any new proof was wanting of this tendency, he has given it in his present essay. Many men in talking of women's rights show, not merely a dislike to the eccentricities of their advocates, but a certain jealousy of the claim of equality of those whom they hold to be inferior beings. They admit with reluctance any proofs of feminine intellect, and manage to make their compliments as insulting as their abuse. From this fault at least Mr. Mill is as free as it is possible for a man to be. He seems at times to be anxious to establish rather the superiority than the equality of those whom he describes as our "slaves"; and we may therefore assume that women have found in him an advocate whose zeal is equal to his ability, great as that undoubtedly is, and have consequently the very best face put upon their pretensions.

Mr. Mill is not one of those writers whose argument can be compressed into a sentence or two. It would of course be easy to sum up in a few phrases a compendious account of his opinions and to supply an equally compendious refutation. In fact, however, we must admit that his essay fails chiefly on the side of insufficiently developing his theory; and it will therefore be fairer, without affecting to compress once more what is already so closely packed, to indicate as shortly as we can the general nature of his argument and to point out the omissions which, in our opinion, take away some of its force. The essay, then, is divided into four chapters. The first is intended to rebut the general presumption against the truth of his theories; the second points out what are the particular social arrangements of which he complains; the third is designed to prove the capacity of women for profiting by the proposed changes; and the final chapter is an answer to the question, what definite good results are to be anticipated? The purpose of the whole essay is summed up in the first page, where the author announces his intention of explaining the grounds of an opinion which he has held with constantly increasing strength of conviction:—

> That the principle which regulates the existing social relations between the two sexes—the legal subordination of one sex to the other—is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement, and that it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality, admitting no power or privilege on the one side, nor disability on the other.

The first chapter, after dwelling on the difficulties of attacking a position resting on so many prejudices and associations that the burden of proof is thrown upon the advocate, instead of the assailant, of an equality which in all other cases would have a general presumption in its favour, proceeds to argue that experience is really in his favour. Not only, he argues, has there never been an experiment of any other than the existing system, but such inferences as we can draw from history are in favour of a change. In all other cases, there has been a gradual transition from compulsory to voluntary arrangements. In old times society was founded, to an extent which we can scarcely realize, upon the law of superior strength. Nobody, except philosophers or saints, saw anything wrong in the principle. By very slow degrees slavery was gradually abolished, though within the last forty years Englishmen might buy and sell human beings, and within the century might kidnap them, carry them off, and work them to death. Women, however, are still slaves by law, and if in some respects better off than ordinary slaves, in others their position is even worse. The dependence of women on men is, in short, a relic of barbarous times; it has "not lost the taint of its brutal origin", and, standing alone amongst modern ideas on all others but this most important point, it is as though "a gigantic dolmen occupied the site of St Paul's and received daily worship, whilst the surrounding Christian churches were only resorted to on fasts and festivals." The argument that the distinction rests upon a difference in the nature of men and women is, it is urged, irrelevant, because the nature of women is the artificial product of this very subjection. It is a parallel to the argument that, because a cottier deeply in arrears to his landlord is not industrious, therefore the Irish are "naturally" idle. As a matter of fact we know little philosophically as to the nature of women, and few men know much about more than one side of the nature of one or two women. If, however, they are disqualified by nature from any employments, we may trust to free competition to find it out. We do not make laws to provide that only strong-armed men shall be blacksmiths, we leave it to the weak-armed men to find out by experience that they can do better elsewhere.

The presumption against equality of the sexes being thus remitted, what are the evils due to a neglect of the principle? The most prominent evil, according to Mr. Mill, is the state of the marriage-law. A husband has absolute rights over the person and property of his wife. "She can do no act whatever but by his permission, at least tacit. She can acquire no property but for him, the instant it becomes hers, even if by inheritance, it becomes ipso facto his." The system of settlements only evades this partly, and only in the case of the richer classes. The husband alone has legal rights over the children. And from this state the woman has no power of withdrawing herself. Mr. Mill remarks that the consideration of the propriety of divorce is foreign to his purpose; but that, if the present system is permitted to continue, the only alleviation possible would be to allow a woman to change her master, and that alleviation is forbidden. Of course many, indeed most, men do not push their rights to extremes; and women have a resource in what Mr. Mill calls "the power of the scold, or the shrewish sanction", but, as it is, a tyranny exists the results of which, besides great misery to individuals, are summed up in the phrase that "the family is the school of despotism, in which the virtues of despotism, but also its vices, are largely nourished". There is of course no difficulty in showing, by the ordinary reasoning, that arbitrary power causes many evils, even if in a majority of cases it is moderately exercised, and, in many, exercised with all possible wisdom and benevolence. The argument, however, to which Mr. Mill is chiefly concerned to reply is the obvious one that when two people ride a horse, one must sit behind. When two people are intimately connected, one must have the deciding voice. In answer to this, he says that voluntary partnerships do not necessarily imply that one partner is to have the entire control; although such a principle would be less dangerous in cases where the union may be dissolved at will. He admits that men will, as a rule, take the largest share in supporting the family, and will so far have the more potential voice, but he thinks that these matters may be left to voluntary arrangement in each case, and that, as in practice some sort of compromise is amicably affected, except in unfavourable cases, the law might correspond to the facts Matters, he says, are not improved by making the husband a despot whose concessions may be recalled at pleasure and without warning Meanwhile the effect of the present law, even where no advantage is taken of it, is, he contends, to encourage the husband to hug himself in the consciousness of his power, and the more decidedly in proportion to his unfitness for its exercise

The third chapter, after shortly noticing the claims of women to the suffrage, deals chiefly with the question of the supposed inferiority of the feminine intellect It is a curious consideration, says Mr. Mill in one of those skilful turns of argument for which he has so great a talent, "that the only things which the existing law excludes women from doing are the things which they have proved that they are able to do." There is no law, that is to say, against women writing poems or composing music, but there is a law forbidding them to take part in politics. Now Mr. Mill regards it as certain that women are able to govern, and, in some respects, peculiarly well qualified for government To prove this, he refers to such cases as Queen Elizabeth and Margaret of Austria, and he denounces the argument, or the "bad joke," that women govern better than men, because under women men govern, and under men women We cannot enter into so wide a question, but there is something to be said for Turgot's form of the remark, that no woman ever chose a woman for her Prime Minister Queen Elizabeth is a commonplace instance, but students of history may doubt whether the glory of her reign would properly fall to her or to such Ministers as Cecil and Walsingham. To this Mr. Mill replies, that women at least have a capacity for selecting the best Ministers, and he goes into a long argument, showing that the various feminine qualities—intuitive perception, quickness of apprehension, versatility, and so forth—eminently fit women for government To say the truth, this strikes us as one of the weakest parts of his book, for the very reason which he has explained elsewhere, that we possess as yet no philosophical analysis of the distinctive character of the sexes. It is easy by an à priori method to prove that any talent whatever is likely to be useful in government, and Mr Mill omits the one quality which is after all the most essential, and in which women are supposed, at least, to be inferior. The governor must, above all things, be able to govern—that is to say, he must be strong, and no special pleading will evade the importance of this quality. It does not, of course, follow that women should be entirely excluded from all departments of public business Turning to other talents, Mr. Mill labours to prove that, although no woman has hitherto attained the first rank in any intellectual or scientific department, the opportunities of women have hitherto been so small that we have no right to expect such a result The want of feminine musical composers, which is the chief difficulty of his case, is accounted for by pointing to the difference between amateurs and professionals, and the want of any thorough training of women in the higher branches of the art, especially in Germany and Italy—the only two countries that have produced great composers. Further, he remarks upon the time spent by women on frivolous pursuits, saying that whatever a woman does is done at odd times, and on the degree in which love of fame is discouraged as positively unfeminine This whole chapter, though able, is of necessity occupied with a rather hypothetical argument, and betrays an eagerness to make the most of every point which detracts from Mr Mill's usual appearance of candour.

The final chapter is, we think, more eloquent and less open to dispute than the remainder of the book Its purpose is to insist upon the advantages to be anticipated from the elevation of women to an equality with men, the doubling of the mass of available faculties, the removal of a sense of injustice; the improvement in the tone of public opinion, so far as it depends upon women, the more intelligent direction of charity, the encouragement to wives to aid their husband's aspirations, instead of bringing him into bondage to Mrs Grundy, the improvement of the happiness of married life when men and women can regard each other as equals, and mutually assist in each other's labours These and other topics of a similar character are insisted upon shortly but forcibly, with Mr. Mill's usual skill in investing threadbare subjects with a certain interest and novelty. All we need say is, that most of the proposed benefits would result from an improvement of the feminine intellect rather than from an alteration in the legal position of women.

We have thus followed Mr Mill through an argument which deals, as will be seen, with a vast variety of subjects, in some of which no one can do more than make a probable conjecture. Up to a certain point most people would sympathize with him; but it may be that he would be very little thankful for their going nine miles in his company unless they are prepared to proceed for the tenth. Thus it is difficult to put too strongly the importance of raising in every way the standard of the feminine intelligence, and of enabling women to choose lives full of great interests, instead of a hopeless round of frivolity. We may admit, too, that women, when their cultivation approaches the masculine standard, may develop talents not at present suspected, and even that they may share or appropriate to themselves some fields of labour from which they are now excluded. Indeed, if one circumstance were altered, Mr. Mill's whole argument would be not merely powerful, but absolutely conclusive If women were simply men in a different dress, only distinguished by certain peculiarities of temperament and by varieties of physical constitution, the present restrictions would be utterly indefensible. By all means, we should say, throw down all barriers, remove all invidious privileges, and leave free competition to distribute the functions of life indifferently. But women are not men, and that undeniable truth reminds us that Mr. Mill has neglected one fact, which, to say the least, has a considerable bearing upon marriage laws. He has discussed marriage with scarcely any reference to its effect upon sexual morality. He has therefore neglected to answer the strongest argument that can be brought against him. We may grant that it is desirable that women should have the widest possible scope for the faculties they possess, it is to be hoped that those faculties may turn out to be as great as Mr. Mill can possibly suppose; but it is also important, in an equal degree, that the standard of feminine purity should not be lowered. There is, it may be, much unfairness in the present state of our social arrangements, but at least they secure this important point, that women as a rule are far more moral in some respects than men of the same class. The family, says Mr. Mill, is the school of despotism, but it is also the school of certain virtues of modesty and purity which are of the highest importance to the interests of mankind. A Mahommedan, it might be replied, would urge the same argument in favour of the complete seclusion of women, he would be wrong, we admit, in enforcing extravagant precautions, but it does not follow that no precautions are necessary against one of the most powerful of human instincts Conservatives may be extreme in their opposition to all relaxation of discipline, but they are not only excusable, but are amply justified, in looking with great carefulness at any tampering with existing laws. It might be the height of folly to admit Eastern women at once to the freedom of intercourse which we can safely indulge in European countries, and the fact upon which Mr. Mill insists so forcibly, that the feminine nature is so much the product of artificial regulations, may suggest the serious danger of acting rashly in altering them suddenly. Mr. Mill, for example, guards himself against pronouncing upon the propriety of divorce "in the sense involving the liberty of re-marriage" He would, however, apparently allow an indefinite facility of separation—which, indeed, follows almost logically from his premisses. Complete equality of rights would be meaningless unless the partners could separate on any hopeless divergence of opinion. In the American States, whose example is quoted in favour of the separation of property, the power of divorce has been generally carried to an extreme, and, if not a necessary, it is at least a highly probable, consequence of the proposed principle. It is therefore strictly relevant to inquire what are the probable results of a system which, at first sight at least, is highly prejudicial to sexual morality. Not only may it be fairly maintained that an unlimited power of divorce is likely to be demoralizing, but it would also appear to be in many ways conducive to tyranny. Mr. Mill takes no notice of the circumstance which materially mitigates the "slavery" of women. If the wife is the slave of her husband, he is at least bound to have only one slave. This implies a certain reciprocity of no little importance. The husband gives up a right the use of which would generally tell to his advantage When two people live together on such intimate terms, it will be a general result, not of positive law, but of the nature of the case, that one will be chiefly dependent on the other; and in most cases the ruler would, for obvious reasons, be the strongest and the best able to shift for himself. If the husband could dismiss his wife at pleasure, or make her so uncomfortable as to be forced into assenting to separation, a new weapon of oppression would be put into his hands. The woman is, and is likely to remain, as Mr. Mill admits, far more dependent than the man on her family and household life, if the man could break it up at his pleasure, he would have a mode of coercion which probably would be even more efficient in many cases than those which the law now puts into his hand. The indissolubility of the marriage tie, except under certain defined circumstances, acts as a protection to the weaker partner in the concern, and Mr Mill's theories obviously tend to weaken this bond, though it may be doubtful to what extent he would go. We do not state this as a conclusive answer to all Mr. Mill's complaints, some of which, indeed, appear to have a very sound foundation; but it is a view of the case which he cannot avoid simply by refusing to pronounce upon the question of divorce.

The same omission tells also against the argument for the free admission of women to professions. Admitting in the fullest way that women might admirably discharge many functions from which they are at present excluded, it does not follow that a breaking down of all existing limitations would of necessity cure more evils than it would cause. That women should be mingled with men in all the employments of life may be desirable if we look at it merely from the point of view of the utilization of all existing talents. But the moral question is also one of supreme importance, and it is that upon which the simple principles of free trade and open competition fail to throw any light. The weak-armed, as he truly says, will not be blacksmiths, even if the forges are left open to everybody to enter; women will, on the same principle, only take to those trades where they can make money, but it does not follow that they will avoid trades which are demoralizing, though not unprofitable. As a fact, we have been compelled to ex-of the market. If women are to be doctors, lawyers, and preachers, according to their tastes, it may probably be necessary to enforce regulations against certain obvious dangers as much as in the case of mines or field-labour. If women are now hot-house plants, as Mr. Mill says, we must be very cautious how we suddenly plant them in the open air. It is the general indifference of the advocates of women's rights to these obvious considerations which tends as much as anything else to prejudice sensible people against them, and we can only regret that Mr. Mill's book, though full of eloquence, of generous feeling, and in many places of views which appear to be sound as well as striking, should be exposed to the same objection. We do not know, as he says, very much about the nature of women as it might be manifested under a system of absolute equality; but we do know this, that men and women differ very profoundly, and that the relation between the sexes is one with which it is exceedingly dangerous to play tricks without much consideration and a careful feeling of the way.

THE DATE OF PSEUDO-ENOCH.*

ALTHOUGH we have described the apocryphal Book of Enoch at tolerable length (Saturday Review, May 8), we should scarcely have exhausted the subject did we not say something of the opinions that have been promulgated concerning its origin According to the declaration of the Book itself, it was written by the mysteriously translated Enoch, father of Methuselah, and great-grandfather of Noah; and a belief that such was actually the case was deemed at least reasonable by no less a person than Tertullian, although he admits that it was not received by some (a quibusdam—a mild expression, which may be held to signify the Church in general), nor even admitted into the Jewish canon In fact, he thinks its rejection has been somewhat hasty, being merely grounded on the hypothesis that a work written before the Flood must necessarily have perished in the general destruction. Those who argue in this way, he maintains, ought to bear in mind that Noah was the descendant of Enoch, and had no doubt heard of the admirable qualities and exceptional privileges of his great-grandsire among the most creditable traditions of the family. We read, too, in the Book itself, that Enoch wrote at least a portion of it for his son Methuselah, and for those who might come after him and keep the law in the last days. The passages showing this, it should be remarked, are not to be found in the fragments preserved by Syncellus, and therefore furnish a link in the chain of evidence which tends to prove that an Ethiopian text corresponds to the book possessed by the early Christians. Since one of the objects of Enoch in enunciating his wisdom to Methuselah was to diffuse it among posterity, there is nothing absurd in the supposition that Noah took the place of his progenitor as an instructor in divine knowledge, and even if the written book was destroyed by the Deluge, he might have retained the contents in his mind. An analogous case is presented in the annals of the Jews When Jerusalem was taken by the Babylonians, a general demolition ensued, but nevertheless the sacred writings survived the calamity. Considering all this, and likewise bearing in mind that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God," we may conclude that a book so wholesome, and withal having in its favour the testimony of Saint Jude, ought not to be lightly esteemed, especially by Christians, though Jews may find a pretext for disregarding it, on account of the Christian tendency of some of its revelatio[illegible] So reasons Tertullian in his treatise De Cultu Fami[illegible] but, as Dr. Laurence observes, his arguments "will not for a moment preponderate in the rigid balance of modern criticism." Indeed, the references that are made by Enoch to the "Ancient of Days" and the "Son of Man," far from rendering plausible a belief that the book was written before the Flood, tend to show that it is more recent than the Book of Daniel. On this point all critics seem to be agreed. Enoch must, by common consent, be turned into Pseudo-Enoch, and the question left open to controversy is respecting the interval that elapsed between the appearance of Daniel and that of his obvious follower.

The common stand-point being settled, it is of course assumed that the allegorical history of the Jews, contained in what Dr. Dillmann considers to be the fourth part of the Book, though ostensibly prefiguring the future, really records the past, and that Pseudo-Enoch could not have written till all the really historical events recorded had taken place, though of course it is to be conceded that he looks to a coming day when he talks of the Kingdom of the Messiah. Now the herdsmen set over the sheep, intended to represent the people of Israel, are 70 in number, and these seem afterwards to be divided into groups of 36, 23, and 12. The slight discrepancy between the items and the sum total—which is increased if, with Dr. Laurence, we read 37 instead of 36—is the least material difficulty that presents itself, for, if it comes to the worst, we may set down 70 as a round number, not intended to be too accurate. But who were the historical personages whom the 70 shepherds represent? This is the important query, and every one who recollects the extreme complexity in which the history of the East became involved when the successors of Alexander ruled over Syria and Egypt will at once perceive that it is not to be answered in a moment. Indeed we cannot imagine a prettier amusement for a gentleman of studious habits, who is blessed with a rainy holiday, than to lay open before him the Book of Enoch and the Antiquities of Josephus, and to endeavour to establish such a harmony between vision and fact as shall at once satisfy the requisites of historical criticism and of Cocker.

However, the point being settled that the 70 herdsmen preceded the appearance of Pseudo-Enoch, the query who they were is of considerable importance when viewed in reference to the date of that event. Dr. Laurence, to answer it, counts on his fingers the number of the kings who after the defection of Jeroboam reigned respectively, and satisfactorily makes up the number 37. True that, to arrive at this number, he avowedly omits Jehoaz, the son of Josiah, on the side of Judah, and Zimri, Zechariah, the successor of Jeroboam II., and Shallum, on the side of Israel; but then, as he explains, the first of these reigned only for seven days, the second only for six months, and the third for one, wherefore they may all be fairly struck out of the account, just as, when one takes an estimate of the state of one's banker's book, one disregards the pence. If you want to prove that the number of the wives of our eighth Henry is identical with that of the books of Moses, you naturally follow that monarch's example by getting rid of Anne of Cleves. Thus the 37 herdsmen are the Kings of Judah and Israel after Solomon, Q. E. D. But if this result is authoritatively satisfactory, it is less so when judged with reference to historical details. The herdsmen are all represented by Pseudo-Enoch as objects of the Divine wrath, and it would be rather odd, as Dr. Dillmann remarks, if they comprised the pious kings Hezekiah and Josiah. The twenty-three herdsmen, according to Dr. Laurence, are successively the Babylonian, Persian, and Macedonian monarchs, while the twelve who make up the seventy (more or less) are the subsequent Jewish princes, counted inclusively from Matthias, father of Judas Maccabæus, to Herod the Great. It was, therefore, under the reign of the last-named monarch that Pseudo-Enoch flourished; but he did not survive Herod, otherwise he would have seen the division of the kingdom into three parts, and would have necessarily increased the number of herdsmen. Therefore, also, the year 36 B.C., or thereabouts, is the date of his book, and it was bout a century old when cited by Saint Jude.

Dr. Dillmann, partly for the reason already indicated, refuses o include among the herdsmen all the kings preceding the captivity, and thinks that the rule of the 70 shepherds, representing a foreign supremacy, begins with the reign of Jehoiakin, the penultimate King of Judah, who sat on the throne as a Chaldean vassal. Referring to the prophecy of Daniel (c. 9), according to which 70 weeks are to elapse before the reign of the Messiah, and assuming that the 70 years appointed by Jeremiah (c. 25) re thus expanded into 490 (the week being a mystical expression or seven years), he finds one more expansion in the supposed prediction of Enoch, who transforms the years into so many reigns of heathen princes, which of course might be of long or short duration, and might even comprise contemporary oppressors, since it was notoriously the fate of the Jews frequently to suffer under more than one tyrant at the same time. The number 70 he thus decomposes, 12+23+23+12, observing that the two mean and the two extreme figures are respectively equal to each other. The four terms are so many periods, the first is that of the Babylonian captivity, the second that of the government under the Persians, and the other two that of the Greeks (or Macedonians), the fourth being distinguished from the third as a time of more grievous [illegible] The result of his calculation, which we cannot [illegible] in detail, [illegible] assign the date of the Book of Enoch to the time of Hyrcanus Dr. Dillmann's choice in this respect is, however, confirmed by other than arithmetical considerations Contemplating the general purport of the work, he considers that it is written with the view of calling back the Jews, whose religious principles had been greatly undermined by contact with the Gentiles, to a feeling for their old religion, and especially of reviving in them that hope in a coming Messiah which it is certain had been nearly extinguished Nor, when we consider the compass of the book, and the amount of study and thought required for its composition, can we suppose that it was produced at a stormy period. While the first Maccabees were fighting with all their might and main, there was [illegible] or opportunity for the [illegible]position of pr[illegible] exhortations, especially when these were blended with astronomical instruction. But the period of comparative repose which followed the victories of the valiant brothers Judas and Simon—the period when the religion of Moses and patriotism had become identical, and the hopes of a Messiah were again revived—was eminently favourable to the production of the work, and such a period is represented in the person of Simon's son, Johannes Hyrcanus There is a fact too which we have hitherto left unnoticed, and that is the mention in the Book of Enoch of the Parthians, who, according to both Dr. Dillmann and Dr. Ewald, were not well known in Palestine till the same Hyrcanus joined Antiochus Sidetes in the expedition against them mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. xiii. 8) The assigned date of the Book of Enoch, in pursuance of this theory, is about 110 B.C.

Dr. Ferdinand Filippi, who, though he has written many theological works, has but recently appeared as a controversialist on the subject of Enoch, takes a view widely different from either of those that we have recorded, and the arguments with which he supports it display remarkable ingenuity and acuteness. To Ethiopian scholarship he makes no pretence, but he cites, as unquestionably accurate, the translation of Dr Dillmann, while he is altogether opposed to him in the interpretation of the book. His treatise is also valuable as a summary record of the various opinions that have made their appearance on this debatable ground since Bruce's discovered treasure was made known to the world; for our readers must not suppose that the only division is that which separates Dr Dillmann from Dr. Laurence. Dr. Ewald, with whom Dr. Dillmann agrees in many points, considers that the book was commenced somewhere about the year 144 B.C., and gradually increased in bulk through subsequent additions. Another contends that the allegorical history culminates, not in Johannes Hyrcanus, but in his son, Alexander Jannæus; while a third, Dr. Volkman, effecting a tremendous chronological leap, and assigning Pseudo-Enoch to the age of the Emperor Hadrian, declares that even the Messiah contemplated by the seer is no other than Bar-Cochba, who headed the Jewish revolt against the Romans towards the middle of the second century, and certainly assumed the sacred character.

Dr Filippi, differing toto cælo from Dr. Volkman in other respects, so far agrees with him that he looks upon the last twelve herdsmen, not as Greeks, but as Romans, and he attaches much importance to certain eagles which towards the end of the tale appear as tormentors of the chosen race, and do not seem previously to have received the attention they deserve. His own theory, in the main, is one that has probably suggested itself to those of our readers who have carefully read the passages from the second "parable" which are cited in our former article, and in which the character of the Messiah is described. The theory, in short, is this—that the Messiah contemplated by Pseudo-Enoch harmonizes too well with Christian ideas to be a result of purely Judaical thought, and that the author of the book was a Christian. The use of the expression "Son of Man" in Daniel (c. ix.) is too exceptional to have furnished a precedent for the frequent use of the same expression by Pseudo-Enoch as an epithet proper to the Messiah, and still more repugnant to the Jewish notions is the "Son of Woman."

A still more cogent argument in favour of Dr Filippi's theory is afforded by a portion of the allegorical history to which we have not particularly referred. After 58 of the shepherds have passed away, and the rule of the last twelve (Greeks, according to Dr Dillmann, Romans, according to Dr. Filippi) has begun, the white sheep give birth to lambs, which, amid the sufferings inflicted by birds of prey, piteously but vainly cry to their parents. The horns that spring from the heads of the lambs are plucked out by ravens, but presently one of them is distinguished by a large horn, and is at once surrounded by others whose eyes are then opened. The efforts of the ravens to pluck out this horn likewise prove futile. Shortly afterwards the Lord of the Sheep (the Deity) takes up the "staff of wrath," and the destruction of the hostile beasts ensues, the birds and beasts of prey, the 70 herdsmen, and the blinded sheep being all consigned to subterranean flames. The old house of the sheep is likewise demolished, and then a new house is built by the Lord of the Sheep, in which all the surviving birds and beasts of the earth, including the sheep whose wool is white, fall down and worship. When the eyes of all have been opened and the house is full, a white bull is born with large horns, and all the rest of the animals are changed into white bulls after his semblance, the chief of them being the Word. Out of the passage which we have thus abridged Dr. Filippi makes a very strong case against the Jewish origin of the book. During the rule of the Romans the lamb appears, and is acknowledged by those of the flock whose eyes are opened, being no other than the Saviour. Subsequently the old house—that is to say, the Temple and city of Jerusalem—is destroyed by the Romans, and in its place is erected a new house, which is the Church of Christ. The white bull is of course the Messiah, whether the book is interpreted in a Jewish or a Christian sense; but the acuteness of Dr. Filippi is shown by his hypothesis that the whole narrative embodies a belief in two advents—the lamb being the Redeemer in his humility, the white bull the Redeemer in his strength and glory as judge of the world. Now a second advent, he argues, is wholly inconsistent with the Jewish idea of the Messiah.

In the fifth part of the book the warnings of Enoch to posterity are accompanied by a very summary history of the world from the beginning, divided into seven periods called "weeks," in accordance with the expression used by Daniel. The first period is manifestly that during which Enoch was born, and which consequently preceded the unholy loves of the angels. The second period clearly comprises the wickedness terminating with the Deluge, the third and fourth are respectively those of the call of Abraham and the mission of Moses, the fifth is signalized by the building of Solomon's Temple, the sixth is that of the degeneracy that ensued after the division of the kingdom, and terminates with the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar. Although the characteristics of these six "weeks" are indicated with the utmost brevity, they do not seem to have given rise to any serious controversy, and it is also agreed that the "seventh week" extends to the immediate past of the writer. This period, however, is rendered illustrious at its close by the appearance of an eternal Plant of Righteousness, who will reward the elect by giving them sevenfold instruction respecting his whole creation. To this "Plant," in the opinion of Dr. Filippi, no person in the whole Jewish history, after the first destruction of the Temple, can possibly correspond, except the Christian Saviour.

Besides the seven weeks, an eighth, ninth, and tenth have been mentioned in a previous chapter, where the passages referring to them seem so strangely placed that Dr. Laurence does not scruple so to transpose them that they appear as a supplement to those just described. If the seven weeks bring us down to Pseudo-Enoch, it is manifest that all that is said with respect to the other three must be considered prophetic in the strict sense of the word. Now during the eighth week, which is designated one of righteousness, the righteous will subdue the wicked; and during the ninth righteous judgment is to be revealed, and all works of the ungodly will vanish from the earth. The tenth ends with the last judgment and the appearance of the new heaven as predicted in the

... of Dr. Filippi's reasoning, which is supported by several minor arguments, is this—that Pseudo-Enoch was a Christian who wrote shortly after the destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem by Titus. Consistent with this view is an opinion that the Book of Enoch was originally in Greek.

There is one point with respect to this curious book which we have scarcely touched upon, and which to some persons will be of the greatest interest, and that is its connexion with the General Epistle of St. Jude, whose words, according to the Authorized to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches, which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.'" The corresponding passage in the Book of Enoch reads thus:—"Behold, he comes, with ten thousands of saints, to hold judgment upon them, and will destroy the wicked and contend with all flesh concerning everything that the sinners and the ungodly have done and committed against Him" (chap. i. 9). Though the passages are substantially the same, the correspondence between them is not so close that we can regard the words of Jude as an exact quotation.

not only opposed to earlier critics, who look upon it as a compilation of fragments, produced at different periods, but he is dissatisfied with the view of Dr. Dillman that the work is by one author in the main, but has been enriched here and there with consummate skill by an interpolator. The book, the whole book, and nothing but the book, will content Dr. Filippi. Nevertheless he cannot bear to charge an Apostle with giving his sanction to the authority of a book which is clearly uncanonical, and propagating the belief that it is the work of an antediluvian prophet by whom theories, was encouraged by the passage in the Epistle, which was written before he commenced his labours. Enoch once selected among the saints of old, he freely made use of such material as was afforded to him by the stores of Jewish tradition. Jude might be acquainted with the tradition likewise, and had the advantage of inspiration in discerning the true from the false; and it is worthy of note that he does not expressly refer to a book at all, but simply quotes the words of the antediluvian Enoch, without stating the source whence they were derived.

STRETTON.*

If excess on either side is better than the dead level of mediocrity, Mr. Henry Kingsley may be congratulated, for in Stretton he has surpassed himself—which is saying much—and has produced a novel to which it would be difficult to find an equal. Always with original notions of style and grammar, his originality here takes still higher and more daring flights, and if the English language is to be written according to the model of Stretton, we must have new rules and principles of construction without delay. A peerless young man, a first-class Oxford man, says "Let you and I tackle to this regiment." The author himself asks of a certain Mrs. Evans, who is walking bareheaded under the dew and through the growing clover, with an Indian shawl dropping off her shoulders, and beating herself about the head with her clenched fists, "Is it her in the flesh, and has she gone mad?" Grave old college dons roll off the latest slang, and always speak of the young men who have come up to the University as "a team of boys"; and an Oxford Dean thinks it no shame to preach without a nominative, and to use English epithets in a French sense for the benefit of a rural congregation. He speaks of the "three Shropshire boys" now serving in India (during the mutiny) in this strain:—"In the very depth of the darkness of this furious imbroglio, the extent of which no man can measure, the end of which no man can see, I who preach to you have three boys, more deeply dear to me than my own life. They were committed to me by a man I respect and reverence beyond most men, and I did my best by them. Clever, petulant, furious, fantastic, you know them; you can all say that of them. Innocent, kindly, brave; you can all say that of them." We can fancy how Hodge and Joan would look at each other while this volley of fine epithets was being fired above their heads, and how they would wonder at what ever on airth the parson meant, and what ever was he driving at. But the Hodges of the book have the best of it. A young jeweller designs a "collier"—nothing so commonplace as a necklace—on the principles of the New Jerusalem; and an evil old village woman discourses in this fashion to Aunt Eleanor, the lady farmer and landed proprietor of the place:—"My husband's family have been vassals to your's for centuries. Coming from the manufacturing counties as I do, this vassalage seemed strange at first, but I have got used to it." Further on she says:—

"You will poison Miss Mordaunt's mind against marriage, Miss Eleanor. Beauty like her's should not go unused. Mordaunts and Evanses must not fail in the land; beauty, worth, valour, perfect openness, and perfect truth are too good qualities to be lost in the land; and where are they to be found unless among Mordaunts and Evanses? Ah! we may see Miss Mordaunt mistress of Stretton yet." Whereupon Miss Ethel, with her crest in the air, marched out of the room, with her riding-habit under her arm, and a look of high, cool, unutterable contempt on her face. "I will come back, Miss Evans, when this woman is gone," she said; but she might have gone upstairs without bruising her clenched hand against the banisters. "Mrs. Gray," said Eleanor, angrily, "you are taking great liberties." "Only with a Mordaunt. I love it; I love to make one of those snake-headed Mordaunts put their heads in the air, like an adder just before he strikes, I do it with the boys. They are a red-handed old lot. Why, that youngest one, Jimmy, her brother, nigh tortured your own nephew, Edward, to death at school, that you know. Mad love and bitter hate I love to play with a Mordaunt. Ha! ha!" "I'll trouble you not to play with an Evans, if you please," said Eleanor, calmly furious "No! no! not with a she-Evans. They get their stuff from the Merediths Do you remember your mother? Ah! to see her bareheaded, with her hands held up over her head—well, don't look like that. She was a Meredith, and so are you; your brother is an Evans. All the men-Evanses are soft; you can do anything with 'em you like, except resist them when they plead. Your brother took two of my sons to Waterloo, and only brought back one. They would have gone to the devil after him—and then—why, and then another man-Evans, your nephew Edward, kisses you, strokes your hair, calls you his foolish old woman, and makes you, a woman of spirit, do just as he pleases And he will live to break your heart as his father broke mine You wait till you are old, and see him spending your hard-earned money on them that will despise you Wait till you see him getting impatient for your death, and then remember my words."

Which we venture to say is the most remarkable harangue any old "trot," as Mr. Henry Kingsley calls his village dames, was ever heard to make before the grand lady of the place Only Mr. Henry Kingsley's own characters can show anything like it in fiction; while, happily, in society as it is, such a discourse has never been heard, and, we are bold to predict, never will be heard.

In the beginning of things, and indeed quite to the end of the second volume, it is next to impossible for the reader to make out the individuality of any of this renowned "team of boys" sent up from the Gloucester Grammar School to Saint Paul's College. They are all Evanses and Mordaunts and Maynards, and are all so rich and handsome, and so mixed up together, that they can hardly be distinguished the one from the other. To be sure one is staglike, another bovine, and a third has the head of a snake; one is Antinous, and another a Hercules, another again like a pretty girl, whose beauty and smallness and delicacy get bepraised and belauded in the most sickening manner; and one is a Berserker, and has Norse blood and Norse madness in him—how stale that old Kingsley affectation is! Roland, the hero of them all, though all are heroes in their way, is a "splendid upstanding young fellow, with short curling hair, who carries his head like a stag". and he does wonderful things in boating and classics and love-making and Indian soldiership. But the first time he and his four comrades are in at college lecture they have an unseemly schoolboy wrangle; and they are such baby innocents, though young men grown, that they do not know the difference between college and school, but think they are to be caned, and get lines, and have their liberty stopped, when the Dean tells them to wait after lecture When they get off with only an admonition to remember that they are men and gentlemen, they have a free fight on the stairs for joy. This kind of thing goes on all through, until it becomes inexpressibly wearisome, and without effecting its purpose. Mr. Henry Kingsley had it in his mind to show us a little knot of high-spirited gentlemen-like lads, fresh and innocent, while brave and manly, but he has drawn only a silly set of riotous bumpkins, irritating enough to have excused any one who had caned them all round. It is not so much the sense of life and vivacity that he has given us, as of noise, confusion, and folly. The whole book indeed has this one character of confusion The story is confused; the style is jerky, allusive, and difficult to follow; the characters are phantasmagoric, and run into each other; and, though plentifully described so far as words go, remain to the last in a nebulous condition, hazy and indistinct. Nothing is made out, nothing drawn in clearly, or touched incisively Persons, dates, and circumstances flit at random about the pages. and we never know who may not turn up hundreds of miles away from where we saw him last, with no apparent reason that should have brought him over. The whole "team" are united by such tremendous bonds of love and hate that there is no dividing them. For if one hates another, he loves the sister or the brother of his foe with so much warmth that for the sake of the common centre he agrees to sink all differences and to be as loving as the rest. And they all love in a demonstrative manner rarely seen among Englishmen—a petting, caressing, womanly manner peculiarly Mr. Henry Kingsley's. And they all talk a mixture of blank verse and slang, the like of which no ordinary English gentleman is ever heard to talk under any circumstances whatsoever. But the funniest scene of all is where Eddy goes among the roughs on Saffron Hill. Some of them are up in London "seeing life," and Eddy chooses, as his particular form of that occupation, to go to Camden Town, and thence to a Bible Class in Saffron Hill, with his friend Allan Gray—the young jeweller who makes bridal necklaces on New Jerusalem principles. This account of the Ragged School in Saffron Hill is perhaps the most affected and insincere bit of writing in a book which is affected and insincere throughout. It is difficult to believe that Mr. Kingsley has ever seen what he has attempted to describe, and entirely incomprehensible how he could have condescended to such worse than womanish weakness in his delineation of Eddy. The scene is too long to be given in extenso, but the image of Eddy, a young collegian of seventeen, first of all audience helplessly, "I don't know anything about teaching, but I know the Acts in Greek, and I have been used to class and lecture," then asking them all what they had got to live on, is something too absurd. Had Eddy been a little country girl instead of a young collegian, he could not have been a greater fool, nor could Mr. Kingsley have taken more pains to show how very foolish he is. "But, Sir," said Eddy, puzzled and startled, speaking to an old sailor in the class who argues about St. Paul's tramping it from Gaeta to Rome—"but, Sir, if you haven't got any money, we might give you some of ours." This is after college experience, and boating, and the bargees. Also says Eddy on the subject of tramping:—

"How very pleasant! Why on earth did you come here? Do you mean to say that you went on from one place to another, without caring where you slept, in this beautiful summer weather? I should like that immensely"

When it was explained to this cherubic innocent that they had nothing, and that, tramps as they were, they naturally wanted to eat and drink, his reply is.—

"I always thought you had barrows of cherries, or grindstones, or vans with brass knockers, when you went on the tramp. I always thought it looked so pleasant" "We hadn't got no money," said the sailor. "I have not got any either," said Eddy, wishing to awaken a fellow feeling somehow, but feeling very much at sea "My eldest brother has taken away my money, because he was afraid I should make a fool of myself, and my brother is a very talented young man, with a singularly good judgment"

As unnatural in another way is Allan Gray, who speaks to a drunken woman thus.—

"What a very foolish woman you will find yourself if once you have sufficient resolution to bring your mind to bear upon it, you know. You should bring your mind to bear upon questions of this kind, and should not take action in this rapid and illogical manner. You should think the question out"

This is because the woman wants to get at Eddy, who has protected her by knocking her husband down, the cherubic innocent having science, if no end of folly Again, when this amiable young gentleman goes home escorted by Allan Gray, the meeting between him and his elder brother Roland is curious, to say the least of it. It must be remembered that they are all young men, and that even Eddy, though not quite up to his brother, being a "light-weight" and fond of jewellery, is far above the average in intrinsic manliness and brains, not to speak of skill and courage:—

Roland, the scholar and the athlete, had his square-sided snake-like head bent over his books when the two came in. He was sitting in his shirt-sleeves, and he caught sight of his brother first, and Allan saw him drop his pen, and noticed that the two brown hands turned themselves with their palms uppermost, and spread themselves out to meet those of the brother. Allan, standing in the shade, saw this, but saw more. He saw a bright light in Roland's face for one instant, which he knew, but which I have a difficulty in describing. The eyebrows were elevated, and the mouth was slightly parted, and from between the parted lips the soul said, "My darling! my darling! where have you been?"

Does this strike the reader as being anything like what Roland Evans would have said? This Allan Gray is Roland's elder brother, and the rightful heir to the estates. He is the son of a low marriage made with "old trot's" daughter, when Captain Charles Evans was a young man, just before Waterloo; but he had been mixed up and shuffled about with another baby born in the Grays' cottage at much the same time, and no one but Phyllis Myrtle, another "old trot" much given to sentiment and gin, and her confidante Mrs. Maynard, a woman of position, know that the babies were changed when the one who was not Squire Charles's died; and that Allan Gray, now living as a New Jerusalemite in Camden Town, is really the lawful heir of Stretton, and the eldest and legitimately born son of Squire Charles. However, both young men being heroes in their way, here is no grasping on the one side nor holding back on the other; and both being penetrated with the love of humanity far more than with anything like self-concern, the claims and the defence are put into the hands of the solicitors, and the only confusion likely to arise seems to be in the contention who shall be most generous. A compromise is effected by the lawyers, and our heroes finally meet in India, where Roland is doing good work in the common-sense way of military defence, and Allan bitter mischief by his New Jerusalem and untimely preaching. After having released the Berserker Jim Mordaunt, who has got into trouble by some exhibition of the Norse madness not approved of by the Rajah of Belpore, Allan goes away quietly to be killed; after which the Shropshire team pull through all their troubles, and come home to fine fortunes, pretty wives, and a general hurrahing of the villagers:—

> So ended the pageant, and so ends my seventh story. My boys were very dear to me, but they have passed into Shadow-land for ever; the two Mordaunts, the two Evanses, and Maynard. Of all the ghosts of old friends which I have called up in this quaint trade, called the writing of fiction, only two remain with me, and never quit me. The others come and go, and I love them well enough; but the two who are with me always are the peaked-faced man, Charles Ravenshoe, and the lame French girl, Mathilde.

We can assure Mr. Henry Kingsley that the "quaint trade" he follows would be rid of no little rubbish if he would leave it and its ghosts alone; or at all events, if he must follow it, let him follow it with some amount of simplicity and truth, some kind of regard to nature, common sense, and the rules of art. He ought to remember that failure has a reflex action, no less than success; and that careless work, conceit, and bad grammar are safe to ensure failure, if indulged in to the extent in which he has permitted himself to indulge in them in this silly book of impossibilities and affectation.

HABIT AND INTELLIGENCE.*

IN his recent series of essays on Habit and Intelligence Mr. J. J. Murphy has attacked the problems which lie around the bases of life and thought from an original standing-point, as well as with much freshness and vigour of reasoning. The title of his book is felt by the writer to call for somewhat of explanation. The work itself, however, will be found, after a few preliminary steps by way of defining and justifying his peculiar terminology, to embody fairly enough a substantive, and in many respects a novel, system of ideas as regards the most fundamental processes of being and mind. The word "habit" is employed by him in a sense unusually wide, but, as he fairly urges, in a sense which is strictly accurate, and well fitted to form the nucleus out of which his scheme of philosophy has taken its growth and shape. He means by "habit" that law "in virtue of which all the actions and the characters of living beings tend to repeat and perpetuate themselves." This principle, [illegible] need scarcely point out, is but th[e] extension to the facts and operations of organic or intelligent life of a postulate which is popularly known as one of the primary laws of motion in the domain of physics. A wave or pulsation of life or mind, like a material body in motion, will continue to pulsate or flow till arrested by some opposing force or obstacle. In the organic or vital sphere there is, moreover, a distinctive or differential principle of action, and that of a twofold character. Not only is every living organism distinguished by the capacity of growth, but the perpetuation of force, based upon this law of growth, holds good, not only in the individual, but in the offspring. Just as the early and simple law of motion aforesaid has been expanded into the modern principle of the conservation or indestructibility of force, so does it come to little more than a truism to say that vital or mental energy has its effect through every stage of inherited being. The same law which is incontrovertibly true in physics may be no less conclusively established as a fundamental law of life and mind. What is the law of association of ideas, of which so much is commonly made as a fundamental law of mind, but a particular instance of the law of habit? A large part of Mr. Murphy's treatise is occupied with tracing and systematizing the laws under which habits form themselves, disappear, alter under altered circumstances, or vary spontaneously. Bishop Butler was probably the first to take note of the fact that active habits strengthen, while passive impressions weaken, by repetition. Mr. Murphy shows these effects, by an ingenious process of reasoning, to be both traceable alike to the influence of the same law. He even goes beyond this, and makes it clear that this law is not confined to mental and voluntary actions, but has its foundation far down in the unconscious life. The power of medicines and stimulants, it is well known, is diminished by constant use. Another instance is seen in the action on the heart of a blow or sudden fright, like an electric shock. First comes a momentary cessation or slackening of the heart's action. Next, if the shock is not sufficient to cause death, follows a quickening of the heart's action, the well-known "beating of the heart." Suppose the stimulus or shock to be repeated, its intensity being the same, its effect will become less with every repetition. The heart, that is, is acquiring the habit of not making any response to it, just as the sleeper acquires the habit of not making any response to the bell. Still more curious is the instance of climbing plants, like the passiflora gracilis, cited from Mr. Darwin. The tendril which will yield to the slightest pressure of a twig, or to a weight the 32nd of a grain, will show no heed of the contact of other tendrils of the same plant, or of the falling of drops of rain. The tendrils have acquired the habit of neglecting these—a wonderful instance of vegetable instinct. That animal organs grow by exercise is a fact which has an important bearing upon the same law of development, extending to all vital actions—formative, motor, and mental. Through a chain of proofs, varied and subtle, yet firm and of growing tenacity, Mr. Murphy expands this fundamental idea. From the primary forces and motive powers of the universe he passes on to the chemical energies involved in the combination of elementary powers, and from them to the laws of crystallization, with the analogies and distinctions between crystals and organisms, whence we advance to what is called the chemistry of life, and its results in the multiform phenomena of animal organization. The chapter on the "dynamics of life" deserves particularly to be pointed out as an example of the writer's power in grasping the results of the deepest physiological and biological research, and combining them with what is known of the elementary substances and forces which go to make up the ultimate tissues of animal or plant. Throughout organized nature may be traced the great principle of the "assimilation or storing-up of energy," to be transformed at need into functional, motor, or intelligent force.

The word intelligence, used as it is by the writer in its familiar sense, hardly calls for definition. It will not be questioned by any one that intelligence is found in none but living beings. But it is not so obvious that intelligence is an attribute of all living beings, and is co-extensive with life itself. In his use of the word Mr. Murphy includes not only the conscious intelligence of the mind, but also "the organizing intelligence which adapts the eye for seeing, the ear for hearing, and every part of an organism for its special work." He is not much given to quoting authorities, beyond a few leading thinkers and writers of the day. Nor does his reading seem to have extended widely or deeply into the literature of the past. He seems scarcely aware how much of the ground gone over in the course of his speculations was covered by the "vitalist" controversy originated by Stahl a century and a half ago, and recently revived in France. It has been the generally received doctrine that the organizing intelligence and the mental intelligence are two distinct intelligences. Mr. Murphy's position is that they are not distinct, but are two separate manifestations of the same intelligence, which is co-extensive with life, though it is for the most part unconscious, and only becomes fully conscious of itself in the mind of man. Intelligence assumes in our author's scheme the central position which in the more fanciful system of Schopenhauer was occupied by the will. Habit is in itself, he argues, obviously an unintelligent principle. "No intelligence is involved in the mere tendency to repeat an action or to perpetuate a character." But when the laws of Habit and of Intelligence have been laid down, it becomes a question whether intelligence is itself an ultimate fact, incapable of being resolved into any simpler elements or agencies, or only a resultant from the quasi-mechanical laws of habit. This question, as treated by the writer, it is hardly an exaggeration to describe as "by far the most important of all problems now under scientific discussion, and perhaps the most important that science can ever have to consider." In its solution are bound up interests beyond those which attach to science in the abstract. In the course of the argument the mind is almost unavoidably brought to the borders of a region external to that which is usually regarded as the domain of science. Such subjects as the origin of the universe, the origin of life, the nature of intelligence, and the nature and ground of the moral sense, suggest questions which, if they are to be answered at all, must be answered from data not to be found in the visible world. It would seem to be from no indifference to this class of questions, but rather from a conviction of their transcendent importance, that the author has forborne to enter upon them in the present work. They are, we are glad to hear, to form the subject of a distinct work, already in progress, called the Scientific Bases of Faith. In the meanwhile we are pleased to listen to a writer who has so firm a foothold upon the ground within the scope of his immediate survey, and who can enunciate with so much clearness and force propositions which come within his grasp.

From the point of view adopted in the present work the leading problem divides itself into two—the one concerning the unconscious intelligence that organizes the body, the other concerning the conscious intelligence of mind. The investigation of the nature of the organizing intelligence involves the question of the dawn of organic life, as well as that of the later stages of organic growth and development, which, since the publication of Mr. Darwin's great work, may be said to have attracted more interest than any other scientific question of the day. Mr. Murphy professes his agreement with Mr. Darwin in the belief that all species have been derived by descent, with modifications, from a few simple germs, possibly from a single original germ. He further agrees with him in attaching great importance to "natural selection among spontaneous variations," as part of that agency by which the modifications have been effected. But he is altogether opposed to Mr. Darwin in believing that the wondrous facts of organic adaptation cannot all have been produced by natural selection, or by any unintelligent agency whatever. In his chapter on organization, for instance, after disowning all connexion with the exploded notions of "final cause," as having no place in scientific parlance, he dwells strongly upon the idea of "purpose" as peculiar to and constitutive of organized structure, and as having in nature "analogies with man's work." The relation of means to purpose is with him a higher analogue of the relation of living structure to function. For instance, the relation of the structure of the eye to the function of seeing is something which has no analogy whatever in the inorganic creation, but which has analogies in machinery and other apparatus of man's invention. The eye is, in fact, a camera obscura. No man of the simplest intelligence can deny the existence of the most complex and wonderful adaptations in the organic creation. Are these, then, but so many cases of the simple or mechanical law of cause and effect? It has been maintained with great knowledge and ability by Mr. Darwin in his Origin of Species, and by Mr. Herbert Spencer in his Principles of Biology, that the laws of cause and effect are adequate to account for all adaptations; that the adaptation of the eye to light, for example, has been produced by the direct and indirect action of light upon countless generations of living beings; and so of all organic adaptations. From this theory Mr. Murphy totally dissents. It is his belief that the relation of means and purposes in organization is as much a primary law of nature, and as incapable of being resolved into any other more general principle, as the relation of cause and effect itself. As we ascend the scale in nature to higher and higher vital functions, we find the relation of cause and effect less traceable, and that of purpose more so. Nowhere in the universe, he argues, is the relation of means to purpose more conspicuous to us than in the organs of sense in the higher animals, especially in the eye and the ear. Yet nowhere is it more difficult, not to say impossible, to assign any physical cause for the structure which these wonderful organs have assumed. And as we rise in the study of nature, not only do the separate functions become more widely traceable, but their mutual relations become more definite. The trunk, the leaves, and the flowers of a tree have each their function, but it would be unmeaning to ask whether the tree exists for the leaves, or the leaves for the tree. In all the higher animals the parts manifestly exist for the whole, and the whole for the parts. The purposes which biological science reveals to us are, in fact, only relative purposes. As Kant acutely remarked, all the parts of an organism are mutually means and ends; all the parts ministering to each other and to the whole. If we ask what absolute end is served by this wondrous play of means to relative ends, physical science, Mr. Murphy justly reminds us, gives no hint or suggestion of any answer. He is, however, in error when he lays down the distinction that purpose, as manifested in intelligence, is not equally discoverable in the inorganic creation. What reason can there be for asserting that the laws of heat or gravitation, or the chemical properties of bodies, are either more or less designed for or directed towards an end or purpose, than the laws of structure or of formation which biological science makes known to our minds? Nor is this the only source of confusion which Mr. Murphy introduces into this portion of his argument. While repudiating the use of "final causes," as an exploded expression in science, he makes it by implication a charge against the science of the day that it has neglected, and even abjures, all reference beyond that of cause and effect, in other words, that it confines itself to phenomena in their sequences or immediate causes, without pursuing them to their ultimate cause or purpose. He here places himself in a logical dilemma. If he refuses to include the relation of means and purposes in organization within the general relation of cause and effect, he virtually, though explicitly protesting against the charge, denies the universality of the law of causation. If, on the other hand, he finds fault with advanced science for stopping short of a sphere where the universal relation of cause and effect ceases to hold good, on what logical wings, we should like to know, is he going to sustain himself in an atmosphere too attenuated for all known processes and conditions of thought? What our author objects to in Mr. Darwin is that that philosopher throws no light upon the origin of life as distinct from the origin of species, or from successive steps in the evolution of living forms. Professedly accepting to the full the theory of development, Mr Murphy holds the theory to be incomplete as yet Beyond all recognised forms, however much modified by descent under the laws of gradual and successive development, he would go back further still to some "one originally vitalized but unorganized germ." This germ, he believes, "must have been vitalized by the same Creative Power that gave their origin and their properties to matter and energy." Our author is here trespassing upon ground which he has marked out by anticipation for his promised work upon the basis of theism. To account for the origin of life, or the origin of matter, forms no part of the programme of science, in the strict or positive sense in which science is at present understood. It was in no sense that which formed the subject of Mr. Darwin's special and characteristic theory. To trace within the range of ascertained forms of life, and throughout the entire record of organized being, a uniform law of sequence and unbroken chain of development is quite another thing from assigning a date to the beginning of life itself, or giving laws to a power which must in its very nature transcend all that experience tells us concerning the forces or agencies that now exist. The very idea of creation, or of a beginning of things in the absolute sense, lying as it does beyond the scope of our experience, beyond even that of our power of conception, can find no place in the domain of science. There is, on the other hand, nothing in the peculiar hypothesis so carefully elaborated by Mr. Darwin which necessarily excludes the operation of an ultimate or first cause, or which is incompatible either with rigid theism or with the more developed or dogmatic forms of received theology. An uncalled for and excessive antagonism to the principle of development by natural selection, as well as to that of the psychological school dating from Hartley, and represented by Mill, Bain, and Herbert Spencer in our day, has been the means of betraying Mr. Murphy into fields of speculation beyond the proper province of his inquiry, no less than into inconsequences of reasoning which weaken our trust in his logical powers. There is so much of boldness and breadth in his conception of his subject, and so much fresh and genuine ability in his mode of making good his main positions, as to make us regret the more anything that might be taken for injustice in dealing with the arguments of an opponent.

THE MUNICIPAL HISTORY OF LONDON.*

THE reappearance, after an interval of forty years, of so well-known a book as Mr. Norton's Commentaries enables us to measure the enormous advance which has been made during the interval in the knowledge of municipal history. At the date of its first publication, the annals of London, as they were drawn by writers like Maitland from chroniclers like Grafton and Hall, disclosed little more than a monotonous succession of civic junketings, while, for a general inquiry into the subject of borough life, materials could only be found in the meagre treatises of Brady and Maddox, or in the larger and more recent compilation of Stephens [illegible] strictions of municipal suffrage by which it told on the general politics of the realm. The great collections of Thierry, and the well-known prefaces which first gave a philosophic basis to the study of communal institutions, were still unknown on this side of the Channel, and Sir Francis Palgrave had done little more than hint at his conclusions in a few reviews. To explore the history of London, therefore, in 1828, was simply impossible, and Mr. Norton did wisely in looking for firm ground in a running commentary on the long series of charters which recorded the gradual steps of its advance. Since that time, however, a mass of new materials has accumulated, in which the actual life of the great city stands revealed to us; the researches of M Delpit among its archives, the edition of the Liber de Antiquis Legibus by Mr. Stapleton, have been followed and completed by the publication of the Liber Albus and the Liber Custumarum in the series of the Master of the Rolls Of this immense addition, however, to our knowledge the new issue of Mr. Norton's Commentaries knows absolutely nothing, while the revision announced in its title has left every page disfigured by historical blunders which would disgrace a schoolboy. Hengest, for instance, "established his government over Kent, Essex, and Middlesex, and fixed upon Canterbury as his capital in preference to London." Egbert "fixed upon this city as the seat of his residence and the metropolis of his empire." Heriot is called a "Danish" burden. "The Bishop, who acted as a magistrate, was appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury." It is needless, however, to prolong a list of errors which occur on every page of the earlier part of this volume—errors no doubt evitable at a time when Hume could be cited as the source of information for our earlier history, but we can hardly think that the Corporation of London have exercised a wise liberality in encouraging a mere reprint. Some effort might at least have been made in this third edition to bring the book up to the historical level of to-day.

The municipal history of London divides itself into two great periods—the period of communal development, and that of mercantile restriction. The first ranges from the very dawn of its English history to the date of the battle of Evesham and the close of the Barons' war. The modern life of London seems to have begun in the revival of its commercial activity after the settlement of the Danes; its political importance as "the capital" dates only from the eve of the Conquest and the settlement of the Confessor at Westminster. That, like the bulk of the English towns, it had over formed part of the Royal demesne, there is the very strongest ground for doubting. The first step towards freedom in the ordinary history of boroughs is the commutation of the unlimited demands which could be made on them at the will of their lord, for a fixed annual sum, the fee-farm rent. By the acceptance of such a payment the lord of a borough, were he king or earl, parted at once with his actual proprietorship in the soil, and in the persons of the citizens; the borough became free, its inhabitants became "freemen." But no tradition of such a change exists in the case of London. There seems every ground for supposing, with Sir Francis Palgrave, that in this case at least the Roman mun[illegible] had survived the storm of the English Conquest, that it had practically retained its independence in the face of the petty kings of the East Saxons, and that the sole hold of the conquerors upon it lay in the presence of a royal reeve, the reservation to him of the higher criminal justice, and the exaction of specified royal dues. But if its freedom were a relic of Roman times, its inner constitution, as it survived unchanged from its first revelation in the Dooms of King Athelstan to the great changes of the Edwards, presented the most perfect image of the older Teutonic democracy. In form it was precisely identical with that of the country round it; the burgesses were grouped, for the purposes of the "free pledge," in their territorial sokes or gilds, as the husbandmen in their hundreds, gild-court answered to hundred-leet, alderman to hundred-man. The royal reeve served, in the borough as in the county, as the centre around which these separate powers and jurisdictions grouped themselves in a loose federal way; bishop and reeve presided in the general hustings-court as bishop and reeve presided in the shire-moot. But the whole of this simple and obvious organization was penetrated with the spirit of personal independence. The hereditary alderman presided, indeed, in the leet-court of his ward or gild; on solemn fast-days he gathered with his fellows round the reeve for consultation on the affairs of the town. But the real control was in the hands of the free burgesses themselves. They did service at the ward-mote for law or for government; suit or ordinance were decided by their "yea" or "nay." In the same free "yea" or "nay," thundered out more loudly as the great bell from the campanile of St. Paul's summoned the Folk-mote together in the church-yard, lay the rule of the city. All laws were passed, all elections made, all greater suits decided by the collective body of burgesses, gathered, as the Swiss freemen still gather, their own rulers and lawgivers, in the green meadows of Uri.

It was this free constitution which the Conqueror recognised when his charter confirmed to the men of London the rights they had enjoyed in the days of King Edward. Through all the great changes which followed on the Conquest, London remained the single untouched instance of English self-government. The free voice of the people was hushed in the deliberations of the Magnates or of the King's Council, but the Folk-mote beneath St. Paul's still preserved the tradition of the Witanagemot. It was this preservation of the old Teutonic tradition that made the political greatness of London of such vital moment for England under her foreign Kings. It was from the city which still preserved the rights she had enjoyed under Edward that the claim went forth on behalf of the nation at large for the restoration of the laws of the Confessor, for the charters, which recognised that claim, of Henry and Stephen and John. Stephen was emphatically the Londoners' King, in him they claimed, more for the people than for themselves, their "jus prærogativum eligendi," the right of nomination in the case of a disputed succession, it was the rejection of their cry for the Confessor's laws that overthrew the throne of Matilda, St Thomas was a son of the great city, the first Act of Henry II. was a confirmation of its freedom. By the close of his reign London was already pressing forward to the second step in its municipal advance. As yet the municipal influence had been seen in the extension to borough after borough of the liberties she had once exclusively possessed. The great democratic movement which sweeps quietly along, unnoticed by historians, from the days of the First Henry to those of the Third, found its source in the capital, and the charter of London is expressly quoted as their type by the bulk of the charters of the realm. But it is the direct influence of the parallel movement in the north of France, which is seen when Earl John and the Baronage, gathered with the Folk-mote to decree the deposition of Longchamps, granted that the City should henceforth be a "commune," bound as the communes of Amiens or Noyon by the joint oath that knit burghers into fellow-citizens. John, in fact, the clearest-sighted of the Angevins, saw throughout the political importance of London, it was to his desire to win its goodwill that the City owed the crown of its privileges in the grant of the Mayoralty, the concession of entire self-government.

The concession was fruitless; London bore the brunt, both of the original revolt which won the charter, and of the long struggle which preserved it from his son. Nowhere is Mr Norton more defective than in his account of the part played by London both internally and politically in the Barons' war. The Liber de Antiquis Legibus reveals the inevitable progress of the new democratic movement, which found expression in the Friars and in the reforms of De Montfort, within the walls of the town, the first great severance between the "majores" and "minores," the "discreti homines" and the "indiscreta multitudo," upon which the after-history of the capital was to turn. The triumph of De Montfort was the triumph of the civic democracy, of that older Teutonic equality which expressed itself in the Folk-mote and in the Commune. The triumph of Prince Edward was the triumph of an oligarchic minority, the beginning of a long reaction which ended only in the ruin of municipal freedom. It is this second period of the history of London which we have termed the period of mercantile restriction. We can only briefly sum up here its principal features, but it is important, in the face of the praises showered of late upon the First and Third of the Edwards, to note the part which these princes actually played in the matter. To Edward I. London owed the overthrow of her popular constitution, the exile, imprisonment, or death of her more patriotic citizens, and the restriction of all power to the wealthier and more conservative among her burghers. Before the close of his reign, a royal edict had withdrawn the election of their Mayor from the citizens at large and entrusted it to a select committee of probi homines, the prudhommes of Continental history, summoned by the civic oligarchy. It was in vain that the citizens claimed again and again their rights, their interference in civic elections was at last peremptorily forbidden, and the grossest oppression on the part of the wealthier classes was supported by the Crown. Under Edward III. the cessation of the Folk-mote threw the control of the City wholly into the hands of the prudhommes, a body who, in the reign of his successor, became the "Common Council," in which this branch of civic government finally vested. But side by side with this action of the Crown, the civic oligarchy was pursuing a yet more complete plan of popular disfranchisement. It is in the reign of Edward II. that Mr. Norton finds the first mention of the mercantile constitutions of the civic corporations. Their advance, however, was rapid, and membership in a trade-guild—a privilege necessarily denied to the mass of inhabitants by the long apprenticeship or the heavy redemption-fee—became now an indispensable preliminary to the full freedom of the City. For the first time since the charter of the Conqueror, Londoners, as a whole, ceased to be "law-worthy." One general privilege yet lingered in the election of members to Parliament; but under Edward IV. this last remnant of the older constitution disappeared, and the attendance at Common Hall for this purpose was restricted to the liverymen of the Companies. Never had London seemed greater or wealthier than under the merchant-rule. The Crown was its debtor, civic loans rendered Créçy or Agincourt possible, royal letters from the field of battle announced the tidings of success to the citizens first of all. Sometimes a merchant like Philpot would fit out a fleet for himself and sweep pirates from the seas. But the wealth seems to have been concentrated in a few hands, and the whole relation of London to the people at large was changed. Its privileges, wielded by a small oligarchy, were seen to be monopolies. The insurrections of Cade and of Mortimer showed the silent disaffection of the mass of inhabitants, excluded from all share in their own judicature or government. But its example had told for evil, as of old it had told for good. The same course of mercantile restriction had in every corner of England turned the boroughs into little oligarchies, and disfranchised one half of the electors of the realm. Under the Tudors, the Stuarts, the Georges, their Parliamentary representation had become a farce. National feeling, driven from its natural strongholds, had to express itself in the counties, till the great reforms of our own days restored our old political and municipal constitution. In those reforms London has participated; the general mass of citizens have regained their rights of election and self-government, though still hampered by the ridiculous claims of the trading companies. But it is a little discouraging to see that our greatest steps in advance are only a recurrence to older freedom, and that the great work we have to do is simply the undoing of evil that has been done.

THE ETHNOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S TRANSACTIONS.*

A LEARNED Society devoted to one single branch of a larger science cannot be expected to produce annual volumes of equal interest and importance. It must be often engaged on seemingly trifling, fragmentary, and disconnected contributions to the science which it represents, and these, when collected into a volume, may afford no pleasant reading, while they bewilder the reader with the multitude of small additions to his knowledge, and disappoint him by telling him so little on subjects which he would gladly have seen probed to their depths. In many cases, indeed, one or two more considerable papers, embodying rare and long experience, and showing a full mastery of a large subject, give a higher tone to the volume in which they find a place. It is not our object to depreciate the small contributions, slight as they may seem to be, nor to exaggerate the value of the longer papers, which may after all owe their interest only to greater skilfulness of presentation. It is the privilege of volumes of Societies' "Transactions" to receive whatever sound knowledge is offered them without that bidding for popularity which is the bane of books of travel published independently, and what is for the time imperfect or fragmentary may lead the way to fuller and riper knowledge in the future. We mean, therefore, no disrespect to the writers of these "Transactions" when we assert that this seventh volume has far less of interest than some previous volumes. Its 333 pages contain no fewer than thirty articles, which gives an average of scarcely above ten pages to each, and it is obvious that no subject can be treated adequately on such a scale, except when it is so minute as to possess very slight importance. But it is impossible to speak of the composition of the volume without paying a tribute of respect to the late President of the Society, Mr. John Crawfurd, whose papers have so long formed the staple of the Transactions that they must henceforth be painfully missed. A philologist of a school somewhat antiquated, a student of one special branch of ethnology (that of the Malay race) who could scarcely raise himself to the higher level required for the consideration of the ultimate connexion of peoples apparently widely divergent, and who to the last doubted the existence of a consanguineous Aryan race—he wrote ably and honestly, and commanded the respect of those who differed most widely from him. His latest studies, "On the History and Migration of Textile and Territorial Plants in reference to Ethnology," "On the History and Migration of Cultivated Narcotic Plants in reference to Ethnology," "On the Malayan Race of Man, and its pre-historic Career," and "On the History and Migration of Cultivated Plants producing Coffee, Tea," &c., are contained in this volume; and we should be glad to learn that there are other posthumous articles still to be published. The loss of so diligent and careful a writer—we would refer the reader especially to the historical exposition in the last-named paper—is one of the most serious losses the Ethnological Society could have to deplore.

advantage or a disadvantage to the Society which adopts it? For making up a volume it is decidedly an advantage, since papers can be received which only belong to ethnology construed in the very widest sense. But for doing any scientific work, for investigating the nature, and therefore the affinities and distinctions, of race among mankind, it seems to us that the line should be drawn much closer than is the present practice with the Ethnological Society. We have here, for instance, "An Account of some Cases of Arrest of Development," which would have been more properly placed in a medical or pathological journal, since it simply gives instances of individual children whose growth of body and mind was "arrested" at an early period; it can therefore have no more bearing on the formation of nations than any other malformation, such as that of the Siamese twins. The article "On a Hairy Family in Burmah" is of the same class. Mr. Whymper's paper on "Russian America, or Alaska," is pleasant reading, but has scarcely enough of ethnology (unless it be his vocabularies of certain dialects) to warrant its insertion here.

The longest and perhaps most important paper is that by Dr. J. Shortt, Superintendent-General of Vaccine, Madras Presidency, entitled "An Account of the Hill-Tribes of the Neilgherries." The Neilgherries, it should be remembered, are the remarkable lofty range in which the Western and Eastern Ghauts unite at their southern end, and which extends from about 12° to about 9° N. lat. The term "Hill-Tribe" is, here as elsewhere in India, applied to the half or wholly savage tribes who still live in solitude on isolated heights, little troubled by and little courting the society of the men of the plains surrounding their natural fortresses. They are therefore still objects of great interest, especially to ethnologists; for the great question has still to be solved, Are they the same as their civilized neighbours of the plain, wanting the civilization, or are they of a different and older race altogether? Their savageness and difficulty of approach, and the little need of political or social contact with them, have conspired to keep the Hill-Tribes at a distance from the European; and the Hindus, their especial enemies, have further imbued our countrymen with their own feelings. Now, however, a different spirit seems to pervade our treatment of India. We take nothing on hearsay, but ourselves explore all corners of the country, and especially endeavour to fill up great gaps in our knowledge of the races inhabiting it. The Hill-Tribes have justly received a large share of this attention; and Mr. W. W. Hunter, in his work recently reviewed in this journal On the Non-Aryan Languages of India, has done much for the investigation especially of the more northern of them—the Kols and Gonds. Dr. Shortt now describes the southernmost, which are especially interesting in many respects. His medical character and his official duty, that of vaccination, secured him reception and confidence everywhere, and he was enabled to study the physical conformation of the tribes visited, and generally to bring away measurements of the skull and every essential part of the body of both males and females, based on an average of twenty-five instances. There are five tribes—or rather races of tribe, since each is often subdivided—in the Neilgherries. Of these the Todas appear to be the most remarkable. They consider themselves the earliest occupiers of the hills, and give practical effect to this belief by basing upon it a claim for a tribute of one-sixth from the other tribes. The truth of this assertion of lordship is not only acknowledged by the other tribes, in the payment of tribute and in other significant matters, but is borne out by their position high up on the hills in the cooler temperature, whither the later arrival of other tribes must have driven them. To this elevated position they owe some of the interest which has centred on them, for Dr. Shortt considers that much of the manly beauty ascribed to them was due to their graceful toga-like covering and fine hair, exposed and destitute of the greasy turban, both peculiarities being possible only in a region so elevated as to have, at 11 degrees from the equator, a temperate climate; for the average annual temperature on the summit of the Neilgherries (Dodabetta, 8,760 feet above the sea) is below 59 degrees. He allows, however, that the Todas are by far the most prepossessing of all the tribes of the hills, being copper-coloured, tall, well-proportioned, and with features of Caucasian type; the females being also tall and good-looking (though not "strikingly handsome," as some have called them), with smooth and delicate skin, and nose more aquiline than is that of the men, and both sexes exhibiting a striking amount of self-possession in converse with strangers. Their occupations are pastoral, and their habits peaceful. So far the picture shines with the fairest colours. But some darker tints must be added, which alter essentially our feelings towards the Todas. They are constitutionally indolent and slothful, which is perhaps natural to herdsmen; however, "the wives are treated by their husbands with marked respect and attention, and, unlike most of the Indian races and natives of the East generally, are not regarded as mere household slaves; they are left at home to perform what European wives consider their legitimate share of duty, and do not even step out of doors to fetch water or wood. . . . The Toda women employ their leisure hours in embroidery work, which they execute in a clever off-hand manner; others amuse themselves in singing, of which all appear very fond." But they are dirty in their persons and habits, and never wash, but besmear themselves with ghee (melted butter), which soon becomes rancid. And they retain the extraordinary ancient custom of polyandry, which revolts our feelings so much more than polygamy. Yet the ancient Sanskrit epic, the Mahâbhârata, shows us Draupadî as the common wife of the five Pândava brothers, thus proving the custom to have a respectable age, and to be acknowledged even by the civilized Sanskrit people of the North. The custom as now practised by the Todas is described by Dr. Shortt as follows:—

If there be one feature more than another that has contributed to invest the Todawar tribe with the great share of interest, or rather curiosity, evinced towards them at all times by Europeans, it is their practice of polyandry, which, as long as they have been known, has been maintained, and is still perpetuated, as a social system among them. Their practice is thus—all brothers of one family, be they many or few, live in mixed and incestuous cohabitation with one or more wives. If there be four or five brothers, and one of them, being old enough, gets married, his wife claims all the other brothers as her husbands, and as they successively attain manhood, she consorts with them; or if the wife has one or more younger sisters, they in turn, on attaining a marriageable age, become the wives of their sister's husband or husbands, and thus in a family of several brothers there may be, according to circumstances, only one wife for them all, or many; but, one or more, they all live under one roof, and cohabit promiscuously, just as fancy or taste inclines. Owing, however, to the great scarcity of women in this tribe, it more frequently happens that a single woman is wife to several husbands, sometimes as many as six. When any one of the brothers or husbands enters the hut, he leaves his wand and mantle at the door, and this sign of his presence within prevents the intrusion of the others. . . . . In keeping with this peculiar marriage system, they adopt a method of affiliation all their own; that is, the first-born child is fathered upon the eldest brother, the next-born on the second, and so on throughout the series. Notwithstanding this unnatural system, the Todas, it must be confessed, exhibit much fondness for their offspring, more so than their practice of mixed intercourse would seem to foster. Of this I had personal opportunities of satisfying myself when conducting vaccination amongst them. I have frequently seen the Toda mother, on hearing the cries of her child, exhibit marked maternal feeling and distress. There is no doubt that, anterior to the reclamation of these hills and their occupants from their original state of rude barbarism, female infanticide was practised among them; but this hateful crime, it is gratifying to record, has long since become extinct through the active operations of the British Government. It is unknown now, except as a traditionary fact of the past, to the truth of which the tribes themselves bear the best testimony.

Their language is described as "unmistakeably Tamil, although what is now spoken is a mixed dialect, being a jargon of Tamil and Canarese. At first it is difficult to understand what they say, owing to their peculiar low muttering, rapid utterance, and guttural expression." Anything that can be known of their origin must be elicited from their distinctive religious and ceremonial acts, which present many peculiarities, but coincide in several important points with those of the Hindu (i.e. Brahmanic) inhabitants of the neighbouring plains. So in polyandry, in cremation of the dead, in laying out the dead body in state, and chanting lamentations over it, and throwing coloured grain at the corpse; also in the sacred groves, where sanctified persons called palal (= milkmen), like the Sanskrit gurus, dwell in solitary—and starving—blessedness. A striking confirmation of these hints is found in a Toda tradition quoted from Captain Harkness, which says that about the time of Râvana, the demon-king of Lanka or Ceylon, who in the oldest Sanskrit epic, the Râmâyana, carries off Sita, the lovely and faithful wife of Râma, the hero, they inhabited the low country; "that, being afterwards unable to bear the severities imposed upon them by the successful Râvana, they fled to these mountains as a place of refuge, driving their herds before them, carrying their calves and children on their shoulders, and vowing to wear no covering on their heads till they had wreaked their vengeance on their oppressors." As, in the Râmâyana, Râvana is representative of the Dravidian (South Indian) race, in opposition to Râma and Bhârata, types of the Aryan, this legend, in fact, declares the identity of race between the Todas and the (now Brahmanical) population of the plains.

Dr. Shortt next describes the Kurumbas, who are savages, and supposed to be the aborigines of Southern India, before the intrusion of the Dravidian race. For this belief there seems to be some ground in their peculiar physiognomy ("they are, as a body, sickly-looking, pot-bellied, large-mouthed, prognathous, with prominent out-standing teeth, and thick lips—frequently saliva dribbles away from their mouths"), wild matted hair, and almost nude bodies, fondness for the very rudest ornaments; and notably in the fact that they are resorted to by other tribes, such as the Badagas, to perform priestly or magical functions for them. They are regarded with awe, even by the Todas, as great adepts in the black art. They scarcely cultivate the ground at all, live in villages secluded in glens or forests, sometimes when driven by necessity ensnare animals for food, have no marriage ceremony, and only crude notions of a Superior Being. One point of great interest is hinted at:—"They are said to hold in respect, and make offerings at, the different cairns and cromlechs met with on these hills, from which it is believed that these cairns and cromlechs are the work of their ancestors." As these monuments of the highest antiquity, first noticed in our country, and popularly ascribed to the Celts or ancient Britons as the earliest known inhabitants, have since been found not only throughout Scandinavia, but traced across Russia to the Caucasus, and thence into the south of India, whatever light is thrown on their builders in one part must be reflected on their origin in every other. That they are ante-Aryan seems highly probable; but if they are the work of an aboriginal (ante-Dravidian as well as ante-Aryan) Indian tribe, how wonderfully is their antiquity enhanced! That the Kurumbas formerly spread over a much larger territory than now is evident, if the Coromandel coast is named from them.

The next occupiers of the hills after the Todas are acknowledged to be the Kotars, who are said to be descended from a low caste of the plain. They excite disgust from eating carrion, but are a very remarkable and superior class in many ways. They are by far the most industrious of the Hill-Tribes, engaging both in agriculture and handicrafts; skilful in the latter, as carpenters, smiths, curriers, &c., and performing many menial offices to the Todas, and Badagas. They pay the goodoo tribute to the Todas, but exact from the Bagadas fees for services rendered. They speak a dialect of Canarese, like the Todas, but without their peculiar guttural expression. They are well made, of a tolerable height, rather good features, and light copper skin. Their worship seems to embody indistinct ideas of Shiva and his wife.

The Badagas constitute the largest part of the hill population; but we cannot speak in detail of them, or of the last tribe, the Irulas. We hope that our comment may induce many readers to study Dr Shortt's paper for themselves.

The only other paper in this volume which we can notice is on "the Varini of Tacitus, or Warings, and their relations to English Ethnology." It is by Mr. Hyde Clarke, but it follows so naturally in the track of Mr. H. H. Howorth's able paper in the preceding volume, on "The Origines of the Norsemen," that it might almost be from the same hand. The combination of "Angli et Varini" in the Germania suggested to Mr. Clarke to discover who these Varini were, and to avail himself of the hint given by Tacitus' coupling them with the Angles. We cannot follow him through a maze of evidence from Pliny, Bede, Procopius, and a host of less known authorities, but must state simply that they appear first as neighbours of the Jutes, Saxons, Frisians, Angles, Rugians, and other tribes on the North Sea, the Baltic, and the intervening peninsula. From this close proximity to the Angles it is exceedingly probable that they took part with these in the invasion of Britain. Many geographical names remain in apparent attestation of this—such as Warwick, Warrington, Werrington, Wanford, Warnham, and Warnborough, cited by Mr Clarke, to which might probably be added many others, such as Waring, Wareham. That they also penetrated to the Arctic Sea is suggested by the name Waringa Fjord, which forms the northern boundary of Norway and Russia. But a more brilliant destiny awaited them on their native Baltic. That sea was in the ninth century called the Waring Sea, and was so completely under their control that they took tribute from the Slavonic tribes on its coasts. They also penetrated up the Russian rivers, and found a way to Byzantium and Greece. They so terrified the people, and threw the country into such confusion, that to restore order they were invited to come and rule it. This is perhaps the most striking instance afforded by history of the almost universal incapacity of the Slavonians for bearing rule. "Our country is great, and everything is in abundance, but order and justice are wanting, come and take possession of the soil, and govern us.' They sent three brother princes, the eldest of whom was the celebrated first ruler of the Russians, Rurik, from whom all later sovereigns seek to establish their descent. Rurik is said by Nestor to belong "to the kind of Warings called Russians, as others are called Swedes, Northmen, English, and Goths." This makes Waring a very generic term indeed, even more so than Scandinavian. But Nestor must have taken "Russian" (as Mr Clarke does) as the equivalent of the ancient Rugii, who gave their name to the island of Rugen, which seems to us doubtful, considering the claim of the land still called Rus (Ruthenia, the south-western provinces of Russia) to this name. We have not space to give an abstract of Mr. Clarke's graphic account of the great part played by the Warings in the Byzantine Empire, and even as far as the Caucasus. He wishes to establish their claim to be "English," as next-door neighbours to the Angles on the Baltic, and to abolish the Scandinavian character which has been assigned to them, especially by Professor Rafn of Copenhagen. If their raids remind us more of the Norsemen than of the steady Saxons, the following point outweighs any idea of their nationality which might be based on that consideration:—

> In Russia the rights of the Warings as a race were recognised, and their most curious monuments are their laws. These make a distinction between the Waring and the Slavonian, and they are framed exactly like the law of the "Angli et Werini," and the Anglo-Saxon laws of the same time, murder and all other offences being commutable by a weregeld or money fine, the oath of a Waring being received as evidence of innocence by compurgation, and questions of debt being referred [illegible] of twel[illegible] Such is defined in the laws of Jaroslaw, and the like in the laws of Isiaslav, Vsevolod, and Swithoslaf, passed at a Witanmote. This latter code recites the laws of frankpledge and streetward.

DOUBLES AND QUITS.*

IT would be a misuse of words to call this a good novel, or even to call it a novel of any kind, good or bad. It is a sort of half vaudeville, half jeu d'esprit, and as such it is not altogether unworthy of Blackwood's Magazine, in which it originally appeared. It is written in an agreeable, springy, sometimes almost racy style, reminding one both of Whyte Melville and of Guy Livingstone. But it has not the promise of Whyte Melville's earlier, nor the execution of his better, novels, and though free from the grotesque ferocity and virility of Guy Livingstone, it wants the nerve and go of his best productions. It is a milder mixture altogether, and for ordinary drawing-room reading it may be none the worse for that. It has also the advantage of being pleasantly printed, and it is all contained in two short volumes, so that, if a man has half an hour to spare in which he has absolutely nothing to do, he might spend it more unpleasantly than on Doubles and Quits. It would be rather more amusing to read at a railway station, for instance, waiting for a train, than the advertisements on the walls; and an attentive reader would get about as much knowledge of military life out of it as an ordinary foreigner would get of the inside of London by studying the map of the underground railway which the Directors have so thoughtfully provided at all the Metropolitan stations. It would be hardly honest to promise anybody any more from the book, but after all, half an hour's amusement, even of the mildest form, is something to get out of six hundred pages.

The idea of the piece—for plot it cannot be called—is something of this sort. There are a couple of men, Bruce and Burridge by name, the one a captain in the Line, the other a captain in the "Heavies," and these two captains are the exact counterpart of one another. There are also a couple of young ladies, Miss Mary Richmond, and her cousin, Lady Rose O'Shea; and Captain Burridge is engaged to Mary, and Captain Bruce is in love with Rose. But unfortunately Captain Burridge is a married man, and his wife, a disreputable broken-down actress whom he had been entrapped to marry when a boy, is still alive. The story hinges on the successful efforts made by the one captain to free the other of this woman, by proving that she was married to a stage carpenter before she met her present husband. He succeeds at last, and in return for his good services the lady who is engaged to Captain Burridge prevails upon her not unwilling cousin to look favourably upon Captain Bruce. And so they are all married, and live happily for ever after.

Such is the story, slight and commonplace in all conscience, but worked out, in the first volume at least, with a certain sprightliness and geniality. It would be the merest flattery to give Captain Lockhart credit for any of the characteristics of a novelist beyond those of sprightliness and geniality, and, we may add, a talent for appreciating "situations." He would be the first to see through any such flattery. But these characteristics he possesses, and he makes the most of them. He hardly professes to give his mind seriously to the construction of plot, or to analysis or delineation of character. Mary Richmond is a name and nothing more, and Captain Burridge a lay figure. There are some indications of nature and reality in the sketch of Lady Rose, and, so far as they go, they are agreeable, but they are only half elaborated. Captain Bruce has not much more character than his "double." In this respect the author is consistent, and he may be dramatically accurate in his representation of the ordinary captain, whether in the cavalry or infantry, but consistency and accuracy of this kind do not produce amusing characters, and do not make up an interesting novel. And as it is with the actors in the drama, so it is with the plan of it. The idea of a man's "double" being used as a peg on which to hang a number of incidents, though not original, is in a manner new, and capable of successful handling. But here the incidents are not grouped together with effect, the author does not make the most of them, and does not make them fit into the piece. They are pitchforked up anyhow, and hang about the peg awkwardly and without adjustment. He seems to have set himself down to knock off pleasantly a number of widely-printed pages in the easiest manner possible, and so far he has succeeded. The process could not have occupied much time, and could not have taken much out of him, and so far he may be congratulated. Some of the isolated scenes, such as the first tête-a-tête with Lady Rose in the garden, and the captain's cross-examination of himself as to whether or not he is in love, are pretty well done, and probably took some trouble to write. Here and there, too, we find a certain novelty of expression and a way of putting things which are amusing, such as the description of Mrs. Lewis "communicating her ideas in short sentences, delivered in one unvarying key, and in the warily staccato manner of a parson reading the Psalms, and afraid of being run into by the responses." The weariness and monotony also of the ordinary mess-dinner, and the subaltern's conversation thereat, to a man whose mind has just awakened to an appreciation of that most melancholy of all forms of festivity, are well described, and will be appreciated by many sympathizing spirits.

But, as a foil to these good points in the book, there is a great deal that is very bad. The second volume almost entirely breaks down. There is only one good scene in it, the interview with the stage carpenter, and there are a great many that are worse than commonplace. The electro-biological scenes are contemptible, and Burridge's story is long-winded and wearisome. These two episodes detract much from the worth of the book, and are unworthy of Captain Lockhart's ability. So also is his tendency to run into an old-fashioned mannerism affected by writers of the Blackwood school, which is tedious to educated people. It shows itself in Bulwer and Aytoun and Lever, and others of that stamp, and is in high favour with Guy Livingstone. It consists of the constant half-jocular allusion to classical subjects, and the damnable iteration of stale classical quotations, chiefly from Horace. It surely does not coincide with most men's experience of captains in the Heavies to find them continually talking of Here and Aphrodite and Jupiter Opt. Max., or of Acheron and Phlegethon and Styx and Lethe. Yet these two captains are always at it. In the mess-room of familiar life men do not speak of the morning bird as the "pervigil ales," nor of empty soda-water bottles as "reliquiæ Danaûm," nor of their brother-officers as being more "nati consumere fruges." When they bid farewell to persons of the other sex, and tell them that they are going down to Aldershot to-morrow, they do not in real life say "cras ingens iterabimus æquor"; and if they did, it would not be true; and if it were true, the ladies would not understand them. Neither do they, so far at least as our experience goes, when speaking to their friends of the fickleness of a woman, characterize her as "varium et mutabile semper." They may possibly entertain such ideas of the sex, but if they do, they won't convey them to their friends in quotations from the Latin Grammar. They are much more likely to do it in short, emphatic, and familiar Saxon. After a good deal of this sort of thing the most patient reader gets bored, and feels inclined to re-echo the words of Captain Burridge, "Oh, bother the dead languages! Keep your spirits up, and don't let us spend the night talking metaphysics in Soho."

This book, then, shows, as we have said, smart writing, geniality, and an appreciation of "situations"—all valuable qualities in the present day for a man who is willing to write for the stage, but by no means the first thing needful in a novelist. If Mr. Robertson, for instance, had taken to novel-writing in the magazines, he would have produced something like Doubles and Quits—a shade more sentimental perhaps, and several shades more vulgar. But he has turned his talent for situations to much more profitable account by the production of Caste and School, and the rest of the series of his dramas. In like manner Captain Lockhart might turn out "very excellent fooling" if he were to take to stage-writing. Even as it is, Doubles and Quits might be made to do well for drawing-room theatricals. The central idea is admirably adapted for the grouping of ludicrous incidents around it. Of course it is not original, and it requires the stage to show it to advantage. The Comedy of Errors makes one laugh when it happens—which is very rare—to be well acted. It does not particularly amuse one to read about the two Dromios and the two Antipholi. So, in Captain Lockhart's drama, one could imagine an audience being tickled by the resemblance of the Captains if they were well made-up, by their first meeting—one of the best scenes in the book—and by the disentanglement of all their mutual troubles. But the fun is lost in the narrative, and it would be hardly true to say that it is much helped by the pictures by "Sylvestris." Of these perhaps the less said the better. No doubt the drawing of them amused "Sylvestris," just as the writing of the book amused the author "Sylvestris," so far as we know, is unknown to fame. Possibly, therefore, these drawings are the first efforts of this artist. As such they are creditable enough, or rather some of them. They would have been delightful souvenirs of pleasant work had they been kept to ornament a dozen, or perhaps fifteen, copies issued for private circulation. But when they are given to the public they become subject to criticism, and the kindliest critic would hardly use the language of commendation, if he had a conscience The pictures do not help us much to realize Captain Lockhart's "situations." They want the stage, and its accessories and tricks, and if the author has nothing of a more engrossing character in hand, it might be worthy of his consideration whether he would not spend the summer between now and the shooting season in converting his novel into a play. Doubles and Quits produced at the Prince of Wales's or the Gaiety might be a success, but the repetition of it or anything like it in Blackwood's Magazine must be a failure.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES.*

THE Book of the Landed Estate, amongst much other valuable matter, contains some brief but sound remarks and suggestions touching the condition and accommodation of the agricultural labourer. And there are not wanting, in the first Report of the "Commission on the Employment of Children, Young Persons, and Women in Agriculture," and in the Cottage Plans recently put forth by Lord Cawdor, public and private evidences of an increased interest in this vital subject It is no longer an unchallenged assumption that labourers' cottages need be little better than dog-kennels and cowsheds, and in the serious contemplation, by landlords and agents, of such questions as "estate schools," and cottage gardens and allotments, as well as the provision of decent sleeping arrangements for cottagers and their families, one recognises an awakening to the calls of duty and ownership which cannot fail to be thrice blest in its results.

Upon a question the bearing of which on the comfort of the rural labourer is not unimportant we do not get any help from Mr. Brown, nor, though from the nature of his publication it was hardly to be expected, from Lord Cawdor—the question, we mean, of the expediency of letting the cottages on a farm to the tenant, along with his fields and farm-buildings. The question has two aspects. The farmer has a very cogent plea for such an arrangement when he urges the difficulty of otherwise retaining his farm-labourers, who in proportion to their ignorance and wilfulness are apt to transfer their services at short notice to another farm, a railway, or the ironworks. Sparse populations especially seem to offer a premium to fickleness. If a cottager rents immediately under his squire, and is a decent sort of man, it would be a harsh measure to give him notice for preferring the service of a farmer off the estate to one upon it, and supposing the notice to be served, the farmer lacks, until the term of the notice expires, not only a labourer, but a cottage into which to put him. If, however, a cottage lets with the farm, an arrangement of monthly pay and a month's notice precludes sudden defections, or, in any case, prevents their being needlessly vexatious to either party. Much will depend in such cases on the stipulations as to keeping the cottage in repair. In our experience this is still the landlord's function, even when he allows his tenant to sublet. In many respects it is better that the tenant should rent directly under his squire; and Lord Leicester's plan, as noticed in Mr. Frazer's Report to the Commission above referred to, of having all his cottages hold direct from himself, but allowing his tenants to nominate to the cottages adjacent to their farms, subject to his agent's approval, is perhaps the best solution; especially if a stipulation is agreed to that the cottager shall quit the cottage so soon as he leaves the farmer's service.

Still there is much to be said for the other course, nor will the matter be very important if the landlord is possessed with a due sense of his responsibility, not only for the maintenance of the cottage, but for the comfort and kind treatment of the cottager. The question, in short, narrows itself into a struggle between a perfect and an imperfect sense of duty. The worst cases of neglect arise out of acquiescence, from indolence or constraint, in the legacy of wrongs bequeathed from father to son. And, such being the case, it is more useful to cast about for practical solutions of the cottage-building difficulty, and to devise means for improving and restoring what is dilapidated, at the least absolute loss (for gain, even of the slightest kind, is confessedly out of the question), than, as is too much the fashion with lookers-on, to stigmatize the landlords as a class for the faults of individual members of it. When one hears of six children lying in the sole sleeping-room of a hovel, five down with scarlet-fever, and the sixth certain to come in for it next, "the stone might cry out of the wall and the beam out of the timber answer it" if the press failed to expose such grievous indifference to life and health, and did not earnestly agitate for a wide reformation in the housing of the rural labourer. Yet, if theoretical reformers of this terrible abuse were to become landlords to-morrow, they would find their philanthropy sorely puzzled where and how to begin. There is no denying that our fathers went too much on the principle that the state of things to which they had been accustomed would last their time, and were content to let bad run to worse. Hence, on many estates there exist deserted and roofless hovels, and on others inhabited huts that are literally unfit for the shelter of human beings. In such cases the work has to be begun de novo, and the large question is opened, what should be the cost of a pair of plain and unornamental cottages, with proper sanitary appliances and a due regard to convenience and comfort? A pair of cottages, or a block of cottages, is obviously cheaper, in proportion, than a single one; and it is now generally admitted that it is not an absolute sine quâ non to have three bedrooms to each dwelling. Probably, in a group of three cottages, it would suffice to have one with three, and the others with two each, especially if a roomy landing were provided which at an exigency might supply an additional sleeping place. It is not wise to offer a temptation to cottagers to take lodgers "on the sly"—a course to which they are apt to resort, even where a provision against taking lodgers has been expressly agreed upon. But, even so, and after the strictest economy consistent with essential requirements, we believe that (notwithstanding exceptional instances, such as we find in the marvellously cheap plans of Lord Cawdor, in one or two cases quoted by Mr. Frazer, and in the case of the pair of cottages erected by Mr Brown for Major Stapylton, Book of Landed Estates, p. 493, which cost 240*l.*) it will be hard to find a pair of cottages that have been built under a cost of 260*l*, and this sum is twenty pounds less than what "the Report of the Committee of the Society of Arts," appointed in 1864, considered the minimum. This is manifestly an outlay for which the landlord cannot expect interest from the cottagers' rents, though it is quite possible that, with the better class of farmers, there might be a willingness to pay such interest, in addition to the rent of their farms, for the sake of good cottages and such labourers as would seek to occupy them. But in this case the cottage must necessarily be let with the farm; nor should we think that, where a farmer was enlightened enough to value good cottages on his farm, there would be any great harm in such an arrangement. All this presupposes a thoroughly good understanding between landlord and tenant, and we suspect that, however it may seem to outsiders, there is more of this in the agricultural counties than is often supposed. If a tenant is met half-way, he is not more unreasonable than other people; and the squire who allows him a voice in the well-ordering of his estate and neighbourhood does much towards modifying, and in time rubbing off, his class prejudices. What is wanted in the building of cottages de novo on an estate is previous deliberation as to the fittest site, and this should be open to all concerned. In the best and most "model" arrangements it will be found that the cottages of an estate are thrown as much as possible together, near to the church, and, if it may be, with a Sunday or daily school hard at hand If a landlord has all his work to do, he may wisely eschew the plan of outlying tenements, and cottages near a wood, supposed to be safeguards against poachers, but really handy spots for the woodstealer, the trespasser—in short, the Arab of your country desert But the disposition of cottages is seldom so much in a landlord's hands. He is guided very much by what he finds in existence and though this is not conducive to the best theoretical arrangement, we are far from sure that it is not the most wholesome fact in the future of cottage-building.

The practical common-sense wisdom of Lord Palmerston never displayed itself more characteristically than when, at a county agricultural meeting, instead of binding burdens upon the squires that they could not bear, he set himself to point out how much might be made of many old tumble-down cottages, which haply had been long condemned and remained untenanted till it suited the landlord's purse to replace them. It is surprising how far fifty pounds will go in the work of restoration, especially where, as is usual in agricultural counties, the ordinary materials are within easy reach. We have in our mind's eye half a score of ruinous heaps of timber, tiles, and wattling, which the discerning glance of a country builder has shown him how to reconstruct and renovate so that they will last at least another fifty years. Not uncommonly the old timbers are marvellously sound; better, firmer, and more lasting than the half-seasoned larch or poplar which is too apt to be thrust into a modern cottage.

Mr. Brown, in p. 256, tells his readers that in taking down in 1868 a cottage built in 1760, he found oak beams so perfectly sound, that he used them in constructing a new cottage, and we can corroborate his experience, having found precisely the same to be the case with timbers of a cottage erected in 1715. Then the earthen floor requires to be replaced by flags or boards—the roof to be raised so as to allow ventilation in the sleeping rooms, which a little management subdivides successfully. The Broseley tile supersedes the broken moss-grown slate, or the mouldering dripping thatch. A lean-to supplies pantry and coal-place, which under the old régime were idle superfluities, and if two or three cottages lie close together, a detached building to serve for a joint scullery and washhouse, with other necessary adjuncts, helps to make a comfortable dwelling of what aforetime was only comparable to a "den." In counties where most of the cottages are composed of brick-noggin walls, the picturesque effect is not a little enhanced by the bestowal of an extra pound or two upon blackening the timbers, and whitewashing the bricks; an extravagance which may be condoned on the score of its being both an earnest of attention to cottage-restoration, and also an index to the sanitary condition of the occupants. It is not likely that the inside of the platter will be, in such cases, less cared for than the outside. This, then, is a step in the cottager's favour, which even the less wealthy landlord may take without risk, and must take if he would be clear of guilt as concerning his poorer brother It may be taken without risk, for the increased accommodation will justify an increased rent to cover the outlay, and a rent too within the cottager's means. It must be taken by every reflecting landlord, unless indeed his estate is so burdened and encumbered that he ought to sell or let it, or unless he is prepared for the more costly and magnanimous alternative of building up his cottages anew, after the manner of the Duke of Bedford, and the Earl of Leicester, and other great men who have not disdained to concern themselves with the details of cottage-building, and of providing decent dwellings for agricultural labourers.

Often it will happen that the landlord has no option in the matter, and then the problem is that which Lord Cawdor offers his contribution towards solving—how to provide the agricultural labourer with decent accommodation at the least cost. Mr. Brown lays down two laws as to cottage-building which we should be sorry to think unalterable—namely, that the number of bed-rooms should in no case be less than three; and that no home timber should be used, unless oak. The former dictum is practically untenable, and is well met by a suggestion recorded by Mr. Frazer, that as the inhabitants of a pair of cottages will fluctuate in number, if one house has two, and the other three, bed-rooms, a little contrivance, by stopping up one door-way and opening another, will attach the fifth room to that tenement which happens from time to time to require it. As to the latter dictum, it is not enough to say that the sale of home timber will pay the cost of foreign, unless the consideration be first had of easy or awkward railway communication. But Mr. Brown gives good hints as to points of detail—e.g., slates v. tiles, the shape of windows, handy cottage "kitcheners," and ventilation. He recognises cottages of one story, with three bed-rooms, besides a kitchen, &c.; and also two-storied cottages with the same accommodation; but his plans are for the latter. His plainer pair of cottages is estimated to cost 240*l.*

Several of Lord Cawdor's plans contemplate a single story, with three bed-rooms, and, according to more than one authority, labourers' wives prefer these, because their children and household cares are thus closer about them. The objections to this arrangement seem to be, deficient privacy, and additional expense of foundations and roofing. But whether one-storied or two-storied, the drawback to Lord Cawdor's cottage plans is that—paradoxical as it may seem—they are too cheap They have, in several instances, the central chimney-stack, the plastered walls, the essential comforts and conveniences, which mark a model cottage, and yet they are so cheap that one is set wondering why the Duke of Bedford, with his princely building establishment—which includes a steam-engine of 25-horse power, and two hundred labourers—cannot turn out a couple of cottages at less than half as much again No one who knows Pembrokeshire will be disposed to deny it any praise within the bounds of reason; it must be taken into account, too, that it lies very handy to the sea, and must get its timber cheap, perhaps, too, labour is not in it very costly; but it must be something approaching fairy-land—something very un-English, to say the least—if it can turn out a pair of cottages of good dimensions, built of rubble stone, ceiled, plastered, with concrete floors downstairs, and ploughed and tongued flooring upstairs, and with three bed-rooms, the largest of very fair size, for the sum of 131*l.* 15*s.* 7*d*, exclusive of haulage. The Earl of Cawdor deserves all the credit of philanthropic zeal and research, but his experience must have been exceptionally favourable in cottage-building; and, in the interests of landowners and labourers alike, we sincerely hope that his estimates are accurate to a fraction. Yet we cannot disguise from ourselves the awkward and militating fact that, whereas he estimates his pair of cottages (No. 7) on an English plan at 205*l.* plus the haulage, an almost exactly similar pair in a county on the Welsh border, with many favourable circumstances, has cost, at the very least, 260*l.* And we note that the "Royal Windsor Society's" cottages, which have the advantage of handy building materials, and should be cheaper, as being built in numbers, cost, at the lowest tender, about 118*l* per tenement The cottages of the Enclosure Commissioners average 143*l* each. Is there, then, any feasible way to cheapen the cost of cottages? Mr. Tall's patent for erecting walls of concrete by a patent apparatus and scaffolding offers a very plausible answer. His walling is shown to cost half the price of bricks and mortar, to be stronger than brickwork, and so smooth that, for houses constructed with it, one coat of internal plaster will suffice. These walls, being perfectly solid and made of concrete which is one part Portland cement to five parts large gravel, deaden sound, defy mice and rats, and admit of invisible rain-spouting, formed by removable wooden cores placed in them before the cement is set. With clay or gravel at hand, Mr Tall avouches that four-roomed cottages of good dimensions can be built with this patent for 50*l* each. The Commissioners to inquire into the "Employment of Young Persons and Women in Agriculture" are inclined to pronounce unfavourably upon Mr. Tall's patent (see Report, p. lix.), chiefly because, owing to the cost of the patent apparatus, Mr. Newton, C E., who has constructed buildings under Mr. Tall, "does not think it applicable to agricultural cottages unless built in considerable numbers together." They prefer the application of concrete to building purposes brought into notice by Mr. B. Nicoll, of Regent Street—a development of his patent for giving increased power to the ordinary "sewing-machine." According to this plan, slabs are formed of the size of nine feet by three, and of a thickness of three inches, arising from compression of several layers. Its centre is a fabric of straw sewed together by a large "sewing machine," and compressed at the same time to one inch thickness by rollers. This is steeped in silicate, to make it fireproof, and set in a frame of one-inch angle-iron, with cross-bars of iron at intervals welded to it. Each surface of the straw is coated with small gravel, held together by Seyssel asphalte, and small spaces are left for nut-screws, to fasten the slabs together, when put into their place in the building. "When so fixed—the lower edge having been first imbedded in a foundation of concrete—an external coat is applied of concrete made with the best Portland cement in the proportion of one of cement to six of broken stone, and an internal coating half an inch thick" The result is said to be a fabric three inches thick, but as strong as nine-inch bonded brickwork, impervious to vermin, warm in winter, and cool in summer. Roofs, it appears, can be made of similar slabs, of a thinner texture, and Mr. Nicoll adopts other contrivances, as to joiners' and glaziers' work, and as to flues, which must cheapen cottage-building. According to Mr. Nicoll's architect, a three bed-roomed single-story cottage can be built on this plan for 85*l.* Regarding the designs of such cottages, appended to the blue-book, æsthetically, we should say at once "Ne sutor ultra crepidam!" Give us a cottage that looks like a cottage at an extra cost of 15*l* or so.

But if either this plan, or Mr. Tall's, which in spite of adverse judgments from those in authority we are disposed to prefer, can be so utilized as to conduce to the better housing of the labourer at a moderate outlay, this generation will have gone far towards solving one of the knottiest problems of modern philanthrophy.

GERMAN LITERATURE

THE expectation naturally aroused by the announcement of a correspondence between Catharine II. and Joseph II.* will not be disappointed by this last publication of the indefatigable M. von Arneth. The subjects treated are of real importance, and both sovereigns bear their part in a manner worthy of their celebrity The originals of nearly all the letters are autographic, and the style and sentiments are in the highest degree characteristic. As Von Arneth observes, each correspondent seems to have given the other credit for boundless vanity, and the result is a friendly contest for the prize of elegant adulation. Catharine undoubtedly carries off the palm. Her letters are models of grace and point, of ingenious turns and felicitous expression. It seems extraordinary how the little rustic princess of Anhalt Zerbst, who had lived since the age of sixteen at the semi-barbarous Court of Russia, should have so completely imbibed the esprit français. Joseph's letters are also extremely well written, but betray a certain bluntness and constraint in comparison with Catharine's. These elegant compliments served to mask serious designs on both sides. The same entente cordiale then existed between Russia and Austria as now prevails between the former Power and the latter's successful rival. Joseph was thoroughly convinced that the alliance of Russia was necessary to his country, and the shrewder Catharine pushed on her approaches against Turkey under pretext of co-operation with him. These letters reveal a concerted scheme for the partition of Turkey in Europe. Russia was to advance her frontier to the Bog; Austria was to have Servia; the Danubian Principalities were to be made an independent kingdom under a prince of the Greek Church, i.e., one devoted to Russia; Catharine's second grandson was to reign at Constantinople. We have seen certain items of this programme carried out, but Austria is in our day as anxious to preserve Turkey as she formerly was to destroy it. It must also strike all readers that the graphic picture of Turkish decay here drawn by Catharine is no longer true to the same extent, and that the most alarming symptom of it noted by her sagacity—the insubordination of the local governors—has been completely remedied. Catharine would probably be surprised, could she revisit the earth, to find that her favourite idea had made so little progress; but she would also find the attitude of Russia unaltered, although its stealthy advance is now made under cover of Prussia, instead of Austria. Turkish affairs, although the most important, are not the only subjects treated. Part of the correspondence turns upon a project of Joseph's for the marriage of the Grand Duke Paul's sister-in-law to his nephew Francis. It is amusing to find Catharine suggesting to him that, while she established herself as head of the Greek Church at Constantinople, he might similarly instal himself at Rome, with the Pope for his vicar in matters ecclesiastical. She would no doubt have gladly seen him entangled with so chimerical a project. Joseph's reign, as is known, closed in adversity. The last letter he received from Catharine was an assurance of sympathy, and a promise of steady support to his successor, and his reply, almost the last letter he ever wrote, is an effusion of the warmest gratitude.

A biography of Dr. von Martius *, the renowned traveller in Brazil, is in every way a creditable work, but is chiefly remarkable as one of the most beautiful productions of the modern German press. Martius was a fine specimen of the genus savant, full of physical and intellectual vigour, and admirably qualified to represent Bavarian science with dignity on public occasions A few pages suffice to render ample justice to his merits in these respects As there is little else to mention except his adventures in Brazil, the biography mainly consists of an abridgment of the voluminous narrative in which these are detailed

The eminent astronomer Encke never undertook a journey to the stars, and his biography is accordingly even less eventful than that of Von Martius. His Life by Dr. Bruhns † is, however, a somewhat important contribution to the history of astronomy, from its copious chronological data respecting the progress of discovery in connexion with him and his scientific colleagues. It is also pleasing to find the veteran astronomer presented under so favourable a light.

The present is hardly a propitious period for the publication of Schelling's correspondence ‡, but to have awaited a more favourable time might have been equivalent to an indefinite postponement. Schelling's philosophy labours under a twofold disadvantage in our day. Not only is Germany sated with abstract speculation, but imaginative literature is likewise at an exceedingly low ebb. The logical acuteness of Hegel and the mathematical consistency of Spinoza may render their systems acceptable, or at least interesting, to the disciples of the reigning schools; but Schelling, who addresses himself to poetical temperaments, and whose system rose and set with the most brilliant epoch of German imaginative literature, is too much at variance with the tendencies of the times to expect recognition in any quarter. A reaction will no doubt ensue some day, and the renewal of interest in Schelling's philosophical speculations will secure attention for these epistolary records of his life. The present volume begins with a biography of his youthful period, which is neither so full nor so graphic as might have been desired. The point chiefly brought out in it is Schelling's extraordinary intellectual precocity. The correspondence extends from 1796 to 1803, the date of his appointment as professor at Munich. The most interesting letters are those between him and the elder Schlegel; they are lively and pointed, but have more reference to personal than to literary or philosophical matters. More important as illustrations of Schelling's philosophy are the dithyrambic effusions of his enthusiastic disciple, H. Steffens. These principally relate to his ideas on natural philosophy, which have proved fruitful of results in the hands of others. Indeed this may be said of his ideas in general. "No one," observes Mr. J. D. Morell, "who compares the philosophic method of Schelling with the 'Philosophie positive' of Auguste Comte, can have the slightest hesitation as to the source from which the latter virtually sprang. The fundamental idea is indeed precisely the same as that of Schelling, with this difference only, that the idealistic language of the German speculator is here translated into the more ordinary language of physical science."

Alfred von Kremer's work on "The Ruling Ideas of Islamism" * is one of singular interest. Few persons appreciate the vigour of religious speculation among Mohammedan nations. We are accustomed to think of Islamism as intellectual stagnation, the monotonous repetition of two sterile dogmas. This may be true of Mohammedan orthodoxy, which is in the nature of things limited and unprogressive; but how far it is from adequately representing the religious thought of Western Asia is evinced by Von Kremer's interminable list of the prophets, sages, scholars, visionaries, anchorites, and rationalists who have at various times arisen in the character of antagonists to it. The friendly relations between the early Mohammedan ascetics and the Christian monks are very curious. Kremer ascribes to Christian monachism a considerable influence on the development of Mohammedanism in Arabia, and is of opinion that Buddhist monks exercised a corresponding influence in Persia. One of the most interesting chapters of his work is devoted to the recent movement of El Bâb in the latter country. It is within our knowledge that arrests are made even in Egypt, of Persians suspected of belonging to his sect. He was undoubtedly a man of insight and genius. Another important section treats of the Mutazili, or Rationalists, the Protestants of Islam. These asserted the doctrine of free will in opposition to fatalism, and denounced the anthropomorphic conceptions of the orthodox. For a brief space they were the dominant party, and the era of their preponderance is that of the highest development of Arabic civilization. Von Kremer anticipates that their ideas will revive, and that the Oriental world will be elevated by them to intellectual equality with the world of Europe.

It is a somewhat violent transition from the fanciful speculation and impassioned mysticism of the East to the erudite sobriety of "the judicious Hooker," † an analysis of whose great work has been carefully prepared by Dr. K. H. Sack. Dr. Sack's plan includes the addition of much interesting illustrative matter, and a discussion of the genuineness of the last three books of Hooker's work. The pains he has thus devoted to a great English author merit cordial acknowledgment. It is needless to remark, however, that the peculiar phase of controversy represented by Hooker can have merely an historical interest for Continental Protestants.

The object of an essay on the treatise known as the fourth book of the Maccabees ‡, and usually attributed in the MSS. to Josephus, is to show that it is a Jewish sermon of the first century. The writer does not attribute it to Josephus, but he rates its merit very high. He considers it a significant instance of the approximation of Jewish and Greek philosophy, and points out that St. Ambrose and others of the Fathers have been largely indebted to it. He has added several excursuses on collateral points, and bestowed much pains on the restoration of the text.

The "Policy of the Popes," by R. Baxmann §, is in effect a history of the relations of the Papacy to the secular power from Gregory I. to Gregory VII. A more interesting subject could hardly be proposed to the historian, and Herr Baxmann has treated it most ably, and quite as satisfactorily as the restricted scale of his work allows. He is a Protestant, but appears to be free from every trace of polemical bias. It is only to be regretted that the subject is hardly completed. A comprehensive view of the rise of the Popes' power should terminate, not with Gregory VII, by whom the theory of Papal supremacy was fully elaborated, but with Innocent III, under whom it actually prevailed in practice The correlative history of the decline of the Papacy would date from the death of the same Pontiff.

Prebendary Venn's biography of St. Francis Xavier ‖ has been translated with some alterations by Dr. W. Hoffmann, who has prefixed an historical introduction and appendix, so as to convert the work into a general history of Christian missions The unity of the volume is seriously marred by the disproportionate space accorded on this plan to Xavier. It is impossible that a joint history of Catholic and Protestant missions, by a zealous professor of either creed, should not assume a controversial aspect. Mr. Venn and Dr. Hoffmann, however, appear to us to have sincerely endeavoured to write in a spirit of equity, and to have succeeded as well as the nature of the case would allow.

A "History of the People of Israel," by Dr. Ferdinand Hitzig ¶, is distinguished by one merit very unusual in such works—that of extreme condensation. This estimable quality may perhaps be even in excess, but it is still most acceptable, especially as it is accompanied by simplicity of style and sobriety of judgment. Dr. Hitzig treats his materials in a cautious and conservative spirit, equally remote from blind credulity and from the love of fantastic innovation. The most remarkable feature of his work is the extent to which comparative philology is employed as a means of investigation. Some of his speculations, however, in this department appear rather fanciful. He has not made so much use of the recent Assyrian discoveries as might have been expected.

A volume of sermons, by Dr. Schwarz *, and an analysis of the doctrinal portion of the Synoptic Gospels, by Dr. Schwalb †, are interesting as indications of the tendencies of Liberal Protestantism in Germany.

Libanius the orator is fully entitled to a special biography from his intellectual and moral eminence, the eventful character of his life, and more particularly from his position as the most brilliant representative of expiring Paganism in the fourth century. Our information respecting him is principally derived from the particulars afforded by his autobiography and voluminous correspondence. The late Dr Sievers ‡ has displayed much skill in fashioning these into a continuous narrative, and indefatigable diligence in illustrating them by quotations derived from a vast variety of sources. There is a somewhat dry and academical air about the book, but it is highly interesting nevertheless. Excursuses are added on the condition of schools of rhetoric in the age of Libanius, and on the biography of various personages connected with or mentioned by him.

A series of essays on the Odyssey, by A. Kirchhoff §, chiefly aims at pointing out the inconsistencies in the poem as we have it, and determining how far they are to be attributed to interpolations in the text.

In an interesting essay, Dr Dunger ‖ gives an account of the mediæval writers on the Trojan war, especially Joseph of Exeter, Conrad of Wurzburg, and Guido de Colonna. He particularly investigates the sources of information resorted to by these writers, which, as they all flourished in Western Europe, must be sought for among Latin authors.

We can but mention three very meritorious commentaries on classical authors —on Plato's Cratylus, by Dr H. Schmidt ¶, on the Æneid, by Dr. A. Weidner , and on Æschylus, by R. Westphal ††.

A publication on Greek and Sicilian vases, by Otto Benndorf ‡‡, promises to be, when complete, a very valuable work. It is to contain about eighty plates, thirteen of which are published. The accompanying letterpress is a model of elegance, both as regards print and paper; the plates are unfortunately, but necessarily, not coloured, the original tints being indicated by shadings. The first part being devoted to Athenian ceramics, the plates mostly represent mere fragments, vases discovered in Attica being seldom entire. One feature of the work is the extent to which modern Athenian museums have been laid under contribution. The text is learned, and at the same time readable.

A very important contribution to the study of archæology has been made by a catalogue, with detailed descriptions, by Dr. Stephani, of the magnificent collection of ancient vases in the Hermitage Palace, in Russia §§. This museum is especially remarkable for its number of specimens from the Crimea and the adjacent coasts.

A work on political economy, by Dr. H. Maurus ‖‖, is designed as an introduction to the science, but also contains sketches of social reforms advocated by the author, and discussions on such controverted subjects as Free-trade, a paper currency, co-operation, and credit. In the abuse of the latter, the author sees the cause of all commercial disasters. He is a Protectionist. His views seem to be in general the result of independent thought, and he shows little affinity for any of the leading schools of political economy.

A journal of papers on physiology ¶¶ begins with a bulky volume, and promises to prove a repertory of valuable information. By far the largest and most elaborate paper is one by G. Valentin, describing the results of a series of investigations of the poison of arrows employed by American, African, and Malay savages.

Karl Goedeke's history of German imaginative literature * is a very valuable work, uniting the characteristics of a literary history and a bibliography. A memoir of each writer is given, concise but full of matter, and containing everything really necessary for the understanding of his works. Herr Goedeke's criticisms are very clear and precise, and in the main very sound. He is perhaps somewhat too partial to the Swabian school, and is certainly too severe upon Heine. The justice of his strictures is indisputable, but he does not adequately recognise the unique character of Heine's inspiration. The other German poets of the period are the products of certain factors, the influence of which may be distinctly traced in their writings. Heine is himself a factor, his poetry is a new organic type of the art. He belongs to the very rare class of truly original authors, and occupies as such a higher position than the best of the second class, from whom he differs as a fountain differs from a reservoir.

The uninviting appellation of "Moral Tales" seems to have been bestowed upon Paul Heyse's eighth volume † in a fit of pique, the previous volume having been taxed with immorality. The grounds of the imputation, so far as we can collect them from the somewhat vague statement of the writer himself, certainly appear sufficiently frivolous. He hints that he has this time taken care to bring himself down to the level of his readers, and, whether this is really the case, or whether the strain of constant production is beginning to make itself apparent, the tales in this collection are less interesting than usual as narratives, and less admirable as works of art. The first two are altogether too slight. The third contains a very powerful picture of a house devastated by cholera. The fourth is also an excellent story, and is a good example of Heyse's characteristic power of resolving an intricate situation arising out of a problem in morals. The fifth is the most amusing of any, and extremely vivid in its sketches of Corsican manners and scenery, but it is imitated from the Italian of Guerazzi.

A series of select translations from the eminent Russian novelist, Turguenell ‡, opens with his Fathers and Sons, an English version of which has been already reviewed in these columns. The personages and ideas depicted are perhaps somewhat too exclusively Russian to attain a wide popularity beyond the writer's own country, but readers of every nation must admire the simplicity of style and sentiment, the faculty of graphic description, and the pregnant conciseness manifested on every page. The translation is sanctioned by the author, and its fidelity is attested by a preface from his pen.

In attempting to write two hundred pages of original epigrams and poetical aphorisms, J. S. Tauber § has engaged in an undertaking in which success was impossible. Perhaps not half-a-dozen of his pieces fulfil all the requisites of this most difficult species of composition. Even, however, where matter and form are alike defective, there is frequently enough merit in both to show that the writer is above the usual level of satirical versifiers.

Karl Candidus ‖ is an Alsatian. If all the authors of Alsace write like him, patriotic Germans will have the consolation of knowing that the loss of the province has been unattended by any prejudice to the national literature.

THE DECISION OF THE PEERS.

THE vote by which an imposing majority of the House of Lords passed the second reading of the Irish Church Bill was welcome to the country and creditable to the Peers, and must have been truly gratifying to many of the minority. Where should we have been by this time if the Lords had been really seduced by the rhetoric which gave them so much pleasure? To put it in the very mildest form, the Lords would have lost as much as they have now gained in popular estimation. As it is, they have undoubtedly raised themselves in general opinion, partly because they were represented by so many good speakers, and still more because, after they had given themselves the treat of a fine debate, and had talked in a grand and patriotic and determined way, they ended in a display of ordinary common sense. That the Bill is now past all serious danger, and that there has been no collision between the Houses, is certainly the first subject of congratulation, but there are subsidiary results of the vote which are also of considerable importance. The utility of the House of Lords under certain circumstances and up to a certain point has been brought home to the popular mind. The Peers are still as far as ever from having any definite and adequate province in the management and conduct of ordinary legislation. They could not offer many grand set speeches like those which marked the recent debate, without becoming wearisome and monotonous. But they have shown that they can produce a striking effect if their powers are brought out rarely and on very important issues. They have, it is true, advantages over the Commons which very much aid their oratory. A speech from a peer is a success which would be a failure in the House of Commons, because a peer is able to discourse as he pleases without having to attend to practical results, whereas a leading speaker in the House of Commons is necessarily obliged to take a side, and to regard a great measure like the Irish Church Bill as something which he has to defend or oppose. It adds very much to the air of wisdom with which the Lords speak that they can safely oppose or defend a Bill with all kinds of modifications of opinion about it, and with numberless suggestions and counter-proposals, which, from their insight into things, they claim to be enabled to offer. Still the speeches in the Lords last week were undoubtedly very good, and they were as good on the last night of the debate as they had been before; and it cannot be doubted that the energy and distinctness with which Lord RUSSELL and Lord WESTBURY, in addition to many other peers of all parties, adopted the policy of concurrent endowment has given the country matter of thought that is clearly new, and has made it question seriously whether the policy is feasible or not. Then, again, it may be regarded as a decided political gain that the Conservative party has for the moment escaped from the leadership of its more headstrong advisers, and that it has contributed a very respectable following to the more moderate and liberal section of its leaders. Lord DERBY has done his very worst to defeat the Ministry, and has himself been defeated. The tradition of his empire over his party has been shaken, and the fact that Lord CAIRNS joined with him in taking the side which proved unsuccessful must affect the relations of the party to its leaders for the future.

A debate on such a subject as the Irish Church has a peculiar interest for the clergy, and the bishops, as the special representatives of the clergy, naturally and properly took a prominent part in it. On the whole, they did so with much success, but still the part which they played was not without its strange side. It is difficult to conceive anything weaker than the conduct of the two Archbishops in ostentatiously declining to vote. The Archbishop of CANTERBURY more especially presented a wondrous spectacle to the lay mind. He did his best to get the Bill passed. His influence, given so decidedly, and at the outset of the debate, did perhaps more than anything else to determine waverers, and to quiet the scruples of timid consciences. He expressly said that if the Bill was read a second time it might, he thought, be moulded into a very good Bill; which was very strong praise indeed from the most eminent representative of a Church which last autumn we were told was going to thunder against such a Bill from seventeen thousand pulpits. But he could not make up his mind to vote for it himself. He thought it was not quite right that an Archbishop should do what he urged and encouraged laymen to do. He was hampered by the thought that he would be said to be deserting his order, and sacrificing a sister Church. He, in fact, hedged to please, or at least not to offend openly, the clergy. It is perhaps true that there might have been some little outcry against him which his refusal to vote may have stifled; but in the long run the clergy would have respected him more if he had had a little more courage, and the laity would have at once regarded him with the respect due to a man who shows nerve and statesmanship in a difficult crisis. The Bishop of LICHFIELD deserves to be mentioned as a specimen of a Bishop who showed qualities exactly the opposite of those displayed by the Archbishop of CANTERBURY. His remarks were very queer, very unpractical, and quite out of the usual range of episcopal remarks, but they breathed a spirit of frankness and courage in every word. Other bishops departed more or less from the sphere of secular politics, but he was out of it altogether. What could even the most reverential peer, the most ardent disciple of bishops, make of a speaker who said that he thought that the Irish Church Bill was a bad Bill because he, although a clergyman of the Church of England, had once been invited to share the tent of a Romanist chaplain; who said that, bad as the Bill was, he yet hoped it might produce two good effects—the accordance of a comfortable site in Rome for Anglican worship, and the downfall of the temporal power of the Papacy; and who finally invited the coming Œcumenical Council to observe that the spirit of justice which dictated this bad Bill was due to the free preaching of the Gospel in a Protestant country? Still more astonishing to his hearers must have been the passage in which the Bishop avowed himself an ardent advocate of Mr. BRIGHT'S land scheme, apparently conceiving that such people as the Dukes of DEVONSHIRE and ABERCORN were like Maoris, good wild creatures, who, properly managed, would retire into uninhabited districts and leave nice blocks of soil to every deserving settler. "We [illegible] are in Arcadia" must have been the thought that passed through the minds of many of his listeners. It was quaint, simple, New Zealandish beyond belief, and yet it left the impression that it was a very good thing that in such an assembly as the Lords there should be a man who could think and say such things. The Bishop said that he should not mind saying all he had to say about the Irish Church Bill before a crowd of working men at Wolverhampton. Probably this would be a very small trial of his courage; he will need much more boldness if next year he goes on as he has begun this Session, and seriously adopts the cause of Irish tenants in an assembly of landed proprietors.

Lord WESTBURY tickled the fancy of his hearers by the free use of a queer sort of Biblical language. That he would say something very odd and amusing was confidently anticipated, but the most sanguine could never have hoped that he would compare himself to JOHN the BAPTIST. What he described himself as crying out in the wilderness was that the Roman Catholics ought to have a large slice of the funds of the Anglican Church. Lord WESTBURY need not inconvenience himself by going into a desert and living on locusts to tell us this. It is what many eminent persons have been constantly saying for some years. Lord RUSSELL had actually opened the debate that very evening by making the very same proposal; which is perhaps none the worse because he has made it before, and abandoned it perhaps as being too sensible. How very much more at his case Lord WESTBURY would have been if Fate had permitted him to take the other side, was obvious from the large portion of his speech that was irrelevant. He gave a number of reasons why the Irish Church ought not to be attacked, and acknowledged that it was not attacked on many of the grounds which he declared to be inadmissible, but concluded by saying that the Irish Church was subject to one reproach, which it was essential to remove, and that was, that, being the Church of a small minority, it had got all the funds of the Irish nation applicable to religious purposes. He offered this, with characteristic audacity, as a kind of discovery which he, Lord WESTBURY, had made, and which had not dawned on persons of feebler intellectual powers. In a humbler, but much more effective, way, Lord RUSSELL stuck to his own pet project of giving glebe-houses to the ministers of all denominations. Whether so great, and perhaps theoretically desirable, a change in the Bill as this would involve is possible at this eleventh hour is open to much doubt. In the debate the considerations which support the notion of giving a portion of the Church funds to the Roman Catholics were in a hasty and summary way brought before the public. No more could be done in a debate on the second reading, but perhaps the project could not have been presented in a more favourable manner. There was an unquestionable advantage in having it put forward in that vague, general way which avoids the discussion of the difficult details it involves, and in its being recommended by men whose names carry weight with them, and yet do not awaken much sectarian enthusiasm or aversion. If we speak only of the debate, and not of anything yet to come, we may also observe, that while the amendments tending to concurrent endowment were radical enough, all the other amendments suggested were of a very trifling character. Peer after peer spoke as if he had got some splendid secret amendment in his pocket, but he never gave any clue to the mystery. The Archbishop of CANTERBURY, for example, said that the real evil of the Bill was that it encouraged Ultramontanism, and he considered it indispensable to protect the Roman Catholic laity against their pernicious advisers. The only means or instruments, [illegible] he shadowed forth as tending to this desirable end [illegible] ne or two amendments which would perhaps giv[illegible] the disestablished Irish Protestant Church about a quarter of a million of money m[illegible] Government proposes to give it; and if this woul[illegible] pr[illegible]tect the Irish priests and people against the clique now triumphant at Rome, they must be much more easily protected than is commonly supposed. It would be a curious inquiry whether in the same [illegible]ay by [illegible] could protect ourselves against any of the clerical cliques under which we sometimes suffer. The general conclusion to which the debate in the Lords leads us is that, although there was much eloquence and much wisdom in many of the speeches made, there was also much that was, at bottom, nerveless and poor, and that showed an indifference to the obligation to reason out a proposition and to trace its consequences. Lord DERBY wished the Lords to reject the Bill, but had not the faintest suggestion to make as to what was to come next, the remarks of the bishops "moved in another sphere" than those of laymen, who had to consider the possibilities of things; rival schemes which a very strong Ministry might well shrink from adopting were lightly and almost jauntily proposed as trifles; amendments of the most trivial importance were darkly spoken of as sure to retrieve the fallen fortunes of the Irish Church. The main thing is the vote; that has a value which neither time nor reflection will diminish. But of the debate there is not much that will be long remembered, except that it was generally creditable to the Lords, that the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH took his hearers by storm, that a few Conservative Peers saved their party from a great blunder, and that the Bishop of ST. DAVID'S played a very difficult part with singular firmness and courage.

THE VICEROY AND THE SUEZ CANAL.

WHILE there is but one opinion as to the propriety of giving the ruler of Egypt a suitable reception, some ceremonial difficulties arising from his ambiguous rank will require an exercise of tact and judgment on the part of his entertainers. The potentate who is commonly called the Viceroy enjoys a Turkish title which is said to indicate a rank somewhat short of royalty, and it is admitted that his independence has not yet amounted to actual sovereignty. The SULTAN not unnaturally desires to retain to himself a supremacy which is perhaps not wholly titular, and it may be presumed that his powerful vassal hopes gradually to relieve himself from his present relations. It is possible that a feudal connexion with the Turkish Empire might in certain contingencies operate as a security to the VICEROY, who may claim the benefit of the guarantees given to the SULTAN by the Treaty of Paris; nor would an exchange of a nominal subordination for the officious protectorate of some Western Power be for the advantage of the Egyptian dynasty. An Oriental Prince, however, is not unlikely to prefer the nominal attainment of Imperial power to considerations of prudence; and it is supposed that, on the occasion of opening the Suez Canal, he hopes to form direct diplomatic connexions with the European Governments. His visit to the different Courts is preparatory to the reception which he hopes to offer to a brilliant assemblage of Royal personages in the autumn, and his hopes of success will be in some degree affected by the nature of the hospitalities with which he may be welcomed. If the heads of the great ornamental departments in England are qualified for their duties, they will contrive to evade all delicate questions of form. The VICEROY has luckily not assumed the style of Majesty, and it is not disputed that he must be addressed as Highness. The most troublesome questions will perhaps arise when he is saluted by forts or ships, as there is no point of honour more rigidly exacted by great dignitaries than a proper complement of guns. Military and naval commanders have generally some experience as masters of the ceremonies, and they must manage in their expenditure of powder to give as little offence as possible to Egypt or to Turkey. The French Government, in accordance with its recent policy, will perhaps have been more lavish of honours to the VICEROY, but both at Vienna and Berlin the distinctive privileges of sovereign rank have been sedulously withheld.

A special envoy or agent of the Porte, being the brother of the VICEROY, has preceded him on his journey, for the express purpose of protesting against any acknowledgment of his possible pretensions to independence, and the invitations which are to be issued for the Suez celebration appear to provoke peculiar jealousy. The SULTAN is, in his own opinion, the proper host of foreign sovereigns who may chance to visit his dominions; but perhaps he would not persist in his objection to the proposed festivities were it not for the more serious project of a convention for neutralizing the Canal. Whatever may be the advantages of such a measure to Turkey as well as to Egypt, a formal treaty concluded with the VICEROY would go far to be regarded as a recognition of his independence. A person who enters into a contract cannot afterwards dispute the competency of the other party to perform his engagements, and if a convention were made, the VICEROY would undertake a kind of responsibility which only belongs to [illegible] A b[illegible]ch of [illegible] the pa[illegible] of the Eg[illegible] Government could only be resented by blockade, by reprisals, or by some other warlike operation, and consequently a treaty would involve a hypothetical recognition of Egypt as a possible belligerent. If England or France were to agree for a right of free passage with the States which are traversed by the Atlantic and Pacific lines of railway, the American Government would deem itself entitled to treat the compact as an infringement of its exclusive rights, and a similar objection applies to negotiations with respect to the Suez Canal initiated without the consent of the Porte. If the arrangement is thought desirable by the Powers which have the chief interest in the transit, it will be advisable both to insist on the participation of the SULTAN in the transaction, and in his acquiescence in the policy proposed by the VICEROY. There are good reasons for avoiding or postponing organic changes in the constitution of the Turkish Empire, but the protection which has been again and again accorded to the SULTAN involves a corresponding duty of suitable deference and conformity. The VICEROY would have no plausible excuse for rejecting the nominal intervention of the SULTAN if his own object of preventing his country from becoming a campaign-ground for European armies is practically or even apparently attained.

It is not yet certain whether the neutrality of the Suez Canal will be established, nor is the meaning of the term absolutely clear. The provisions of existing treaties by which certain States or territories are declared neutral have never yet been interpreted by practice, nor is it certain that they have any real validity. It is probable that, in case of war, Switzerland would be respected, because the Swiss are able and willing to punish a lawless intruder. Belgium, on the other hand, considers it necessary to protect by fortresses, and a considerable standing army, the precarious neutrality which is secured by every possible parchment sanction. According to a definition which may perhaps be official, the neutrality of the Suez Canal is to consist in the exclusion of ships of war, and in the uninterrupted passage of merchant vessels; but it is difficult to believe that a powerful belligerent would attend to either restriction. As long as merchant vessels are liable to capture at sea, it would matter little that they were, as at present, exempt from molestation in waters which would be within the dominions of Egypt or of Turkey. The Canal might serve as a port, but it would be blockaded at both ends by the fleets which respectively commanded the Mediterranean and the Red Sea; or, if no formal blockade were established, liability to capture would revive as soon as the Canal was left behind. It may be supposed that it is not intended to maintain the exclusion of ships of war in time of peace; for transports with troops and war material would come within the definition, and it would be absurd to compel the Indian reliefs to disembark on one side of the isthmus, in order to proceed as at present by railway to Suez or to Alexandria. Conventions made by Powers at the time friendly, in prospect of future war, are of no value unless a third party who may be expected to be neutral is strong enough to enforce performance of the contract. If the command of the Suez Canal became vitally important to two European belligerents, neither Turkey nor Egypt would be able to restrain their inevitable infractions of a restraining convention. In such cases it is always easy to find excuse in the conduct of the enemy for the use of superior power directed to the attainment of some indispensable object. The champion in the ballad who had promised to be passive declared, as soon as he saw his brother overmatched in single combat, that "his word, it should not stand." It would be impossible to prevent, by mere argument, a commander who was in force at one end of the Canal from relieving a beleaguered port or a threatened squadron at the other extremity.

It is rumoured that the English and French Governments are not entirely agreed on the question of neutralization, and perhaps it may be convenient to postpone the conclusion of a permanent arrangement until it has been ascertained whether the Canal itself will answer the expectations of those who have constructed it. Its capacity and its security from material impediments are even more important than the political provisions which may relate to the navigation. If it proves to be sufficient to admit vessels of the largest burden, English commerce will in time of peace derive the chief advantage of French enterprise and skill. It must be supposed that the Peninsular and Oriental Company has ascertained that it will be exposed to no fresh disadvantage in the competition with the highly subsidized French line which has already so largely diminished its prosperity. It is evident that a double disembarkation and transhipment would be fatal to a trading Company, where a rival was not subject to similar disadvantages. Shipowners will undoubtedly after a time adapt themselves to the new conditions of transit; but as the English generally use larger vessels than the French, it would be highly inconvenient to find that the depth of the Canal imposed a practical restriction on the tonnage. The route by the Cape of Good Hope may perhaps still be used by sailing vessels, but for many years there has been a growing tendency to employ steam in all but the longest voyages. The Canal will accommodate a large part of the traffic between Europe and Asia, for the railway transit from the Atlantic sea-coast to San Francisco will be too expensive for any goods which are not exceptionally costly and portable. It is not surprising that the ruler of the adjacent territory should anticipate a great increase of wealth, although he may perhaps feel that his independence is exposed to an additional danger

AMENDMENTS ON THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.

SEVERAL notices of amendments have already been given by different Peers, and many more may be expected. But, of all amendments that have been or may be proposed, those that point to concurrent endowment are by far the most important. Until it has been decided whether there shall be some effort made to carry out a scheme for giving the Roman Catholics a portion of the surplus, there is no use in discussing the details of the Bill, for clause after clause would either need alteration or would be indefensible. If the Roman Catholics are to benefit by the surplus, many of the reasons for making that surplus so large by confining compensation solely to life-interests fade away. It is difficult even to see why the Irish Church should not exist on its present legal basis if the way to do justice to the Roman Catholics is not to make the Anglican Church a voluntary body like theirs, but to give them money. This is, we presume, what Lord GREY has in view in giving notice to alter the preamble. He wishes to raise a general preliminary discussion, and perceiving that, if his amendments were carried, a totally new Bill must be framed, he naturally leaves to the Government the trouble of framing it. Whether the discussion ends in anything practical or not, it is quite worth while to have the whole subject of concurrent endowment thoroughly discussed; and we think we may anticipate that all seriously considered schemes of concurrent endowment out of the surplus will fall under two heads. Either a large portion of the surplus may be handed over to the Roman Catholics on terms which it may be presumed the heads of their Church would approve, or an effort may be made to give the Roman Catholic laity and the Irish priests, as opposed to the Ultramontane Bishops, a standing ground against those spiritual superiors who, as we think, are misleading them. The way to carry out the first object would be to hand over a lump sum of, let us say, two or three millions of money to a body of episcopal trustees, who should be permitted to spend the money, without supervision, inquiry, or responsibility, exactly as they might think best in promoting their religion. There can be no doubt that the Roman Catholic bishops would accept the money on these terms, and would give England a sort of receipt or acknowledgment to the effect that she had behaved in a proper manner to the Church. The objections to this course are that it would be intensely distasteful to the English nation, and that none of the objects proposed by the statesmen who have advocated concurrent endowment would be attained by it, except the one—which is doubtless very important in itself—of getting an avowal from the priests that they had been well treated. The other plan, that of applying a large portion of the surplus to the purposes of the Roman Catholic Church, but so applying it as to erect a bulwark more or less strong against Ultramontanism, would be best carried out by adopting Lord RUSSELL's proposals. If a large sum were spent in building houses for the priests, and purchasing adjacent plots of land for them, and in building churches and chapels where necessary, and if the property so created were vested in a Board composed in a great degree of Roman Catholic laymen, there might probably be created a most valuable check on the despotism of Ultramontane bishops. They might perhaps retain the right of turning a priest out of his cure, but they would always have to justify themselves for so doing in the eyes of a body of intelligent, wealthy, and independent laymen. We do not hesitate to say that this would be a most satisfactory appropriation of the surplus, ten times better than giving it to lunatic asylums and nurses. It would answer a most desirable end, and it would be almost certain to work practically well. The Board would build the house, establish and stock the garden, and send the key to the priest; and when he came to see how nicely the roof was slated, and how promising the cabbages and potatoes looked, he might be trusted to walk in and put up his hat on the peg which the foresight of the Board would have put prominently before him. Nor could the gift be rejected on the plea that it subjected the priests to the control of a heretic State. It would merely provide the priests with what they much want under the supervision of a Roman Catholic Board.

If such a proposal could be submitted to the decision of the Protestant laymen of England who have really taken the trouble of thinking over the difficult question of the Irish Church, we venture to think that nineteen out of every twenty would enthusiastically accept it, and the judicious friends of the Irish Church would gladly catch at it, as it would enable them to secure very much better pecuniary terms for their friends than the present Bill offers them. Possibly, if Lord RUSSELL's amendments were carried by a large majority in the Lords, it might be practicable even now to shape the Bill in accordance with his proposals. But however much we may wish to see a desirable object attained, we must take into account the difficulties that lie in the way of attaining it; and the difficulties that lie in the way of embodying Lord RUSSELL's amendments in the Bill seem very great. The Protestant Nonconformists of England, the class of English clergy who howled at Mr. GLADSTONE in Lancashire, and the Scotch generally, will be dead against any proposal to put money into the treasury of Babylon. And, we fear, the Irish Roman Catholic members in the Commons would find themselves obliged to oppose the scheme, for, although most of them might in their hearts welcome gladly any plan that promised to make the body of the priests more independent, and although the bulk of their constituents would think as they did, and although the bulk of the priests who guide these constituents might share their feelings, yet the risk of losing their seats at the next election might frighten them. The bishops would order the priests to oppose them; the priests, who are now absolutely dependent on the bishops, would obey, and would set the constituency against the very men who had done what the priests and the constituency wished they should do. We do not see where the motive-power to carry the Bill through the Commons would come from, except by a coalition between the Government and the Opposition. We are thus led to the real central difficulty that bars the way to the acceptance of Lord RUSSELL's amendments. The Cabinet would find itself in a position that would be almost, if not quite, untenable. The Ministers have come into office on the plea that they were forced to prepare a counter policy to that of Lord MAYO. But to give a large slice of the surplus to the Roman Catholics for glebes and churches, is really levelling up. It proceeds upon the same principle, and is defensible only by the very arguments that Lord MAYO would have used for his scheme. The only difference between the two plans is one as to the amount of money to be given to the Roman Catholics. If, as Lord MAYO would have proposed, the Irish Church had kept all that it has got, the amount to be given to the Roman Catholics must in fairness have been larger than it would be if taken from the surplus. But, further, the Government have justified their Bill on the ground, not that it was theoretically the only Bill or the best Bill, but that it was the Bill which the country wishes for. They have stated that, in accordance with what is indisputably one of their primary duties, they have ascertained the feelings of the country, and that all schemes of concurrent endowment are alien to these feelings. To adopt Lord RUSSELL's amendments would be to acknowledge that they have performed one of their primary duties in a most insufficient way; and although they might shelter themselves under the plea that the opinion of the country has changed, they would still substantially confess that they have misinterpreted the signs of the times, and the real Ministerial power, the government and direction of the country in this most important affair, would obviously reside not in them, but in the peers who carried Lord RUSSELL's amendments. They will also see that to adopt these amendments would not only lower their prestige, but in all probability break up their party. Mr. GLADSTONE would, indeed, be making a martyr of himself if he consented to abandon his present position in the Commons in order to oppose, by the aid of the Conservatives, the English Dissenters, the Scotch, and the Irish Roman Catholic members. Other observers than Lord CLAUDE HAMILTON would watch with interest Mr. GLADSTONE's face as he came into the House of Commons to own that Lord MAYO was right after all. Even if, in obedience to a new view of duty, he would consent to wear sackcloth and cover himself with ashes to this extent, it is by no means certain that the Bill could be carried this year; for there would be a large section in both Houses who would agree with Lord WESTBURY that the constitution of the Established Church might remain much as it is if the claims of the Roman Catholics were settled in cash, and there would be another large section who would say that if the necessary sum were paid to the Roman Catholics and the Presbyterians, the Irish Church might very well be allowed to keep the rest. If these views, which certainly have a show of reason, prevailed, the Bill would have to be recast from beginning to end. All the labours of the Commons would be entirely thrown away, and about the end of July the Government draftsmen would have to be charged with the preparation of a new Bill.

We have yet to learn what amendments those peers will devise who think it possible to keep the framework of the Bill as it is, and yet to amend its provisions largely in the interest of the Irish Church. It is easy to anticipate what may be done in the way of what the Yankees call one-horse amendments. Lord GRANVILLE has frankly owned that the Government has itself kindly contrived an easy passage for humble vehicles through some of the provisions of the Bill. A good-sized pony would be enough to draw through such amendments as that of changing the date from which to calculate private endowments, and a donkey might do for Lord SHAFTESBURY's proposal to insert special clauses to meet the curious longevity of clergymen. It is quite true that as a large portion of the Irish clergy lead healthy, frugal lives, with a fair income and almost nothing to do, they belong to the class of annuitants who wear out the hearts of reversioners, and who go living on, like ravens or swans, years after intelligent actuaries have proved to them that they ought, according to the best tables, to be in their coffins. But there are peers whose views are much more ambitious and extensive, and who propose to drive four, or even six-horse, coaches through the Bill. We can only say that when they make their attempt, they ought to have quite fair play. Every amendment should be discussed on its own merits, and we may go further and say that, wherever a point can be shown to be doubtful, it ought to be decided in favour of the Irish Church. It would be a source of the greatest satisfaction to all impartial Englishmen if any amendments could be devised which would comfort and appease the Orangemen and yet not depart from the principles on which the Bill is founded. To do this seems to us very difficult, and certainly Mr. DISRAELI signally failed when he set himself to do it; but by all means let it be done, if it be possible.

SPAIN.

THE Spanish Constitution has been adopted and sworn to, and SERRANO is installed as Regent; but there has been no reconciliation of parties. The Spaniards, although some of their claims to general admiration are exaggerated or premature, may boast of having deviated with entire originality from the ordinary track of revolutions. For seven or eight months they have managed to keep the peace, and to conduct the ordinary business of the country, while they were debating general principles, and choosing between two different forms of government. Their final decision in favour of a monarchy has led to the provisional establishment of a system which might be accurately described as Republican. An elected ruler exercises the executive power under control of the Cortes, not as a Viceroy, although he bears the ambiguous title of Regent; but by an appointment which became necessary in default of a King. There are precedents, both in Europe and Asia, of sovereigns reigning by a subordinate title which had been originally conferred, in accordance with the fact, on themselves or their predecessors; but SERRANO is not suspected of any design to found a dynasty, nor is there the smallest probability that such an enterprise could succeed. The old French Commission of Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, once held under the authority of the League by the Duke of MAYENNE, corresponds nearly to the rank which has been conferred on SERRANO. The English title of Protector meant less than the Spanish Regency when it was borne by GLOUCESTER or SOMERSET, and it implied more solid and independent power when it was afterwards conferred on CROMWELL. If the present arrangement should last for any considerable time, the Spanish Constitution may perhaps imperceptibly approximate to the Parliamentary Monarchy which in England contains all the elements of an orderly Republic. The difference between a Regent chosen by the Cortes, and a President elected by the people, extends over the whole intermediate space between the English and the American systems. If, unfortunately, there were to be a President elected for the United Kingdom, Mr. GLADSTONE would at the present moment be preferred to all competitors by an overwhelming majority. His administrative functions would probably be those of a Prime Minister, but his position would be radically altered. Instead of representing the supremacy of Parliament, he would hold his power direct from the people; and as long as his popularity lasted he might probably be able, if he were willing, to defy the opposition of the two Houses. In the actual state of things the Minister is really the stronger, because the trust which is delegated to him by Parliament is revocable at a moment's notice. It is probable that SERRANO will find his task facilitated by the obvious impossibility of a collision with the Cortes.

The personal rivalries which were naturally supposed to divide the chiefs of the Government have hitherto, except on one occasion, been successfully repressed. TOPETE warned the Cortes against the ambitious projects which he imputed to PRIM; but the Admiral still presides over the navy, and the Field-Marshal over the army. SERRANO would be supported by the Cortes in any contest with his formidable colleague; and there is some reason to hope that the military revolts which have in Spain frequently regulated the distribution of power, are becoming obsolete. The Revolution of September was exclusively conducted by naval and military leaders, and it is probable that an edifying proclamation in which PRIM denounced the interference of soldiers in politics produced little moral effect. The right of rebelling against the QUEEN or her Ministers has by long custom only been limited by the penalties of failure. Non-commissioned officers who hoped to earn their epaulettes by a mutiny had only to calculate the force of their opponents, inasmuch as both parties knew that the country at large was entirely indifferent whether O'DONNELL or NARVAEZ was in power. It is only where veteran mercenaries trained in war have learned to consider their flag or their regiment as their country, that military conspiracies are likely to thrive in defiance of popular feeling. A rebellion of general officers against the Cortes would be universally resented; and the soldiers themselves would to some extent share the general indignation. Notwithstanding many idle rumours of Carlist risings, there is only one malcontent party from which an insurgent chief could hope for support; and happily PRIM is divided from the Republicans by reciprocal animosities. It is certain that he will not intrigue with the banished dynasty; and it would be impossible for him to rest a claim to supreme power on his military position. If the army again engages in civil broils, it will be either supporting or opposing an attack of the Republicans on the Constitution. It is at present the interest of PRIM to remain on good terms with SERRANO; and there is no reason to accuse him of disloyalty. CABALLERO DE NODAS, the most active and ambitious of PRIM'S lieutenants, is on his way to Cuba; and no other military chief is sufficiently prominent to alarm the jealousy of SERRANO and PRIM. The army, which may not perhaps be easily converted from its restless tendencies by general orders, will perhaps gradually recognise, as in other European countries, the supremacy of the civil Government. Since the Revolution order has more than once been restored by a display of military force; and there has been neither disturbance nor menace on the part of the army. PRIM has invited the officers to swear to the Constitution, leaving them full permission to refuse; but at the same time intimating that disobedience will be followed by dismissal.

The Republican members absented themselves as a body from the ceremony of SERRANO'S taking the oath of office; and it would seem that the party in general refuses to acquiesce in its recent defeat. Although the minority ought to a certain extent to be bound by the vote of the Cortes, perseverance in maintaining the Republican cause can scarcely be considered perverse as long as the dominant party postpones the election of a King. The choice of candidates has been narrowed by the tacit retirement of the Duke of AOSTA, and by the refusal of Dom FERNANDO, followed by his recent marriage. A Queen who could scarcely perform the functions proper to her rank, or a wife of the King who was not even decorated with the Royal title, would not be acceptable to a nation which has not yet forgiven the degradation of the former Court. The Duke of MONTPENSIER, who remains, has not gained in popularity, although his claims may have been improved by the retirement of his rivals. The Republicans in the Cortes lately expressed loud indignation at the DUKE'S return from Portugal, although it is not pretended that he has committed any act which ought to be punished by exile. Princes have often been banished on grounds of political expediency; but the Duke of MONTPENSIER is not even a pretender to the throne, which he only hopes to obtain by the choice of the Cortes. It is probable that his return may indicate the intention of his supporters to push his claims; but either his friends think that the time for declaring in his favour has not arrived, or they are restrained by the opposition of PRIM. There is no doubt that the Duke of MONTPENSIER might have been crowned with general consent if he had taken an active part in the Revolution, and especially if he had been at the side of SERRANO in the combat of Alcolea; but absence has not removed the prejudices which he had provoked, and since last autumn the Republicans have had time to count their numbers, and to organize themselves into a party. They have been outvoted in the Cortes because their distinctive name is vaguely associated with subversive theories, and because socialists and anarchists are numbered in their ranks; but it is not certain that the mass of the population is as much afraid of change as its representatives, and revolutionary Democrats have always disregarded the decision of the greater number when it was opposed to their objects. The risings of last winter at Cadiz and elsewhere have perhaps been partially forgotten, and it is evident that in some parts of the country the Republic is popular. There is no reason at present to apprehend disturbances which would be easily repressed by the army, acting under regular and legitimate authority. The best speakers in the Cortes are Republicans, who will probably prefer Parliamentary conflicts to struggles in the field, where their own peculiar qualities would be useless. If MAZZINI'S conspiracy, which has lately exploded in different parts of Italy, should be unexpectedly successful, the influence of a Republican triumph would be strongly felt in Spain. At present the leaders of the party have to content themselves with annoying a Government which they are not strong enough to overthrow. The prosaic discussions on the Budget, in which the Cortes are at present engaged, offer little opportunity for the exhibition of revolutionary fervour.

It is well that there is no occasion at home for the services of the army, as the rebellion in Cuba causes a serious drain on the military resources of Spain. The lawless deposition of General DULCE, and his forced removal from the island, although both measures might perhaps be defended by Spanish precedent, are alarming events. The Spanish volunteers in Cuba thought fit to depose the GOVERNOR on account of his alleged leniency, and as long as they control the Government, they will probably conduct the civil war in the most barbarous manner. They will find in CABALLERO DE NODAS a commander who will scarcely be disposed to regulate his administration at the will of a portion of his troops; but it would seem that there is a risk of a dangerous contest among the defenders of order or of Spanish sovereignty. If any of the American adventurers who have joined the rebels are put to death in violation of the customs of civilized war, the irritation of their countrymen will be at the same time just and formidable. It is strange that a struggle which has lasted for more than half a year should never yet have been made intelligible to foreigners. It is not known whether the insurgents are friendly or hostile to slavery, and their dislike of Spanish functionaries seems to be an insufficient cause for an obstinate rebellion. The nature of the insurrection is as obscure as the motives of its leaders; for, although narratives of battles and victories have been occasionally published, it is uncertain whether the chiefs have ever succeeded in raising an army. American sympathisers with the rebellion exult in the actual or probable sufferings of the Spanish army from disease, especially in the hottest months of the year; but prudent officers will probably contrive to save their troops as far as possible from fatigue and exposure. The Cortes have, perhaps prudently, discouraged discussion on the affairs of Cuba; but it is said that the nation shares with the Government the feeling that it is a point of honour to defend an unprofitable possession. It may be doubted whether the Deputies from Cuba will ever take their seats in the Cortes to share in the debates upon future schemes for the abolition of slavery.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD ROMILLY was perfectly right in desiring to check the applause in the Strangers' Gallery of the House of Lords, but the evil would not a short time ago have been thought one of the most urgent of existing grievances. The irrepressible excitement produced by the speeches of peers must be gratifying to the House, even when it takes an inconvenient or irregular form. One cautious speaker appropriately recalled the memory of the French Convention, and of debates controlled by the male and female rabble who were directly addressed by the more unscrupulous leaders of the Mountain. It may be hoped that the peers, and especially the bishops, will be proof against the temptation of preferring mob popularity to the approval of their colleagues. Even the Church dignitary who shouted and groaned last week on the steps of the Throne is perhaps not so dangerous an agitator as the Demoiselle THÉROIGNE. The silent interest of the audience in the gallery, and of the general community, will sufficiently reward the exertions of contending orators. When a dozen peers scattered themselves over the benches in the dull interval between five o'clock and dinner-time, the unprivileged spectators were not in the habit of violating the rules of order. Since the entrance of Lord SALISBURY into the House the attendance has been larger, and the ordinary proceedings have consequently been more spirited. The extraordinary vigour of the great debate of last week may possibly facilitate the efforts of ambitious members of the House to secure for it a greater influence in the conduct of public business; but it is above all things necessary, in any such attempt, to abandon the hope of achieving impossibilities. Even if the House of Lords were entirely composed of statesmen of the political and intellectual rank of its principal leaders, it would be as impossible as it is in present circumstances that a body not directly representative should have the weight of the House of Commons. The nation, though it may be willing to listen to prudent counsellors, reserves to itself the ultimate decision of all questions of the first importance, and in almost all cases of the kind the decision of the House of Commons ought to be accepted as the judgment of the country. The wisdom of the majority, in passing the most unpalatable of measures in deference to the authority which is virtually supreme, will increase the respect which is generally paid to the House of Lords. The defeat of the Irish Church Bill on the second reading would have been conspicuously imprudent, and undeniable rashness invalidates more than almost any other defect the reputation of a deliberative assembly. It will be generally acknowledged that the House of Lords has not only displayed great power of argument, but that it has had the virtue and the foresight to perform an act of remarkable self-denial. The Orangemen who complain that expediency has been preferred to the assertion of principle unintentionally pay the House of Lords the highest of political compliments. In all public affairs a wise man looks only to what is to be done for the general good, attaching but little value to opportunities of uttering barren or unseasonable truths. Perhaps nine-tenths of the members of the House may have thought that the abolition of the Irish Establishment would be a grave misfortune; but a sufficient number fortunately remembered that the question was not whether the measure should become law, but how long the agitation should be allowed to continue before it would be necessary to submit to terms which might probably be more unfavourable.

While it is necessary that in the greatest matters the House of Lords should defer to the opinion of the House of Commons, it is not to be hastily inferred that reconsideration is useless. The large and respectable minority in the country which may be opposed to a popular measure is both satisfied by the expression of its feelings in the House of Lords, and in some degree reconciled to defeat by the example of politic submission. Such speakers as Lord SALISBURY and Lord CARNARVON are more likely to find a hearing from the friends of the Irish Church than if they had shared the vehement and uncompromising opinions of Mr. GLADSTONE. In their speeches the Conservative classes find a proof that it is not impossible to combine their own prepossessions with acquiescence in the inevitable overthrow of the Establishment. It may be added that, through the operation of various causes, the debates in the Upper House generally turn on comparatively general principles. The pregnant and weighty argument of the Bishop of ST. DAVID'S would have been thought out of place in the House of Commons. There is no occasion to rate too highly the importance of an appeal which necessarily ends in the confirmation of the judgment of the House below. The Irish Church Bill, like the first Reform Bill, will have been virtually the work of the House of Commons, if it is passed in the present or in any future Session. The functions of the House of Lords were confined to the explanation of the reasons which rendered it necessary that a reluctant majority should pass the Bill, and to a limited modification of details. It is in the more common and larger mass of legislation that a Second Chamber has the opportunity of being substantially useful. It has of late been frequently and justly stated that, in questions of secondary importance, the country is not indisposed to place considerable reliance on the ability and honesty of the House of Lords. Among other qualifications for the despatch of business, the Peers possess the traditional habit of being guided by their leading members. The rank and file are not encouraged to make superfluous speeches; and the coldness with which volunteers are received effectually suppresses the garrulity which elsewhere finds an excuse or a motive in the eagerness of constituents. The debate is in ordinary cases confined to the front benches, with great addition of value to the discussion. Except where commercial interests are concerned, there are few subjects of legislation on which there is not a respectable amount of special knowledge among the principal members of the House. Even if the power of the House of Lords extended to the control of finance, there are generally Ministers or ex-Ministers present who have in former times discussed similar questions in the House of Commons. Professor THOROLD ROGERS complains, in a letter to the Morning Star, of the extravagant compliments which have, in his judgment, been paid to the speakers in the Irish debate. There is perhaps some pretext for a censure which would apply equally to almost all laudatory criticism; but when Professor ROGERS attempts to reduce the alleged merit of the speeches to an absurdity by suggesting that, if the Lords are abler than the Commons, the constituencies must have been mistaken in their choice, the dilemma is not absolutely conclusive. The average standard of ability is nearly the same in both Houses, and the respective leaders belong to the same official class. No competent and candid judge of eloquence will deny that Mr. BRIGHT is the greatest of living orators; but Lord ELLENBOROUGH in his prime was superior to any second speaker in the present House of Commons.

There is much foundation for the complaint that successive Governments have, in deference to the supposed jealousy of the House of Commons, withheld from the Peers a fair share of the business of legislation. It is fortunate that, for various reasons, and more especially in consequence of the difficulty of finding seats for official candidates, a large section of every Cabinet is necessarily composed of Peers. It cannot but be the wish of Ministers in the position of Lord GRANVILLE or the Duke of ARGYLL to add to the importance and utility of their order, and, by a steady exertion of their influence, they may to some extent counteract the prejudices and the timidity of their colleagues in the Upper House. Unless some unwise interference with the provisions of the Irish Church Bill produces a reaction, public opinion will not be opposed to an increase of the legislative activity of the House of Lords. Lord SALISBURY'S joint Committee has, as might have been expected, ended in nothing; but although the House of Commons may not consent to change its forms for the purpose of adding to the power of the House of Lords, it would offer no active resistance to a reasonable modification of the custom by which business is distributed. The authority of the House of Lords, independently of its constitutional rights, depends not only on the practised ability of the leading Peers, but on the vast possessions and the social pre-eminence of the order. To some fastidious critics the love of an Englishman for a lord appears to be a mark of national vulgarity. It would not be difficult to show that there is another side of the question, if the inquiry were necessary for practical purposes. It is sufficient to know that the preference for men of high rank for the performance of certain duties is unquestionable and almost universal. A man is born a peer, but he is elected a director, a trustee, a chairman, and a president of all manner of institutions; and the House of Lords consists in a large proportion of persons who have been thus appointed by popular suffrage to responsible offices. It is not surprising that an Assembly so composed exercises a power which imitative bodies of the same kind in other countries have uniformly failed to acquire. The weight which the House of Lords derives from the personal position of its members is sufficient for all ordinary purposes; but the scale flies up when the House of Commons on rare occasions throws a fixed resolution into the balance. It is as necessary in politics as in all other forms of human activity to defer to laws of nature wherever they are ascertained. A prudent Assembly will not invite inquiry into the limits of its power, nor undertake any task which it may not reasonably hope to accomplish.

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS AND THE EMPEROR.

THE significance of the French elections does not become less serious as the event itself retreats from view. Though this or that prophecy may have been falsified by the second ballot, there is enough in the facts that remain to give cause for grave anxiety, if not for immediate alarm. The position of affairs in France is one to which the Second Empire is wholly unaccustomed, and it is yet to be seen whether the instinct of self-preservation will supply the lack of experience. Hitherto it has been taken for granted that the great body as well of the electors as of the people is on the side of the Government, while even no longer ago than last winter the extreme minority showed so many symptoms of exhaustion that the EMPEROR thought it harmless enough to be treated as a useful tool. We are separated only by a few weeks from the time when this reading of the political atmosphere seemed still plausible, but it has passed in this short interval into the limbo of exploded hypotheses. The overwhelming majority has proved to be very little larger than was required to turn the scale in favour of the Government, while, if looked at in the light of official knowledge, it may hardly seem to fulfil even this requirement. For immediate purposes, indeed, a vote is a vote, no matter who has given it, or how it has been obtained; but, to those astute persons who regard it as an index of the mental attitude of the elector, this remoter consideration must appear of considerable importance. When the exigencies of official position, the need of official countenance, and the hope of official favour have all been taken into account, a very large deduction will have to be made from those 800,000 voters who have won for the Government its nominal victory. The support of a huge bureaucracy is no doubt extremely valuable in deciding a critical contest, but it cannot after all be counted as anything more than a species of political challenge cup which is always at the command of the combatant who is strongest for the time being. How large an allowance must be made on this account the EMPEROR ought—if only he is well served—to know better than any one else; but that some such allowance must be made is absolutely certain, and the majority of 1869 is not so overwhelming that any even the smallest diminution of it can be viewed with indifference. Thus it is a feature of the situation in France that the EMPEROR must be thoroughly aware of the weakness of the system he has built up with so much pains. So far as he himself is concerned, it is of course well that he should see facts in their true colours, but this accuracy of vision may be none the less a source of danger to Europe. More than one critic has lately been busying himself with speculations whether

NAPOLEON III., if brought face to face with revolution, would show more determination than LOUIS PHILIPPE, or as much dignity as CHARLES X. To foreigners, at all events, it is of more moment to consider what he will do to avert a revolution than how he will bear himself in the presence of one. For the last month the foreign relations of the Empire have seemed but of secondary interest in comparison with the judgment of the country upon its domestic policy. Now that the elections are over, the balance must be readjusted. The questions suggested by the mere mention of Prussia, or Rome, or Belgium can hardly have been brought nearer to a peaceful solution by the fresh need in which the EMPEROR finds himself of supplying the Empire with a raison d'être. Even in the congratulatory platitudes which the EMPEROR offered on Thursday to the victors of Solferino, his identification of French patriotism with military fidelity shows that he perfectly appreciates the quarter to which he can alone look for real support in any formidable crisis.

Nor is this the only aspect in which the result of the late contest furnishes food for thought. Whatever may be the precise numbers to which the Radical Opposition can fairly lay claim, it has certainly shown abundant traces of an amount of strength and organization that has taken most people by surprise. The comparative indifference which the Republican party throughout Europe has of late shown to political methods has sometimes been mistaken for an abandonment of political action. The returns of the Paris elections will have rudely undeceived any who thus think; and the fact that the Republic is desired as a means rather than as an end, as an instrument to effect social changes rather than as a political change which is its own justification and reward, will not make this sudden enlightenment less alarming. Neither the temper which animates the apostles of the new movement, nor the confidence they display in their own success, contains much consolation for those timid citizens who have been telling themselves ever since 1848 that the age of revolutions is over. Perhaps their assurance will prove about as well grounded as the kindred belief, which was so prevalent in 1851, that war had been finally got rid of. But whatever may be the real danger shadowed forth in these vague indications, it is, in a greater or less degree, a danger for Europe generally. If the Radical Opposition in France were actuated only by political motives, it might be fairly argued that the contagion of their example will not, under any circumstances, extend to countries which furnish no parallel to the political conditions under wh[illegible] Frenchmen now live. So far, however, as the social condit[illegible] of other European countries differ from those of France, they are for the most part rather more than less favourable to the development of revolutionary ideas. Why, for example, should an English labourer with ten shillings a week be more inclined to set his face against communism than a small French proprietor? He may remain a good while longer beyond the sphere of its influence, but if once he is brought within it, there is no reason why he should not take the disease at least as badly as his neighbour. It is possible, of course, that the next European revolution may turn out in the end to be as fertile in unforeseen advantages as its predecessor, and that the progress which public morality has made in the interval will prove sufficient to preserve it from those tremendous evils by which the changes of 1789 were alloyed. But even those whose estimate of the future is on the whole sanguine may be pardoned if they feel a natural shrinking from so colossal a readjustment of existing arrangements as is contemplated by the Socialist Republicans; and in so far as the French elections have shown the strength of this party to be greater than had previously been supposed, they certainly supply an additional ingredient in that composite sense of uneasiness of which France has more than once become the occasion.

In the absence of better materials, the French public has been seeking to extract as much information as possible about the future from the EMPEROR'S letter to Baron DE MACKAU, followed as it has been by the promotion of Baron JÉRÔME DAVID to the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. It must be admitted that if it were necessary to invest these two acts with the importance at first attached to them in Paris, they would amount to little less than a promise of a new coup d'état. Baron JÉRÔME DAVID belongs to that small clique of politicians which glories in being more Imperial than the EMPEROR, and it is not unnatural that the choice of an Arcadian as the donee of exceptional honours, immediately after the elections, should be generally taken as a note of defiance against every section of the Opposition. The language of the letter to M. DE MACKAU is quite compatible with this theory. Indeed, if the EMPEROR has really come to the conclusion that "concessions of principles, or sacrifices of persons, "are always inefficient in presence of popular movements," and that "a Government with any self-respect ought not to "yield either to pressure or persuasion or riot"; it is no longer open to him to make any change whatever in his system of government. There is little chance that France will again, at least in his lifetime, enjoy that freedom from "subversive "passions" which at an early period of his reign it was his boast to have secured to her. Whether the Empire shall yield to persuasion, or be modified by pressure, or succumb to riot, it may still be in his power to decide; but that, in the absence of some unforeseen catastrophe, one or other of these influences will be in constant operation for the future, it is hardly possible to doubt. That halcyon state of absolute immunity from censure or criticism which followed upon the Second of December will scarcely be reproduced by any less drastic process. We can readily believe that NAPOLEON III. is now quite convinced that, if he can but get such an opportunity again, he will use it to better purpose. When all opposition is once more silenced, and an adoring nation has composed itself to accept from the hand of its preserver the boon of a liberal Constitution, the long-delayed reforms will be bestowed with lavish generosity. Happily, perhaps, for the Imperial consistency, these resolutions of amendment will never be put to the test; but it is by no means equally certain that the position taken up in the letter to M. DE MACKAU will be maintained in its integrity. This curious document has all the air of that introductory protest against yielding anything which, in the mouth of an irresolute sovereign, is not seldom the preface to an unusually large concession. If the EMPEROR has made up his mind to try some fresh experiment in a Liberal direction, he will naturally be anxious to invest the act, as far as it is in his power to do so, with the character of being the unprompted product of his own will. With this end in view his first aim would be to interpose a break between the elections and his intended reforms. France must learn that the former event has no connexion with the latter, before she can be allowed to profit by the intimate relation which really exists between them. There is no great difficulty in reconciling the elevation of Baron JÉRÔME DAVID with this explanation. Among ourselves, when a new Ministry comes into office, its first act is sometimes to give peerages to the most impracticable of its supporters while in opposition. NAPOLEON III. has the character of being true to his friends; and, if he has resolved to break with the Arcadians more definitively than he has yet seen his way to doing, the promotion of one or more of their number would form an appropriate preface to the act. That the EMPEROR has actually made up his mind to any irrevocable step is highly improbable, but this is no reason why he should not take one which, as we have seen, has the merit of being legitimately open to more than one interpretation.

THE DUAL GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY.

MR. O'REILLY has redeemed his pledge of again bringing before the notice of the House the anomalous relations which exist between the General for the time being exercising the authority of Commander-in-Chief, and the Secretary of State for War. It was right that the subject should be mentioned on going into Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates, but neither Mr. O'REILLY nor any one else could hope at this moment to get up a real live debate on any subject of the kind in the midst of the excitement caused by the present aspect of the Irish Church question. All that could be done Mr. O'REILLY has done. In the first place, he has made the subject his own, and will no doubt hereafter discharge the responsibilities which he has assumed. He has, moreover, extracted from the Minister an admission that he has no answer to give beyond the usual transparent and conventional fallacies with which it is the rule to meet all questions on administrative matters which cannot otherwise be got rid of. The contest is only postponed. The time is inopportune for such a discussion; and the same considerations which staved off a debate in the House are equally potent with us against an immediate renewal of the controversy. At a future time we shall certainly recur to it, but for the present shall content ourselves with noting the precise position of the question, leaving its final solution to wait for a more favourable season, when the opponents of military domination may be less tongued-tied than they now are, and the mind of the country less absorbed in a more pressing, though scarcely more important, controversy. Mr. CARDWELL suffered so much humiliation in the early part of the year from the injudicious and disingenuous course which he took upon this subject, that we do not desire to load him with further reproaches, and we shall only refer to the past so far as is absolutely necessary to clear the question of all false issues, and show what the point in dispute really is. The facts are now no longer in question. His ROYAL HIGHNESS the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief exercises all the powers of the office of Commander-in-Chief. Those powers are defined by a Royal Warrant to include an exclusive authority over all appointments and promotions, and over the discipline of the army, absolutely free from any interference by the Secretary of State for War, except by invoking a special exercise of Royal prerogative. These powers are, as a rule, exercised independently of the Parliamentary Minister, except in cases of considerable importance; and if a difference of opinion arises on these serious matters, it is the custom of HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS to waive his strict rights, and defer to the suggestions of the Secretary of State. Practically the result is that, on great questions of policy connected with the military government of the army, the Commander-in-Chief, though lawfully supreme, pays regard to the wishes of the Minister; and so great conflicts are avoided, and always will be avoided, while the office is held by a General as prudent as HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS. At the same time, in the ordinary administration of the army, the independent powers of the Commander-in-Chief not only exist in theory, but are exercised in practice, and the Secretary of State abstains as religiously from any interference with Horse Guards' organization and administration as his military coadjutor does from asserting his rights on contested points of the [illegible] In sh[illegible], by th[illegible] complaisance there is an approach to unity of policy, while in practical administration duality flourishes in full vigour. No [illegible], h[illegible] the [illegible] of the Horse Guards Department (and there are many such abuses), is ever touched by the Minister who affects to be at the head of the army; and even when, as at present, a large and comprehensive scheme of re-organization is under consideration, the whole field of Horse Guards administration is excluded from the inquiry, and left not only without reform, but without question

Mr. CARDWELL does not now dispute any of these facts, and it is difficult to say precisely on what grounds he means to rest his defence. All that we can do is to register the successive excuses which he has put forward, leaving the future to determine on which of them he intends to rely when the conflict comes, as come in due time it assuredly will. Here is the list of the Ministerial pleas, which would do justice to the most astute of special pleaders

First Plea.—The Duke of CAMBRIDGE is not Commander-in-Chief, and exercises his authority not under a Royal Warrant, but under a letter of service, and is in theory and practice subordinate to the Secretary of State.

Second Plea.—The Duke of CAMBRIDGE does exercise all the powers of Commander-in-Chief under a Royal Warrant, giving him exclusive jurisdiction, and it is right that he should do so.

Third Plea.—Though the Duke of CAMBRIDGE has theoretical independence, he waives it when the Minister brings his influence to bear upon him, and it is right that he should have, by a solemn document, powers which it is wrong that he should exercise.

Fourth Plea.—The Secretary of State does not in practice interfere with or control the ordinary Horse Guards administration, and does not include it in his comprehensive projects for the reform of army organization; the Commander-in-Chief is not his subordinate; and this, also, is right.

These defences are curiously like the traditional schoolboy's plea, "I never had your knife—besides, it was my own—and "you know I returned it."

We have said that we do not mean at present to re-open the argument, and we leave the subject as it stands on the various inconsistent contentions of the SECRETARY-FOR-WAR. Substantially the issue may be thus summed up. The Commander-in-Chief is, in his department, de facto independent of the Secretary of State, but he is subject to his influence, which is used on great occasions to prevent direct conflict, but is not used to check extravagance and abuse in ordinary administration. On his side, the Minister is subject to the counter influence of the Horse Guards, and is more controlled by, than master of, his military subordinates in the War Office. Mr. CARDWELL says, this arrangement is not dual administration, and is very wholesome. We say it is not very wholesome, and it is dual government. Some day the argument will be fought out. But in the meantime it is curious to observe how completely the Minister is subordinated to the clique represented by Sir HENRY STORKS. If it had chanced that this military dictator had combined with the Horse Guards authorities to place the office of Secretary-for-War in the flabbiest hands they could find, they could scarcely have done more than Mr. GLADSTONE has done for them by the appointment of Mr. CARDWELL. If a Minister of Mr. LOWE's stamp had been at the War Office, we should not have seen the constitutional authority of the Secretary of State abdicated in favour of a military usurpation. As it is, we find day by day the civil control of finance transferred to the hands of a soldier more formidable than the COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF himself, because he practically wields at his own pleasure all the authority of the Secretary of State. We may expect to see the most able and experienced civilians in the supply departments snubbed and cashiered, and their places supplied by dignified officers who cannot but look for, and probably will get, twice or three times the accustomed salaries. All this time there is much talk of reforms, the particulars of which are shrouded in the darkest mystery. As yet nothing definite has resulted from nearly a year's labour of the great military dictator, who has succeeded in destroying an existing system without substituting any new organization which will bear to be announced to the public. Abuses of this kind cannot last for ever, but the present position of affairs is this:—The real power so unconstitutionally vested in the Commander-in-Chief is supposed to be controlled by the influence of the Secretary of State, while the lawful authority of the Minister is absolutely subject to the dictation of General Sir HENRY STORKS. Such an inversion of the due order of things must in course of time right itself by an explosion, and we should not be surprised if the explosion were to come sooner than is generally anticipated.

THE THAMES CONSERVANCY.

FATHER THAMES has been suffering for many years under a complication of disorders; he is now suffering many things from many physicians, and though it would be possible to make things worse than they were, it does not as yet seem that we know the exact effects of all our remedies upon the interesting patient. First, there was the indignity which the great Father of our British streams endured in being turned into the common sewer of London. Thanks to the strong and fetid appeal made by the sufferer to the Legislature one extremely hot summer, we undertook the main drainage of London, and to their cost the ratepayers know that at all events we tried to do the matter thoroughly. That is to say, we caught all the filth of London, secured it in large pipes, and again returned it into the river some ten miles down the stream; but the horrid whisper prevails that we have done little good except in the way of establishing a large floating laystall at Barking, the savoury contents of which again find their way [illegible] the upward tide will carry them. The gudgeon [illegible] dace and flounders which used to sport opposite the Temple, and which are now promised in Chelsea Reach, are to be [illegible]aught when they can be caught. Then we have [illegible]yed the Thames, and done it well; but we yet await what will happen to all the old London bridges by the change in the bed of the river which must attend the narrower and stronger stream. But all these doctorings only affected the Thames as it approached and flowed through London. The Thames, though one river, consisted of two separate dominions—the Lower and the Upper Thames. The Lower Thames reaches from the Nore to Staines, and in the old days, when corporations were powerful, it fell under the care of the Court of the Mayor and Aldermen of the City, who were ex officio Conservators. The Upper Thames, from Staines to Cricklade, was under the management, or supposed management, of a large body of Conservators, partly officials and partly consisting of the riparian owners and residents, who were supposed to have an interest in protecting the navigation and stream. These Conservators of the Upper Thames had not much to show for their government. Not only were they an unwieldy body, but the times were sadly against them. They were in debt hopelessly and insolvently. Their locks and weirs were everywhere rotten and dangerous. As a highway for traffic of goods the Thames had been obliged to yield to the railway, and there was every chance of the navigation entirely ceasing. Add to this that every conceivable job and abuse was perpetrated in the Upper Thames. What with the rights, real or pretended, of the mill-owners and the fishery-owners, the stream itself was in the most uncertain state. No provision was made for dealing with floods, or for storing superfluous waters. Oxford for years has been a breeding-pond for malaria and fever; and every town on the banks, by turning all its sewage into the river, made the river undrinkable pretty nearly through its whole course. In 1866 the new Thames Conservancy Act was passed; the two jurisdictions were incorporated, and a single Conservancy Board established, with a preponderating and, as many people thought, excessive London element. But, on the whole, the Act was a good one. It aimed at a good many reforms, which hitherto have not been carried out, though they are always going to be carried out. As we said at the time, the Act was both timid and tyrannical, and the result of a panic. Consequently but little has hitherto come of it. Subsidized by the profits accruing from the Lower navigation, it was hoped that the Upper Thames, as a navigable stream, might still continue to be kept open. And here and there a lock has been, we are assured, repaired, and a weir remodelled; but as regards the general state of the lockage between Windsor and Oxford, almost everything remains to be done. Then as regards the pollution of the river, this new Conservancy Act gave ample powers to prevent the evil. It is of course all going to be remedied; but at present, as far as we can see, none of the large towns have been compelled to submit to its provisions; nor are the paper mills, nor the dwellers on the banks, taken in hand by authority. Bleaching refuse and house drainage are all along the river thrown in much as they used to be, and, if we remember rightly, the provisions which gave some respite to these nuisances to provide themselves with another exit must be by this time exhausted. In short, as regards both the navigation and the purity of the Upper Thames, the new Conservancy is as yet not much to be congratulated on the results of its three years of existence; while, as regards the really important objects contemplated by the Act, the providing for an outfall of the flood-waters in such places as Oxford, and the storing of the stream floods in reservoirs for the water supply of London, nothing has been done except to provide a subject of everlasting talk. The sewage of towns and houses and the refuse of mills passing into the Thames is prohibited by law; but these things are carried on, and seem likely to be carried on.

No doubt there is some excuse to be made for the Conservators. In some cases the time of grace to the nuisance-mongers—very unnecessarily prolonged by the Act, which extended it over some years—may not have quite run out, though we are not so sure that the notices to abate all local pollutions which the Act requires the Conservators to give have been given. But we suspect that the real weakness of the Conservators is in their poverty. The Tower Hill Board is not sufficiently in funds to go into long and protracted law-suits with all those who, for sixty or seventy or a hundred miles of stream, find it to be their interest to pollute the river. Five or six years ago the Kingston people contrived to defeat all the Sanitarians and to win an egregious triumph for the practice of poisoning HER MAJESTY's subjects. Abingdon and Wallingford, and Reading and Maidenhead, and Windsor and Staines, are not likely to miss the value of this dirty precedent; and if the Conservators are to enforce the Act, they must have more funds, and, above all, more inspectors than they can afford with their present income from profits—if they have any profits. The Act is stringent enough, and its provisions are minute enough; it goes so far as to provide a machinery for scavenging the stream, and fishing out dead dogs, and it prohibits all offal, and vegetable or any other refuse, being cast into the river. But these are mere paper prohibitions, sure to be evaded without an army of inspectors; and when the Act was passed we expressed fears, which have been amply verified, that the cleansing of the Thames was really as far off as ever.

But something has been done. The Conservators have at last drawn up some by-laws—first, for the regulation of boat-races, and next, for the regulation of the fisheries on the Upper Thames. The object of these by-laws is to assimilate the rules of the upper stream to those already in force below Staines. The Act provides that any by-laws of this sort should first be advertised, for the purpose of allowing objections and representations to be made on their substance. At present the by-laws—they were advertised in the Times on Monday—are open to objections and capable of modification till July 28. We propose, therefore, to avail ourselves of this invitation to critics, and shall discuss them in order. We pass over a preliminary objection that, after all, these are very minor matters; and though boat-races and gudgeon-catching are important objects to certain folks, the public would have been as well pleased had the new Conservators displayed their energy, recruited by three years of passive existence, on such not very trifling considerations as the pollution of the Thames and its secure navigation.

The first provision relates to boat-races and regattas, and under a penalty of five pounds compels the master of any vessel to obey the Conservators' officer in keeping the stream clear for the race. This is quite right, and the regulations observed at the late Henley Regatta show that the provision is feasible. But we think the Conservators might have gone further. A nuisance has lately sprung up in the upper river by the establishment of private steamers, which career wildly at their own sweet will, and render the river perfectly intolerable to quiet boatmen, anglers, and those who love scenery. A steamer under the Cleifden woods is neither more nor less than a public nuisance. Boating on the Thames is a healthful, noble, and sportsman-like exercise; but what can be said of a noisy, tearing, hissing, smoking, venomous-looking little screw, freighted with an idle and rowdyish company, often racing with another compeer just as ugly, offensive, and mischievous—except that it is a refinement of selfishness and idleness? These private steamers of course have the full command of the river, and to say nothing of the dangers which they involve as regards the small and light rowing craft, especially in passing a lock, they do infinite damage to the banks, and foul the stream by their wash. These chartered libertines of the river are well worthy the attention of the Conservators, if the public convenience and the happiness of the greatest number is an object with those grave authorities. The general execrations with which this innovation of private steamers on the Thames was saluted at the Henley Regatta are of course thrown away on their owners, but they might, however, have their effect with Captain BURSTAL and the Conservators, and there are few people who value the beauty and safety of the Thames who would not hail with satisfaction the absolute prohibition of steaming craft for purposes of what is called pleasure. Steamers are all very well in tidal waters, but not in the narrow reaches of such a river as the Upper Thames. As regards fisheries, the by-laws are, we believe, only a transcript of those already in force in the lower river. They require the observance of fence months, and they prohibit the capture of any fish below a specified size, and at the same time regulate the size of nets, prohibit night fishing, night lines, wiring, and scratching and bow-nets. There is nothing to find fault with in these rules, except perhaps to suggest that the close months for pike are unnecessarily lengthened from February 14 to June 1; we think that March 1 would be quite early enough. In France, where the season is likely to be earlier than in this country, the fence season is later—namely, from March 15 to June 1 or 15. And we may also ask, with some wonder, why the tench—a fish nearly unknown in most parts of the Thames—should have one whole day of law more than his brethren, and a by-law entirely to himself; the fence season for the tench being between February 14 and June 1, and the fence season for all other fish—except the salmonidæ—being fixed between February 14 and May 31? This single day's immunity to the tench is a profound mystery. We may also suggest that the prohibition of using wires or unbaited hooks should be extended from the stream of the Thames to all the affluent ditches. The pike, which suffers most from this poaching, is taken by wires, not in the river itself, but in the small narrow streams and ditches where the fish retire for spawning in the spring. One of these by-laws prohibits the destruction of spawn; but this is a provision absolutely nugatory while the Thames is as at present overrun with swans. A certain number of these fine birds contribute much to the picturesque character of the river; but while it is not perhaps quite established that swans do not eat live fish—we think they do not—it is past question that they will eat half their own weight in spawn in a single day of Spring. Swans are very well in their way, but a fleet of them, sixteen or eighteen strong, in a single reach of the Thames, makes anglers pray for an onslaught from Sir EDWIN LANDSEER's sea-eagles.

These by-laws, we say, are all very well in their way; but they will come to very little unless the Conservators are prepared to pay a vast array of inspectors and keepers. Who in the quiet upper waters is to see that no pike below twelve inches and no perch below eight inches is carried off by the pot anglers and London excursionists? And were this close supervision practicable, the great fact would remain that it is not line anglers and Waltonians who spoil the Thames fishing, but the night poachers and the proprietors of the so-called private fisheries, among whom every yard of the river is divided. The fishing of the Thames, as of all navigable rivers, is of common right for anybody; but besides this there are co-ordinate rights of private fishing, and to these private fisheries, with all their appliances of eel stages and eel lines and general netting, all existing rights, real or pretended, are reserved. So long as these private fisheries—a relic of feudalism—in public and navigable streams survive, angling is a mere pretence and mockery. If the Conservators in the public interest really wish to preserve the Thames fishery for the public convenience and amusement—an innocent and healthful object—they would be well employed in investigating the titles of those claimants of private and several fishery, and certainly in abridging and curtailing them, or, if need be, of buying them out. As far as we understand the origin of those rights and privileges, they were originally grants from the Crown, the Crown being the proprietor of the stream of navigable rivers. In France as well as in England the navigable rivers are the property of the State. If this is the case, the State in the public interest can well revise grants which were made under social conditions and for objects long obsolete. Investigation would perhaps discover that in many cases the riparian proprietors and owners of adjacent manors have treated the Thames as though it were an unnavigable stream, and have assumed rights over this great river which they would have had only were it an ordinary Scotch trout stream.

We cannot conclude these remarks on these proposed by-laws without calling attention to the grim irony of the clause which prohibits the taking of any salmon below the weight of four pounds in the Thames, or without expressing our firm conviction that the attempts now being made to stock the Thames with trout must fail as long as the breed of pike is encouraged, and while the artificial propagation of trout only ends in turning into the river hundreds of thousands of fry, which are constantly destroyed by their hundreds of thousands of natural enemies. It is of no use to introduce trout into the Thames if the fish are under a quarter, or, still better, half a pound in weight.

THE FALSE PERSUASION OF KNOWLEDGE.

MORALISTS of the cynical type have usually missed altogether the element in human conduct and character which is in truth the most presumptuous, the most self-deceiving, the most laughable, and, finally, the most mischievous of all our characteristics. They have sneered at the irony of life which hands the good over to the tender mercies of the wicked; which, while a man is eagerly toiling to this goal or that, has already dug an impassable pit just in front of the goal; which makes the bad man prosperous, and the virtuous man a scoff to the scorner; and which, in a word, seems to reduce all the conditions of existence to the level of a semi-humorous and semi-malignant chance. They point with unfair but very effective emphasis to the pretence, mendacity, imbecility of the actions of men and women, contrasted with the loftiness of their professions, the sublimity of their aspirations, the fervour of their creeds. We need not take any pains to go on enumerating the various lines of argument by which the desired result is reached—that men, namely, are a pack of marvellously organized dupes, every individual being duped by himself, and a great majority being duped by other people into the bargain. Now this conclusion is by no means of so passingly edifying a kind as to call for any zeal in providing it with new buttresses and holdfasts. Only it is worth while pointing out that our misanthropes have seldom or never found out the root of the evil which so impresses them. Content with a glowing presentation of the superficial features and colours of the fortunes of men, they have not penetrated to the worst and most radical ingredient of all this dupery and folly over which they so inhumanly gloat. Where are men the most bitterly and painfully duped of all? Surely, in their false persuasion of knowledge; in their ungrounded assumption of a right to pass judgments, and form opinions, and maintain convictions, where they have no such right; in their mistaken estimate of the ease with which competence of intellect and understanding is attained, and their still more mistaken estimate of the breadth of the gulf that divides competence from incompetence. If the misanthrope only understood "the beggarly trade he has chosen," he would inevitably have fixed upon this as the field in which men most habitually deceive themselves, and in which they are most eager to gather the poisonous crops they have sown, as if they were treasures of sustenance and health.

The means of illustrating this and fixing it in the mind are never wanting. If you seek examples, circumspice; it matters not where you are, either in point of time or of space, nor what may be the subjects which engage either your own attention or the attention of your neighbours. The spectacle is invariably the same, points the same moral, and adorns a uniform tale, the blundering of men, the looseness of their grasp of methods and principles, their rashly accepted axioms, unverified inferences, misinterpreted experiences, spurious analogies, and all the other paraphernalia of minds equipped in the confidence of a knowledge which is in fact no knowledge at all. Let us illustrate this. We constantly hear the laugh of the scornful over friendship, and its hollownesses and unrealities. You call a man your friend, it is scoffingly alleged—and alleged with a measure of truth—because you happen to agree about some leading political question, or because you dine with one another twice a year, or on the strength of your son having married his daughter, or because you were at the same school or at college together. Any outside bond, however casual, however frail, is counted at once for the symbol and root of the most intimate and penetrating relation in affection between you. And this sort of sarcasm is usually not very much misplaced. The relationship to which the name of friendship is given is mostly a hollow parody of friendship in any true, high, or natural sense. This, however, by way of illustration. The dining acquaintance is not a more ghostly mimic of a friend than the opinions of nine people out of ten, upon all difficult and important questions, are ghostly mimicries of the only sort of opinion that is entitled to the weighty and honourable name of conviction. In politics, in religion, in speculation, indeed in all the most momentous departments of thought, the whited sepulchre of the Scripture is the only type of belief that can be at all said to represent the facts. To the outer eye the opinions of men seem shapely, symmetric, firmly built up, of stout material, and containing much rich and toilsomely acquired treasure. Alas, nothing could well be more deceptive, nothing more hideously deluding, alike to the possessor of this precious mausoleum and all other persons. Instead of gifts acquired by much toil, it contains nothing but dry bones, lifeless and dusty, picked by time and natural processes of all muscle and utilizing sinew, unconnected with one another, not even making up a decent and compact skeleton among them. They were thrown at random into the heap, nobody knows exactly how nor why, and the owner has taken no pains even to sort them for mere order's sake and seemliness. This is not a bit too strong a picture of the contents of most men's understandings, if they could only be conveyed in concrete and physical images. One reason why such a mass of intellectual slovenliness prevails in the world is that people have not been accustomed to look at opinion in this concrete way, or by the help of these palpable illustrations. If men and women would only realize vividly the analogy between outer and inner disorder, the first step would have been taken towards inflaming them with an effectual solicitude to do something to remove the latter, as they are already anxious, in a general way, to remove the former. People have often amused themselves very heartily over the pictures of savages clad in a black chimney-pot hat and a dress-coat, with rings in their noses and ghastly tattooings on their cheeks, and no trousers, and patched boots, and strings of beads. Little do they dream that this incongruous tatterdemalion, half laughable, half pitiable, is the very image and pattern of their own inner selves, only perhaps a shade too favourable. Is it not, then, in his intellectual aspects, after all, that the misanthrope or cynic would find the fittest object of his resentment or contempt? Is it not here that dupery is supreme?

It is certainly unavoidable for the large majority of mankind that they should hold a great many opinions, and habitually act upon them, which they have not reached by rigidly logical processes, and which they would never be able to defend against the sharp and searching thrusts of a disciplined reasoner. Men and women must live, it is simply impossible to live without more or fewer opinions, and it is as impossible that those opinions should all be formed in an inexpugnable manner. Their germs are planted in the mind by early education, deliberate or accidental, and they are watered by circumstance and association. It is small blame to a man that he accepts the various moral and intellectual ideas which were instilled into him from the first, and he is all the better for holding them firmly, instead of in that provisional manner which so often puts practical morals into serious danger. The only thing that we have a right to demand from a person of this quality is that he shall be as intensely modest as it is possible for a human being to be. It is not necessary that he should think too abjectly of himself, or indeed abjectly at all, only we may fairly insist that he shall not play the Pope on all occasions. If he likes, he may remain satisfied that his opinions are good enough for himself. This is a point on which we may believe him to be the best judge. Their adequateness for other people, and their conformity to facts, are quite different things from this, and of these he has no sort of right to have any judgment until he has taken some pains to probe his opinions, test them, and generally establish them on something like a reasonable basis. And, as a rule, this is exactly what the man of what we may call hereditary or instinctive convictions declines to do. It is the last position in the world that he would be inclined to take up. He will be Pope, not only in the forum of his own conscience, but universally; permitting no impeachment of his infallibility either on his own hearth or in any company where somehow he may have gained a right to lift up his voice. It is this which is so hard to be borne by any poor creature who, not content with inherited or instinctive opinions, has really exercised himself in the effort to improve them, or to revise the reasons for which they are worth holding, or to state them in some better form than has been customary. It is hard for such a one to find himself only just tolerated, and treated as at best no more than an equal, by the mere tenth transmitter of a foolish opinion. Yet this is what is constantly happening in all sorts of subjects. The tyranny of the professor is grievous, but far more grievous is the usurped authoritativeness of the ignorant; and among the very worst of the ignorant is he who, in one sense, knows most. That is to say, he is worst who has the greatest knowledge of facts and the longest list of opinions in his head, if he does not also know, and in a more or less reasoned manner, both the bearings and significance of the one, and the true grounds of the other. It is amazing how many things a man may know, and yet may not know the most important of all—the limits and grounds of competence in one subject and another. For example, there are great hordes of people who believe that to have read a book with moderate care is to have earned a title to pronounce it good or bad, able or feeble. As if all did not depend upon the amount and kind of preparation which they had brought to the book. There is a great controversy raging in London society as to the tremendous question of the experiential and intuitional schools of moral theory. You may hear people take sides over their soup, and keep the debate up until the coffee; each of the pair of philosophic gladiators strong in the panoply of ignorance alike of the issues and of the literature of the subject. They fight with lath swords as if they were of Damascus steel. The whole performance is a mockery of polemic, each disputant bethwacking the other as with the hollow bladder of clowns. To a calm looker-on, caring and knowing a great deal too much about the matter to attempt to settle it, or get any light thrown upon it, at promiscuous dinner-parties, the spectacle is infinitely amusing. The contest is so bloodless, so unreal, so uninjurious—except in so far as it may lead to the persuasion that moral science is being popularized by this puny polemic of incompetent persons. A man who is truly competent may watch the dinner-party disputation of the utilitarian young gentleman with the intuitional lady, much as an artist might watch the scrabblings of a pair of children with a pencil on a blank sheet of paper. But politics and morals pass for a kind of No-man's Land, in the sense that any or every man may enter and possess it. Just as Mr. Mill says that every man thinks himself good enough to be the master of any woman, so three-fourths of the people we meet are persuaded of their own perfect fitness to discuss these most complex, difficult, and important matters, as if they were subjects on which no gentleman ought to be without a firm and most compact opinion, to be defended with perfect assurance against all comers. The mischief of this is fully as patent as its exceeding folly. It is, indeed, the root of most of the mischief there is in the world, and is the great obstructive force that prevents the removal of the old accumulated and time-honoured supplies of mischief. There is nothing better worth fighting against. This laxity of idea as to what constitutes mental competence ought to be constantly resisted at all hazards—even at the hazard of destroying mountains of self-conceit, and again and again blowing to the winds infinite bushels of unedifying dinner-table talk.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY ON COMTE.

FEW recent articles have more rejoiced our heart than that which Professor Huxley has contributed to the current number of the Fortnightly Review, for the dissection of Comtism. For years it has been a burden to us to see writers who appeared to have no one scientific quality held up, by themselves and others, as incarnations of science—writers whose sole merit was a dashing vehemence of style, who, to the discussion of the profoundest problems, brought arrogance in place of humility, dogmatism in place of cautious doubt. The roar of the young lions of the Daily Telegraph has been as nothing to the roar of a Positive philosopher. And the most provoking part of the certainty and confidence with which the opinions of these writers have been enunciated is the ease with which that confidence has been attained. Is there any subject that perplexes the minds of men, any subject on which the wisest men can proceed only cautiously, and can hardly affirm anything with certainty? the Positivist has a secure and triumphant way out of the difficulty. Cut it out; let us hear no more of it. The subject, we are told, is one belonging to the infancy of the human race; the clear air of the nineteenth century will not endure obscurity and doubt; therefore, let us get rid of what is obscure and doubtful by the simple process of shutting our eyes to it. It is in this way that religion, philosophy, nay, even the furthest advances of science itself, have been dealt with by the Comtists. And what is most ludicrous is that they have thought this method of treating abstruse topics something absolutely novel, the perfect fruit of the latest philosophy; whereas it is really the vulgar objection, that has been heard since the beginning of the world, against all studies that do not bear immediate fruit.

Let us, however, hasten to say that these observations are directed, not against Comte himself, but against the followers of Comte. A philosopher may be a very great philosopher for enunciating that which yet other people would be very great fools to enunciate after him ipsissimis verbis. And for this reason, that almost all great discoverers have discovered but a grain of wheat amid a monstrous quantity of chaff; but one or two diamonds among thousands of pebbles, a few grains of golden ore among a heap of dust. And thus we are far from wishing to speak with contempt of M. Comte's theory of the "three stages," or even of his yet cruder attempt at the classification of the sciences. Considered as the views of a single philosopher, they were brilliant, suggestive, and comprehensive; but they sadly wanted clarifying; they gave no dry light to the intellect; and this was no more than what might have been expected from their origin. Comte was but a young man when he produced his Philosophie positive; besides being a young man he was a Frenchman, and a Frenchman of more than ordinary ambition, disdain for old theories, and determination to be himself the great prophet of a new era. And his views were precisely such as wanted diligent and long shaping at the hands of others; precisely such as it was not good to fall down and worship, to set up as the perfect flower of philosophy, the finished expression of thought. This, which ought not to have been done to them, is the very thing which has been done to them. And we say deliberately that Professor Huxley, who attacks Comte in the article of which we have spoken, is the first genuine follower that Comte has had; the first person who has taken Comte's views, and, without either accepting them as inspired, or anathematizing them as diabolical, has modified them in accordance with the interests of truth and the natural unborrowed reason.

And, as Professor Huxley's modification of the doctrine of the three stages is by much the most brilliant and satisfactory portion of his article, we will proceed as well as we can to describe it to our readers, with our own comments thereon. The doctrine of the three stages, as is well known, is as follows:—That all human inquiry into the reason and causes of things begins by assigning none but personal causes to whatever is seen or known; that, proceeding onwards, it assigns abstract notions as the fundamental cause; whereas the third and last stage of inquiry, and that which alone supplies true and intelligible results, is that in which nothing is sought for but the sequences of phenomena which invariably hold good, and are therefore said to be regulated by invariable law. Now, as Professor Huxley most truly remarks, these three stages of inquiry are not successive, but contemporaneous, and the first and third of them are both unquestionably legitimate; or at least, if one of them is to be swallowed up in the other, this cannot be effected at present, and therefore to speak of the first as inefficient, or as a nonentity, is unpractical and mischievous. The child conjectures just as truly, and produces to the full as successful a result, when it conjectures that the appearance of faces and hands and feet which it sees indicate a number of persons like itself, as when it conjectures from previous experience that fire will burn, or that sugar is sweet. It could just as little dispense with one of these classes of knowledge as with the other. And we will add, what the Professor has not added, that this duality of knowledge continues equally after the child has grown up. If it is necessary to us to know the properties of gold and silver, of iron and coal, it is also necessary to us to know a good deal of the temperament and disposition of our neighbours. Had we not this last kind of knowledge we should be perpetually quarrelling, we should be utterly unable to combine; all social pleasure, all social organization, would be impossible. And if our knowledge of nature is progressive, so also is our knowledge of man. He would be a bold person who should deny that we know more of our fellow-creatures now than did our barbarian ancestors, to whom a language different from their own formed an impassable barrier, or even than did the men of five centuries ago, when the scanty range which every man's neighbourhood afforded him was not supplemented either by extensive travel or by books. It is one of the commonest observations, that a much more various knowledge of human character is displayed in modern literature than in ancient; and what is this but to say that our knowledge of man has continually been growing and developing?

It will not have escaped the reader that these first and third stages of inquiry in the Comtian system, which Comte absurdly called the Theological and Positive stages respectively, are but another form of the common antithesis between matter and mind, between physical and spiritual being. Professor Huxley chooses to call them respectively the anthropomorphic and physical views of nature, nor do we quarrel with his phraseology. But what is to be said of the second, or, as Comte called it, the metaphysical stage, the stage in which nature is explained in accordance with abstract notions? That we will come to directly, but meanwhile we have one other remark to make as to the contrast between the first and third stages. It may be asked with surprise, Is there really nothing more in this distinction of Comte's than the common distinction between persons and things? Is it nothing more than a trite platitude and truism? It is something more, and this is what it is more. There can be no doubt that it is the common tendency among rude and uncultivated people to press the anthropomorphic way of looking at things into regions where it cannot apply. What is the cause of this tendency may be doubted, but the fact is certain. Genii, fairies, demons, river-gods, water-spirits, are the agencies which the uneducated invoke as explaining the causes of natural phenomena. And even among the educated, in certain subjects, this tendency is not obscurely present, the personal will of intelligent beings, the personal will, at times, of the Supreme Being, is looked upon as an ultimate cause, barring the way to all further questions, a kind of hard fixed point which prohibits the approach of reason. It was perfectly just in Comte to point out this usurpation of anthropomorphism; or rather, as we should say, this false conception of anthropomorphism, of what the spiritual nature really is; it was just in him to reclaim for science provinces which would never have been denied to it except under the influence of a superstitious fear. But it is one thing to refuse to accept this conception of personal will as a single inexplicable cause, a bar to reasonable inquiry; another, and quite a different thing, to refuse all cognizance to the human mind and spirit, as a real and most important element in the things which are presented to our knowledge. And this was what Comte did. And indeed, even in the sense in which Comte's theory is true, it is only of partial, and not of universal, truth; it is a protest against a particular form of error, but that error is one which, in many subjects, is escaped altogether. As Professor Huxley remarks, a child "does not imagine that the taste of sugar is brought about by a god of sweetness, or that a spirit of jumping causes a ball to bound." The Positive stage, in such cases as these, is reached at once without any erroneous theological wanderings.

But now what is to be said of the metaphysical stage? Here is Professor Huxley's account of the matter:—

> In the progress of the species from savagery to advanced civilization anthropomorphism grows into theology, while physicism (if I may so call it) develops into a science, but the development of the two is contemporaneous, not successive. For each there long exists an assured province which is not invaded by the other, while between the two lies a debateable land—ruled by a sort of bastards, which owe their complexion to physicism and their substance to anthropomorphism, and are M. Comte's particular aversions—metaphysical entities.

And he goes on to say that in the progress of time "the borders of physicism increase, the territories of the bastards are all annexed to science, and even theology, in her purer forms, has ceased to be anthropomorphic." Here we think Professor Huxley has struck the true key-note defining the position of metaphysics, while yet we do not agree with the remarks we quoted last. His description of metaphysics, as a sort of bastards which owe their complexion to physicism and their substance to anthropomorphism, is most felicitous; but we do not agree with him that any metaphysical topic, properly so called, has ever been annexed to science. Take the Cartesian philosophy, with its cogito, ergo sum; take the Kantian, with its debates respecting God, freedom, immortality; the Hegelian, with its Becoming, Being, and Not Being; how have the questions here suggested ever been won over to the domain of physicism? It is true that in many sciences there has been in former times a great amount of bad reasoning employed, which is now discredited, and which many people choose to call by the title metaphysical. Such, for instance, in astronomy, was the reason once given for the supposed fact of the heavenly bodies moving in circles, that the circle was the perfect figure. But it is manifest that here we have a simple piece of bad reasoning that has been abolished, which is a very different thing from a real metaphysical subject brought over into the realm of science. Our account of the matter is this. As time advances, physics does not increase singly and solely; but physics and anthropomorphism grow up and develop side by side. As physics develops in the different sciences, so anthropomorphism develops in poetry, painting, music, history, religion. Meanwhile, just as anthropomorphism encroaches on the domain of science, and fairies and demons are brought in as causes of material phenomena, so the scientific spirit encroaches on the domain of anthropomorphism, and it is attempted to represent our inner and inmost being, the Ego, as part of a scientific scheme. And this encroachment of the scientific spirit on the domain of anthropomorphism is what is called metaphysics. Metaphysics, as it appears to us, will be eternally unsuccessful; while yet we are far from thinking that it will be or is barren, but the contrary. For though this great duality of human endeavour, the poetical and religious spirit on the one side, the scientific spirit on the other side, will never become a unity, yet the two branches of the duality are connected by innumerable ties, and everything that tends to strengthen those ties is good. And though it is essentially a mistake to attempt to reduce to form and line what can only be caught by feeling and emotion, which is the mistake of the metaphysician, yet this is a mistake that is often only the excess of a virtue. There are minglings of science in the study of man; there are minglings of man in the study of nature.

And if any one is surprised, as no doubt some will be surprised, at the account we have given of metaphysics, as the invasion of the scientific spirit into regions which do not really belong to it, we will add the following by way of explanation. The scientific spirit was first manifested, not in those regions which most indisputably belong to it, but on the confines and extremities of its proper realm; not in the clear solid fact, but in the obscure boundaries into which all fact fades. This was the result of the natural ambition of man, which strives to be all-comprehensive, at the cost of losing that over which it can exercise a sure command. Hence the ancient metaphysics, and not less the modern metaphysics, is an impulse of the true scientific spirit, not of the poetical or religious spirit; but it is the scientific spirit exercising itself in a territory where the only victories hitherto have been those of feeling and emotion, of the poet, the painter, the historian, or, in one word, of the anthropomorphist.

THE TROUBLE OF THINKING.

ARCHDEACON DENISON is reported to have said the other day, in a Charge delivered to his clergy, that he wished newspapers were written without leading articles, as they only saved people the trouble of thinking. We hope the learned Archdeacon would allow some exceptions to his rule, or he must desire—sad as it is to have to record such a wish—that the Saturday Review should cease to exist altogether. But, apart from the extreme consequences of so rigidly literal an interpretation, the remark itself is a suggestive one, though a High Churchman and a very high Tory is hardly the person from whom we should have expected to hear it. It is at least a common charge against the upholders of lofty claims, whether of religious or political authority, that they are anxious to spare people the trouble of thinking rather than to encourage an exercise so likely, as experience proves, to result in their thinking wrongly. It is supposed that "the right divine" of kings and priests is designed to supersede the necessity for any such dangerous action of individual caprice. Thinking with the Church was a favourite phrase of Ignatius Loyola, and he certainly did not mean that the Church should leave people to think for themselves. It has been often observed, again, of the Jesuit system of education, which once exercised so controlling an influence over the mind of Catholic Europe, that it is admirably constructed to teach people how to think within a prescribed circle of ideas, and to prevent their having any thoughts beyond it; in other words, to crush individuality, and to train adroit special pleaders. We do not forget, however, that the Archdeacon of Taunton, if he is a Tory, and what the Record calls a sacerdotalist in principle, is something of a democrat in practice. He has at all events a good deal of the making of a successful demagogue in him, and a popular orator, whatever be his professed creed, can never forget that there are other sources of authority—in the old sense of the Latin term—besides those which rest on official position, and the sanctions of civil or canon law. The Archdeacon is desirous, no doubt, that others should think as he does, but he is content to trust in large measure to his powers of persuasion in getting them to do so; and the adverse influence of that veritable "autocrat of the breakfast table," the daily paper, may often be a serious impediment to his success. It is, however, with the speech, rather than with the speaker, that we are here concerned. We propose to inquire how far it is true that newspapers save people the trouble of thinking for themselves, and whether they do a service or a disservice to the public in so far as they discharge this function of vicarious judgment.

Our first observation will perhaps be regarded as a paradox, though it might more justly be objected to as a truism. We feel sure that the overwhelming majority of mankind, even in this enlightened age—say, ninety out of every hundred, to keep within moderate limits—do not dream of really thinking for themselves at all, and would not do so any the more if they never saw a leading article from one year's end to the other. To begin with, very few women ever think on subjects of public interest, except in the Ignatian sense of "thinking with the Church"; that is, they passively adopt the views put before them by some authority they rely upon, whether of their husbands or their pet preacher, or—to take Archdeacon Denison's instance—their pet newspaper. As a rule, however, the newspaper, if they care to read any, is chosen in accordance with their previous views, and would be instantly discarded if it attempted to correct them. There are probably, for instance, many High-Church ladies who have been indebted for their weekly budget of information and instruction on public affairs to the interesting and unimpeachably cautious columns of the Guardian; but we should like to know how many of them have substituted John Bull during the last twelve months, since their trusted oracle has been so sadly heterodox about that shocking Mr Gladstone and the Irish Church. It is not the litera scripta, but "the living voice," to which women naturally turn for guidance. They like, as George Eliot once said, "to have their science done by Faraday"—in the rare event of their wanting any science done at all—"and their religion by the superior clergy." There are exceptions of course to this, as to all other rules. We do not forget Miss Martineau and Miss Cobbe. And we are quite aware that, in that Paradisaic state of society to which Mr. Mill is looking forward, we shall have a plentiful crop of fair politicians who will form an independent judgment on all sorts of subjects, from direct taxation and the laws of bankruptcy to the development of species and the evidences of theism. We only say that that happy day is still looming in the future. So far most critics, at least of the male gender, will agree with us. But we must add that the number of men who think for themselves, though it is larger than the number of women, is very much smaller than is commonly assumed. Yet there is this difference. Every man in the upper or middle classes is expected to have some opinion on the leading questions of the day—social, political, or religious—and to be ready on occasion to express it. And consequently most men do, with more or less ardour and consistency, profess some opinion on these topics, but it would be a great mistake to suppose that these opinions are, in nine cases out of ten, their own in any other sense than that in which their coats and boots are their own. They have procured and put them on, and perhaps learnt to wear them gracefully, but they no more made them for themselves than they made the articles their tailor and bootmaker have supplied them with. A large number of men adopt the opinions, especially in politics, which their fathers held before them, and some, in whom the antagonistic predominate over the imitative instincts, adopt the contrary opinions to those in which they have been brought up, precisely because they are the contrary. Wealthy men, or men who have become wealthy, are pretty sure to be Conservatives, from a general sense of the greater security of a strong Government and a dread of revolution. Many men simply drift, without effort or resistance, into the current opinions of the society they are mostly thrown with, especially in religious questions, while the views of many are practically determined by some personal feeling of sympathy or dislike. There was a curious paper published last year in Good Words, called "An Afternoon at St. Alban's, Holborn," which seemed to show how much the individual popularity of some of the "Ritualist" clergy had to do with recruiting the ranks of their disciples among the poor. And the same principle holds good in a wider field. It is commonly said that Catholics go by authority, and Protestants by private judgment. The real distinction is, that Catholics profess to rest their belief on authority, while Protestants, as a rule, do so without professing it. They acquiesce in the faith of their childhood, or of their country, or of their immediate surroundings, because they lack time or opportunity, or sufficient interest in the subject, to question it. But that is no more an exercise of private judgment than a languid acquiescence in the infallibility of the Pope. We are far from saying that the opinions, political or religious, acquired in this haphazard sort of way, may not be honestly and even enthusiastically entertained, for the strength of a conviction is quite independent of the logical or illogical process by which it has been originally acquired. All that is here asserted is that in nine cases out of ten the opinions have not been excogitated, but arrived at by some different road.

These are but a few illustrations of the ways in which most men shirk the trouble and responsibility of thinking, often without admitting it to themselves. We have not yet noticed the particular hindrances to independent thought on which Archdeacon Denison is so severe, and for this reason. People very seldom trust to a newspaper for their principles, though they may be guided by it as to the detailed application of the principles. Men are not converted by the Standard or Daily Telegraph to Toryism or Liberalism, but select their political organ according to their inherited or adopted creed. No doubt within these limits a paper or periodical does do a good deal of the thinking for the party it represents, but it cannot go beyond them. A defence of Mr. Gladstone's policy in the Quarterly, or of Mr. Disraeli's in the Edinburgh, or—to take a different example—a vindication of the Apostolic Succession in the Record, or an attack upon it in the Guardian, would not influence the habitual readers of those journals, but simply disgust them, from its obvious incongruity. It is not the kind of thing they expect to find there. Still, within the recognised circle of ideas a party organ does exert considerable influence on those it appeals to, and so far saves them the trouble of thinking out their conclusions for themselves. It gives them their cue, so to speak, as to how the questions of the day are to be dealt with. And, of course, it may give them the wrong cue. But before we decide that newspaper or review articles—for they fall under the same category—should be tabooed as an incumbrance to independent thought, it is important to inquire whether thinking would become more general without them. We suspect not. People do not refrain from thinking because they read the Times, but they accept its verdict on many points because they do not care, or are unable, to form any opinion of their own. If they had no Times to read, they would still get their opinions from some external source, whenever it was necessary to profess to have an opinion. On the other hand, those who do care to think for themselves do so in spite of the newspapers. It is perfectly true that a great number of foolish and erroneous, sometimes very mischievous, notions are fostered by the periodical press, but the same might be said of the pulpit and the platform. And unless we are prepared on that account to put down "the liberty of prophesying" with the lips, we cannot in consistency condemn the liberty of the pen. The religious world would probably be a gainer if the leading articles were cut out of the Record and the Rock, but it would be a much greater gain if Mr. Murphy could be put to silence. When a party is bound together on a narrow and intolerant basis, the party organs are pretty sure to intensify the mischief, and it is possible the party itself might fall to pieces sooner if there were no periodical stimulants to sustain its corporate vitality of bitterness. One can only desire in such cases that the guidance should pass into better hands, for guidance of some sort or other there must be. Put it as you will, the great majority of mankind are incapable, either from circumstances or mental build, of thinking for themselves. They are too dull, or too ignorant, or too busy, or too apathetic, or too prejudiced. And therefore, as a matter of fact, they are sure, consciously or unconsciously, to devolve the duty on somebody else. In the classical age the State thought for them, supplemented in some countries by the great orators, in mediæval Europe the Church thought for them, in the Renaissance period the leading scholars moulded educated opinion; in our own day journalism has attained to a hitherto unprecedented power, and may almost be said to have become a profession. To denounce leading articles because they save people the trouble of thinking is much as if an Athenian should have proposed to abolish the Pnyx, or a Christian of St. Bernard's day to close the pulpits. It is more to the purpose to urge that those who have so powerful an engine in their hands should recognise their responsibility in the use of it.

There is another aspect of the question which we cannot do more than cursorily touch upon here. Is it desirable, as the Archdeacon seems to imply, that every one should be left to his own unassisted thinking? There are of course many matters of personal conduct on which a man ought to form the best judgment he can for his own guidance, but these are not points on which newspapers are likely to obtrude their advice. And those who abdicate their responsibility do so rather from suffering themselves to become mere creatures of habit or inclination than from surrendering their judgment to others, whether wiser or more unwise than themselves. The question is whether it would be better for everybody to try to form an independent opinion of his own on such matters of public interest as we have referred to, without any further assistance from others than a juryman would derive from hearing the deposition of the witnesses. In the abstract it seems as if that would be the natural course, but in the actual world the attempt, if it were made, would be an absurdity. Few men comparatively, even among the educated classes, have leisure to give more than a passing notice to questions, however interesting and important, that have no direct bearing on their ordinary vocations; and many of those who have leisure are wholly destitute of the judicial faculty requisite for pronouncing a really impartial judgment on the evidence when it is before them. It must be added that, where this faculty is most prominently developed, it is not usually accompanied by high practical abilities. Thought and action may go together in individual cases, but generally they exist apart. There are many of whom it would not be too much to say, in sober earnest, that for them thinking is indeed "an idle waste of thought." Society itself, and the various sections into which it is divided, have, and always must have, their men of action and their men of thought, and the former must be content, to a great extent, to be guided by the latter. A great orator, for instance, is seldom a great thinker. The cautious temperament and habit of balancing evidence which are necessary for the one, are almost incompatible with the fire and energy of the other. Doubt, which paralyses action, is of the essence of thought. The rough work, whether of the world or the Church, has to be done by men of strong convictions, and strong convictions are much oftener accepted than reasoned out. At all events the reasoning must be over before the conclusion can be acted upon. And it is more important that the conclusion should be right than that the agent should have discovered it for himself.

FLIRTING.

THERE are certain things which can never be accurately described—things so shadowy, so fitful, so dependent on the mood of the moment, both in the audience and the actor, that analysis and representation are equally at fault. And flirting is one of them. What is flirting? Who can define or determine? It is more serious than talking nonsense, and not so serious as making love; it is not chaff, and it is not feeling; it means something more than indifference, and yet something less than affection; it binds no one, it commits no one, it only raises expectations in the individual, and sets society on the look-out for results; it is a plaything in the hands of the experienced, but a deadly weapon against the breast of the unwary; and it is a thing so vague, so protean, that the most accurate measurer of moral values would be puzzled to say where it exactly ends and where serious intentions begin. But again we ask, what is flirting? what constitutes its essence? what makes the difference between it and chaff on the one hand, and it and love-making on the other? Has it a cumulative power, and, according to the old saying of many a little making a mickle, does a long series of small flirtings make up a concrete whole of love? or is it like an unmortared heap of bricks, possibilities of utility if conditions were changed, but valueless as things are? The man who would be able to reduce flirting to a definite science, who could analyse its elements and codify its laws, would be doing infinite service to his generation; but we fear that this would be as difficult as finding the pot of gold under the end of a rainbow, or catching small birds with a pinch of salt. Every one has his or her own ideas of what constitutes flirting, consequently every one judges of that pleasant exercise according to individual temperament and experience. Faded flowers, who see impropriety in everything they are no longer able to enjoy, say, with more or less severity, that Henry and Angelina are flirting if they are laughing and whispering in an alcove together, probably at the most innocent nonsense in the world; but the fact that they are enjoying themselves in their own way, albeit a silly one, is enough for the faded flower to think they are after mischief, flirting being to her mind about the worst bit of mischief that fallen humanity can perpetrate. The watchful mother, intent on chances, says that dancing together oftener than is necessary for good breeding and just the amount of attention demanded by circumstances, is flirting; timid girls newly out, and not yet used to the odd ways of men, think they are being flirted with outrageously if their partner fires off the meekest little compliment at them, or looks at them more tenderly than he would look at a cabbage; but bolder spirits of both sexes think nothing worthy of the name which does not include a few questionable familiarities, and an equivoque or two, more or less "risky." With some, flirting is nothing but the passing fun of the moment; with others, it is the first lesson in the great unopened book, and means the beginning of the end; with some, it is not even angling with intent; with others, it is deep-sea fishing with a broad, boldly-made net, and taking all fish that come in as good for sport if not for food.

Flirts are of many kinds, as well as of all degrees. There are quiet flirts and demonstrative flirts, flirts of the subtle sort whose practice is made by the eyes alone, by the manner, by the tender little sigh, by the bend of the head, and the wave of the hand, to give pathos and point to the otherwise harmless word; and flirts of the open and rampant kind, who go up quite boldly towards the point, but who never reach it, taking care to draw back in time before they really cross the border. This is the kind which, as the flirt male, does incalculable damage to the poor little fluttering doves to whom it is as a bird of prey, handsome, bold, and cruel; but this is the kind which has unlimited success, using as it does that immense moral leverage we call "tantalizing," for ever rousing hopes and exciting expectations, and luring on as an ignis fatuus lures one on across the marsh, in the vain belief that it will bring us to our haven at last. Then there is the race of male flirts great in the way in which they manage to insinuate things without committing themselves to positive statements. They generally contrive to give the impression of some mysterious hindrance by which they are held back from full and frank confession. They hint at fatal bonds, at unfortunate attachments, at a past that has burnt them up or withered them up, at any rate that has prevented their future from blossoming in the direction in which they would fain have had it blossom and bear fruit. They sketch out very vaguely the outlines of some thrilling romance; a few, of the Byronic breed, add the suspicion of some dark and melancholy crime as a further enhancement; and when they have got the girl's pity and the love that is akin to pity, then they cool down scientifically, never creating any scandal, never making any rupture, never coming to a moment when awkward explanations can be asked, but cooling nevertheless, till the thing drops of its own accord, dies out from inanition, and they are free to carry their sorrows and their mysteries elsewhere. Some men spend their lives in this kind of thing, and find their pleasure in making all the nice women they know madly or sentimentally in love with them; and if by chance any poor moth who has burned her wings makes too loud an outcry, the tables are turned against her dexterously, and she is held up to public pity—contempt would be a better word—as one who has suffered herself to love too well and by no means wisely, and who has run after a Lothario who would not let himself be caught. Then there are certain men who flirt only with married women, and others who flirt only with girls, and the two pastimes are as different as tropical sunlight and our northern moonshine, and there are some who are "brothers," and some who are "fathers" to their young friends—suspicious fathers on the whole, not unlike Little Red Ridinghood's grandmother the wolf, with perilously bright eyes, and not a little danger to Red Ridinghood in the relationship, how delightful soever it may be to the wolf. Some are content with cousinship only—which, however, breaks down quite sufficient fences—and some are "dearest friends," no more, and find that an exceedingly useful centre from which to work onward and outward. For, if anything will do on which to hang a discourse, so will any relationship or adoption serve the ends of flirting, if it be so willed.

But what is flirting? Is sitting away in corners, talking in low voices, and looking personally affronted if any unlucky outsider comes within earshot, flirting? Not necessarily. It is just possible that Henry may be telling Angelina all about his admiration for her sister Grace, or Angelina may be confessing to Henry what Charley said to her last night, which makes her lower her eyes as she is doing now, and play with the fringe of her fan so nervously. May be, if not likely. So that sitting away in corners and whispering together is not necessarily flirting, though it may look like it. Is dancing all the "round" dances together? This goes for decided flirting in the code of the ball-room. But if the two keep well together? If they are really fond of dancing, as one of the fine arts combining science and enjoyment, they would dance with each other all night, though outside the "marble halls" they might be deadly enemies—Montagus and Capulets, with no echo of Romeo and Juliet to soften their mutual dislike. So that not even dancing together oftener than is absolutely necessary is unmistakeable evidence, any more than sitting away in corners, seeing that equal skill and keeping well in step are reasons enough for perpetual partnership, making all idea of flirtation unnecessary. In fact, there is no outward sign or symbol of flirting which may not be mistaken and turned round, because flirting is so entirely in the intention, and not in the mere formula, that it becomes a kind of phantasm, a proteus, impossible to seize or to depict with accuracy. One thing, however, we can say—that taking gifts and attentions, offered with evident design and accepted with tacit understanding, may be certainly held as constituting an important element of flirting. But this is flirting on the woman's side. And here you are being continually taken in. Your flirt of the cunningly simple kind, who smiles so sweetly and seems so flatteringly glad to see you when you come, who takes all your presents and acted expressions of love with the most bewitching gratitude and effusion, even she, so simple as she seems to be, slips the thread and will not be caught if she does not wish to be caught. At the decisive moment when you think you have secured her, she makes a bound and is away; then turns round, looks you in the face, and with many a tear and pretty asseveration will declare she never understood you to mean what you say you have meant all along; and that you are cruel to dispel her dream of a pleasant and harmless friendship, and very wicked indeed because you press her for a decision. Yes, you are cruel, because you have believed her honest; cruel, because you did not see through the veil of flattery and insincerity in which she clothed her selfishness; cruel, because she was false. That is woman's logic when brought to book, and forced to confess that her pretended love was only flirting, and that she led you on to your destruction simply because it pleased her vanity to make you her victim. Then there are flirts of the open and rollicking kind, who let you go far, very far indeed, when suddenly they pull up and assume an offended air, as if you had wilfully transgressed known and absolute boundaries—girls and women who lead you on, all in the way of good fellowship, to knock you over when you have got just far enough to lose your balance. That is their form of the art. They like to see how far they can make a man forget himself, and how much stronger their own delusive enticements are than prudence, experience, and common sense. And there are flirts of the artful and "still waters" kind, something like the male flirts spoken of just now; sentimental little pusses—perhaps pretty young wives with uncomfortable husbands—whose griefs have by no means soured or scorched, but just mellowed and refined, them. Or they may be of the sisterly class, creatures so very frank, so very sisterly and confiding and unsuspicious of evil, that really you scarcely know how to deal with them at all. And there are flirts of the scientific kind; women who have studied the art thoroughly, and with the grave attention due to an art; and who are adepts in the use of every weapon known—using each according to circumstances and the nature of the victim, and using each with deadly precision. From such may a kind Providence deliver us! As the tender mercies of the wicked, so are the scientific flirts—the women and the men who play at bowls with human hearts, for simply the stakes of a whole life's happiness.

It used to be an old schoolboy maxim that no real gentleman could be refused by a lady, because no gentleman could presume beyond his line of encouragement. A fortiori, no lady would or could give more encouragement than she meant. What are we to say then of our flirts if this maxim is true? Are they really "no gentlemen" and "no ladies," according to the famous formula of the kitchen? Perhaps it would be said so if gentlehood meant now, as it meant centuries ago, the real worth and virtue of humanity. For flirting with intent is a cruel, a false, and a heartless amusement, and time was when cruelty and falsehood were essentially sins that vitiated all claims to gentlehood. And yet the world would be very dull without that innocent kind of nonsense which often goes by the name of flirting—that pleasant something which is more than mere acquaintanceship and less than formal loverhood—that bright and animated intercourse which makes the hours pass so easily, yet which leaves no bitter pang of self-reproach, that indefinite and undefinable interest by which the one man or the one woman becomes a kind of microcosm for the time, the epitome of all that is pleasant and of all that is lovely. The only caution to be observed is, not to go

HISTORY IN THE LATE DEBATE.

A DEBATE in the House of Lords has this advantage over a debate in the House of Commons, that the peers have not constituencies which they have to talk Bunkum to in order to please. A peer therefore who has nothing to say can, if he pleases, hold his tongue and save himself from being ridiculous. This advantage evidently told in the great debate on the Irish Church. In the debates in the Commons we know too well who spoke and what they said. In the Lords it would seem that no one spoke except those who honestly thought they had something to say, and that of those who so thought the greater number were not very far wrong in so thinking. Mr. Charley and Sir George Jenkinson were therefore not reproduced in full in the Upper House. Several of the speeches made, Lord Harrowby's for instance, were weak enough in all conscience; but we can hardly say that any one speech was, like several speeches in the Commons, simple nonsense from one end to the other. Yet more than one peer, in particular parts of his speech, ran Mr. Charley very hard. There was the Duke of Rutland, and there was one from whom we should have looked for better things, the Bishop of Lichfield. And Lord Derby himself, in the parts of his speech in which he unluckily took on himself to grapple with past history, may be added to the list. Of the three the Duke of Rutland certainly comes the nearest to the honours of a Charleyismus, still, "unwise" as his speech may be, there is an air of innocence about it which marks the difference between a speech made under an honest conviction of duty and a speech made under an official necessity of roaring. The Duke of Rutland deserves respect as a man who has, before now, withstood the impulses both of his own party and of the nation at large, when he held that his own party and the nation at large were led astray. But it cannot be denied that his present speech is far from bearing the stamp of absolute wisdom. We pass over conventional platitudes about the Coronation Oath, the Act of Union, and how wrong it is to take away property which has been held so long as three hundred years. But we feel sure that, when the Duke was uttering this kind of stuff, he honestly believed that it was not stuff at all. When he goes on to say that there are things in the realm with which "the State has nothing to do," when he goes on to talk about "the property of God," as if the earth were not the Lord's nor the fulness thereof, we can only send him to learn Law and Gospel of the Bishop of St. David's. For our part we pass on to the Duke's astounding discoveries in chronology. The Duke tells us it is not the Protestant but the Roman Catholic Church which is the badge of conquest in Ireland. To prove this we have the old talk about Henry the Second, who, according to the Duke of Rutland, conquered Ireland in 1171 at the instance of Pope Hadrian the Fourth. Unless therefore the Duke does great injustice to his own meaning, he fancies that Hadrian the Fourth was alive in 1171. He then says, with the modest simplicity of one who is not much used to reckon up years and centuries, "It was conquered at the instance of the Pope of Rome, and for two centuries, I think, after that time it was under the Pope of Rome, but during those two centuries it was not more happy or more content." Then, somewhat abruptly, it being doubtless much easier to ask questions than to answer them, the Duke turns round and asks, "If the Established Church is to be destroyed in Ireland, what is to be put up instead of it?" But we want to know about the two centuries; it was for two centuries, and seemingly only for two centuries, so the Duke of Rutland thinks, that Ireland was under the Pope of Rome. The two centuries begin in 1171, so that, according to the Duke of Rutland, it was in 1371 that Ireland ceased to be under the Pope of Rome. The year 1371 is therefore, no doubt, in the Duke of Rutland's eyes, the year of the Reformation, and the date has, to say the least, the merit of novelty. We can only guess that the Duke had heard something about Wickliffe being the Morning Star of the Reformation, and something about Wickliffe living somewhere about the year 1371, so that a mind not much used to chronology might pardonably think that the Reformation must have happened in one of the years during which its Morning Star was shining. But, before we come to this, we have another piece of chronology yet more puzzling. The Duke tells us that "for one thousand years after the commencement of the Christian era, Ireland had nothing to do with the Roman Catholic Church." Nothing can be more true, for no one whose mind was not utterly confused about all ecclesiastical matters would think of applying the words "Roman Catholic Church" to anything that existed during the first thousand years after the Christian era. But the way in which the Duke of Rutland proves his point is odd. He goes on to tell us:—

> In a sermon preached by the Bishop of Lincoln I find this extract from Wordsworth's History of the Irish Church:—"Laurentius, another missionary from Rome, succeeded Augustine in England. He wrote a letter which may be found in Bede's History, in which he describes the nature of his own reception first from the ecclesiastics of Britain, and next from those of Ireland."

The Duke does not tell us whether the Bishop of Lincoln and the historian of the Irish Church are one and the same person; but it is plain that the Duke does his ecclesiastical history at third hand, getting at his Beda through Wordsworth's History of the Irish Church, and at Wordsworth's History of the Irish Church through the Bishop of Lincoln's sermon. He also evidently thinks that Augustine and Laurentius had something to do with the Roman Catholic Church, and he seemingly thinks that they both lived one thousand years after the commencement of the Christian era. Let us then draw up a little chronological table according to the ideas of the Duke of Rutland:

	A.D.
Conversion of England	1000
Conquest of Ireland, under Hadrian the Fourth	1171
The Reformation .	1371

To a mind so great at historical discovery we would suggest the study of a small piece of local antiquity. Will the Duke of Rutland go home and find out for us the exact year when the small district from which he takes his title first became an independent shire?

But we have higher game than the Duke of Rutland to fly at. What are we to say to the historical researches of Lord Derby himself? Lord Derby, it seems, does not study history for himself, but he has friends who send him quotations, and he actually, so he tells us, "takes the trouble to verify" them, from which we suppose that Lord Derby finds the work of verification both unusual and exhausting. Lord Derby reads to the House what he calls "some very remarkable passages from a very early page of our history." The extent of Lord Derby's research is shown when these very early pages of our history are found to be so modern as the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. There is perhaps some worldly wisdom in this; a Conservative student may perhaps find it convenient to begin his studies with the retrograde times of the House of Lancaster, and to leave out the days of that immemorial freedom which ages before the fifteenth and since the sixteenth century have devoted themselves to recover. Now what do these two wonderful passages, of which Lord Derby speaks as if they were perfect novelties, prove to be? The first is no other than the well-known petition of the Commons to Henry the Fourth praying for a general confiscation of Church property, and the King's refusal to consent to it. Pity that Lord Derby's study of fifteenth-century history did not go on a little further, or that his friend who keeps him in quotations was not a little more bountiful in his supply. What if they had gone on to the year 1414, the year which supplies the most exact parallel to the Act of 1869? Did Lord Derby and his friend ever hear of the Suppression of the Alien Priories? Under the reign of one of the most pious of Kings, through the agency of one of the most bountiful of Primates, a class of ecclesiastical foundations which experience had proved to be useless and dangerous were suppressed by Act of Parliament, and their property lawfully and justly confiscated. That is to say, the supreme authority then exercised those inherent powers which it had already exercised to the like purpose in the eleventh century, and which it is again exercising in the nineteenth. Surely the act of such a Primate as Chicheley, of such a King as Henry the Fifth, affords a precedent of which even Lord Harrowby and Lord Redesdale need not be ashamed. And the fifteenth century agreed with the nineteenth and differed from the sixteenth in this. The property of the Alien Priories was not squandered and gambled away like the property of the monasteries which were suppressed under Henry the Eighth. Very little of it came into private hands. Most of it was applied to the great foundations of the century at Oxford, Cambridge, Eton, and Windsor. And Lord Derby's second "remarkable passage" is just as little to the purpose. It is that famous letter of Archbishop Whitgift to Queen Elizabeth, in which he prays her to cease from her aggressions on Church property, and warns her to beware of the sin of sacrilege. Some of the expressions used by Whitgift might not exactly meet with the approval of Bishop Thirlwall, but his prayer and his warning are on the whole sound and to the purpose. But why? Because the acts against which he warned his sovereign were acts of a widely different kind from the regular suppressions of the days of Henry the Fifth and of Victoria. Whitgift had to contend against real breaches of the Coronation Oath, against acts of real sacrilege, against the unlawful perversion of ecclesiastical property to private purposes. He lived in an age when the Queen eked out her revenue by keeping bishoprics void for years that she might receive the profits, in an age when courtiers mended their fortunes by cajoling or bullying bishops into unjust and often illegal alienations and leases of their lands. These doings were distinct breaches, always of moral right, often of positive law; they were those very violations of the rights of the churches of the realm from which the sovereign was bound by her coronation oath to abstain. Against these irregular acts of fraud, robbery, and sacrilege, done almost wholly for the sordid ends of private persons, Whitgift manfully protested; but how this protest bears on a regular Act of the Legislature, lawfully passed with a view to the public good, we must learn to see with Lord Derby's spectacles before we can hope to understand.

Nor is Lord Derby any more lucky in his encounter with the great prelate against whom he was rash enough to measure himself. With almost offensive condescension, he talks about the "able speech" of the Bishop of St David's, but he seems not to have thought it so able but that he himself might answer it. The encounter of a Derby and a Thirlwall is indeed amusing. It is grotesque enough to see the mere Rupert of debate rushing blindly to an encounter with that serene intellect which prejudice or passion never for a moment warped or ruffled. It is grotesque enough to see a man who gets up his history from information sent to him that morning venturing to match himself against that almost boundless knowledge to which the past and the present lie familiar as an open book. Lord Derby, who discusses the deeds of St. Ambrose on the strength of information sent to him that morning, tells us that the case—in plain English, the case of St. Ambrose—"is thus stated" by Tertullian in his Apology to the Christians of the second century. One might perhaps think that Tertullian belonged at least as much to the third century as to the second, but at all events it would be amazing if Tertullian in the second or third century could have stated the case of St. Ambrose and Valentinian the Second towards the end of the fourth. But difficulties of this sort seem to stand as nothing in way of the chronological defenders of the Irish Church. Lord Derby ventures to say that Bishop Thirlwall "omitted to carry out his comparison to the full extent." The charge of omission is perfectly captious, but Lord Derby himself or his informant of that morning certainly contrived to omit the main point of the comparison which they made themselves. St. Ambrose refused to give up any of the churches of Milan or their property to the Emperor and his mother, but Lord Derby leaves out the fact that they were demanded to be applied to the worship of the Arian heretics. Lord Derby is himself, if we mistake not, owner or trustee or possessor of some kind of a large chapel on the north side of Manchester Cathedral. If Lord Derby were bidden at the mere word of a prince to give up that chapel of his own act for any purpose which he thought heretical, we do not doubt that he would return as spirited an answer as St. Ambrose did. So, we do not doubt, like Abbot Whiting, would Bishop Thirlwall do in the like case. St. Ambrose refused to be personally guilty of a breach of trust. How the story bears on the Parliamentary treatment of the Irish Church we are quite unable to see. But at all events Lord Derby should be careful how he brings charges of omission against such a man as Bishop Thirlwall while he is himself making the greatest of all omissions in his own story.

Last of all we come to one whom we are sincerely sorry to find in such company, the Bishop of Lichfield. We should not have thought that it was absolutely necessary for a Bishop to be funny on such a subject as the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, but if he must be funny he might at least give us better jokes than this:—"On this bench, and a bench of still greater importance in the Lower House, business is carried on by a firm trading under the title of Henry VIII and Co." But the main passage of which we complain in the Bishop's speech is as follows:—

> On the subject of disestablishment, the reason why I object to this Bill is because I watched carefully all the reasons assigned in favour of it, and I cannot see any validity in them whatever. Now, the reasons are, first, that the Established Church in Ireland is a badge of slavery. Now, my lords, I do not know anything in England which is not a badge of slavery, except the National Anthem. Our institutions in Parliament and our trial by jury are badges of Saxon conquest, while the Norman-French embodied in our language is a badge of Norman conquest. In a lower range of life, as Scott informs us, beef and mutton are a sign of Norman conquest, while sheep and oxen are a badge of Saxon conquest. A noble lord the other night made a graceful allusion to the ladies, thus establishing a precedent which I will take leave to follow. The ladies of the present day have happily given up that practice of their great-grandmothers which reminded us of our affinity to the Picts. In the same way the Princess of Wales is a badge of slavery. We know that her ancestors overran a great part of England of which she has conquered the whole. How puerile, therefore, is it that a quick-witted nation like the Irish, except for reasons especially applicable to themselves, should feel in any way degraded by that which, if rightly managed, would be simply a benefit to them. But the fact is that the slavery or conquest of Ireland, if we may so call it, was the act entirely of the Pope.

This sort of talk may be fairly left to speak for itself. We dare say it is just as funny as the joke about the firm of Henry the Eighth and Co., but neither the former nor the latter joke seems to us to be particularly good. But, at any rate, the Bishop seems to know that there are pages of our history earlier even than those very early pages which were dwelt upon by Lord Derby. Yet the way in which he deals with them is certainly queer. We were a good deal puzzled to know how any of our old institutions could be said to be badges of slavery and conquest. At last, after deep thought, we felt sure that the disputed wares of Messrs. Pike and Nicholas must have fallen in transitu into the hands of the Bishop of Lichfield, that the Bishop has taken up the part of an aggrieved Welshman, and that he looks on every Englishman he meets as either a renegade brother or an intruding oppressor. And to think of the old story about the beef and mutton, which we have no doubt is to be found somewhere or other among the compilations of Mr. Timbs, being hashed up again in the House of Lords for the ten thousandth time. At all events it would seem that the Bishop looks on Parliaments and Trial by Jury in their present shape as what are vulgarly called "Saxon" institutions, and it is clear that, as Lord Derby gets up his ecclesiastical history from information which he receives that morning, so the Bishop of Lichfield gets up his Danish history from the epithalamium of the Poet-Laureate. If the sins of Hubba or Swegen were to be avenged on their children to the twentieth generation, it could not harm a hair of a princess of the House of Oldenburg.

One word more. There was some queer talk in the course of the debate about the Queen's Supremacy, and some noble and learned lords still seem to dream about some supremacy in the Queen different from the supremacy of the law. But it is something gained that, after the discomfiture of Dr. Ball and Mr. Disraeli, no noble and learned lord has ventured to say a word about the Sovereign being the supreme Head of the Church.

A PEACE-FESTIVAL.

THERE has been a "great musical peace-festival" at Boston. General Grant has been exhibited, although the fountains of his speech do not seem to have been opened to an appreciable extent. Mr. Thornton has been in attendance, by way of suggesting to reflective persons that England and America are still in a state of decent official friendship. Everything has been done that the Bostonian imagination could suggest towards a due celebration of the occasion. There has been a prayer by a reverend gentleman, and speechmaking by various honourable persons; and a chorus has been raised by a band of a thousand performers, and "My country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty" has been sung, with discharges of artillery keeping time to the music; and a hundred members of the Boston fire department have joined in with blows upon a hundred anvils, and, in short, a very great noise has been made, by a very great number of people, in honour of the "restoration of peace and union throughout the land." It would be very easy to criticize the performance, of which unfortunately we have not yet received full reports, in any style that might be desired. We might take the cynical view of the case, and point out, what is only too evident, that Americans are still deficient in proper æsthetical faculties; that they labour under a permanent confusion of ideas as to mere bigness and real impressiveness of sounds and sights, and fancy that they can make up for any shortcomings in harmony by firing off enough guns and hammering upon a proper number of anvils. Or we might, with equal ease, dilate upon the excellent sentiment which is latent at the bottom of all these absurdities, and point out that, if people must be vulgar and noisy, it is just as well that their noise and vulgarity should be ostensibly in honour of peace instead of war; and that, however little they may be disposed to carry their preaching into practice, it is a step gained that they should recognise distinctly that it is, on the whole, better that men should occupy themselves with making bad speeches about brotherly affection than with encouraging each other to blow their neighbours into small atoms. To say the truth, there is a certain naïveté about the proceedings which almost disarms us of a natural propensity to laugh. The simplicity of the performance almost neutralizes its vulgarity. When people endeavour to enhance the effect of music by firing off a large number of cannon, they show a certain freshness which is not without its charm. It is doubtless very absurd; but we don't feel quite certain that the British shopkeeper is not restrained from similar proceedings rather by his want of audacity than by his good taste. If that enterprising body, the Crystal Palace Company, were to get up a similar demonstration, there would certainly be more people to laugh at it; but there would be a numerous band of reporters ready to declare that so impressive a performance had never taken place in this or any other civilized country. We do not laugh at children because there is a strange mixture of the natural and the artificial in their way of testifying exhilaration; and perhaps our American friends may excuse themselves for their absurdity under the plea, which covers so many sins, that theirs is a new country.

The demonstration, however, if that is the proper word, may induce us to reflect upon some curious characteristics of modern sentiment. We cannot help speculating with a certain interest upon the part which Mr. Thornton had to play in the performance. What particular kind of nonsense can he have talked, for he was bound to talk some kind of nonsense, to the assembled multitudes? With the fact of Mr. Reverdy Johnson before his eyes, he would be hopelessly cut off from the pleasant commonplaces about Shakespeare and Washington, and the common language, and the absolute identity of the populations on opposite sides of the ocean. General observations on the advantages of peace would be dangerous, for they would be liable to the misinterpretation that England was willing to pay four hundred million of pounds sterling for the chance of that inestimable boon. An oration on the opposite tack, proving that regard for national honour was at times preferable even to the maintenance of friendly relations, would be liable to an equally awkward gloss of the opposite kind. We do not know what he said, nor, indeed, whether he said anything in public, but perhaps it is not so difficult to imagine what an intelligent gentleman in his position would naturally have thought. An ambassador, to modify the old definition, is no longer a man sent abroad to tell lies, but to hold his tongue, for the good of his country; and Mr. Thornton is likely to be quite sensible of the advantages of reticence; but, otherwise, he might perhaps be inclined to indulge in a little preaching somewhat to this effect.

You, he might say, are firing off cannon, and striking anvils, and shouting at the tops of innumerable voices, in honour of peace and union. It is, to say the least, a very natural sentiment. When a nation has run up a huge debt, and provided itself with an inconvertible currency, and lost no one can say how many lives, and generated a vast amount of corruption, and laid a large part of the country waste for years, in pursuit of an idea, it may think that the results are worth the expenditure, but it must be very glad that it is not obliged to spend any more. There cannot well be a more rational subject of congratulation than the fact that millions of money are no longer being spent in promoting slaughter on a gigantic scale, and that the nation may rest from its toils and recover from its losses. Whether the mode of celebration is in the best possible taste may admit of a doubt; but there can be no doubt that there is excellent cause for satisfaction. Only we cannot help feeling that some sort of machinery might be set to work for a very different purpose. The object might be to get up the steam for future hostilities instead of rejoicing over the pacification of old quarrels. There are just as many commonplaces ready to hand. Orators would find excellent matter for peroration in the Pilgrim Fathers, the iniquities of George III. and Lord North, the tea thrown into Boston Harbour, the heights of Bunker's Hill, the battle of New Orleans, the destruction of American commerce by British pirates, the sympathy of an effete aristocracy with a nation of slaveholders, and all the rest of it; and the interstices of eloquence might be filled up with appeals to national honour, the superiority of sentiment to material considerations, and the manifest destiny of the great American people. The cannon might roar and the anvils ring every whit as appropriately to emphasize one set of considerations as the other. Nor would there be of necessity any inconsistency. The older Abolitionists favoured secession, and denounced war. The most eloquent of their poets exclaimed in the vernacular that,

> As for war, I call that murder,
> There you have it, plain and flat;
> I don't want to go no furder
> Than my Testament for that.

After a time the Abolitionists discovered—and we need not argue that they were wrong—that war might be converted into a crusade against slavery, and might rouse the nation from an unhealthy slumber. It became plain to them that the Union sentiment might be enlisted on their side instead of being a great obstacle in their way. They took advantage of the weapon which circumstances had put into their hands, and carried out their principles at the point of the bayonet, instead of advocating peace at any price. Without blaming them for a moment, it is impossible not to see that a similar change may take place in the feelings which are now uppermost. The sentiment which is really at the bottom of all this peace celebration is not the love of peace at any price, but the sense of patriotic pride. You are rejoicing because the peace which has been won at a heavy price has resulted in the firmer welding together of the American people. Unless some change takes place beyond the powers of human foresight, secession can never again be threatened on the same grounds. The strength of the South has been utterly crushed. The slaveholding party has been ruined, root and branch. The North has established the superiority due to its enormous natural resources. You are rejoicing, and no one can deny that from your point of view the rejoicing is amply justified. But if at any future time it should appear that the nation might be still more strongly united, not by peace, but by war, that a patriotic spirit might be roused by fighting England instead of conquering the South, what would be the popular oratory on Boston Common? The advantages of peace would shrink into the background, and a very different style of eloquence would gain the upper hand. We might witness a great musical celebration in which the Union would be invoked to a very different purpose; and we need not doubt that there would be quite as loud a noise, though the British Minister might not be invited to honour you with his presence. The question therefore naturally occurs whether foreign Powers are likely to be affected with quite so strong a sense of pleasure as the native partakers of the festivity. To answer it satisfactorily, we should have to plunge into a very wide discussion indeed. Is the advance of democracy more favourable to peace or to war? When a small clique of high-spirited persons could decide upon national policy, they were apt, it may be, to be crotchety and unreasonable, and to boggle unnecessarily upon trifling points of honour. Now that great masses have to be taken into council, we have to take into account the new force of what we may call popular oratory, not to stigmatize it by the unpleasant name of Buncombe. It is difficult to suppose that a huge crowd of uneducated people will not be as impulsive and as unreasonable as their leaders. They will be as easily deluded by a few commonplaces as their former rulers were by trifling quibbles and the influence of petty personal interests. When a Peace Conference met at Geneva a year or two ago, they agreed upon the desirableness of universal peace, after all outstanding quarrels should have been settled by thoroughly fighting them out. Peace in the abstract, it may be admitted, will always have charms for the masses; but we may also doubt whether they will not always have a preliminary difficulty or two to get out of the way before opening the expected millennium. Indeed, if the question were only to be between the instincts of a selfish aristocracy and a thoroughly ignorant mob, it would be very difficult to strike the balance. War would be waged for different motives according to the prejudices of the governing class, but in one way or the other it would be equally likely to have charms for somebody. There is only one comfort to be found in the prospect—namely, that war carried on by democracies is likely to turn upon more vital points, because it must enlist the sympathies and touch the interests of a greater number of people. Its advocates will have to prove that at least it will gratify the prejudices, if it does not increase the prosperity, of whole nations, instead of comparatively small classes. Whether it will be entered into more cautiously on that account, must depend on the more perplexing question of the degree of intelligence to which the general mass of the people have been raised. Huge festivities, such as the Boston celebration, so far as they show anything beyond the delight of a great crowd in hearing discharges of artillery and performances on anvils, show that a large number of persons are sufficiently educated to have a certain national pride; whether they are capable of taking a sensible view of national interests is a very different problem, the solution of which would require a very different set of facts for its satisfactory solution.

PARLIAMENTARY DISORDER.

READERS of the debates in the House of Lords last week were not more astonished at the eloquence of the speeches than at the uproariousness of the demonstrations of the audience. We are surprised and shocked at this disturbance of the gravity, and we had almost said the dulness, which the House habitually maintains, and we cannot express the amazement with which we learn that "a very distinguished and eminent member of the Church of England," who was apparently not a member of the House, placed himself on the steps of the Throne, and cheered or groaned as he liked or disliked the speeches. There surely must be something contagious in the character of the subject under discussion which seems to possess sober Englishmen with more than Irish excitability. It is to be hoped that there will not be many more debates upon this question, either in Parliament or elsewhere; for, if there are, it will become necessary to provide funds for the enlargement of lunatic asylums, not only in Ireland, but in England. The House of Lords during the debate on the Irish Church appears to have resembled a bear-garden rather than a deliberative assembly, and one cannot help wondering that a body which is supposed to be aristocratic and exclusive should be more tolerant of popular effervescence than another body which directly represents the people. We should like to see a "very distinguished and eminent member of the Church of England" being permitted to be present at a debate in the House of Commons, and taking upon himself to cheer and groan at passages of the speeches.

When we read that the speech of Lord Cairns evoked "enthusiastic applause in the Strangers' Gallery," we are moved to ask whether the admirers of Lord Cairns desire to introduce the extravagance of revolutionary France into sober England. If strangers are permitted to applaud, they will next attempt to interfere in the debates, and advice will be given to the House, which although impertinent might not be unprofitable, that there be less talking and more despatch of business. The disestablishment of a Church was made in France, as it has been made in England, the occasion of a disturbance of Parliamentary decorum; but there was this difference, that in France the disturbers were the enemies of the Church, whereas in England they pretend to be her friends. We have all read Mr. Carlyle's description of the visit which the spoilers of Parisian churches paid to the hall of the National Convention. An address was sung, while Danton, who was not particular about trifles, gloomily demanded prose and decency, and the singers, not untouched with liquor, craved permission to dance the carmagnole, whereto an exhilarated Convention could not but accede, and several members took the hands of girls flaunting in priests' vestures and danced the carmagnole along with them. We do not of course mean to say that anything like this occurred in the House of Lords during the debate on the Irish Church, and indeed the Protestant Association, although it has been prolific of poetry, is not likely to be great at dancing. We read that the married daughters of peers usurped places which properly belonged to peeresses and their unmarried daughters, but in other respects the conduct of the ladies present at the debate was orderly, and they do not seem to have followed the example of eminent and distinguished Churchmen in emitting sounds indicative of approval or censure during the speeches. There is, of course, an immeasurable difference between peeresses and the married daughters of peers on the one hand, and, on the other, the wet, hungry women of Paris, whom Mr. Carlyle has described as penetrating into the Constituent Assembly at Versailles, to the interruption of public speaking and the order of the day. "Bread," said they, "and not so much discoursing." They were supplied with bread, and also with sausages and wine, and sat and refreshed themselves on benches and in galleries while the Assembly proceeded with discussion of the Penal Code. It was then only five months since those galleries were filled with high-plumed, jewelled beauty at the first meeting of the States-General, and now, in the course of regenerating France, they had come to be occupied by dripping, dirty market-women. The Constituent Assembly had from its first meeting allowed spectators in its galleries to applaud, and even to hiss. Seeking, as it did, the support of the people against the Court, it had not only allowed, but even encouraged, applause; and now it found that it had raised a power which it could not control. The history of legislative Assemblies in France teaches a lesson which ought not to be disregarded in England, and we hope that Protestants in the gallery of the House of Lords will not, in their zeal for the Church, forget the Constitution. If they desire to applaud Lord Cairns, they can hold one more public meeting, and invite Lord Cairns to attend it, and he can come if he feels disposed.

It clearly appears, however, that members of the House of Lords are much more disorderly than the strangers who are admitted to its galleries. Indeed the Lord Chancellor has not power to enforce order, and the House is not disposed to give it to him; for although the present Lord Chancellor would not be likely to exercise that power capriciously or disagreeably, the House remembers some of his predecessors under whose authority it would expect to feel particularly uncomfortable. If the House is to have a master, it would prefer to have one of its own choosing, instead of having one chosen for it by the Government; but the House appears to think that it does not want a master at all. The ordinary state of things is that one Cabinet Minister makes a speech, while two other Cabinet Ministers converse in voices rather louder than the speech. This is the way of conducting business which, as a noble duke says, is of some importance, but not of such general interest as to induce silence. Of course, when a great debate is held, the leading orators of the House are heard with sustained attention, and silence is only broken by the cheers and groans of some enthusiastic interloper who ought to be turned out. It may be confidently asserted, too, that silence is maintained whenever Lord Cairns asks Lord Granville a question about a speech or letter of Mr. Bright's. But in general it is difficult or impossible for an assembly, with or without a president, to be persuaded to keep silence when either the matter or the manner of a speech which is being addressed to it is unattractive. The task of restraining conversation sufficiently to allow of business being transacted is sometimes almost too great for a judge sitting in a court of law. Indeed an Irish judge has been urged, by the impossibility of hearing a single word that any witness says, to exclaim that any gentlemen who want to talk in court had better go outside. We cannot help feeling, however, that this unruly character of all assemblies is much more of a blessing than a curse. Suppose that it were possible to enforce absolute silence in the Houses of Parliament, what awful places they would be! The souls of members would be bound under an unmitigated tyranny of boredom. Indeed, there are other places where one is sometimes tempted to wish that it were possible to resort to some of the Parliamentary contrivances for intimating to a speaker that he is tedious. It was the custom of the Puritans to express their satisfaction with a sermon by a deep hum. We do not know whether it was their custom to express dissatisfaction by any other sound, but probably the assertion of the usual token of approval was sufficient to warn a preacher to conclude. Unfortunately, if modern congregations possessed any means of signifying their desire for relief, the wish could not ordinarily be granted, for a reader of a written sermon cannot always trust himself to shorten it, and to conclude abruptly is hardly decent. So the discourse proceeds to its destined end, and no hearer, however weary, would think of going out of church before it is finished, and it is even thought improper to look furtively at a watch.

Talking in courts of law is a great nuisance, but the growing custom of applauding verdicts will become, if it is not checked, an intolerable abuse. Yet there have been judges who seemed to play to the galleries in their summing-up, and whose threat of committing the first person who was caught in the act of cheering did not sound very formidable. These demonstrations ought to be firmly restrained alike in Parliament and the Courts. It is doubtless pleasant to be cheered, but those who cheer one speaker will hoot another, and thus the beginning would be made in England of a practice which in France was carried so far that at last the galleries became more potent than the body of the House. It is true that our House of Peers is inaccessible to those classes whom Lord Taunton describes as "fishwomen and others," and "a very distinguished and eminent member of the Church," who is frantic with horror at disestablishment, can hardly be designated a revolutionist. But nevertheless we cannot help expressing Danton's wish for decency. There is always likely in our Parliament to be a sufficient quantity of prose.

THE MISSIONARY DOG IN THE MANGER.

IT appears from the Report of the London Missionary Society for 1869 that the Independents have lately had a wonderful success in Madagascar. The external world already knew, from the admirable book of their missionary, Mr. Ellis, something of the history of this mission. It deserves to be spoken of with ungrudging praise; the story of its conduct, its persecutions, its martyrs, its first winning of tolerance from the sovereign power, recalls the history of early and mediæval missions in Europe. The edifice has now been crowned by the conversion of the Queen of Madagascar herself. There is nothing so dear to your Puritan as a noble or a sovereign; and the gentlemen at home who are of the same persuasion as Mr. Ellis are crying jubilantly, "Hear, O Earth! There is now a sovereign in this world who is a genuine Congregationalist!" Whether the opponents of the establishment of the Church in England are expecting the establishment of Independency in Madagascar does not yet appear. They may be; for it seems that what is good in England is bad in Madagascar, and what is bad here is good there, as they are now declaring very energetically, both from the platform and in the newspapers. It is true that there are still many thousands of heathens in Madagascar; but with the history of mediæval missions before our eyes we know that the conversion of the people, in a half-barbarous nation, is comparatively easy work after the conversion of the Sovereign and the Court. Madagascar may be said, therefore, at the present time to offer a full and fat manger for missionaries. There is not that trying need of education, thought, and solid wisdom which was wanted of old in Alexandria and Rome, and is so urgently wanted to-day in great part of India.

The Independent dog, having got into this good manger—let us grant by its own merits—is now assailed by a carnal fear lest other missionaries, not Independent, should be tempted to share it. It is true, as the Report says, that there are already "thirty Romanist priests in the capital." As we have not the Annals of the Propaganda by us, we cannot tell how many more there may be in the country. Nor can we tell what is their opinion of their own share in the Christianization of the people. But then it is of course easy to dispose of their presence and their work, before a missionary audience at Exeter Hall, by simply ticketing them as ministers of Antichrist. The good dog Independent has, however, heard a preliminary bark from another quarter which is giving him extraordinary anxiety. A wicked proposition of some years ago has been revived. Some of the Directors of the S. P. G. have sent out a circular appealing for funds to support a bishop in the island, who is not to be a Roman Catholic bishop. "A Friend of Missions" has written to the Daily News, calling for "general public condemnation on a scheme so fraught with evil." But, to give the least glimpse into the frantic state of mind into which the whole Independent world at home has been worked up by this proposal, we must quote the Report of the London Missionary Society:—"The Protestant ministers, English and native, are firm in their adherence to the Bible alone as the appointed instructor and guide of the people. And it is because the preaching of vital truth has been so blessed that the Directors are anxious to prevent the introduction of all minor controversies. Therefore they cannot but consider that, in the absence of any number of converts in the Episcopal missions, the appointment of a bishop of the Church of England to Madagascar, promoted by one of these missions, is undesirable." "Loud and long-repeated cheers" stopped the reading of the Report, we are told, at this Independent ruling of the question how many priests and how many people an "Episcopal" mission may have before it is to be allowed to add an Episcopus. A bishop "is calculated," according to the Report, "to introduce confusion among the young converts, to hinder their spiritual progress, and to do them vital and lasting injury." These charitable sentiments were very naturally followed by "renewed cheering" from the congregated Independents. The Directors propose "a friendly conference with the S. P. G., with a view to persuading them to "lay aside their scheme altogether." If we may be so rude, they will endure, it seems, the few whelps who have found their way into the Independent's manger—the priests, deacons, and people; but the big dog of a bishop, to ordain any more priests or deacons, to confirm the baptized converts, to rule and guide a mission which pretends to be "Episcopal," they cannot endure. In one word, the "Episcopal" mission may be in Madagascar, but it must not want to be permanent. The Report, however, gives but a mild expression to the indignation that is now burning in the Congregationalist world. Sweetness and light were brought in by a Rev. Dr. Morton Brown, who moved the first resolution upon the Report. This gentleman often wonders "that many bishops are so unlike the Apostle Paul, because he did not wish to enter upon other people's labours, but to go to places where he could plant Churches"; who also, Dr. Brown might have added, does not seem to have been very jealous when Apollos watered where he had planted. After describing Madagascar as the Paradise of Independency—for that is plainly the aspect in which it is viewed by those who believe that they have sole religious proprietorship over all its natives, converted or unconverted—he adds the sad reflection, "But there is no Paradise in this world of ours but what some Serpent is ready to start up and to interfere with the scene. I do not mean to say that a bishop is a serpent." "Laughter," we are told, followed this disclaimer. But why should Dr. Brown disclaim at all? The fathers of Independency were not so scrupulous; they called all bishops, as bishops, by far uglier names. The delicate-minded Penry, upon whom some Independent ministers still lecture as an Independent martyr, called bishops "desperate and forlorn atheists," "castaways," "the dishonourablest beasts under heaven," and many other pretty epithets. The belief of his fathers—Dr. Brown should recollect—that a bishop was in himself something very like a serpent, was their prime excuse for interfering in the Anglican Madagascar.

Into the theological and ecclesiastical differences between the Independents and the proposed Bishop, which the Report so amiably and unexpectedly describes as "minor controversies," we cannot of course enter. But that they are differences great enough to convulse and rend a nation every Independent knows, and every Independent boasts—when he thinks it necessary. They are the differences which peopled New England when emigration was no easy undertaking. They are the differences which cost the early Quakers who dared to put foot into the Congregationalist preserve of New England their lives, or their property, or bloody scourgings upon their naked bodies. When the Independents of the present day have England instead of Madagascar under their eyes, they are not in the habit of calling these differences "minor." They did not wait long before supplying us with a very pretty instance.

The Independents, it must be known, have not only a foreign Missionary Society, but they also possess a "Home Missionary Society," which held its anniversary and read its Report in the same week as the other made its shriek about its Madagascar. What is the end of this H. M. S.? To convert England. But is not England a Madagascar already in the possession of the Church of England? The bishops of the Church of England converted and baptized all the kings and queens, and the people of the kingdoms speedily followed their sovereigns. The bigoted bishops, rectors, vicars, and curates now in possession put to the Independent home missionary the same case that the Independent Madagascar missionary in possession puts to the missionary bishop. "In the name of Christianity we protest"—we are using Dr. Brown's words to the proposed Bishop—"against such a man going and disturbing those churches when God is pouring out His blessing so marvellously upon them." Bishop, "you represent," says Mr. Charles Reed, M.P., the Chairman, "a Church hitherto little known amongst us." This is the sort of thing which the blind Anglican parish priests say to the Independent "home missionary." It appears, however, that Congregationalism has two sets of Christianity, two sets of morality. One is good for foreign use; it scolds those who attempt to go near its own manger. The other is kept for home use; it scolds those who protest against its entry into their manger. It is quite the wrong thing for a bishop to go into the big Madagascar parish of the Independents, even though he should confine himself to the conversion of those who are still heathens. It is, on the contrary, the right thing for a young Independent, with "a lust to be pulpited" (as Sir Thomas More says), to go into the parish of any Anglican rector, even though he should know there are no heathen in it, and should confine himself to inciting the parishioners to exchange church-going for meeting-going. Mr. Benjamin Scott, the City Chamberlain, thinks it a monstrous thing that the chief "difficulties put in the way of the Society's agents" come from the clergy. All the ministers of the Independent body appear to be struck with wonder that the parochial clergy do not assist their agents to preach against the doctrine of the Church, and send away their flocks from the parochial churches. Let them think of their own Madagascar. A simple English vicar imagines that the parish for which he has laboured year after year, baptizing, teaching, marrying, burying, visiting its sick and its whole night and day—and not merely talking for an hour or two in it every Sunday on some religious topic—is a Church of England parish, one of the Anglican Church's Madagascars. The vicar may be very intolerant; but if he is, the London Missionary Society is the same. The London Missionary Society may be in the right; if it is, we can scarcely declare the vicar to be in the wrong. The Independent who goes into the Anglican parish with a Bible under his arm may say that he goes to supply an element of truth which the vicar, if a true "Episcopalian," cannot supply. The bishop, it is at least just and honest to suppose—while he rejoices in all the good work done by the Independent in Madagascar, and honours it—may think that he has something to supply which the Independent, if faithful to pure Independency, cannot give, and would not if he could.

FARADAY MEMORIALS.

IT will soon be two years since the world lost the great Faraday, a man who has left such a mark on science, and whose work has aided the material progress of mankind to such an extent, that he is on all sides looked upon as an honour to the land which gave him birth, and a benefactor to the human race. It is not our present purpose to show how just is this appreciation of his great discoveries, or to give an account of them. Professor Tyndall in this country, and M. Dumas in France, have done this long ago, and in a manner which leaves nothing to be desired, either in point of feeling or philosophy. We have, in fact, reached a further stage. That Englishmen must honour themselves by founding memorials of Faraday was, of course, a feeling which found voice shortly after his lamented death; but we move slowly in such matters, and only during the last week have two separate movements with this object in view come fully before the public. To these movements, and to several points connected with them, it is well that attention should be drawn.

We have, first, the Chemical Society's memorial of Faraday, which consists of a "Faraday Lectureship," an office tenable for a year by some foreign savant distinguished in chemistry, who is to come over to this country and make us acquainted with the inner minds of the workers in that science in other civilized countries. We regard this memorial as a very admirable one, and when we reflect upon the influence it will assuredly have in bringing the efforts of all European chemists to a focus, of making every step of progress a vantage-ground common to all, it will be obvious that one of the desires of its founders—namely, that they should do something in Faraday's name which he himself would have wished to see done—is amply fulfilled. Dr. Williamson has well stated another view which the Chemical Society have had in their minds in thus linking the development of human knowledge with the name of Faraday. It is that our arrangements for the advancement of science, admirable in many respects though they be, are yet wanting in others; one of them being that, although that advancement depends upon the store of ideas possessed by the workers, our scientific books and memoirs present us, as a rule, with facts alone; we have the dry bones—articulated it may be, but still the bones only—of a science, instead of the complete living form. There is none of the interest and life which appertains to the personal narrative of a discoverer, and we know nothing of those ideas at work in his mind which will in all probability lead to still further triumphs. Our Societies may sometimes give us this, but even then we have but the contact of minds similarly constituted and trained. The Faraday Lectureship carries us to a higher region: it gives an opportunity for the contact of minds of different nationalities and educations, and year by year will afford English chemists an opportunity of bringing up their ideas, as well as their work, to the standard of the foremost workers in another land.

This memorial is no longer a proposal; it is a fact. The first Faraday Lecture was delivered a few days ago in the Theatre of the Royal Institution, and it was a pleasant sight to see chemists from all parts of the three kingdoms gathered together to hear M. Dumas, the foremost chemist of France, both lecturer and audience being there to do honour to Faraday in the place where he had so often explained his brilliant discoveries. The first choice might well fall on M. Dumas, for other reasons besides his admirable qualifications for such a task and his high position as a brilliant discoverer; one of the reasons being that he and Faraday had been devoted friends for many years; another, that he, as Perpetual Secretary of the French Académie des Sciences, represented a learned body of which Faraday was always proud of being a member. It is not too much to say that the first Faraday Lecture will long be remembered by those who were privileged to hear it. After the presentation of a medal by Dr. Williamson, specially struck in honour of M. Dumas' visit, M. Dumas, after a brief éloge of his friend, discussed the present condition of chemical science, evidently leaning towards the idea that in time many of the substances now called elements might be found to have a common basis, and, after limiting the term "organic substance" to those compounds which alone take part in the growth of organized beings, stating his doubts as to the success of attempts to build up such compounds artificially. These were points, among very many others to which we need not specially refer, raised by M. Dumas in his discourse, which fairly electrified his audience by their brilliancy and breadth of treatment. Another good feature of the Chemical Society's memorial may be dwelt on for a moment; we refer to the opportunity it gives, not only for the interchange of ideas, but for the interchange of good-will among the scientific workers of different lands. Surely such results must delight the shade of the great man whose intellect was but one part of his noble nature.

And now we come to the other memorial, the steps taken in furtherance of which we will state as nearly as may be in the words used by the Prince of Wales as chairman of the public meeting held last Monday, also in the theatre of the Royal Institution. Early in 1868 the Council of the Royal Society requested the President, as representing the Royal Society, to take measures for bringing forward a proposal for a memorial to Faraday, and the project was submitted to the following Societies, with a request that they would join in the endeavour to carry it out—the Royal Society, the Royal Institution, the Chemical Society, the Royal Astronomical Society, the Geological Society, the Linnean Society, the Royal Geographical Society, and the British Association. On the 24th of March, 1868, a meeting of the Presidents of these Societies was held, and it was thought desirable by them to learn the views of the Government in regard to the erection of a monument to Faraday. On the 27th of June Mr. Disraeli wrote to the effect that he considered the erection of a monument to Professor Faraday to be a proper object to which to devote public funds, but that, as the Estimates for the year had passed, any vote for the purpose must be deferred to the following year. On May 8, 1869, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Lowe, wrote that while fully concurring in the propriety of erecting a monument as proposed, he could not consent to the appropriation of public money for the erection of a monument to any private citizen, however illustrious; adding that he did not make the rule, but found it. On June 8 it was resolved that a public meeting should be held at the Royal Institution. This public meeting was held, as we have stated, last Monday, and it was resolved to erect a monument by public subscription, and we do not doubt that any sum of money that may be required will soon be at the disposal of the Committee.

But this is not the point on which we need dwell. There is another much more important one raised by Mr. Lowe's reply. The whole question of the relations of the State to science comes up at once in its full force. It is well known that Faraday while living, in an interview, which he did not seek, with the then Prime Minister—the interview having reference to the grant of a pension to him, which also he did not seek—found his feelings so outraged by the Minister's conduct that he broke off the interview, and could not be induced to brave a second one till an ample written apology had been sent to him by the Minister. It has been well pointed out with regard to this occurrence, that it only shows how little English politicians know of England's greatest men. Surely there is no civilized country in the world in which power is so divorced from the higher order of intellect as it is in England. Of course one cannot for a moment wish that minds capable of better things should forsake their pursuits for politics; but we do maintain that the persistent manner in which the Government refuses to ally itself with science, the course which it adopts with regard to anything scientific which has not the imprimatur of Mr. Cole, C.B., is most unfortunate for the future advance of this country. Unless, in fact, it can be demonstrated that our material advance would not be assisted by a more vigorous and general investigation of physical science—and who would dare to affirm such a proposition?—the position of those who maintain that the progress of physical science should be the State's care is unassailable. But, further than this, who can doubt that the government of this country would be far better conducted were an infusion of men with scientific training possible among our administrators? No one can see the chaotic state of some of our public departments without having this thought brought strongly before him; for, in fact, administration is really a scientific question, and a man who has received a scientific training is more likely to grapple with it successfully than one who has not.

Mr. Lowe, however, in his incisive way, supplied us with a reason for not permitting such an intrusion. If the knowledge of Faraday had really been of any service to the State—in other words, if the State had been unwise enough to have aided or fostered science in any way, and in doing so had regarded the services of such a man as Faraday, and had paid him for those services—then the State would have rendered itself liable to erect a monument to him if it should so happen that he ever came to be looked upon as a public benefactor. Here surely is argument enough against politicians ever having anything to do, officially, with "England's greatest men." It might, for instance, have so happened that it became a question whether Mr. Faraday, Mr. Lowe, or Mr. Cole, C.B., was to have a public monument—taking both the latter gentlemen as model public servants, with the necessary qualification of receiving public pay at the rate of so many thousands per annum, paid quarterly in the regular manner. It may be that Mr. Lowe's decision in this case was strictly according to precedent, although he has already proved himself to be not always accurate in his statements where science is concerned; but we must ask, is such precedent to be a binding rule for all time? are the men who are most highly paid by the public to form in this matter a Mutual Admiration Society, to grant money for the erection of statues to each other, but without power to add to their number, even in those cases where service is rendered to the public without fee or reward? It is hardly necessary to remark that Mr. Lowe's strong statement of this principle was commented upon at the meeting to which we have referred. Professor Owen, after pointing out what Faraday had done for the State, asked the pregnant question what had the State done for Faraday, and then told how Faraday's declining years, instead of being the care of the nation which he had so largely benefited, were solaced by the private kindness of Her Majesty. Surely it is a parody on the modern idea of government to throw such a charge as this upon the personal income of the Sovereign, and even Mr. Lowe would, we should think, hardly deem it fitting that the public purse should be thus relieved from a burden. We do not believe that the public will endorse Mr Lowe's decision in this matter. The time is, we trust, not distant when the public opinion of this country will see that the fact that a man like Faraday can remain poor in order to endow mankind with the fruits of his labour, and does so endow them without any State aid, is rather a reason for granting public honours to him in preference to the man who serves himself while he serves the State, and is handsomely paid for his services.

As to Faraday himself, what needs he

> for his honoured bones
> The labour of an age in piled stones?
> Or that his hallow'd reliques should be hid
> Under a star-ypointing pyramid?

Is it yet too late to found a memorial in the shape, say, of a Faraday Scholarship at each of our Universities, or some such distinctive thing which, while it will aid the national progress, will sufficiently separate itself from the monuments of "piled stones" which, as we now learn, are erected by our paid public servants to men of their own order only? We need not fear reducing the number of our public monuments by adopting such a course, for Mr. Lowe will doubtless have his monument for the admirable and statesmanlike manner in which he has stood in the breach to protect the interests of the paid public service against the intrusion of a Faraday, coupled with his admirable representation of one of our chief scientific and intellectual institutions. We trust that Mr. Matthew Arnold will have the designing of the monument.

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE CRICKET-MATCH.

A SPECIAL interest attached to the University match this year, because out of thirty-four matches hitherto played sixteen had been won by Oxford and sixteen by Cambridge, the remaining two having been drawn. Since 1866 Cambridge, then somewhat behindhand, has been steadily making up its lost ground, and by its victory now has succeeded in passing its rival. That the result of the struggle this year would be in favour of the light blues seemed almost certain, if any reliance could be placed on the respective performances of the two Universities in their matches against the Marylebone Club and Ground. In those trial events Cambridge was successful both at Fenner's and at Lord's, while Oxford was decisively beaten in both matches. Cricket, however, is such an uncertain game that it is always dangerous to jump to conclusions based on public form. Every man plays cricket in his own way, and, moreover, very few men play two days alike. An Eleven in the field is a very different matter from an Eight in a boat. By discipline and constant practice the eight, if they are good for anything, are made to work with something like mechanical precision, but there is nothing mechanical in cricket. A professional bowler, indeed, reduces himself in time to something like a machine, and can pitch ball after ball almost on the same spot with unfailing accuracy; but with the majority of amateur bowlers bowling is a mere matter of chance. A captain of an Eleven, however good, must be a bold man if he expects his team to play to-day as they played yesterday. All he can reasonably hope is that, if one man does not come off, another will, that by some principle of compensation, if his best bat gets a duck's egg, and his best bowler cannot obtain a wicket, some less famous members of the Eleven may be raised up for the occasion to repair the fortunes of their side. The fact is that most of the operations of cricket require the exercise of independent judgment, and cannot be regulated by fixed laws. Every ball that is played, or fielded, or caught, must be judged separately on its own merits; and whether the player in each case will judge rightly or wrongly depends on the state of his eyes and his nerves and his stomach, on where he dined the night before, and on how much he drank after dinner. Add to this the allowances that must be made for the state of the ground, whether dry or moist, dead or lively, true or bumpy, and of the atmosphere, whether clear or hazy, and it will be seen how much need there is for discretion and discrimination on the part of each individual player. If we consider further that even the best players, when contending for the honour of their University under the eyes of thousands of watchful and observant critics, are unable to free themselves from a certain amount of nervousness, we shall begin to understand what a lottery a great cricket-match is. It will be conceded, we think, that very few men play up to their real form on these occasions, the majority are so impressed with their responsibility as to be quite unable to do themselves real justice. Some happy beings, not afflicted with nerves, will play as unconstrainedly as if they were at practice; but far more become for the nonce so completely the opposites of themselves, that their nearest friends would fail to recognise them. There goes in the steady man, who plays the game, and never takes liberties. What? is that he running out wildly at a long-hop, and being ignominiously stumped? There goes in the hard hitter, the dread of loose bowlers. Look how the field spreads out, and how anxiously long-off and long-on watch his movements. What? is that he playing back at half-volleys, and making feeble little pokes at balls off the wicket? Yonder is the surest field in the two Elevens; his hands are safe to hold the ball, if he gets a chance. Now it comes, straight towards him. A moment of suspense, while his partisans are preparing themselves for a hearty cheer; and, lo, he tumbles the ball, and it slips from his hands to his arms, and wiggles down to the ground, and he loses his presence of mind, and very likely kicks it further away instead of picking it up, and accommodates his opponents with an extra run. Such is the perversity of human nature that it triumphs when victory is little heeded, and fails when success is most eagerly coveted.

An Englishman, being an argumentative animal, is fond of inquiring, after a trial of strength between two or more parties has been decided, not why it was won, but why it was lost. After the Derby, when the first moments of enthusiasm are over, the winner is comparatively forgotten, and universal attention is directed to the second. The scribes take up their pens, the critics display their ingenuity, and a paper war rages for weeks as to why it was that, having got so near, the second horse could not get a little nearer still. Proceeding on the same principle, we will ask not why Cambridge won on Tuesday last, but why Oxford lost? In the first place, in point of physical strength, Oxford stood at great disadvantage as compared with Cambridge. Several of the dark blue Eleven were youths of slender and delicate frames, and played with a certain prettiness of style, so often associated with absence of muscular strength. We do not mean to say that, to be a good cricketer, a man must necessarily be six feet high, or be furnished with limbs and thews like those of Mr. Thornton or Mr. Absolom; but just as a good big horse is better than a good little horse, so a good big cricketer is better than a good little one. In this respect Oxford was quite overmatched, for the Cambridge Eleven included more muscular and physically powerful men, capable of standing any amount of work without fatigue, than were ever in all probability ranged under the same banner before. In the next place, the Oxford men proved themselves totally unable to play slow underhand bowling. Now it is rather a humiliating thing to bowl what are called, in cricketing parlance, "lobs." They have fallen into total disuse in first-class matches, for, showing no skill on the part of the bowler, they are only useful against utter incapacity on the part of the batsman, and incapable batsmen are not supposed to have part or lot in important matches, and they are only to be seen now in country districts where uncouth and inexperienced players are easily disposed of by them. But if it is humiliating to bowl lobs, as showing that the bowler cannot trust himself to bowl round-hand, it is more humiliating to be bowled out by them, and the depth of degradation is reached when the batsman is stumped off a slow, which at the same time happens to be a long hop. Yet into these lowest abysses the Oxford Eleven had to descend. If anybody had told them a month ago that they could not play Mr. Money's slows, and that eleven of them would be his victims in the University match, they would probably have considered themselves personally insulted. Yet such was the case. There is nothing very wonderful about Mr. Money's slows. There is little variety about them. Some are half volleys, some are long hops; all twist to the same amount in the same way. But the way the Oxford men played them was as follows. When they were pitched up, they played back and were caught; when they were pitched short, they ran out of their ground, and were stumped. More childish play at childish bowling could not be seen on any village green. And to those two causes—inferiority in strength and power, and inability to play slows—the defeat of Oxford must be attributed.

Cricket-matches may be classed under different heads, according as the issue is decided by exhibitions of proficiency in special departments of the game. Some are batting matches pure and simple, some are won by the bowling, this may be called a wicket-keeping match. The unprecedented number of fourteen wickets fell to the rival wicket-keepers, eight being taken by Mr. Stewart, for Oxford, and six by Mr. Richardson, for Cambridge. It is from no wish to underrate the prowess of the latter gentleman that we give the palm of excellence to Mr. Stewart. Mr. Richardson is an excellent and sure keeper to slow bowling, but he only showed moderately in his efforts to take the fast. Mr. Stewart keeps equally well to fast and slow, and takes all sorts of balls alike, to the leg or to the off, with wonderful precision and neatness, and without any pretentious show. We did not see him fumble a ball throughout the match, and they were often thrown in to his feet instead of his hands. Mr. Richardson got nearly all his wickets off Mr. Money's lobs, and of course any one with the faintest idea of wicket-keeping ought to take such things as those to a certainty. His stumping Mr. Tylecote off a fast ball of Mr. Absolom's was a mere matter of luck, for the ball hit his leg and went back on the wicket, and his hands had nothing to do with it. We were once stumped out ourselves by a wicket-keeper who positively turned round to flee from the approaching ball, which hit him violently in the small of the back and rebounded on the wicket. He was duly credited with the same on the scoring sheet, but we were not impressed with the ability of the performance.

It may seem paradoxical, after what we have said of the Oxford batting, to assert that the best cricket in the match was shown by Oxford men, but nevertheless we believe it to be the truth. The best batting during the two days was that of Mr. Pauncefote, and Mr. Digby in the second innings of Oxford; the best bowling was that of Mr. Walter for the first half-hour of the second innings of Cambridge; the best wicket-keeping was that of Mr. Stewart. Indeed, the Cambridge batting may be characterized as strength without style. Mr. Absolom prides himself in hitting off balls to square leg; Mr. Thornton has not the ghost of an idea of cutting—the prettiest part of a thorough batsman's play—and confines himself to forward hits—and very far forward they travel; and Mr. Weighell hits nearly as hard as Mr. Thornton, and rather more irregularly. A great part of Mr. Thornton's first innings was, in our opinion, very badly played, a great many loose balls (and Oxford bowling was very loose at that time) being let off and wrongly played at. His second innings, though of smaller amount, was worth half a dozen of the first, the loose balls being hit cleanly, and as none but he could hit them, and the good ones being played steadily and strongly. Still, it is from no wish to praise the losing at the expense of the winning side, but from strong conviction, that we repeat that the good parts of the Oxford batting were better cricket than the best of the Cambridge batting. Neither Eleven, however, included a batsman to be compared with Mr. Mitchell or Mr. Buller, or a bowler equal to Mr. Fellowes. Last week we should have spoken differently, and said that Mr. Bruno was quite worthy to play for the Gentlemen against the Players, for he bowled out a powerful M. C. C. Eleven for an insignificant number of runs, but this week he could not obtain a single wicket, while Mr. Money disposed of eleven. Such are the contradictions of cricket! Undoubtedly the best Eleven won, but it was a victory of superior strength more than of superior skill. Mr. Walter bowled wonderfully for half an hour, and then relapsed into mediocrity, but Mr. Absolom could bowl for a week without exhibiting signs of fatigue. Some of the Oxford batsmen appeared to have the will, but not the strength to hit, even when the chances were most favourable; but Mr. Thornton and Mr. Weighell could hit all through a summer's day without getting out of breath. Just so with the fielding and running. Mr. Absolom is a trained sprint-runner, and gets from wicket to wicket before you can swallow a glass of dry sherry. Mr. Yardley runs like a deer, covers an immense deal of ground, picks up the ball with one hand, and throws it in at the rate of forty miles an hour, straight to the wickets. The Oxford men could not, and possibly cannot, next year attain to all these things. They cannot add cubits to their stature, or double the width of their chests, but they may learn so simple a thing as how to play "lobs," and we sincerely trust, for their own sakes, that they will take their first lessons as speedily as possible.

REVIEWS.

THE HIGHLANDS OF TURKEY.*

THE volumes before us represent the personal experience derived from three separate visits to the countries described; an adequate amount of thought and reading during the intervals; and a basis, to start with, of common sense and sound scholarship. Though the subject is one which neither two nor ten volumes would exhaust, the writer has touched upon almost every point of it—the classical archæology of the old traditional or disputed sites, the social condition of the monasteries, and, above all, the politics and ethnology of one of the most diversified regions in Europe; the domain of the Greek, the Turkish, the Bulgarian, and the Albanian languages, the domain of Mahometanism as the ruling creed, and of Greek and Roman Christianity as the subordinate ones. The personal narrative, which is nowhere unduly prominent, relates chiefly to the mild mountaineering suggested by the title-page.

The chapter in which the information is the newest, and that which supplies the most definite desiderata, is the notice of the Mirdite Albanians. More than once Mr. Tozer shows how thoroughly he treats Turkey, even in its most European districts, as a mere outlyer of Asia; and here, upon entering the Mirdite country, he calls himself "almost the only European who had visited Orosch within the memory of the inhabitants." Now Orosch is certainly in Albania, and Albania has generally been treated as European. Possibly the word used by the natives was Frank, but this Mr. Hecquart, who has the next best claim to pass for an authority on Orosch, would probably translate Frenchman. Considering that, concurrently with this piece of testimony on the one part, the Alpine Club on the other is claiming Kasbin and Elbruz, as far beyond the other side of Constantinople as Orosch is on this side of it, for Asia, the term is, to say the least, curious. The next visitor is advised to give the name just as he heard it. But this is talk about the shell rather than the kernel. Against the real subject-matter there lie but few exceptions. Mr. Hecquart, hitherto our chief authority, tells us less of what he saw than Mr. Tozer does. Albanian in speech, Romanist in creed, and Austrian rather than Russian in their political predilections, the Mirdites stand in strong contrast to their neighbours on the west, the equally independent and anti-Ottoman Slavonians of Montenegro. They are savages with fraternal friendships after the fashion of the Dorians, and vendettas after those of Corsica. One of their auguries is taken from the bladebone of the sheep, so that shoulders of mutton serve both for food and fortune-telling. The custom is probably Turkish; for the old traveller Bell describes a similar process of divination among the Tartars to the east of the Caspian. The dominant characteristic, however, is perhaps their Exogamy, or the practice of eschewing marriages within their own tribe. Hence, a Mirdite bride must be carried off from one of the clans in the neighbourhood, these being Mahometan; a necessity which implies not only an abduction, but a conversion. The practice, however, being recognised by all parties concerned as an institution, rarely leads to hostility. Such are the Mirdites—Christians, and, in their way, missionaries.

About Montenegro we know more, partly from the notice of a lady, Viscountess Strangford—and partly from one of a soldier, Lieutenant Arbuthnot. The question, too, of its practical independence has been sufficiently ventilated. Mirdita, in this respect, is another Montenegro; and, as our knowledge increases, we shall probably find in the terræ incognitæ which pass under the name of Upper Mœsia at least two more claimants for the same consideration—the Wassoevitchi, or the descendants of a Basileus, and the still wilder mountaineers of the Drobniak district. These have yet to be described in detail; and, these being dealt with, fresh claimants to a modified independence will appear—mountaineers and coastmen, Mats and Krivyashes, and other names, if possible, less known to fame; but which, when the questions of Roman or Greek Catholic, of Slavonian or Albanian, and of Russian, Austrian, or even Venetian, proclivities come under analysis, will demand recognition. The derivation of the word Mirdite is one of Mr. Tozer's etymons which we must go out of the way to protest against; the more so as the protest may serve as a text to some criticisms upon his ethnography in general:—

> The Sultan Amurath, meeting the chief, was saluted by him with the words mire dite ("good day," in Albanian), and in consequence of this, when the battle was over, he gave them the name of Mirdites, in commemoration of the words of good omen which he had heard in the morning. Though the explanation is inadmissible, it has some plausibility in it, &c.

All that is true in this is that Sultan Amurath had something to do with the name. Nothing shows the likelihood of this more than the names in the neighbourhood. On the frontier are the Ducadjini, or those whose name dates from the Ducas dynasty. Then come the Clementi, named from the legendary St. Clement (Roman or Albanian, as the case may be), of whom the work before us gives us, for the first time in English, a fair notice. Then, though not within our author's route, are the Vassoevitshi, already mentioned.

We cannot make the analysis of the ethnology of European Turkey an easy subject. To the general reader every writer brings a fresh detail. We are criticising Mr. Tozer, and we must own that he has enriched our knowledge with two new names. In each case we know of the population, but the names are new; and as they imply strange subdivisions within a recognised division, they have their value. It is one thing to learn, in a general way, that a large tract of Thessaly, Macedonia, and Albania is Valachian, or Vlakiot; it is another thing to know, as a detail, that a fraction of its population calls itself Armeng. In Western Macedonia, too, we have long known that a certain district was neither Greek nor Ottoman Turk. It is something to learn that a part of its population is called Pomak. These two new names, with the analyses they suggest, seem to be Mr. Tozer's. Concerning the Pomaks, we hope that in a future journey he may tell us more. In respect to the Vlakiots, we must record our differences with him. One applies to the name; the other to the value of the bearers of it as an element in the future history of Greece and Turkey:—

> Among themselves all the various branches of the Wallachian family are called Rumuni, or Romans, with the single exception of this colony in the Pindus, who style themselves Armeng, a name which is difficult to interpret, though it may possibly be a corruption of the same word. Those that dwell south of the Danube are frequently known by the name Tsintsar, an appellation which forcibly recals the original "shibboleth," being derived from "tsints," which is their pronunciation of "chinch" (five, quinque). It is, of course, a name of ridicule, and unwelcome to their ears; as is also the case with the title Kutzo-Vlacks, or "lame, halting Wallachs," which refers, I believe, to the same, or a similar defect, of speech.

This may or may not be the case; but why not tell the whole story? or why not give the reader the advantage of the suggestion of a different view? Why ignore the connexion between Tsintsar, Zingaro, Romani, and Gypsy? What, too, if there were in these very parts of Thessaly a bishopric of the Kutzagri, Kutzagri, or Kotragi, so that we find reasons for believing that the Kutzo-Wallachians were simply Kutiagri, or Kutigurs; these being an historical people akin to the Huns, Avars, and old Bulgarians. Non meus hic sermo. Zeuss, in 1837, asks concerning this very population, "May not these Wallachs, Thessalians, Kutziagirs, and Kuber's Bulgarians, be allied?" Just, however, as our author never hits the Kutziagri, so Zeuss never notices the term Kutzo in the sense of Lame. Assuredly, in these matters, the whole is easier than the half.

Mr. Tozer thinks that, as a future political influence, these Kutzo-Valachians are likely to go for nothing. It may be so, or it may not. If so, however, it will not be because they are unimportant, but because the Valachia of the present year, the Valachia with a Prussian King, is other than the Valachia of the first Greek revolution, the Valachia of a Fanariot régime. Upon this point let us put three things together. The first Greek revolution began in secret societies, and the Southern Albanians did half the work in it. It began with Ypsilantes, and Kolettes was one of its heroes. Now Ypsilantes was the highest Greek official in Valachia, and Kolettes was a Valachian of Sirako, and Sirako is a town on the very line where the Hellenizing Albanians are separated from the Ottomans. Whatever, then, may be the case hereafter, it is probable that the Valachians of Thessaly and Albania were powers of some sort—possibly as gipsies are powers in the eyes of a smuggler, and possibly as Jews are powers in the eyes of a loan-monger; but still powers. That they were not powers in the sense that Garibaldi, or the Pope, or the Czar, or the Prime Minister of England, or even a demagogue in Athens, are powers, we, with Mr. Tozer, freely admit. Yet it is unsafe to ignore them.

No English writer has given more attention to these same Vlakosts than our author, yet he fails to connect them with the Children of Israel. Meanwhile, it is thus that he writes about a Jews' Castle, or an Ebraio-Castro which gives him trouble, or at any rate suggests nothing but a conjecture:—

> Captain Spratt has suggested, with considerable probability, from the frequent occurrence of the name "Jews' Castle" in the islands and on the continent of Greece (there is an Ebraio-Castro on Mount Pelion) that ruins are regarded as likely places for finding treasures, and hoarded money is, or was in former times, associated with the Jews. It must have been from some notion of this kind that the name arose, for the fortresses themselves cannot be supposed to have belonged to members of that despised race.

But what if this despised race was not always so despised? Or what if populations other than Jewish called themselves, or were called by others, Hebrews? Of something of this kind there is evidence even in the work before us. An extract (which, by the way, has seen a good deal of service) from Benjamin of Tudela, Jew and traveller, tells us that about Zeitun, in Thessalia, the inhabitants are called Vlachi; that they are not Christians; that they are robbers; that no one ventures to make war on them; that their names are of Jewish origin; that some even say they have been Jews; and, finally, that when they meet with a Jew they only rob him, whereas the Gentiles they both rob and kill. With a population of this kind there is no need to go far for the origin of Jews' Castles. But it should be added that the evidence of Benjamin of Tudola has been disparaged; for the statement is undoubtedly a strange one. Yet the most probable explanation of it is stranger still. What if they were Samaritan, rather than Jewish—or, in other words, Jews of the Ten, rather than the Two, tribes? The evidence here lies in the history of the Khazars, especially in their double relation to the Bulgarians on the one side, and the Jews on the other. In respect to the first, let us turn to Zeuss. The Khazars appear in history as allies of the Emperor Heraclius against Chosroes, King of Persia, A.D. 626; or, to connect the date with a greater name, during the lifetime of Mahomet. They come from the parts about the Volga, or the original Bulgaria. They follow the tract of the Huns, Avars, and the Bulgarians of Europe, in connexion with whom—sometimes as enemies, sometimes as friends—they are often mentioned, and that by the Arabian as well as the Greek historians. They conquered the Crimea, till then perhaps Gothic rather than Greek; but from the conquered country acquired a civilization which, though Greek and Eastern, was not Byzantine. They were great conquerors in Russia; tribes which lay at least as far north as Kiev (which they founded) having been reduced by them—the authority on this point being that of the earliest Russian annalist, Nestor, himself a monk of that district.

Now for the Jewish side of the picture. One, at least, of the Khazar kings was a convert to Judaism, and the whole Khazar nation Judaized. The Jews, too, were powerful in Khazaria. There they had a necropolis; the paper on which, by Chwolson, has formerly been noticed in our columns. The general era is that of the Captivity of Jerusalem, but sometimes that of Samaria. One of the gravestones stands over the body of, perhaps, the last of the Sadducees. That the names of Samuel, Simeon, Gabriel, Daniel, and Moses appear in almost every page of Wallachian and Bulgarian history is simply a remark of Mr. Finlay's. What passes, then, for Wallachian may have been Bulgarian, and what passes for Bulgarian, Khazar—for so it is in Greece throughout. The Greek and Turkish languages are facts; but the blood is mixed and mysterious.

The Khazars, however, were both Bulgarian and Jewish. And they were also Russian. Concerning which last statement we must note the following names—Dragovitæ and Smoleni. These, among others, we find in the eighth century applied to certain Slavonian colonists in Macedonia. The first came from the parts between the Upper Dnieper and the Pripecz, say from Minsk or Grodno. On this, for which we have the authority of Nestor, there is no doubt. Smoleni may indicate Smolensko. And how came they to Macedonia? Not by land, like ordinary Slavonians or Bulgarians. Not by sea, after the fashion of the men of either Constantinople or the Crimea. They came in canoes (monoxyla), and the time of their coming was the time when the Khazars were just in the position to colonize Russia from Macedonia, and Macedonia from Russia. They are just the people to do this; but they are the only people whose influence accounts for both Jews and Russians in the northern parts of what the ancients called Greece. The whole is, we repeat, easier than the half, but the whole must be submitted to ultimate analysis.

As definite points in the Eastern question, the two most impalpable are the Greek blood and the Greek language. The first is too evanescent to be anywhere; the second so ubiquitous that it is everywhere. The religious creeds, on the other hand, are capable of being considered. The difference (within the Orthodox Church) between the Bulgarians and the Greeks, Mr. Tozer has adequately described. The Roman element he has understated. On two occasions, at least, the claims of Rome upon Bulgaria have been prominently set forth; nor have they ever been formally abandoned. Under Nicolas I., when the schism between the two Churches had become final, the province of Illyricum was claimed by Rome, and of the province of Illyricum Bulgaria was claimed as a part. Towards the close of his reign, Bogoris, the first Christian king of Bulgaria, had learned to distrust his converters. He knew the difference between the Iconoclasts and their opponents; he knew, too, the scandals of the quarrel between Photius and Ignatius; and he also knew something about the authority of the Pope. To Nicolas I. he applied for answers to a hundred and six questions; and Formosus, Apostle of the Bulgarians, and afterwards an anti-Pope, was charged with the answer. This may be found in Milman. So may the dealings of Innocent III. with the King of Bulgaria and Valachia. Here, however, the claim is different, being founded upon the Bishopric of Thessalonica—a result of the Fourth Crusade, or, in other words, the sack of Constantinople by the Venetians.

Specially interesting, in this respect, is Mr. Tozer's notice of what we may call the Crypto-Christians of North-Western Turkey—Christians who, under constraint, submit to occasional conformity in the way of Mahometanism. There are Fire-worshippers who do the same in Asia, and enough of them to claim recognition as political influences.

Respecting the Koniarats, Mr. Tozer, who is one of the few travellers who notice them, writes thus:—

> Derdi, which lies in the plain, is inhabited by Koniarates, and was one of the original positions occupied by that tribe. Their history is as follows. Shortly before the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, the Greek inhabitants of Larissa were reduced to so weak a condition, and had so little hope of assistance from their Government, that they were obliged to submit to the rule of a Bulgarian prince. Wearied, however, of this yoke, they called in to their aid an Ottoman chieftain called Turkhan Bey, who, after driving out the intruder, established himself in the country. The forces at his disposal being too small to hold it with safety, he sent to Konieh (Iconium) in Asia Minor to invite any of the population who were willing to leave their homes and colonize these fertile plains. Some five or six thousand families responded to his call. . . . They have a good reputation for industry, but are also said to be extremely fanatical, and we ourselves found them sulkier and more insolent than any other Turks, forming a marked contrast to their countrymen of Asia Minor generally, who are quite the most favourable specimens of their race.

We have much to learn about these Koniarates. There is another settlement of them in Macedonia; so important a person as Mehemet Ali having been no true Ottoman Turk, but rather a Seljukian Koniarat of Cavalla. So little did the genuine Seljukians fraternize with them as kinsmen of the Ottoman division, that no prince or potentate on the European side of the Hellespont gave more trouble to the Amuraths and Bajazets of the times before the taking of Constantinople than the representatives of the Iconium dynasty, the half-conquered or rebellious princes of Karamania. The present Koniarates, if better known, would probably be better liked. Compared with the Turks of Constantinople they are pure in blood; neither are they so notably spoilt by the possession of power. Left as they are to manage themselves, they care little for the attractions of the capital, employ themselves on their own farms, and, though they would probably make the best officials in the empire, they either neglect or despise place-hunting. It would be better for the Turkish administration if a little more of the Koniarat element were infused into it.

We make no secret of having treated the political parts of Mr. Tozer's book at the expense of the scholastic, the artistic, and the archæological; and of having made a text for criticism out of the few points wherein we differ from him, rather than a reproduction of the many wherein we agree with him.

KEBLE'S MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.*

DR. MOBERLY has done wisely in collecting into one volume Keble's miscellaneous poems—all, that is, which are not included in the Christian Year or the Lyra Innocentium. It must not be supposed, however, that all, or nearly all, the contents of the volume are really new. On the contrary, more than half the pieces brought together have appeared already, about a third in the Lyra Apostolica—to which Newman and Keble were the chief contributors—and the remainder in various hymnals or other collections of religious poetry. Of those now published for the first time few, if any, with one conspicuous exception, rise to the author's highest mood as a poet. We have not, for instance, observed among them any composition which matches the exquisite lyrical sweetness of the "Song of the Manna Gatherers," or the jubilant ring of the lines for Easter Day in the Lyra Innocentium. Neither, again, among the delicate domestic touches which abound, here as everywhere, in Keble's poetry, do we recollect anything to equal the perfect grace of the verses in the Christian Year for the Third Sunday in Lent, or the Twenty-fifth after Trinity, which are some of the most characteristic he ever wrote; nor is the solemn grandeur of the opening stanzas for the Twentieth Sunday after Trinity, "Where is thy favoured haunt, Eternal Voice"—which are not quite in his usual style—recalled to us. But we should nevertheless have been very sorry if the editor had omitted any of these fragmentary records, as we may term them, of a pure and noble life. There are persons whose best biography is that written unconsciously by their own hand, and Mr. Keble was one of them. Not only is there a remarkable continuity pervading his writings throughout—a maturity in the earliest poems, and a freshness in the latest—but in this, as in other respects, his poetry is, to use Dr. Moberly's language, "in a very high degree the reflex of himself." Its most marked peculiarity is its "intense and absolute veracity." We can well believe that he never sat down for the purpose of writing poetry, but simply wrote as the inward feeling prompted him. So little studious, indeed, was he of literary reputation, that he would not willingly take pains to correct or polish what he had written. This is amusingly illustrated by the story of Wordsworth's criticism on the Christian Year, for which there is said to be good authority:—"It is very good; so good that, if it were mine, I would write it all over again." Whatever occasional roughness or feebleness of expression might have been removed by doing so, we cannot doubt that half at least of the indescribable charm of that wonderful volume would have evaporated in the process. It is precisely because he felt so intensely and so thoroughly every word he uttered, and never allowed himself to say, for the sake of effect, a syllable more than he felt, that his words have come home with such constraining force to the deepest religious instincts of two generations of his countrymen, and their force seems unexhausted still. There are very few poets of whom this rigid sincerity could be predicated. And those, like Byron, who make the greatest parade of taking the public into their confidence, are apt to be the least true either to their audience or to themselves. But the same spirit of unostentatious devotion which made Keble turn from the highest honours of the University, which he had gained almost as a boy, and from the admiration which everywhere followed his steps, to bury himself for life in the pastoral ministry of an obscure country village, breathes throughout every line of his poetry. It has just that "soothing tendency" which, in the preface to the Christian Year, he ascribes to the Prayer-book services it was designed to illustrate. It would perhaps be difficult to describe the effect of his writings better than in the well-known words of the great Roman poet:—

* Miscellaneous Poems. By the Rev. J. Keble, M.A., Vicar of Hursley. London: Parker & Co. 1869.

> Tale tuum carmen nobis, divine poëta,
> Quale sopor fessis in gramine, quale per æstum
> Dulcis aquæ saliente sitim restinguere rivo.

The first hundred pages of the volume, as we have already said, are a reprint from the Lyra Apostolica, which has passed through several editions, but has never become so universal a favourite as the Christian Year. We are very glad, therefore, to have Mr. Keble's contributions, which include some of his most perfect poems, secured to us in a permanent form; one especially, which is hardly as widely known as it deserves to be, though we doubt if, for its pathos and "tender grace," there are many to equal or any to surpass it among all that he has written. We mean the lines on the "Burial of the Dead," originally, it appears, intended for the Christian Year, and which recall, both in tone and metre, the exquisite poem for Tuesday in Holy Week. Those who do not happen to be familiar with the Lyra will thank us for introducing them to one of the sweetest strains of consolation that ever cheered a mourner's heart:—

> I thought to meet no more, so dreary seem'd
> Death's interposing veil, and thou so pure,
> Thy place in Paradise
> Beyond where I could soar;
>
> Friend of this worthless heart! but happier thoughts
> Spring like unbidden violets from the sod,
> Where patiently thou tak'st
> Thy sweet and sure repose.
>
> The shadows fall more soothing: the soft air
> Is full of cheering whispers like thine own;
> While Memory, by thy grave,
> Lives o'er thy funeral day;
>
> The deep knell dying down, the mourners pause,
> Waiting their Saviour's welcome at the gate.—
> Sure with the words of Heaven
> Thy spirit met us there,
>
> And sought with us along th' accustomed way
> The hallow'd porch, and entering in, beheld
> The pageant of sad joy,
> So dear to Faith and Hope.
>
> O! hadst thou brought a strain from Paradise
> To cheer us, happy soul, thou hadst not touch'd
> The sacred springs of grief
> More tenderly and true,
>
> Than those deep-warbled anthems, high and low,
> Low as the grave, high as th' Eternal Throne,
> Guiding through light and gloom
> Our mourning fancies wild,
>
> Till gently, like soft golden clouds at eve
> Around the western twilight, all subside
> Into a placid faith,
> That even with beaming eye
>
> Counts thy sad honours, coffin, bier, and pall;
> So many relics of a frail love lost,
> So many tokens dear
> Of an endless love begun.
>
> Listen! it is no dream: th' Apostles' trump
> Gives earnest of th' Archangel's;—calmly now
> Our hearts yet beating high
> To that victorious lay.
>
> Most like a warrior's to the martial dirge
> Of a true comrade, in the grave we trust
> Our treasure for awhile:
> And if a tear steal down,
>
> If human anguish o'er the shaded brow
> Pass shuddering, when the handful of pure earth
> Touches the coffin-lid,
> If at our brother's name,
>
> Once and again the thought, "for ever gone," > Come o'er us like a cloud; yet, gentle spright,
> Thou turnest not away,
> Thou know'st us calm at heart.
>
> One look, and we have seen our last of thee,
> Till we too sleep and our long sleep be o'er.
> O cleanse us, ere we view
> That countenance pure again,
>
> Thou, who canst change the heart, and raise the dead!
> As Thou art by to soothe our parting hour,
> Be ready when we meet,
> With Thy dear pardoning words.

We could hardly find a better illustration of that delicate tenderness of feeling which was a leading trait of Mr. Keble's mind, as of his writings; but it would be a great mistake to infer that, because this was one side of his character, it was the only one. Sir John Duke Coleridge, in a letter printed at the end of his father's memoir, calls attention to Keble's "sternness" in the condemnation of what he thought erroneous or wrong. But it has been argued with a strangely perverse ingenuity that, if he was a dogmatist in his formal creed, he was a latitudinarian in his poetry, and therefore in his deeper convictions of which it is the instinctive utterance. Nothing could be further from the fact. In no writer is the form of his theological belief more indelibly stamped in its every detail on his poetry, and that because to him it was not a mere form, but a genuine and living faith. It is true no doubt, as his wife is reported to have said of him after his death, that he was scrupulously diffident and forbearing in his judgments on those who differed from him in belief, but it was in the spirit of St. Augustine's famous saying, amat errantes, odit errores. For error itself, or what he considered such, he had no tenderness. It might be sufficient to refer, in illustration of this side of his character, to the striking lines in the Christian Year beginning "Is this a time to plant and build?" which are no less characteristic of one side of the author's mind than those previously referred to are of another. And the poem for the Eleventh Sunday after Trinity is not an exception, but an example of what is abundantly illustrated throughout the volume. But it is perhaps in the Lyra Apostolica that this severer side of his theology—which is only another way of saying of his character—comes most prominently to the surface. Nor is it any answer to say that his contributions to it were written for publication. Even if the fact was so, which is very doubtful, and did they seem to strike a different note from his other compositions, as they do not, it is certain that he wrote nothing that did not come straight from his heart, or for the mere purpose of producing a salutary impression on others. The whole series of poems on "Fire" will serve to exemplify our meaning. There are others in this part of the volume that we had marked for extract, and among them the "Winter Thrush," which is one of the happiest illustrations of Keble's power of idealizing the common sights and sounds of country life, and may not unfitly be named with Shelley's ode to the Skylark, or Wordsworth's to the Redbreast. But we must turn to the later portion of the volume.

Of the translations from the Latin breviary there is not very much to be said. It is comparatively seldom that translated hymns retain enough of the spirit and rush of the original to be adapted for singing. Dr. Newman's translations of the Advent Hymns, and Dr. Neale's "Jerusalem the Golden," are among the most conspicuous exceptions. There are very few even of Keble's original verses that are suited for purposes of hymnology, and even fewer of his translations. Perhaps we should except his version of Alleluia dulce carmen, but it hardly has the ring metrical version of the Psalter, though of course, as poetry, it is infinitely superior to the wretched doggrel still sometimes sung in our churches. The fact is, that he was too really a poet to be a good hymnologist, except occasionally, and as it were by accident, as in some verses of his poem for Whit Sunday, "When God of old came down from heaven." Of the hymns, written as such, would require to be curtailed by half at least.

The concluding portion of the volume contains various fugitive pieces, composed at dates ranging from 1808, when the author was a boy of sixteen, though already a resident scholar of Corpus, till within a year or two of his death. Many of them are of a directly personal kind, and bring out that freshness and playfulness of disposition which seem to have survived with him to the last. Some few of the earlier ones are love verses, and several, including the very latest of all, have more or less of a humorous character. His fondness for children is conspicuous in all alike. They are very properly given here in their chronological order. We have spoken already of that bond of unbroken continuity through which they are visibly "linked each to each by natural piety." There is the same profound sense of the unseen world in the earliest, and the same "almost boyishness" of feeling—to use the editor's words—in the latest. His sense of the humorous is almost quaintly combined with his devoutness of mind in the lines on "the Rook," which may be taken as a specimen of that lighter style, hardly familiar to those who only know him by the Christian Year. After describing the destruction of the rook's nest in "grandpapa's tallest elm-tree" by a strong north wind, and the untimely death of its occupants in spite of all the efforts of "Aunt, Robert, and Hill," to revive them, comes the following reflection:—

> 'Tis a very bad wind, as in proverbs we find,
> The wind that blows nobody good;
> I have read in books; yet sure the young rooks
> Would deny it to-day if they could.
>
> They sure would deny, but they cannot well try,
> Their cawing not yet have they learn'd;
> And 'tis just as well not; for a fancy I've got,
> How the wind to some use may be turn'd.
>
> Do you see Martha Hunt, how she bears all the brunt
> Of the chilly, damp, blustering day?
> How gladly she picks all the littering sticks!
> Her kettle will soon boil away.
>
> How snug she will sit by the fireplace and knit,
> While Daniel her fortune will praise.
> The wind roars away,—"Master Wind," they will say,
> "We thank you for this pretty blaze."
>
> Then spite of the rooks, what we read in the books
> Is true, and the storm has done good.
> It seems hard, I own, when the nests are o'erthrown,
> But Daniel and Martha get wood.

We could have wished to find room for part at least of the ballad of "Robin Lee," and the beautiful lines, apparently referring to an early disappointment in love, printed under the heading of "Nec me discedere flevit." But, for these and many more which are sure are long to become popular favourites, we must refer our readers to the volume itself. There is one, however, of these posthumous poems which we cannot altogether withhold from our readers. It appears to have been originally intended for publication in the Lyra Innocentium as an ode for the Conception of the Virgin, but was suppressed, against the author's own better judgment, in deference to the rather crotchety objections of some of his friends. We are not concerned here with its theology, but all will agree that it would have been a misfortune if the world had been deprived of what, alike for lofty poetry and exquisite tenderness of feeling is second to none of its author's compositions. We quote the concluding stanzas: —

> Mother of God! O, not in vain
> We learn'd of old thy lowly strain.
> Fain in thy shadow would we rest,
> And kneel with thee, and call thee blest;
> With thee would "magnify the Lord,"
> And if thou art not here adored,
> Yet seek we, day by day, the love and fear
> Which brings thee, with all saints, near and more near
>
> What glory thou above hast won,
> By special grace of they dear Son,
> We see not yet, nor dare espy
> Thy crownèd form with open eye.
> Rather beside the manger meek
> Thee bending with veiled brow we seek,
> Or where the angel in the thrice-great Name
> Hail'd thee, and Jesus to thy bosom came.
>
> Yearly since then with bitterer cry
> Man hath assail'd the Throne on high.
> And sin and hate more fiercely striven
> To mar the league 'twixt earth and heaven
> But the dread tie, that pardoning hour,
> Made fast in Mary's awful bower,
> Hath mightier proved to bind than we to break.
> None may that work undo, that Flesh unmake
>
> Thenceforth, whom thousand worlds adore,
> He calls thee Mother evermore,
> Angel nor Saint His face may see
> Apart from what He took of thee.
> How may we choose but name thy name
> Echoing below their high acclaim
> In holy Creeds? Since earthly song and prayer > Must keep faint time to the dread anthem there.
>
> How, but in love on thine own days,
> Thou blissful one, upon thee gaze?
> Nay every day, each suppliant hour,
> Whene'er we kneel in aisle or bower,
> Thy glories we may greet unblamed,
> Nor shun the lay by seraphs framed.
> "Hail, Mary, full of grace!" O, welcome sweet,
> Which daily in all lands all saints repeat!
>
> Fair greeting, with our matin vows
> Paid duly to the enthronèd Spouse,
> His Church and Bride, here and on high,
> Figured in her deep purity,
> Who, born of Eve, high mercy won,
> To bear and nurse the Eternal Son.
> O, awful station, to no seraph given,
> On this side touching sin, on the other heaven!
>
> Therefore as kneeling day by day,
> We to our Father duteous pray,
> So unforbidden may we speak
> An Ave to Christ's Mother meek
> (As children with "good morrow"
> To elders in some happy home.)
> Inviting so the saintly host above
> With our unworthiness to pray in love.
>
> To pray with us, and gently bear
> Our falterings in the pure bright air.
> But strive we pure and bright to be
> In spirit, else how vain of thee
> Our earnest dreamings, awful Bride!
> Feel we the sword that pierced thy side
> Thy spotless lily flower, so clear of hue,
> Shrinks from the breath impure, the tongue

HILL'S LIFE OF NAPOLEON III.*

IT is not very clear why Mr. Pascoe Grenfell Hill should have written the Life of Napoleon the Third. He does not give us a line of preface or introduction of any kind, nor do we know anything about Mr. Hill save what we learn from his title-page, namely, that he unites the letters — not often found in company — of R.N. and B.A., and that he is also Rector of S. Edmund the King and Martyr. We are thus left quite in the dark, unless indeed it is meant that we should infer that Mr. Hill's musings on his own East Anglian patron have led him to recognise a reproduction of that model of sainted kingship in the present ruler of France. On turning to the first page of the body of the work we find that Mr. Hill, Rector of S. Edmund the King and Martyr, is in correspondence with M. l'Abbé Isidore Mullois, who is described as "premier chapelain de la maison de l'Empereur." Marry, this is somewhat; it is not every rector who gets private letters from the first chaplain of an Emperor. And the matter of the correspondence between the two divines—Anglican we suppose we may say on one side, but we suppose in these days hardly Gallican on the other side—seems to be not a little remarkable. Mr. Hill and M. Mullois seem to be laying their heads together to make M. Mullois' master better known to the people of England. "Je voudrais faire mieux connaître l'Empereur à votre nation;" so writes M. Mullois, seemingly calling on Mr. Hill to be his helper in the good work. To us who can remember 1851, and unluckily a good many things before 1851, the job might seem hardly to want doing. But there are people now grown up who cannot remember 1851, and there are others who were grown up in 1851 who have somehow forgotten all about it. Careful research has revealed to us the existence of a large class of people who think that 1848 and 1851 were one and the same year, and who think any one very ignorant who tries to draw any distinction between them, so perhaps it might not after all be a mere work of supererogation to set about making M. Mullois' master a little better known to the English people. Still we do not exactly see why M. Mullois should have picked out Mr. Hill as the chosen instrument for the work. Mr. Hill himself seems to have been a little puzzled at his own promotion. "It is very well," he says, "but how can I contribute to make the Emperor better known to the British nation?" Mr. Hill seems indeed to have taken his own measure pretty carefully. "I cannot," he goes on to say—"'as others use'—compose a five-volume, or even a three-volume, work." We quite agree with Mr. Hill; we have not the least wish to see five, or even three, volumes about Napoleon the Third from his hand. But Mr. Hill goes on. "A single sentence from the pen of M. Mullois reassures me—'La brièveté est aujourd'hui une des premières conditions du succès!'" Thus reassured, Mr. Hill infers that, "a short summary of the chief events in the career of Louis Napoleon may be acceptable to the English reader." Very good; some things are certainly the better for being short, and we should be inclined to say that any book by Mr Pascoe Grenfell Hill was among them. Shortness may be a merit, or it may not. Brevity is said to be the soul of wit; whether it is or is not the soul of truth depends on the way in which the brevity is brought about. Mr. Hill has achieved the distinction of being at once short and lengthy. We mean lengthy in the real sense of the word, if there be such a word, not in the sense of the penny-a-liners in which it is simply a longer word for long. Mr. Hill's book contains only 203 pages of large print, well leaded and with a handsome margin, but the book is lengthy all the same. It is undoubtedly short; still it is lengthy because we get weary of it long before we come to the end, and begin to cry "Ohe jam satis est, ohe libelle" long before we reach page 203. For Mr. Hill's shortness is certainly that kind of shortness which is far from being the soul either of wit or of truth. His short summary of the chief events in the career of Louis Napoleon is made short only by leaving out all those events which, whether likely or not to be acceptable to the English reader, are certainly not likely to be acceptable to either an English or a French panegyrist. If you leave out all about the occupation of Rome, all about Cayenne and the Isle du Diable, all about the French and Belgian press, all about the prosecution of the Count of Montalembert, all about the confiscation of the Orleans property, all about Savoy and Nice, all about Mexico, the chief events of the career of Louis Napoleon are made much fewer, and the summary of them is made much shorter. It is in a certain sense made more acceptable, but whether it is not made short and acceptable by the sacrifice of objects even higher than shortness and acceptability we leave it to the combined divinity of M. Mullois and Mr. Hill to decide.

The game of setting some Englishman to write a weak book in praise of the present master of France, whatever else may be said for it, certainly has not the merit of novelty. It was tried as long ago as 1857, when some events were fresher than they are now, when a book of abject flattery appeared, bearing the title of "Napoleon the Third," &c. &c., "by a British Officer," and most lovingly dedicated to the British officer's wife. But unluckily the "British Officer" turned out not to be the holder of any known office, civil, military, or naval, the panegyrist of Napoleon the Third received some pretty compliments from the hero of his tale, but in the end he vanished somewhat ingloriously in the bursting of a bubble Bank of Deposit. We do not suspect Mr. Pascoe Grenfell Hill, Rector of S. Edmund the King and Martyr, of being a man of straw of this kind; indeed the letters "R.N." may be taken as implying that Mr. Hill has, or has had, better claims to the title of a "British Officer" than his forerunner twelve years back. Still the omen is a little unlucky, and it suggests that all trades must have failed before a man takes to the trade of trumpeter to Louis Napoleon. In fact one would have thought that the policy of trumpeting at all was of itself a bad policy. The forgetfulness of mankind is great, and it would be safer to trust to it. Napoleon the Third, whatever we may say to his regnal arithmetic, is a great fact; he holds a great position; he is master of the lives and properties of many millions of people. It might be wiser to be satisfied with these facts, and not to tempt people to pry too closely into the way in which that great position was gained. There are people who honestly believe that Napoleon the Third is an hereditary prince who succeeded Napoleon the Second. There are people, as we have seen, who somehow confound Buonaparte and Cavaignac, and who fancy that it was his present Imperial Majesty who saved society in June, 1848. There are a good many people who have no belief one way or another, but who accept the fact of the powers that be in France just as they accept the fact of the powers that be in Reuss-Schleiz. Napoleon the Third is Napoleon the Third, and they no more think how he came to be Napoleon the Third than they think how Henry the Seventy-seventh (if that be the right number) came to be Henry the Seventy-seventh. Here then is a good healthy mass, if not of active friendship, at least of the opposite to active enmity; a passive mass of opinion which, if it does not exactly think well, at any rate is far from thinking ill. While such a state of things exists, it is wiser to let well alone; it is wiser not to awaken the sleeping lions of thought and inquiry. Mr. Hill and the British Officer are not doing their patron any service by stirring people up to examine into his title; after sixteen years of familiarity with the sound people are beginning to think that the word Emperor does, as once did, translate Βασιλεύς; Mr. Hill's attempts to make matters better known may perhaps issue in making people conscious that what it really translates is Τύραννος.

We therefore do not look on Mr. Hill's as a wise book, even viewed in a general kind of way with reference to the interests of his own hero. We shall perhaps be still less inclined to look upon it as a wise book if we look at it a little in detail. It is, as we have said, chiefly remarkable for the things which it leaves out altogether. It is also remarkable for the charming simplicity with which Mr. Hill—for aught we know M. Mullois also—hopeth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things. Mr. Hill, and no doubt M. Mullois too, believe in the sincere and perfect piety of their hero. We have no wish to disturb their belief; Louis the Eleventh, Francis the First, Louis the Fourteenth, even Louis the Fifteenth, were all princes remarkable for their piety. There are several ages of the world in which the difficulty is to find a prince who is not. It therefore makes no difference in our estimate either of the events which Mr. Hill leaves out or of those which he records that we find that not only the Rector of S. Edmund the King and Martyr, but also the subject of his biography, are firm believers in a superintending Providence. We have not the least mind to dispute Mr. Hill's most true proposition, that

> In addition to the heavier toils and cares which attend high office, its possessor is exposed, by a rule which admits no exception, to the cavils and misrepresentations of prejudice and jealousy.

But we are not specially moved when we read what follows:—

> "The honours of this world," the Emperor wrote, not long since, to a French cardinal, "are a heavy burden imposed on us by Providence, who in justice augments our duties in proportion to our dignities. Thus, I often ask myself if in prosperity our troubles are not as great as in adversity. Our guide and support is faith, religious faith and political, in other words confidence in God, and consciousness of a mission to accomplish."

We are not at all surprised to find "at every stage of the eventful career of Napoleon III. the same constant expression of trust in Providence, the same acknowledgment of the 'Sovereign Commander of all the world,' who decrees the issue of battles, the establishment or downfall of dynasties." We see nothing that proves anything either way in the fact that Louis Napoleon, on the eve of his departure on his Italian campaign, asked his chaplains—Monsieur Mullois no doubt among them—to pray for him, or that, on hearing of the taking of Sebastopol, he went to return thanks in Notre Dame, and assured the Archbishop, somewhat condescendingly, "Je me plais à reconnaître que, malgré l'habileté des généraux et le courage des soldats, rien ne peut réussir sans la protection de la Providence." We fully agree with Mr. Hill that "no one truly great or wise can be of the number of those who scoff at the belief in the Almighty Ruler and Disposer of events" only we do not quite see what this proves as to the rightfulness of seizing innocent persons and shipping them off to Cayenne without form of law.

Elsewhere Mr. Hill tells us, with simplicity equally charming:—

> On the whole, it will be generally admitted that France had sufficient grounds to be contented with the measure of success that crowned her efforts in the campaign of 1859. Seven years later, the Italians exulted in the complete attainment of the objects for which the war was undertaken. Of the two alternatives proposed at its commencement, "whether Austria should extend her despotism as far as to the Alps, or Italy be free to the Adriatic," the latter has finally prevailed.

All Mr. Hill's propositions here are indisputable. France had every ground to be contented with her measure of success. Who is likely to be discontented when he gets a whole day's wages for half a day's work? Italy was to be freed from the Alps to the Adriatic; it was freed for only about half the distance; but France got her two provinces all the same. So it is quite true that, seven years after 1859, Italy exulted at finding herself at last free from the Alps to the Adriatic, but we never before heard that it was the help of France which made her so. So, on a more delicate point, Mr. Hill grows rapturous over the marriage of his hero and the excellences of his bride, "the goodness and kindness, the thousand acts of charity"—including, no doubt, the bull-fights of Bayonne—"which form the chief occupation and pleasure of her life." We have given us, at full length, the speech in which his hero enlarged on the alliance which he was about to form as one not in accordance with the traditions of ancient policy. We are told that this lack of accordance constituted one of its advantages, but we are not told, either by the orator or by his biographer, how many vain attempts had already been made to form an alliance in accordance with the traditions of ancient policy. Elsewhere Mr. Hill quotes with admiration the magnanimous saying, "My friends are found not only in palaces, but also beneath roofs of thatch, and in the cottages of the poor." But he forgets that there are other houses besides palaces and cottages, that it is neither in palaces nor in cottages that we commonly look for intelligence and political wisdom, and that it is just among the important class who live neither in palaces nor in cottages that the friends of Mr. Hill's hero are not found. We are sure that Mr. Hill throughout means what he says; the beautiful simplicity with which he records the arrests of Changarnier, Cavaignac, Bedeau, and Thiers, and afterwards goes on to describe the massacres of December the 4th, evidently honestly thinking the whole thing to be all right, is quite enough. Mr. Hill is evidently in earnest, he is evidently beyond the reach of argument; only it is a pity that, being in this state, he is not amusing. Our only chance of a laugh is when he uses his paste and scissors, and gives us the Imperial speeches and proclamations at full length. He does not often get beyond his immediate subject, but he guarantees the Life of Cæsar "to be a work of extensive research, deep thought, and vigorous style." Of Mr. Hill's own research he gives us one specimen only. "While," he tells us, "on the topic of the war in the Crimea of 1854 and 1855 it is curious to recall the fact that full a thousand years before the Russians were absolute masters of the Black Sea; a nation of pirates on a large scale." For this fact he refers us to "Levesque, the historian of Russia," and gives us an extract in French.

BY-WAYS OF EUROPE.*

MR. BAYARD TAYLOR tells us, in the preface to his book, that Humboldt did not say of him that he had travelled more and seen less than any man living. Mr. Taylor adds that he could at once have disproved this, had it been worth while, by publishing a letter written to him by Humboldt, in which, we presume, the philosopher did not make the remark in question, and probably said something of a more complimentary nature. Without pausing to inquire whether this vindication would be perfectly conclusive, we willingly record our opinion that the remark, whoever its author may have been, was only as far from truth as most epigrams are. Mr. Taylor indeed admits that there was in it a certain kernel of truth. He has not the eye of a scientific observer, nor even of a genuine explorer. His first travels were made when he was a very young man, knowing, as he says, even less of the world than most very young men; and he never brought to his task any thorough training in the studies which ought to form part of a traveller's outfit. Neither has he ever been a pioneer of travel. His wanderings have at their furthest led him into those regions which are on the borderland between the commonplace routes sacred to the tourist and the more interesting regions which require a readiness for perilous adventure. He is not to be reckoned amongst the Livingstones, any more than amongst the Humboldts. But in his own sphere he can look upon things with something of an artist's eye, and can bring back very pleasant accounts of his wanderings. He is thus well adapted for a duty which, if not very important, we are glad to see satisfactorily discharged. We are beginning to shrink from those beaten paths along which the sheeplike flock of tourists follow each other with undeviating accuracy. In picture-galleries and palaces we are haunted by the inevitable sight-seers; the Pyramids are not much fresher than the Thames Tunnel; we reap no more praise from visiting Jerusalem than from visiting Chamouni; ascents of the Alps are scarcely more exciting to our sense of novelty than ascents of Primrose Hill. Yet it is a fact which is worth remembering that the tourist herd has one fortunate weakness. The whole continent of Europe is covered with a network of beaten tracks, but the network is not so close but that within the meshes there lie many oases almost as sacred from the invasion of travellers as they were a hundred years ago. Switzerland is perhaps the most thoroughly hackneyed ground for a summer tour; yet even in Switzerland one only needs to diverge a little to the right or left in order to discover villages as primitive in manners and aspect as though Murray's Handbooks were a dream, and the great Cook had never organized an annual incursion of barbarians. There is a legend, which recurs under different forms in many places, of a traveller who crosses some out-of-the-way pass and discovers hidden away in a fold of the mountains some ancient city, preserving for centuries the manners of an extinct civilization. In the Mexican forests, if we remember rightly, there is said to be an ancient Aztec town where the inhabitants keep their cocks below ground for fear that their crowing should reveal its existence to some of the strangers who exterminated the rest of their race. An ancient pagan city was said, until Ordnance maps became common, to survive in some happy valley under the shadows of Monte Rosa. And though we have succeeded in dispelling these pleasant visions, there are yet many nooks and corners of Europe in which the inquisitive traveller may discover fresh remains of old-fashioned forms of life. The by-ways of Europe, as Mr. Taylor calls them, lead into many such pleasant spots; and these volumes may supply some useful hints to those who desire to make a variation on the old-established tour. It is indeed melancholy that a man cannot write about such places without doing something to precipitate their decay. Doubtless a few American travellers will take Mr. Bayard Taylor's hint; the first dribble of adventurous tourists will be succeeded by a more steady stream; and before long some of these little backwaters will be swept away in the general flow of the current. Whilst they still survive we may take a glance at one or two of them under Mr. Taylor's guidance.

The little republic of Andorra almost realizes the legend to which we have referred. It lies high up amongst the Pyrenees, accessible only by a narrow and rarely-frequented gorge on the Spanish side, and having little communication even with France. The history of the valley ends in the year 1278. At that time the one controversy which raged about it came to an end, a compromise being made between the Counts of Foix and the Bishops of Urgel, who claimed certain privileges in regard to it. The Andorrans still pay a tribute, according to the terms of that arrangement. The French Government, as representative of the Counts of Foix, receives annually 1,920 francs, and the Bishop of Urgel 842 francs; however, as the French tribute is the largest, the people voluntarily add, for the benefit of the Bishop, a Christmas offering of the twelve best hams, the twelve richest cheeses, and the twelve fattest capons to be found in the valley. The Powers to which the tribute is paid appoint certain officials, but in practice the valley is self-governing. The Council of the Republic consists of twenty-four officials, each of the six communes electing two consuls and two councillors, who hold office for four years. The Council holds five sessions annually at Andorra. Each parish owns two double-beds in the upper story of the Government House, and in each bed sleep two consuls or two councillors. They have a kitchen with an enormous pot, in which their meals are cooked, and a dining-room in which they are served. The other forms of the constitution of the little valley are of an equally primitive nature. A huge chest built into the wall contains the archives of the republic. Each consul keeps one key, and it can only be opened when all six are present. In it are believed to repose the original charters of Charlemagne and Louis le Débonnaire; for, if the legend be true, the independence of the valley dates from the time when Franks and Saracens met in the passes of the Pyrenees; in the same chest are the annals and digest of laws composed by one Fiter, the only scholar whom the valley ever produced. The people, however, trouble themselves little about laws or history; only one man in a hundred and one woman in five hundred can read and write. If this be accurate, the whole number of persons thus qualified must be considerably under 50, as the entire population amounts only to 8,000. The people are poor, though comfortable; and their one great object has hitherto been to preserve their poverty. They have a notion—probably well-founded—that if they once began to grow rich and develop the mineral resources of their mountains they would speedily suffer intrusions from without. A man asked Mr Taylor, showing him a mineral, "Do you know what that is? Certainly, I answered, it is the ore of lead. Where did you get it? He put it in his pocket, looked up at the sky, and said, What fine weather we have" This character of reserve has become so common that to "play the Andorran" is a cant expression for affecting ignorance. A theological student, for example, translated the words "Jesus autem tacebat," by "Jesus played the Andorran." Thanks to their reserve and prudence, the people have maintained a quiet independence, which even Napoleon respected. It is curious, says Mr. Taylor, that the population has always remained stationary, which is apparently due to the fact that marriages are under very strict restraint. It is also remarkable that, in spite of the complicated family connexions in this secluded valley, which cause them to be constantly applying for dispensations to marry within the prohibited degrees, the race appears to be physically vigorous. It is melancholy to add that the charmed repose which has lasted through so many centuries is in some danger. There has arisen a party of Young Andorra, having a certain taint of revolutionary ideas. They have urged a step which may be fatal to the stability of the Republic. The gaming-tables of Europe having been driven out elsewhere, the proprietors have cast their eyes upon poor little Andorra. They have obtained leave from the Council to make a carriage-road into the valley, and to build a monster hotel, with the regular appliances. If the plan is carried out, the charm of Andorra will speedily be gone, and we recommend all travellers who would like to see so curious a relic of the middle ages, to pay it a visit before the threatened invasion has had time to affect its character.

Without going so far, we may find districts of equal antiquarian interest. Of the thousands of travellers who visit Switzerland, very few remember that anything is to be seen there except glaciers, or anything to be studied except the manners and customs of hotel-keepers and tourists. The working of political institutions is entirely beyond their sphere. Otherwise they might find time for a passing glance at democracies of the ancient type, such as survive in no other part of the world. Mr. Taylor was present at the annual meeting of the Landesgemeinde of Appenzell. The whole male population of the little canton is bound to put on its black hats, to tie up swords with its umbrellas, and to gather on the green slope of a hill at the little village of Hundwyl. The right of discussion, which is still retained by the primary assemblies of Glarus and Unterwalden, has been abolished in Appenzell, but the officers are elected, and laws are proposed and voted, by the whole assembly. Office, we may observe, is so little coveted by this primitive people, that a person is frequently elected, like a London sheriff, in spite of himself, and can only escape by leaving the country for a time, and threatening not to come back unless he is released from his post. This step had already been taken by two members of the Council on the occasion of Mr. Taylor's visit, and three more had appealed to the people for non-election. We may add that the people had the good sense to grant their request. The description of the gathering in the free air in sight of the snowy Alps, and the voting of some thousands in obedience to the stentorian proclamation of a Weibel, or apparitor, is strikingly picturesque. The assembly continued for three hours, and voted no fewer than two hundred and seven times before they had completed their business. They elected their governors, judges, and other officers, and then, after a prayer from the pastor of the village, the Landamman solemnly took the oath of office, every man in the crowd repeating each clause after him in a low murmur. To see such a sight should be at least as interesting as to make the ascent of the Rigi for the ten thousandth time in the course of the year.

We need not accompany Mr. Taylor any further. He describes visits to Lake Ladoga, to Nijni Novgorod, to Majorca and Minorca, to Montserrat, to the Grande Chartreuse, and to the Teutoburger Wald, and to various other places of more or less interest. He also describes an intended visit to Garibaldi; and he got as far as the island of Maddalena, whence he could see Caprera and make out the house of the distinguished exile. In spite, however, of excellent introductions, Garibaldi simply sent back to say that he could not see him, per motivo de' miei incomodi. Poor Mr. Taylor had to return as wise as he came, and could only comfort himself by the reflection that a German professor who had travelled for the same purpose from his native country suffered an equally decided repulse. We will not venture to impeach the wisdom of this decision; but content ourselves with saying that, for our part, we shall always be glad to meet so intelligent a traveller, and to listen to his agreeable narratives of expeditions which deserve to be more widely imitated.

CUST'S ADMIRALS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.*

THE contributions of Sir Edward Cust to military and naval history are contained in portable volumes suitable for reading at odd moments of busy life. The latest of his publications is a series of lives of "Warriors of the Seventeenth Century," which seems to have no destined end except that which curtails all human work. It is of course open to any one who is tired of these compilations to cease reading them, but we have found in the volumes now before us much interesting information, particularly as to the exploits of naval warriors. Every Englishman would desire to know something beyond the names of those famous Dutchmen against whom his forefathers contended so hard for mastery at sea.

The Dutch Admiral De Ruyter did not belong, as his name would appear to signify, to an aristocratic house, or, if he did, it was a house which had fallen into decay. He was what was called, in our own naval service, a tarpaulin admiral; for he was first employed in a rope-walk at Flushing, then he became a cabin-boy, and after eight voyages he rose to the position of captain of a merchant vessel. With the exception of about two years of service in the national fleet, he continued a merchant captain until he was forty-five years old; and he had grown weary of sea-service, and resolved to quit it, when war broke out in 1652 between the English and Dutch, and opened to him a glorious career. In almost all the fierce battles which were fought between our own and the Dutch navies in the next twenty years, De Ruyter bore a leading part. His principal opponents were Blake, under the Commonwealth; and Monk, Prince Rupert, and the Duke of York, under the Monarchy. He encountered a superior English fleet off Plymouth, in 1652, and compelled it to seek shelter in port, leaving untouched De Ruyter's convoy, which it had endeavoured to intercept. This success he gained in Blake's absence. Next year the elder Tromp, who had been in disfavour, was restored to the command of the Dutch fleet, and De Ruyter served under him, while Blake had resumed the post which was rightly his. Although the Dutch ships were smaller than the English, they did not scruple to engage us on our own coast. In these years the sound of Tromp's and De Ruyter's guns was well known at Lowestoft and Ramsgate. It is difficult to select any distinctive features of these battles. They often lasted from sunrise to sunset on two or three successive days, and they most frequently ended by the crippled combatants seeking each the shelter of his own ports. The poets and historians of both countries may dwell on these naval wars with almost equal satisfaction, but it is undeniable that the Dutch began the contest with pretensions which they were unable to maintain. No Dutch admiral after Tromp carried a broom at his masthead in the Channel, and although the balance of naval power remained pretty equal during De Ruyter's life, it has turned in all after-time against his country. The destiny of the two nations was foretold by Dryden when he wrote:—

> Thus, mighty in her ships, stood Carthage long,
> And swept the riches of the world from far;
> Yet stooped to Rome, less wealthy, but more strong;
> And this may prove our second Punic war.

The elder Tromp was killed in the last battle of the war with England which ended in 1653. His successor, Opdam, was killed in the first battle of the war with England which began in 1665. Thus De Ruyter found the way open for him to supreme command, and next year he appeared on the English coast with a fleet of 100 ships. The English fleet of nearly equal strength was commanded by Prince Rupert and Monk, now Duke of Albemarle. The French had joined the Dutch against England, and Prince Rupert was detached to oppose their squadron, which was expected in the Channel. Thus De Ruyter had the opportunity of attacking Monk with a superior force. Monk sustained his attack through three long summer days, and on the evening of the third day he was rejoined by Prince Rupert, and relieved from imminent defeat. A fourth day of battle followed between nearly equal forces, and still neither side could claim a victory. But, if the English were superior in nothing else, they had in

* Lives of the Warriors who have Commanded Fleets and Armies before the Enemy. Warriors of the Seventeenth Century. By General the Hon. Sir Edward Cust, D.C.L., Author of "Annals of the Wars." Vol. III. Parts 1 and 2. London: John Murray. 1869.

Dryden a panegyrist to whom the Dutch could produce no rival. The fleets parted on the evening of the fourth day, and when they met again, after refitting, De Ruyter, not being supported as he should have been by his officers, was compelled to retreat, and narrowly escaped capture. The English fleet insulted and ravaged the Dutch coast, while the Dutch fleet, dispirited and divided by factions, kept close within its harbours. Dryden, as may be expected, makes the most of this occasion:—

> Oh, famous leader of the Belgian fleet!
> Thy monument, inscribed, such praise shall wear
> As Varro, timely flying, once did meet,
> Because he did not of his Rome despair.

It would have been a pity if De Ruyter had despaired, for next year he sailed into the Medway, took Sheerness, and burned the men-of-war on the stocks at Chatham. The chain which had been stretched across the Medway was carried away by the Dutch, and long preserved as a trophy of the boldest of De Ruyter's operations. Peace soon followed, but within three or four years Holland was again at war with both England and France. The combination of these two monarchies brought the Republic into extreme peril, and all De Ruyter's skill and bravery were needed to counterbalance the power of the allied navies. Disregarding his inferiority of numbers, he did not hesitate to put to sea, and he almost surprised the combined fleet at its anchorage in Solebay, near Southwold. It was thought that the French showed some disposition to look on while the English and Dutch destroyed each other, but, although their slackness might account for the indecisive result of the battle of Solebay, both French and English did their utmost in other battles without conquering De Ruyter. They attacked him next year on his own coast, with the view of forcing him from it and landing troops to overthrow the Government. But after a hard day's fighting the Dutch fleet anchored on its own ground, and the French and English sailed away discomfited. This was a substantial victory gained with a far inferior force. It is not wonderful that when the Republic emerged from this deadly peril her admiral-general De Ruyter was reputed to be the first naval officer in the world. After peace had been made with England King Charles II. invited De Ruyter to his Court, but he pleaded age and want of rest as excuses, and declined the honour. He was soon called to hoist his flag once more in command of a squadron which the Dutch sent into the Mediterranean to assist the Spaniards, and here he received a mortal wound in battle with the French Admiral Du Quesne. Thus, like his predecessors in command, Tromp and Opdam, he died in arms. He was a man of simple and modest nature, and of sobriety and piety of life. He had been sixty years at sea, had served in five distinct wars, in more than forty engagements, and in fifteen pitched battles.

The elder Tromp, to whom De Ruyter succeeded in chief command, was born at the Brill in 1597. His father was captain of a ship, and was killed in action with an English privateer. Tromp, then a boy of eleven, was by his father's side when he fell. This was the sort of training which made these Dutchmen what they were. In 1652, when disputes had arisen between the Dutch and English Commonwealths, Tromp came with a fleet and anchored in Dover Roads. Blake came with a fleet to meet him; a dispute arose about striking flags, and an action was fought before war had been proclaimed. A few months later Tromp defeated Blake on the English coast, and hoisted the offensive signal of the broom at his masthead to proclaim his victory. In two following battles, however, Blake defeated Tromp so effectually as to drive him into port. While the English fleet lay off the Dutch coast Blake went home sick, leaving the command to Monk. Tromp, having repaired damages, came out of harbour and engaged Monk in a series of obstinate battles, in the course of which the Dutch admiral was killed. He was called "the father of the sailors," and he is said to have invented modern naval tactics, and taught them to the English in the battles which he fought against them. His successor in command, De Ruyter, and all the other Dutch admirals of that illustrious age, may be considered as Tromp's pupils. His own son began his education early, for the father never went on shipboard, after the boy could walk, that he did not take him out to sea. The younger Tromp's career was interrupted for some years by the political and professional jealousy of De Ruyter. Yet his experience of weather and of war was almost equal to his father's, and he saw something which his rival did not see, for he accepted an invitation from King Charles II., and visited London, where crowds collected to see and welcome their famous enemy. The younger Tromp lived to witness all possible combinations of the three chief naval Powers of his age. In one war France and Holland were against England. In another, Holland was against France and England. In the last war in which Tromp shared, Holland and England were against France. He was appointed by King William III. to chief command of the Dutch fleet which was to co-operate with the English fleet, under Admiral Russel, against the French Admiral De Tourville. He died in 1691, before he had an opportunity for any exploit; and, having left no children, this renowned family of seamen became extinct. The fierce conflicts of the English and Dutch navies were succeeded by a long partnership of hostility to France. In the wars of the eighteenth century Holland was for the most part either allied with England or neutral; but when a new republicanism had spread from France to Holland, the Dutch and English fleets once more combated with the old obstinacy off Camperdown, though with a substantial result of victory to the stronger Power. The smaller States of Europe are almost removed, by the course of modern politics, from the possibility of attaining military or naval honour, and it must suffice for Holland to cherish the memory of an age when the flag of Tromp and De Ruyter maintained itself against every enemy. It is difficult for us to imagine the feelings of a period when there lay in the Texel, only 230 miles from London, hostile fleets ever [illegible] spectators were held sometimes off Yarmouth or Lowestoft, and at other times opposite Beverwyk or Scheveningen.

In contrast to these rude seamen of the Dutch Republic, it is to be remarked that the great admiral of the English Commonwealth was a Master of Arts of Oxford, and did not go to sea until he was fifty-one years old. The naval services of Robert Blake were all comprised in the next eight years, but within this short period he, in Cromwell's words, "made the name of Englishman as great as was ever that of Roman." He seems to have been the founder of the modern English navy, although probably he invented much less than he borrowed from the Dutch. If we compare the accounts of Blake's sea-fights with those of Drake, we shall see that we have passed the line which divides ancient from contemporary history. The marvellous skill of the Dutch admirals in seamanship was to be acquired only by lifelong devotion to the sea. Blake and Monk, who had led troops in the field and defended towns, had sense to perceive the value of a quality which they did not themselves possess, and thus the British navy ultimately equalled, if it did not surpass, the Dutch in seamanship. No reader of cruises and battles of the eighteenth century can fail to admire that faculty by which Rodney, Hood, and Nelson almost compelled the elements to serve their purposes. But in the seventeenth century our soldier-admirals had much to learn from the tarpaulins who commanded the Dutch fleets. The two greatest of these soldier-admirals, Blake and Monk, both belonged by birth to the West of England, and the family of Blake still survives at Taunton, the town which he held so stoutly for what he deemed the cause of liberty. He strove according to his best judgment to serve, not party, but his country, and when Cromwell usurped the government he advised the fleet to submit to his authority; for, said he, "it is not the business of a seaman to mind State affairs, but to hinder foreigners from fooling us."

The French justly claim a considerable share in any gallery of portraits of naval warriors of the latter half of the seventeenth century. It is not a surprising effort of French vanity to assert that their Admiral Du Quesne defeated De Ruyter off Sicily, and it is true that a shot from Du Quesne's fleet killed De Ruyter. Another French admiral, Tourville, defeated the Anglo-Dutch fleet off Beachy Head in 1690, and remained master of the Channel. Two years afterwards Tourville, contrary to his own judgment, engaged an Anglo-Dutch fleet of greatly superior numbers at Cape La Hogue, and suffered a severe defeat. With a happier arrangement of relative forces he encountered an Anglo-Dutch fleet off the coast of Spain, and captured or destroyed a large part of the rich Smyrna trading fleet which it had under convoy. The lowest estimate of the loss thus inflicted on the trade of the allies places it at one million sterling. Tourville, on this occasion, performed that manœuvre which Napoleon vainly strove to teach his admirals; for he united the Brest and Toulon fleets of France off the coast of Spain while the main fleet of the allies was expecting him elsewhere, and thus he had a great superiority of force at the point of decisive action. Tourville combined aristocratic birth with good naval education, having begun to serve against the Turks in the Mediterranean at eighteen years of age. He was assisted in many of his operations against England and Holland by the privateer Jean Bart, who was beyond comparison the first French seaman of his age. Indeed no seaman of any age has surpassed the skill with which Bart slipped in and out of Dunkirk in spite of blockading squadrons.

The naval service of the seventeenth century does not seem to have favoured length of life. De Ruyter had nearly attained seventy years when he received his death-wound. The elder Tromp was killed. Blake died at sea at the age of fifty-nine years. Monk and the younger Tromp did not much exceed the age of threescore years, and Tourville and Jean Bart fell short of it. When De Ruyter sailed up the Medway, Monk endeavoured to put Upnor Castle in some state of defence, and stood threatening mutinous sailors with his cane while the Dutch shot fell thick around him. He answered an officer who remonstrated with him for this exposure, "If I had been afraid of balls I should have quitted the trade of soldier long ago." The king-making Duke of Albemarle —per quem stant ipsi reges, as the inscription on his coffin says—had qualities which made him acceptable to the Court, to the seamen, and to the London mob. His success in politics was largely due to his eminent gift of silence. His influence over multitudes of men was gained by unflinching courage. When five thousand mutinous sailors assembled at Whitehall, Cromwell and Monk rode alone to meet them, and Monk did not scruple to draw his solitary sword upon the ringleaders. After the great fire of London the people said, "If our old George had been here the city would not have been burnt." In many obstinate battles with the Dutch he provoked the fate which Dryden has represented him as desiring:—

> Yet, like an English general will I die,
> And all the Ocean make my spacious grave:
> Women and cowards on the land may lie,
> The sea's a tomb that's proper for the brave.

But Monk died in his house where Albemarle Street now stands, and he was buried in Westminster Abbey, a king-maker among kings.

PAUL WYNTER'S SACRIFICE.*

UNFORTUNATELY for Paul Wynter's Sacrifice, a single personage, even when the leading one, no more makes a good novel than a solitary swallow makes a summer. Paul Wynter, we freely confess, is excellent; a lofty conception consistently worked out. The whole tenor of his life is in keeping with the sustained effort of self-sacrifice that makes it pain and weariness to him. The sufferings he submits to are sublime without being sensational in the popular sense of the word. They spring naturally from ordinary events, and the supporting them merely turns on the extraordinary powers of endurance that strengthen with use, and the grace that learns to exercise them. Paul Wynter has a strong will in a frail body, and so much of the milk of human kindness that all his troubles cannot turn it sour. His temper is not so angelic as to raise him above our admiration as a lusus naturæ, and deprive him of all credit in acting like a saint where a sinner would be driven to bitterness and blasphemy. His nature is chastened by sorrow, and his passions are purified with tribulation; he murmurs, but resigns himself, and, resigning himself, his murmurs become fainter and fainter. The more he bears, the more he has to bear, and the better he bears it; while his occasional outbreaks remind the reader that it is a mortal of like passions with himself that is being martyred. He has the keen, sensitive nature that, encased in such a deformed frame, and with a mysterious sorrow darkening the soul, would have sent a man in old times to a convent, or to a cave, to lead the life of a beneficent hermit. But in our days misanthropy is only within the reach of the rich, and Paul Wynter is poor. Besides, it is contact with his kind that is to give the sting to his sorrows, and we see what he cannot—otherwise his character would lose its charm—that after a probation of three volumes he is to be richly recompensed, and himself partake of the happiness he had been tempted to envy. We read his horoscope in the earliest pages of the book, and respect the hunchbacked wayfarer as the future head of a great English household, and the idol of a beautiful wife. Although in the concluding scene we are nearly thrown out, and fear for an instant that the author has been trifling with our feelings and means after all to make the hero a sacrifice to the very last, yet until then we have never doubted that it is the destiny of the adventurer to make, like Quentin Durward, his fortune by marriage. He arrives one evening in the little inn on the Splugen just before Mr. Brookland, a rich English proprietor, travelling with his only daughter and heiress. An excited postilion, over zealous for his trinkgeld, takes a too sharp turn into the yard, upsets the carriage, and lands its occupants literally on the inn threshold. Thus the introductory incident approaches as nearly to the romantic as modern travelling advantages will admit. A tragic upset on any of the precipices they had passed, at any of the awkward turns of the ascent, could only have been appropriate at the close of a tale: in the Swiss Alps there is no chance of falling among thieves who offer you violence; and a rescue from the beggars that haunt each high place, lying in wait for slow-mounting carriages, although it might have merited the gratitude of the travellers, would have fallen beneath the dignity of fiction. A sprained ankle and some scratches on the face satisfy the requirements of the story. A few days of delay in the dullest of hostelries place the Brooklands naturally enough on familiar terms with some of the other personages of the book, give the sweet poison of presumptuous love time to circulate through Wynter's veins, and let the seeds of gratitude take root in Margaret's bosom. The father is agitated at the sight of the drops of blood he sees trickle down his daughter's face, and gives Wynter the opportunity of reassuring him "with a tender smile" and in "a voice that was low and sweet." Wynter tends the couch of his fair patient like a ministering angel, and when she rises from it and drives on convalescent, she leaves her physician far more seriously wounded. "She seemed to have taken possession of his whole soul, and merged all his faculties into one living thought of her."

Considering the widely different spheres in which their lots are cast—his deformity, his impecuniosity, his consciousness of the existence of a humiliating secret, and that Mr. Brookland, rich, dignified, and aristocratic, is inclined to ignore all relationship between them save that of doctor and patient—it will be seen that Paul Wynter has cause for anxiety enough. However, while the impression Margaret has left on him only grows and deepens with time, he endeavours to distract himself from the hopeless vision by hard toil in his profession and works of active benevolence as well. When we meet him again, he is struggling to get together a small practice in one of the most wretched quarters of London. He makes himself beloved in spite of his seeming eccentricities; and keeps his friends by sheer admiration of his life and character, for they are often insulted and nearly alienated by seemingly capricious and ungrateful conduct which is dictated by reasons he declines to explain. He goes to Brooklands, where Mr. Brookland plays the courteous host, and his daughter seems inclined to warm into something more than the cordial hostess. As may be imagined, the load of shame under which Paul labours is not his own, and the object of his reverential adoration wounds him sorely by discussing as abstract questions hypothetical cases closely resembling his own, and assuming as a matter of course that even vicarious shame like that must stain its victim ineffaceably. An enemy warns Mr. Brookland that his guest is bearing a feigned name. Wynter is forced into an explanation, which shows that he has been sacrificing himself for others, and that instead of being culpable he is a miracle of noble self-denial. That a man of Mr. Brookland's general character should be represented as so pitilessly unjust as he is, under the circumstances, seems to us unnatural, even if we admit in extenuation that he thought his daughter inclined to be too pitiful. It is an improbable and ugly colouring given to the scene to add another pang to the unhappy hero's lot; for no gentleman of kindly disposition would be inclined to heap injuries on a man who was crushed down, and who half an hour before had been his welcome guest—who had done nothing since to forfeit his respect, but told of much to deserve it, and who was cut to the soul by the disclosure of his painful secret. It may all help to glorify Paul Wynter, but, as we said, while his character is a real and a touching one, the others are all more or less weak and forced.

Perhaps Margaret Brookland is as good as any of them—as, indeed, as heroine, she ought to be—but she is no way worthy of her lover, who is immeasurably her superior in all but looks. For an indulged child, an heiress and a beauty, she is condemned to a very lonely life. We question much, had she not lived in a country place, with no attractive neighbours, whether Wynter would ever have come to such preferment as the possession of her hand. Her maiden meditations in her solitary hours chance to turn towards the Splugen, more for want of other objects than anything else. She bases her fancy for Wynter on old remembrances, which had certainly at the time no tinge of affection, and she is more than half in love before she has an idea of her lover's merits. The author presents her as a model English girl, very high-bred, if something high-spirited; but we must say she has some strange ways of her own, which it takes all her high breeding to carry off. There was a sans façon about the reception of visitors in the mansion of Brooklands, which, according to his temperament, may have either taken a stranger aback at his first visit, or put him at his ease. When Wynter and Claude Nutford arrive there, Margaret ushers them herself upstairs, throws open the doors of their rooms, and hopes they like their quarters. We can picture the well-drilled footmen exchanging respectful winks. Then, when her father is struck down by paralysis in London, although the room is filled with people who crowd in, it occurs to her to run for medical assistance herself. No one interferes to prevent or follow her when she breaks wildly into the street, she tears down the pavement, and—most marvellous of coincidences—her instincts and happy fortunes carry her straight into the arms of Wynter, who is just then turning that corner of all corners in the world. Of course his skill brings his patient back from the gates of death, and rivets a second claim on the gratitude of Mr. Brookland and his daughter. What the family of the Nutfords are introduced for at all we know not, unless, indeed, it be to draw out the story to its due length. All their appearances are simply excrescences on the plot, and in following them you go by paths which, although they are pleasant enough, and seem to run generally parallel to the main one, in reality lead nowhere, and only give you the trouble of retracing your steps. Old Mr. Nutford is a worthy and wealthy Cornwall farmer, whose pride in his pet daughter Lucy has led him to "make a lady of her," and whose manners, in their more than roughness, are so antagonistic to the refinement of hers as to make her filial affection and respect really creditable to her. His wife is a serious Mrs. Poyser, much diluted, who is always laying herself out to improve occasions in season and out of season. His son Claude is a genius, much given to dissipation, with his father's vulgarity lacquered over, and without his father's worth. It is a pity he died so young, for English art could ill spare talent like his. If, at his early years, exertion so slight led him to success so brilliant—for his dissipated habits and companionships must have effectually stood in the way of sustained application—what would he have become had he been spared to reform? Mr. Brookland must have condoned the freedom of his manners on the score of his splendid promise, otherwise even his good nature would never have pressed so forward a guest to repeat his visit. As for Mr. Brookland himself, he is still a puzzle to us. He is represented as a man of the world and of great cultivation. Yet Joel Craig, the Mephistopheles of the story, twists him round his finger as he pleases, and catches his spare capital with the coarsest baits. From Mr. Craig's Christian name, general tone, and supposed acuteness, we cannot help suspecting that the author introduced him originally as a Yankee, and changed his nationality later, when the exigencies of the story seemed to advise it. As an American—to whom in English novels at least a certain license is allowed—we can conceive his making good his footing at Brooklands. As one of her own countrymen, we should say the young hostess would have been, not merely surprised as she was, but absolutely disgusted, by the impertinent vulgarity of compliment that marked so utter an ignorance of the usages of decent society. We should have imagined that, in spite of some common tastes, Mr. Brookland would have been repelled at once and irresistibly by the manners of his new acquaintance. The cloven foot peeps out everywhere; and, as an instance of his vulgar self-assertion, take the statement made gravely by this clever adventurer at the dinner-table, and swallowed in all solemn faith by the host. Mr. Craig asserted that it was he who had made our late Premier what he was, by consistently writing him up; Mr. Craig, independently of anything else, being, we should say, the junior of Mr. Disraeli by some five-and-thirty years at least. "Tell me how I can serve you, Craig," said Mr. Disraeli to him in a burst of uncontrollable gratitude, in the lobby of the House; "it must be a wide ditch I would not jump to serve such a friend as you." Mrs. Hardy's table-talk on living political characters is perhaps not the less funny that it is so true to nature in the dull triteness of its commonplace. Mr. Craig got his friend the Premier—at least we presume it was Mr. Disraeli, not Mr. Gladstone—to accept the chairmanship in a Company he was promoting; at any rate he performed nearly as great a feat—that of persuading the sensible Mr. Brookland that he had done so. The moral of the story of the Company is ne sutor ultra crepidam, and it illustrates the risk a lady runs who ventures into the unfamiliar regions of the City. Fancy a shrewd scoundrel broaching a plan for making gas of beef bones and boot soles. Imagine his daring to forge a list of directors selected from well-known public men, taking the Premier for his chairman, and fixing the locality of his fictitious offices in a non-existent number of a place so well known and so easily verified as Victoria Street, Westminster; conceive his doing this with a view to bleeding Mr. Brookland's purse, while all the time he has serious designs upon his daughter's hand, and you have an idea of the fidelity to nature of this part of the plot. Nor is the dénouement much less extravagant, when the smothered passion of the lovers is fanned into a flame just as the flood of water let in by the bursting of a reservoir over the tunnel through which they chance to be passing threatens to quench it for ever. When they have tasted the bitterness of death, and the lady has admitted enough to encourage her retiring lover, the waters subside, and, coming out of the tunnel little the worse for the fright, they marry, and live happy ever after. As we said, Paul Wynter himself is well, if boldly, drawn; but as for many of his fellow-characters, except by a series of marvellous coincidences, nothing in real life could be so odd or improbable as the combination of these creatures of fiction.

ART-RAMBLES IN SHETLAND.*

WITHIN the range of the British group of islands wellnigh every phase of nature may be said to offer itself to the artist, or to the student of the physical aspects of earth, air, and water. Admirers of the beautiful in natural scenery need not confine their interest to a single type, while they have within the circuit of their own country so rich and varied a display of what is most wild and grand in nature's moods as is afforded them in the northernmost of our isles. It is strange that our artists should have been so slow to recognise the wealth and novelty of material that here lies open to their craft. There are happily those for whom the stern and rugged in nature has attractions no less than the placid and the sweet, and we are glad to find that a sympathy of this stirring kind has impelled so keen and indefatigable a student of nature as Mr. J. T. Reid to go so far afield as the comparatively bleak and desolate Shetlands. Without pretending to supply either a formal guide-book for those little-known regions, or an exhaustive account of the islands, their people and their ways, or even a panoramic portraiture of every point of interest that they present, he may fairly claim the credit of having brought together, within the moderate compass of the volume now before us, the most effective features of all the three. From a chance allusion on the part of our author to the clerical tie, we venture to gather that he is not by profession an artist. Yet we see abundant proofs of artistic study and culture in his bold delineations of scenery, and his accurate reproduction of every object or phase in nature. The views with which his pages are liberally interspersed have been drawn with clearness and vigour by himself upon the wood, from sketches taken on the spot.

The literature connected with the Shetlands is but scanty. Besides the History of Dr. Edmondstone published in 1809, and the later and more elaborate work of Dr. Hibbert, described as rare, what little is popularly known of the "naked, melancholy isles of furthest Thule" is derived almost exclusively from the pages of the Pirate. Much of Dr. Johnson's experiences in the [Hebri]des might indeed be brought in to supplement what we powers come in with effect in aid of his ready pencil. His art seemingly confines itself to landscape, else we should have been glad of the opportunity of judging for ourselves how far the familiar types of Minna and Brenda are perpetuated among the existing daughters of the soil. One thing seems clear, happily for the prospects of such visitors as our author's tale of experience may attract in the same direction—namely, that the hospitality and genial ways of the Udallers of old are well represented among the landowners of the present day. If less jovial or loud of speech, the successor of Magnus Troil shows the fruits of a culture and a cosmopolitan experience at that time unknown, while the spirit of Triptolemus Yellowley would rejoice over the signs of scientific and economic husbandry which betoken the influence of what, from a hyperborean point of view, would be called the "canny South." The first aspect of these shores, however, is bleak and cold enough. Two young damsels who, in company with our author, were revisiting their birthplace on board the clipper schooner Matchless, scarcely knew Lerwick again, and thought it wondrous bare and bleak after the coast of Fife, which they had just left, with its patches of rich verdure, tree-clad hills, and thriving villages full of populous life, lit with warm glints of sunlight. Even in May the air was frosty, though clear, and sea and sky wore sober hues of grey. The houses, built Venice-like in the water, look hoar and weatherbeaten. Most of them have a door to the sea as well as to the street, and within a few yards of them a very fleet of yachts and little fishing-boats lies at anchor. A jolly little boatman, with cheeks as bright as a ripe cherry, took bodily possession of our traveller. It is a rule, we learn, for a boatman who takes you ashore to consider that he has a right to you during your stay in the place. The accommodation which this long-shoreman offered was not over inviting—namely, "one small room, with a two-storied box bed, the under compartment of which was let, and the tenant of it was just crawling out cautiously, to avoid hitting his crown on the upper story where the host said his guest was to sleep." It was further hinted that a strange bedfellow might at times turn in along with him. A sketch of this portentous piece of native furniture is given by the author further on. No wonder that he declined this somewhat sea. From thence good horses and divers quaint travelling machines can be had on hire, as well as the rough native shelties, so indispensable to the ordinary tourist over mountain pass and fell. Our traveller, for his part, was favoured with exceptional powers as a pedestrian, thinking lightly of forty or fifty miles a day across country, with a "bittock" of ten or a dozen extra miles thrown in by reason of an unlucky turning at some critical point of the route. The study of the painter's art is pursued in Shetland under difficulties. The days suitable for outdoor painting are few compared with the days of fog and rain. It became Mr. Reid's wont to select the dull and rainy days for travelling, hoping thus to secure the better use of any chance sunshine while sketching. It was in a tremendous downpour of rain that he crossed Bressay Sound to explore the bold and precipitous headland known as the "Noup of Noss," which forms the theme of two or three of his most striking illustrations. On the way he had to scamper over heath and bog and stony hill, passing Pictish burghs and monumental stones of unknown antiquity and purpose, and "lakes so old and dead-looking that they seemed but the shadows of lakes that once were." We can imagine so grim and ghostly a scene outdoing in sombre and awful majesty Mr. M'Whirter's notable "Lake Coruisk, Isle of Skye," in this year's Academy Exhibition. The coast of Noss was found literally lined with wreckwood. At the foot of the cruel black cliffs the waves broke in sullen masses, flinging their foam and spray far inland over the highest summits, blackening and withering the sod. Mr. Reid's engraving well represents the abrupt contours and hard texture of these granitic rocks, split by the frosts, if not the ancient earthquake shocks, of unnumbered years. Bolder and more dizzying still is the chasm which separates the "holm," or isle, of Noss, from the parent cliff. Across this perilous void a cradle passes, hung from stakes fixed on the top of the island rock two hundred years ago by a hardy Bressay climber, who, disdaining to return by the safe transit he had established, fell and perished in his descent. From the summit the eye roams over a wide and picturesque panorama, enlivened by untold myriads of tribes of the air, who float and wheel 'tween sky and sea like a snow shower on a wintry day. Their rude and melancholy music brings to the traveller's ears in the remote distance recollections of the Æolian harp or the hum of a busy city. Their warning cry, the safeguard of many a wanderer on the stormy deep, has often, as in the instance before us, turned back the benighted wayfarer's steps from the brink of the deadly precipice.

The west coast of Shetland, lashed by the fierce Atlantic, is much bolder and far more picturesque than the east. Hillswick, the home of Claud Halcro's "Bonnie Mary," forms the centre of this district, encircled by a galaxy of natural beauties, grotesque stacks, precipitous holms, and dark tortuous caverns. At Mavis Grind, a romantic ridge, the mainland is all but rent in twain by the action of the ceaseless surges, and a narrow band of rock divides, by no more than twenty or thirty feet, the Atlantic and the North Sea. Hillswick Ness furnishes a fine study for the pencil. Another peculiar and highly characteristic feature is seen in the Heads of Grochen, a range of massive cliffs of richly-coloured granite. Still more inviting to the artist is the singular group of the "Drongs"—curious out-stacks, rising like pillars from the sea, the relics of a lofty granite wall riven by the storms and shattered by the billows of centuries. Mr. Reid has given us this splendid subject from several points of view. The days being at their longest, there was literally no darkness, and he could prosecute his studies all the night long. He often sat till midnight painting the Drongs. His view of Rona's Hill over the Urie Frith is probably a unique instance of a sketch taken at midnight. The sun, just dipping behind the crest of the hill, cast a soft radiance over the sky. A reflected light, silvery, luminous, and mellow, gilded the glassy surface of the voe. All that we have to regret is that Mr. Reid cannot give us the varied and expressive tints which no doubt, in his original sketch, perpetuated so rare and delicious a phase of aerial beauty. A striking contrast to this soft and tranquil scene is the grim mass of the Dore Holm, detached rock, dark and forbidding in colour, well compared by the author to the skeleton of some huge antediluvian monster. Through its gigantic bulk the force of the waves has cut a magnificent arch, seventy feet in height, beneath which yachts of considerable tonnage may pass in full sail. A similar sapping of the hard rock is seen in Christie's Hole, a dark cavern to the north of Hamna Voe, where the towering cliffs are literally riddled by winding vaults and caves. In very quiet weather these weird, dark passages can be threaded by a boat cautiously gliding along, till a roomy but sunless recess opens out upon a beach frequented by numerous seals. Sumburgh Head, the scene of Cleveland's shipwreck, and Fitful Head, on the summit of which the cave of Norna the dreaded Reim-kennar is still pointed out by the shuddering natives, could not fail to find a place in our artist's portfolio. Within a few yards of the ruins of Jarlshoff has risen, we are told, within the last few years, the fine new house of Sumburgh, commanding a romantic outlook over the ever changeful roost, with a distant view of Fair Isle, which lies midway between the southern cape of Shetland and the Scottish mainland. On this rugged and barren islet the Duke of Medina and his Spanish sailors had in 1588 to endure no little privations ere intelligence of their disaster could be conveyed to Scotland, and proper supplies could be despatched. "The islanders, seeing not only their cattle, sheep, fish, and fowls devoured by the hungry strangers, but likewise their ponies, availed themselves of the darkness of night to carry their beasts, and what still remained of their provisions, to caves known to themselves alone, where the Spaniards might not disturb them." The slender annals of these out-of-the-way regions furnish Mr. Reid with many an historical allusion and pleasant anecdote. A glimpse or two into a cottage interior enables us to realize much of the home life of the simple islanders, and a few "notes," furnished by an intelligent school teacher, supplement in an interesting way what our author's lively pen and pencil so graphically set before us. For its size and scope this record of art-rambles may be classed among the most choice and highly-finished of recent publications of this sort.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

PERHAPS the most remarkable among the American books at present on our table are two small volumes by ladies belonging to that advanced school of social reformers which, not content with revolutionizing the nation, aspires to effect a revolution in the home, and thinks it of little use to efface all the distinctions of race and class unless they can also abolish the subordination of sex. From one point of view at least, the advocates of "Woman's Rights" are entitled to the commendation of a more thorough consistency, a more unflinching courage in the pursuit of their theory, than the most daring disciples of Mazzini or of Comte. For, after all, the oldest of social distinctions are not older than the dawn of history, or of that quasi-history which archæologists have recently constructed from the evidence of monuments, of poetry, and of language itself, while the subordination or "subjection of women" dates back to the very commencement of human society, and has never, even in the wildest days of anarchy, been for a moment interrupted. To overthrow the most ancient, most deep-rooted, most solid institutions of human ordinance or human growth, though by no means so easy or so safe a task as the Positive Philosophy pronounces it, is infinitely easier than to recast humanity itself, and to obliterate usages as old as mankind, if not older; for the subordination of the female sex appears to prevail among many species of animals, whose case we recommend to the care of the fair enthusiasts to whom we refer, and the fundamental difficulty with which the latest school of reformers have set themselves to grapple lies deep in the order of nature herself, and is not to be overcome without a reversal, or at least a modification, of some of the most stubborn facts of physiology. It may perhaps somewhat detract from the courage we ascribe to the ladies in question that of these physiological facts they are for the most part profoundly ignorant. Those who, in despite of craniology, physiognomy, and anatomy, to say nothing of history, believe that the negro is simply an Anglo-Saxon with a dark pigment under his skin, and find no obstacle to their theory in the fact that the negro has everywhere been enslaved with ease, while the Anglo-Saxon has everywhere fought his way to freedom and ascendency, easily contrive to believe that woman is "undeveloped man," and that her want of development is owing simply to repression, and her subordinate position in every age and country an effect simply of the brute force of the stronger sex. Such, at all events, appears to be a very popular creed among the ladies of the Northern States. Miss Penny, the author of the first of the two volumes before us *, has been compelled by her vocation to use her powers of observation with an acuteness inconsistent with absolute faith in the formulæ of her school; and some of her remarks on the difference between the mental and moral qualities of men and women are sensible, while others are plausible if not sound. Unhappily, she has not mastered some of the first conditions of intelligent writing on the subject she has chosen. A writer on Work and Wages might have taken pains to read Mr. J. S. Mill; and, having done so, would have known better than to ascribe the inferior payment of female labour to the will of the employer. She would have known that the employer has no choice in the matter; that the rate of women's wages is fixed by competition; that the number of labourers and scarcity of work forces it down to the minimum; and that that minimum is lower than in the case of men, simply because a man's wages cannot in the long run sink below the amount which will support four people, while a woman's need not be more than enough for one—because men labour for families, women generally for themselves. And we should have expected from a lady who has shown some power of intelligent observation the obvious reflection that if, as she admits, women are almost universally deficient in thoroughness of knowledge, and are not equal to men in power of hard work, the two things are probably to be traced to some original and ineradicable difference in quality of mind; in short, that women are not as capable as men of sustained mental application. Such an admission would soon lead a candid and thoughtful inquirer to conclusions fatal to all her preconceived ideas. Again, we are somewhat surprised to find an American authoress not arguing, but assuming as of course, that a large proportion of women are not to marry. In a society where there are more men than women this assumption is surely unsound; and if it be true in fact, it argues that something is out of joint. The men would marry if they could do so without heavy sacrifices; they are not too poor to sustain a family in comfort, if they are deterred from marriage it must surely be by some grievous error or unreasonable exaction on the part of the women. Despite all these and other obvious shortcomings and omissions in argument, the papers of which this volume is composed are far above the average standard of the school to which Miss Penny belongs, and some of their suggestions would have real value if applied to a community which, like our own, contains far more women than can reasonably hope to marry.

A more pretentious work is that entitled Studies in General Science *, by Antoinette Brown Blackwell. The essays of which it consists would not bear comparison with the writings of any second-rate masculine author on the same subjects, but they are likely to find a good many readers among women, and among men who have as little taste or leisure as women for severe scientific study, for they handle with boldness and confidence a class of questions which true science has failed to solve and which the masters of science have generally avoided—those, namely, which arise when physical research comes into contact with the frontier lines of metaphysics or theology. Reasonings from the indestructibility of matter and the conservation of forces to the immortality of the soul would never attract the abilities of a Faraday or a Huxley, because their masculine intellects would at once discern the impossibility of establishing the analogy which a feminine writer assumes, and on which the whole force of the argument depends. A series of similar reflections—metaphysical deductions from the later discoveries of physics—forms the staple of the volume, a volume which affords a very apt illustration of the difference between the intellectual calibre of a superior woman and that of really superior men.

The claim of Americans to a peculiar immunity from flunkeyism, as the result of republican institutions and education, is acknowledged most readily and unreservedly by those who never meet Americans, and rarely read American books or newspapers. To such credulous persons we recommend the perusal of an elaborate account † of Admiral Farragut's European visit in the flagship Franklin—a visit which had no ostensible purpose, and no visible result, and the most notable incidents of which were the courteous receptions given to the American officers in a number of European Courts. Why this large and expensive book was written and published, except to assure the Americans that one of their most distinguished seamen had visited the palaces of the Tuileries and of Tzarskoe Zelo, and had been civilly treated by Napoleon III. and Alexander II., we cannot conceive; any more than we can understand why, in a despatch announcing his visit to Portsmouth, the Admiral should have thought it necessary to observe that he had met with the greatest "kindness and courtesy." We should have supposed that even Americans would take for granted the courteous reception of their squadron and its commander by the princes and fleets of all friendly Powers.

All chess-players, and a good many people who care little for chess, will be interested and amused by Professor Allen's Life of Philidor ‡. The curious will be glad to know that the name by which the oldest of the great European masters of the game is known is not, in spite of its sound and apparent derivation, one of those Grecized or Latinized forms of real or adopted surnames which were common in a somewhat earlier period. It is said to have been bestowed by Louis XIII. on the first of the great chess-player's family who became known to the Court and the public—Michael Danican. The latter was so successful in his first musical performances before the King that Louis pronounced him to be "another Filidori," the name of a famous Italian hautboy player who had delighted the French Court a short time before. The sobriquet thus bestowed upon Danican was retained as

‡ The Life of Philidor, Musician and Chess Player. By George Allen, Greek Professor in the University of Pennsylvania. With a Supplementary Essay on Philidor, as Chess-Author and Chess-Player. By Tassilo Von Heydebrand und der Lasa, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of Prussia at the Court of Saxe-Weimar. New York and Philadelphia: Frederick Leypoldt. London: Trübner & Co.

...ly until, it attained a world-wide celebrity in the person of his great-grandson. The younger Philidor, like all his ancestors, was at first a Court musician, copyist, and composer, and learned chess in the course of his professional avocations, that game being the only recreation allowed to the Royal musicians while in attendance at the chapel where the King heard mass every morning. Philidor is reported to have distinguished himself by his proficiency in the game before he had emerged from childhood; his reputation soon brought him into notice, and led to his being matched against the best players at the Café de la Regence and other places of aristocratic resort, and later in life led to his establishment in England as a professional chess-player, assisted and salaried by a number of noblemen and gentlemen who formed themselves into a club for the encouragement of the game and the support of its greatest living master. The chess-player will find much interesting matter in the appendix, which contains an elaborate criticism of several of the most characteristic games recorded by Philidor, and especially in the discussion of his style of play and relative "force" as compared with the celebrities of more recent times. It is certain that in such mere tours de force as blindfold-playing he never reached the marvellous facility displayed by one living performer, and his ideas of the science of the game are admitted by his biographer and critic to have been less accurate and complete than those of his successors, as might be expected from the length of time during which, since his death, chess has been a subject of intense technical and even scientific study to men of equal powers with his and higher education.

Two unpretending volumes on the game and wild sports of America will have some attractions for English sportsmen. The first * is a practical treatise on the choice of guns, powder, and accoutrements, on their use and management, and on the various kinds of sport which the woods, and especially the prairies, of the States afford. The writer recommends in strong terms the use of guns made by the best English makers, and gives instructions for their selection and adaptation to the requirements of the individual sportsman; but the rest of his work is addressed almost exclusively to American readers, and to Englishmen who may be able to visit the haunts of the American wild-fowl. The latter are different from their English congeners; and their habits, the localities in which they are to be found, and the conditions of the sport, are for the most part so unlike anything with which the merely English sportsman is acquainted that the work can have only a theoretical interest for the generality of readers in this country. The other volume, entitled Adventures in the Wilderness †—which relates, however, only to wild regions in the Eastern States—is narrative in form, and, besides being more readable, conveys a livelier idea of the realities of American field sports. Both authors are enthusiastic sportsmen, and the experiences of Mr. Murray during his rough camp-life among the Adirondacks—the Highlands of New York—are told with sportsmanlike gusto, and interspersed with some of those anecdotes of more daring and perilous adventure in remoter wilds, or in older days, before the Indian had entirely disappeared from the Eastern States, with which, if American writers are to be believed, every old hunter and trapper is ready to enliven the bivouac, or beguile the tediousness of a long day's watching for the larger game.

A work of considerable scientific and practical value is Dr. Foster's account of the Mississippi Valley ‡, the fruit of years of personal experience and exploration. The geography of the interior of the North American continent presents at least as many remarkable features as any other region in the world; and nearly all are touched on, more or less carefully and elaborately, in this treatise, which, though professedly confined to the Valley of the Mississippi, really takes in all that is most noteworthy in a general survey of the whole country between that river and the Pacific. The varieties of soil and climate in that vast region are many and strikingly diverse. There are the rich alluvial "bottoms" of the valleys, formed by the deposits of the rivers, which are constantly changing their courses; there are the dense forests with their gigantic trees and rich brushwood, the pestilential swamps formed by stagnant water and decaying woods, and the "oak-openings," where the trees grow like those of an English park, shading a sward perfectly free from jungle or underwood; there are the prairies or treeless plains, sometimes "rolling" like the waves of a solidified sea, sometimes as absolutely level as the sea in a dead calm; and finally, there are the arid, barren, salt-incrusted plains of the Great Basin of Utah, cut off from all communication with the sea, like the Valley of the Jordan, and giving off by evaporation from the surface of its lakes and the dry soil of its plains as much water as rains and mountain streams can supply. The climate varies almost as strikingly as the features of the land; from the malarious, moist, tropical atmosphere of New Orleans, and a considerable part of the lower course of the great river, to the dry healthy heat of Utah, and the alternations from intense cold to intolerable heat, which characterize great part of the central country. In one part of this vast region the soil actually seems to float; and neither foundations for houses nor graves for the dead can be dug in the neighbourhood of New Orleans without coming upon what seems to be a continuous and inexhaustible body of water at a few feet below the surface. In another, the Colorado, flowing hundreds of feet below the surface of the country, leaves a desert table-land above and around it. All the chief peculiarities of these differing regions and climates are described, and their relation to the geological character and history of the continent discussed with great care and evident knowledge by the author, whose reasonings are not the less interesting that his conclusions do not always agree with those most familiarly known, if not exactly accepted, among English readers. Another work, dealing with a small fragment of the same topic, is a narrative of certain exploring expeditions in the Great Basin, with a view to ascertaining the convenience and practicability of what appeared to be the most direct route between the North-Western States and San Francisco; it contains, also, some interesting observations on questions of climate, geology, and temperature.*

The Tennesseean in Persia † is a narrative of missionary enterprise in the latter country, characterized no doubt by much earnestness and honest zeal, but deformed and rendered offensive by the worst faults of two styles, both peculiarly repellent to all who do not share the tone of thought which inspires them—that of the American patriot and that of the theological crusader. Those who do not feel, or can overcome, the distaste which most persons will feel for the extraordinary mixture of spread-eagleism and Puritan phraseology, of fine writing and professional cant, which are apparent at the very outset, may, as the preface promises them, find occasionally an interesting account or readable description in the record of Mr. Rhea's mission and its labours.

Some other theological works are on our list, of which a new translation of Swedenborg's True Christian Religion ‡, and a conspectus of the passages in the four Gospels relating to the closing scenes of the Saviour's life §, so arranged and connected as to form a continuous story, are alone deserving of special mention.

Among those valuable treatises published at the expense of the State and in the form of official documents, which constitute so considerable and peculiar a feature in the graver departments—economical, political, and scientific—of American literature, we have now to mention a Report by a Commissioner sent on behalf of the State of California to the late Exhibition at Paris, concerning the production of the precious metals in all parts of the world.‖ The mines and mining operations of the writer's own State and its neighbours are of course described in most detail and with more intimate knowledge, but his object has been to ascertain and make known as fully as possible the extent to which the diggings of California and the silver mines of Nevada find competitors abroad, and to give a complete statistical and historical account of the world's supplies of gold and silver. The latter part of the volume is occupied with an elaborate narrative and discussion of all the negotiations and debates that have taken place on the subject of an international coinage—a narrative from which we learn, with some surprise, on the unimpeachable authority of a Senatorial Committee, that the idea of a gold standard is peculiarly and originally American—England, it seems, having no concern therewith. The Report is a valuable repertory of statistics and collection of documents relating to these subjects which it might not be easy to find elsewhere, and it has therefore the merit of being, if not a readable or very instructive treatise, a most useful work of reference on important topics.

We find among this month's publications several works of fiction, one or two of which promise to be readable, if not exactly commendable. The Wife's Messengers ¶ is a story of domestic unhappiness produced by the wanton misconduct of the husband. Similar unhappiness, caused by the faults of the wife, forms only

THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.

THE Government is certainly in a humiliating position in the Lords, and is obliged to see night after night the whole management of its Bill taken out of its hands. If it ventures to divide, a steady majority of two to one immediately crushes it. The Ministry is really the Opposition in the Lords, and a very feeble Opposition it is, and the leaders of the majority can pass whatever sort of Irish Church Bill they may choose to fancy. There can be no question that the total want of harmony which this state of things shows to exist between the two Houses of Parliament threatens a great constitutional crisis before long. The danger may pass away, as dangers have so often passed away before the good sense and practical wisdom of the English governing classes; but it is hard to see how the legislation of the country can be long entrusted to two equal assemblies, actuated by quite different feelings and proceeding on quite different principles, without a collision being sooner or later the result. The Ministry which is all-powerful in the Commons is utterly powerless in the Lords, and it is entirely within the discretion of the majority of the Lords how far they will choose to carry their victory. The Ministry has had to accept every amendment which was not so flagrantly at variance with the principles of the Bill that it would be accepting an obviously false position to let it pass. It has had to consent that Irish bishops shall sit in the House of Lords, although the temporalities of their sees are gone, and the Church they represent will be disestablished. It has also had to agree that the payments to curates shall not be deducted from the incomes of incumbents unless the obligation on the incumbent to pay the curate was a legal one. It was only by the aid of the more moderate leaders of the Opposition that Lord GRANVILLE managed to defeat an extraordinary proposal that, when the income of an incumbent was less than 200*l.* a year, it should be valued as if it were 200*l.* a year. For the leading members of the Ministry in the Lords to keep their tempers and to preserve some little show of dignity is very difficult under such trying circumstances. If they say nothing, they will be taunted hereafter with objecting to amendments which, when proposed, they accepted without comment; if they say that an amendment is inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, they are immediately accused of wishing to dictate to the House. The Duke of ARGYLL appears to have laid down with some warmth that there were a whole string of amendments which the Government must declare to be contrary to the principle of the Bill, and to all of which it was therefore opposed. This provoked much angry comment, more especially as the Duke of ARGYLL always courts or provokes opposition rather than go out of the way to avoid it. But the Government must let its opinions be known, and if it thinks that the amendments which are proposed and carried against its wishes and advice are altogether inconsistent with the Bill, it is necessary that some warning of this opinion should be given.

It cannot be said, however, that in the first two nights' discussion any amendment was carried which was violently and indisputably in opposition to the principle of the Bill. There were three occasions on which the Government submitted to [illegible]table defeat on a division rather than let the amendment be adopted without a strong protest. The first occasion was when the Archbishop of CANTERBURY proposed that the new Church Body should have another year to get ready, and should come into legal existence at the beginning of 1872, and not at the beginning of 1871. It was not a point which involved any principle, and both sides professed to have nothing in view but the interests and wishes of the members of the present Established Church. On the one hand, it was said that it would be most desirable to give the Church ample time to make arrangements for the commutation of life incomes, and to ascertain the probable amount of its future revenues. On the other side, it was said that the Irish Church would lose by being kept for another year in hot water, and by being deprived of the commutation value of the life interests that happened to drop during the additional year. So little was the date a question between the Government and the Opposition, that the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH expressed his preference for the former proposal. The next occasion when the Government took a division had reference to an amendment advocated by the Bishops of PETERBOROUGH and DERRY, by which a yearly sum of 18,000*l.*, having a capitalized value of 200,000*l.*, was assigned to the Church body. The Government resisted this on the ground that it was giving something to the Church Body beyond the value of existing life interests. The Opposition supported it on the ground that this payment was a very special one, and was a payment out of the income of incumbents, in return for which they received sums for the maintenance of the fabrics of churches, and for the due performance of Divine service. The balance of argument was, we think, in favour of the Government; but we confess that the argument the other way deserved some attention. We do not see any real difference between the payment of this tax by incumbents and the payment of curates by incumbents who are under a legal obligation to do so. The law obliges the incumbent to pay the tax and to keep the curate, and the incumbent is benefited in return by having his church warmed and his surplice washed, just as he is benefited by having a curate to replace or help him. But it cannot be said that the carrying of the amendment will show any flagrant departure from the principles of the Bill, because it was expressly defended on the ground that it stood apart from all other taxes, and was in the nature of a purchase by the incumbent of certain ecclesiastical advantages. The incumbents were not, according to the amendment, to derive any personal advantage from its being carried. The value of their annuities was not to be increased, but a sum representing the capitalized amount of the yearly payment was to be placed at the disposal of the Church Body. That the proposal necessarily took this shape was probably enough to condemn it. If the Church Body is to have a sum in hand to start with for warming churches and washing surplices, its friends will have entered on the great area of re-endowment, where it is so very difficult to stop.

But although the amendment may be one that can scarcely be defended, it cannot be said that its adoption shows any irreconcilable hostility to the Ministry and the Bill. Much more serious was the adoption of Lord CARNARVON's amendment, for even on the showing of Lord CAIRNS it involved giving the Church Body a bonus beyond the value of existing life interests. How large this bonus would be is of course a matter of controversy. Lord CAIRNS took it at one year's value of the incomes of incumbents, and Lord KIMBERLEY at two years' value of these incomes. But in either case there is an admitted bonus. Lord CARNARVON and Lord CAIRNS both advocate the arrangement on the ground that it has merely done by the Church what in the case of Maynooth was done by the Roman Catholics. What Lord CARNARVON proposed was that commutation should be compulsory, that the State should have no relations with individuals, but should hand over to the Church Body fourteen times the value of the annual incomes of the holders of life interests. This, he said, was exactly what the Government proposed to do as regards Maynooth. The answer of the Government is that Maynooth is a place of education, and that a place of education ought to be dealt with liberally. But we confess the argument does not seem very conclusive, and it may be observed that some of the leading members of the Cabinet in the Commons advocated the bonus avowedly given to Maynooth on totally different grounds, and on grounds very inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, for they said that this was but a very trifling tribute to the religion of the majority of the Irish people. It does not, however, follow that because Maynooth may have got a bonus, the new Church Body ought to have a bonus too. The obvious way of redressing the error would be to give a smaller number of years' value as compensation to Maynooth. But then Lord CARNARVON in some degree, and Lord CAIRNS more fully, advocated the concession of this bonus to the Church Body on another ground. They said that the State would secure an end by it, to secure which was well worth the money. The State would in this way get rid of all its dealings with the Irish Church at the expiration of a couple of years. It would pay a lump sum over to the new Church Body, and have nothing further to do with payment to individuals. The Church Body would gain, but it would not gain so very greatly in money as in efficiency, and in the establishment of close relations from the outset between itself and all its clergy. Every fresh clergyman would learn that he had to deal, and to deal only, with this body, and there is no reason why the State should grudge the Church Body this advantage, which is not a pecuniary one. That no principle of a radical kind was really involved in the adoption of the amendment may be gathered from the fact that Lord GRANVILLE himself offered to give a bonus of 7 per cent. in case a certain number of the incumbents in each province consented quickly. He was willing to give State funds, that is, funds taken from the Church, in order to reward the clergy for conferring on the State the benefit of getting the commutation over quickly. After this there was no difference between him and Lord CARNARVON, except one as to amount, and the adoption of Lord CARNARVON's proposal carried with it at least the signal advantage that it will preclude a wearisome and probably bitter discussion as to the amount to be given to Maynooth. Generally speaking, therefore, it may be said that up to the end of Thursday night the Lords had done nothing to make a compromise between the Houses impossible or difficult, although the temptation to use so very large a majority beyond what discretion or wisdom would sanction is very great, and it is much too early yet to say that the amendments of the Lords promise to be such as not to justify the Government in resisting them in the Commons.

MINISTERS AT THE MANSION HOUSE

IT mattered little at the Mansion House dinner that Mr. GLADSTONE possesses neither the jovial ease of Lord PALMERSTON nor the ironical humour of Mr. DISRAELI. Lord Mayors and their dinners are never more useful than when they serve as notice boards or advertisement sheets to communicate intelligence of public interest to those whom it may concern. It would have been neither decorous nor prudent to interfere with the discussion of the Irish Church Bill by any expression of opinion in the House of Commons, but at the Mansion House it seemed natural to remind friends and opponents, not only that the Government is resolved to maintain the principle of the Bill, but that it is strong enough to overpower resistance. The [illegible] idu [illegible] Mr. Gl[illegible] review of his forces; but it was probably not without design that he paraded them, like a general who desires to impress an emissary from the hostile camp with the futility of a conflict. His own personal power, resting both on great ability and on popular confidence, Mr. GLADSTONE properly left to the consciousness of his hearers and to the graceful eulogy of the LORD CHANCELLOR; but he referred to the acknowledged competence of his principal colleagues, and he descanted in more copious language on the virtues of the present House of Commons. Mr. GLADSTONE has known many Parliaments, and it appears that he has admired and respected them all; but it is not surprising that he should prefer to all preceding Houses the product of the last general election. Mere newspaper readers indeed may complain that, but for the House of Lords, the present Session would have been the dullest on record. There has been no debate since the passing of the Irish Church Bill which it is possible to remember; and Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. GLADSTONE himself in his opening speech, Mr. HARDY, and one or two other Parliamentary leaders, carried off all the honours of the discussion. The House of Commons has not yet, since its first meeting, heard a single joke; and although Mr. GLADSTONE probably feels little regret for the absence of Mr. OSBORNE's amusing levities, ordinary members may reasonably wish that their labours were now and then relieved by a pleasant interlude. If the House is neither eloquent nor witty, it is in perfect discipline; and the members, fresh, as Mr. GLADSTONE says, from contact with the country, keep silence and vote at the bidding of the Government, with the precision of a body of soldiers. The general election, and the expurgation of mutinous Liberals at the formation of the Ministry, have effectually put an end to Caves and tea-rooms. The compound pledge to abolish the Irish Establishment and to vote for Mr. GLADSTONE has been redeemed with punctual accuracy. In applauding the virtues of his followers the Minister unavoidably suggests the reflection that the absolute master of a large majority in the House of Commons can dictate the policy of the country. The House of Lords has more or less explicitly acknowledged its inability to oppose the Government on the main issue; but Mr. GLADSTONE has power to define the principles which he will hold to be essential conditions of legislation. Many even of his own party may regret his probable unwillingness to make liberal concessions; but Mr. GLADSTONE's decision, whether it be right or wrong, will be unhesitatingly adopted by the House of Commons. When the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867 were under discussion, the opponents or supporters of any provision were always encouraged by the hope of defeating the nominal chief of the Liberal party; but it would be impossible to change in the minutest degree the wording of a clause in the Irish Church Bill without Mr. GLADSTONE's consent. He has less than his adversaries to lose by a collision with the House of Lords, and by the consequent postponement of the Bill. The current of popular feeling would only be rendered stronger by the interposition of a temporary obstacle, and another year would be allowed for the preparation of the more difficult measures connected with Irish land. The House of Lords having, therefore, no means of putting any pressure on the Government, ought to consider not only the expediency and justice of proposed amendments, but the feasibility of convincing Mr. GLADSTONE that the specific alteration is consistent with his policy. The rights of man are, as has often been said, less important than the mights of man, and legislation in despite of the Minister's veto is a hopeless enterprise.

Nothing could be more conciliatory in form than Mr. GLADSTONE's promise to consider amendments made by the Lords, even though they may at first sight, and, as he significantly added, at last sight, appear to be inadmissible. It is for the Peers themselves to compare their proposed modifications with the purposes which Mr. GLADSTONE formally declared to be indispensable. The establishment and the endowment of the Church are to be absolutely abolished, and the surplus is not to be applied to ecclesiastical purposes. A great majority of the class which is in some measure represented by the House of Lords disapproves of the arbitrary prohibition of religious uses; yet it may be fairly contended that the measure is worthless unless it satisfies the Irish Roman Catholics who professedly desire the spoliation of the Establishment, while they repudiate the acceptance by their own clergy of an endowment in any form. Whether Mr. GLADSTONE will consent to the provision of glebes for the clergy of the three great denominations is perhaps still uncertain. Even a less ingenious dialectician might possibly reconcile either an acceptance or a rejection of the Duke of CLEVELAND's clause with the phrases employed at the Mansion House. At present it is only known that he will not apply to any object which he may declare to be religious the funds which he may think proper to include in the surplus. It may or may not be desirable that a single statesman should by merit or circumstance have attained a position which enables him to prescribe without appeal the conditions of legislation; but as Mr. GLADSTONE happens to be virtual dictator, he deserves credit for abstaining from an insolent and irritating display of his power. There has been much dispute lately as to the meaning of the verdict which all parties admit to have been given at the election. If there is any serious doubt on the point, the verdict virtually contained a proviso that any doubtful clauses which might be found in it were to be interpreted by Mr. GLADSTONE. He might probably have given the glebes to the Irish clergy without incurring adverse criticism; and it is still more certain that he will be supported if he withholds the boon. The extension of a similar benefit to Roman Catholic priests and Presbyterian ministers has apparently not yet been approved by Mr. GLADSTONE, although he judiciously reserves the expression of his intentions.

The rejoicings of the Liberal LORD MAYOR and of his sympathizing City guests over the demolition of the Irish Church must have been sobered by Mr. BRUCE's announcement that, if possible, in the next Session the Corporation of London will in its turn be selected as the subject-matter for reform. Mr. GLADSTONE's eloquent compliments, and the LORD CHANCELLOR's civic reminiscences of his youth, probably lost much of their charm when the little City victims could no longer play regardless of their coming doom. A municipal government of the metropolis, whatever may be its constitution, necessarily involves the disestablishment, if not the disendowment, of the Corporation. It is in vain that Mr. MILL or Mr. BUXTON affects to call his new chief magistrate Lord Mayor; and it is a still smaller consolation that the reigning sovereign of the Mansion House is to retain his glories for the remainder of the year in which the Bill may be passed. A Lord Mayor of the whole of London will have as little special relation to the City as a King of Prussia or of Italy to the March of Brandenburg or the territory of Piedmont. Although the Government has not yet declared its adhesion to any one of the municipal projects of reform, the transfer of corporate power and dignity to an officer chosen by some constituency selected from the whole of London would be fatal to the Mansion House and to Guildhall. Nearly all the institutions of the City are, if contemplated with the severity of modern judgment, in the nature of abuses. If Mr. GLADSTONE ever dines with a prosaic and practical Mayor of the whole of London, he will expatiate with congenial enthusiasm on the abolition of useless pageants and of nominal dignities; but a Lord Mayor with enlarged duties and diminished revenues will jar against traditional associations. It is not impossible that the strenuous resistance of the Corporation may be seconded by the districts which grudge the sacrifice of their scantier State-rights to a federal or general government. In addressing his immediate audience Mr. BRUCE was safer when he spoke of general education, which involves no direct attack on any vested interest. The City Companies have for the present secured for themselves a veto on any scheme which may be proposed for dealing with their large trust funds; but it may be doubted whether their members regard the Endowed Schools Bill with satisfaction. It is highly probable that the Corporation will offer a more obstinate resistance than the Irish Church. City ascendency is not on the whole obnoxious even to the alien parishes which are excluded from participation in the corporate property, nor have politicians fully satisfied themselves that it will be convenient to establish on the inevitable basis of household suffrage a municipal government for a population of three or four millions. One of the most courteous of Ministers would perhaps have done well to observe the rule that nothing disagreeable should be said after dinner. Mansion House speeches should be confined either to conventional jokes, such as Mr. LOWE's remarks on the rights of women, or to stately enunciations of policy after the manner of Mr. GLADSTONE. Both forms of oratory will perhaps become obsolete when a municipal Reform Bill reduces the City to the level of vulgar provincial boroughs.

It will be a subject of curious observation whether the present House of Commons in maturer years will continue to deserve the praises which Mr. GLADSTONE has bestowed on its modest and virtuous youth. He has never seen a House so entirely exempt from pettiness of intrigue, or so little inclined to waste time in idle discussion. In other words, the House of Commons did as it was bid, even when it was told to hold its tongue and to leave the conduct of the Irish debates to Mr. GLADSTONE. In future Sessions, perhaps, members who have still their reputation to make may be disposed to waste in speeches a larger portion "of that precious time that ought "to be devoted to the noble task of building up the happiness "of the people." Mr. GLADSTONE has done as much as any statesman of his time for the happiness of the people, more especially in his long administration of the finances; but, having risen by eloquence, as well as by industry and practical ability, to the summit of ambition, he perhaps forgets that in the course of his career he has not been uniformly silent. The petty intrigues which are not to be found in the House of Commons are perhaps the unforgiven rebellions of unattached Liberal members against a leader who had not then established his undisputed supremacy. Mr. GLADSTONE is more secure against renewed insubordination than against a revival of the loquacity which he equally deprecates. Any Liberal member who voted against the Government on a vital question would inevitably forfeit his seat at the next election; and the Minister is therefore relieved from the necessity of consulting the personal inclinations or prejudices of his supporters. Mr. GLADSTONE's speech showed a just knowledge of the advantages of his position, while it was entirely exempt from the arrogance which might have furnished his opponents with a plausible grievance.

THE GERMAN FLEET.

IT is strange that the proposed creation of a German fleet should seem to any political writer a laughable enterprise. Although modern experience proves that the fate of nations is decided rather on the land than on the sea, no great Power can conveniently dispense with a respectable navy. North Germany has only three probable antagonists in war, and even Austria has hitherto been superior to Prussia in naval force. The Russian navy is far more powerful; and it would require vigorous and long-continued exertion to place the North German navy on an equality with the marine of France. The quality of the existing naval force of Germany is excellent; and the officers are among the most accomplished in Europe. The military post of Jahde will well repay the cost of its construction, in the sense of security which will be derived from the possession of a harbour with proper appurtenances for building and repairs. It is probable that Dantzig will be furnished with all modern improvements, and the acquisition of Kiel was by many persons regarded as a chief object of the Danish war; but it is evidently expedient to secure access to the North Sea, as well as to provide for the protection of the Baltic. No foreign Government has any right to take umbrage at preparations which are simply prudent, and almost necessary. In the event of a rupture with France, which is, it may be hoped, becoming more and more improbable, the North Germans, though far inferior in strength, might even now do something to protect the coast from insult and annoyance. It seems not wholly impossible that within a few years new disputes with Russia may be caused by sympathy with the vexations which are inflicted on the German inhabitants of Esthland and Liefland. The German provinces of Russia border on the sea, and in a contest for the possession of the Baltic sea-board naval preponderance would probably be decisive. Although the Prussian Government has always practised a wise and dignified parsimony, the funds required for the extension of the navy will always be forthcoming. The slight financial embarrassments which have induced the Finance Minister to anticipate the collection of taxes, and to allow a discount for early payment, are exclusively political. The Prussian and North German Parliaments have refused the demands of the Government for increased duties, not because the subject is overtaxed, but in the assertion of the right which they claim to control the finances. Whatever may be the issue of the domestic struggle, the country will be able and willing to bear the expense of an efficient navy. In Germany, as in England, popular opinion will favour the creation of a force which can seldom be used in civil conflicts, but the strongest argument in favour of ships and docks is that they are required to maintain the national honour.

The supposed interest of England in the maritime weakness of North Germany is at the same time irrelevant and chimerical. The jealousy of a neighbour would only supply an additional motive for the prosecution of a patriotic undertaking; yet it is difficult to imagine a rupture between two Powers which have no conflicting interest. If indeed a war should at any time arise between North Germany and England, it is impossible to deny that the stronger maritime Power would gladly be secured against any resistance at sea. When, in the great war, the Prussian troops occupied Hanover, they were obeying the orders of a foreign potentate who was the deadliest enemy of their own country, as of England. Within a week or two the petty mercantile marine of Prussia was swept from the sea, to be restored as soon as the insolence of NAPOLEON provoked a rising against the common enemy. It is perhaps natural to regret the time, never again to recur, when England was more than a match on the sea for the collected forces of the world. Steam and iron-plating have destroyed a supremacy which would in any case have been challenged as the States of Europe advanced in wealth and resources. The naval force of England would no longer be capable, without an extraordinary effort, of resisting a combination of two or three great Powers; and it may be argued that every additional ship of war which is built in a Continental dockyard augments the strength of a possible enemy; while it is forgotten that a secondary maritime State may be a valuable ally. It is fortunate that the abandonment, in the Treaty of Paris, of untenable claims of belligerent right has largely diminished the danger of a confederacy against England. In 1782 and in 1801 the neutral States took the opportunity of a dangerous pressure on English power to form leagues for the purpose of abolishing the right of capture of enemy's property in neutral bottoms. The victories of RODNEY and NELSON rendered both projects in succession abortive, but no single-handed contest against Europe would be possible at the present day. The American civil war proved that grounds of quarrel between belligerents and neutrals may still be discovered, but the dispute which has in former times recurred whenever England engaged in war can scarcely be revived. It follows that the German fleet of the future is not likely to be employed in a war with England, nor is it impossible that it may tend to the maintenance of a maritime balance of power. The discussion of such contingencies is in itself undesirable, for nations as well as persons should avoid the habit of considering all external transactions with exclusive reference to their own interests. It is for German purposes, and not either for the benefit or the injury of England, that the dockyards of Jahde have been constructed. Conjectures as to the eventual success of the enterprise ought to be wholly dispassionate and practical.

With money and determination ships of the most approved patterns may undoubtedly be built, but the question whether they can be manned is not equally simple. The country to which the Hanse ports belonged still possesses a considerable maritime population, although its seagoing trade only occupies a secondary rank. The military organization of the North German Confederacy will probably render it possible to enforce the compulsory service at sea which has been virtually abandoned by England; and it is easier to train stokers and gunners than the able seamen who once assured to England the command of the sea. The great and constant emigration from Germany to America has probably contributed to direct attention to the cultivation of maritime power. The transfer of a large and useful part of the population to an alien allegiance is regarded with natural regret; and vague wishes point to German colonies as the only alternative for the drain to the United States. If any unoccupied country of suitable climate is still to be found in any part of the world, the experiment of a German colony would deserve all possible good-will for its success; but Australia, New Zealand, and the American continent, down to the Rio Grande, are occupied by settlers who speak English; and in the temperate regions of South America the Italians seem likely to establish a preponderance, unless they are there also pushed out by English energy. In other parts of the United States descendants of German settlers will in two or three generations have adopted the language and manners of the great majority of the American people. It seems barely possible that, in the thinly inhabited region of Texas, the Germans might perpetuate their own institutions without renouncing their political connexion with the United States. Even in Mexico there are many German immigrants far superior to the natives of the country, and especially obnoxious to the clerical party. A new Germany beyond the ocean would advantageously vary the monotonous character which attends the boundless expansion of the English race; yet, even if Germany had colonies of her own, the great body of the emigrants might probably still prefer the United States. It has hitherto been found impossible to direct the stream of English emigration to Canada, and the larger body might probably exert the greater magnetic power over Germans as well as over Englishmen.

Even if great German colonies were established in remote continents or islands, the effect on the marine of the Mother-country would perhaps not be important. It was not because England and Holland possessed colonies that the inhabitants of their coasts took to the sea. Distant settlements were the result, and not the cause, of commercial enterprise, and the first thought of early promoters of colonization was generally the creation or encouragement of trade. The poorer class of Germans desire to go abroad only because they are too much crowded at home, or in some cases revolutionary theories may cause a desire to live under a Republican Government. The devotion to German unity and greatness which has for many years inspired the educated portion of the community seems not to have penetrated into the stratum from which emigrants are derived. The patriotism of the Germans in the United States is exclusively American, while even the Irish look back with a seditious regret to the country which they have left. Although it will be possible to create and maintain a war navy, commercial activity cannot be stimulated by administrative measures. The North-German ports lie far away from the modern highways of trade, nor will they share the great advantages which Marseilles, Brindisi, and Trieste may probably derive from the opening of the Suez Canal. The prosperity of Hamburg may perhaps be rivalled by Kiel, when the Baltic is connected with the North Sea by the projected canal which in time of war will add greatly to the naval force of the Power that possesses the territory through which it runs. Races closely allied to the Low-Germans of Holland cannot have lost the sea-going aptitudes of their forefathers; and indeed there are many German sailors employed in English merchant vessels. The gratification which the opening of the port of Jahde has caused in Germany is in the highest degree legitimate.

CONCURRENT ENDOWMENT.

THE amendment to alter the preamble with which Lord GREY opened the debate in Committee on the Irish Church Bill was eminently characteristic of its author, and yet not entirely useless. It was framed at random, advocated at random, and discussed at random, and nevertheless it brought the great question of concurrent endowment in a convenient shape before the public. With Lord GREY's peculiar theories about Established Churches we do not profess to agree. It is a remarkable fact that scarcely any two defenders of Established Churches defend them on the same grounds. And if we cannot agree with Lord GREY, still less can we agree with the Bishop of OXFORD, who seemed to think that the Roman Catholic religion was true enough to endow, although it was not true enough to establish; while almost in the same breath he said that the truth or falsity of a religion was immaterial as regards its endowment, and that the endowment of even the falsest religion was a debt due to the people who were willing to pay for it and who believed in it. All these difficult questions may be put aside. It is advisable, as it is convenient, to come down to humbler ground and to look at the facts before us. Lord GREY had no specific proposal as to concurrent endowment to make. Lord GREY never has any specific proposals to make. His mission is to make eloquent, cantankerous speeches, on the highest possible principles, with the maximum of public inconvenience. And in his own sphere he is really great. He is the ROEBUCK of the Upper House, and can consume any amount of time in offering suggestions and stating arguments which are queer, crotchety, one-sided, and often irrelevant, but which have a value as proceeding from a mind not cast in the mould of other minds, and daring to be honest and frank. The proposal to alter the preamble of the Bill at the very outset was on the face of it absurd, and yet there was a sort of wild meaning in his argument that the discussion of many of the details of the Bill must be almost fruitless unless it was first settled whether some scheme of concurrent endowment should be entertained. It is also true that Lord GREY managed, at the outset of the discussion of the clauses of the Bill, to place the scheme of concurrent endowment in as favourable a light as possible. He elicited from the Archbishop of CANTERBURY and from the Bishop of OXFORD a distinct approval of the principle of concurrent endowment, and few people except very fanatical Protestants will, after this expression of opinion, pronounce an approval of concurrent endowment to be necessarily and inherently wicked. It must be also taken as a distinct gain in favour of the views he supported that Lord GREY contrived to make many prominent members of the House of Lords declare in favour of the particular scheme of concurrent endowment which the Duke of CLEVELAND has proposed. After the debate of Tuesday night it may be taken for granted that the whole strength of the advocates of concurrent endowment will be thrown into the support of the proposal to allow the Commissioners to provide, when requested, houses, with a small amount of land attached, for the Romanist priests and the Presbyterian ministers. That this is concurrent endowment appears to us clear, although the endowment comes out of the surplus, and not out of the taxes of the British public, as Lord MAYO proposed. Either way money which Parliament has at its disposal is placed at the service of Irish sects other than that of the Anglican Church. It is a narrower scheme of concurrent endowment to build houses or manses for Romanists and Presbyterians than to place out of the Imperial taxation a yearly sum at the disposal of the rival communities, which would put them on an equality with the Established Church. But, although narrow, it is still a scheme of concurrent endowment, and must be defended, if it is defended at all, on the same grounds on which all schemes of concurrent endowment, whether wide or narrow, must be based.

The precise terms of the Duke of CLEVELAND's amendment seem to us to be rather obscure, but they embody in an inoffensive form the general plan of offering houses to the priests and ministers of rival sects, provided that the Anglican Church keeps its glebe-houses free of building charges. If Parliament were prepared to adopt the general principle, it would be easy to give the amendment proposed by the Duke of CLEVFLAND the accuracy which it needs. And we very much wish to believe that Parliament would sanction this general principle. It would be much better for Ireland, and much better for the Anglican Church, if this amount of provision were made for the Catholics and the Presbyterians. The social and political position of the priests would be greatly improved if they had good houses provided for them, and the Anglican Church would be able to make a very good bargain for itself if it conceded thus much to its rivals. We should very much like to see the Duke of CLEVELAND's amendment pass into law; but we cannot conceal from ourselves that there are difficulties which beset its path which are of a most serious character. The first of these is that the vague idea of having some scheme of concurrent endowment carried out before the Bill is done with will inevitably, if widely entertained, encourage the adoption of all sorts of wild amendments in favour of the Irish Church. Clause after clause will be altered, so as to give bonuses to the new ecclesiastical body on the plea that equality is, at a subsequent stage, to be restored by the concession of a power to build houses for the priests and ministers of the other sects. It is very possible that the facility for passing amendments thus accorded may produce utter anarchy. Who is to say that any suggestion in favour of the Anglican clergy is to be rejected if things are to be put all straight at the end by an equivalent being given? Lord GREY had some sort of reason on his side when he said that the principle of concurrent endowment ought to be affirmed at the outset if it was to be entertained at all. Were it once for all established that a definite sum—a million, or two millions, or any other precise amount—was to be expended for the benefit of other sects, an equivalent sum might be claimed out of the surplus from the Anglican Church. But if it is left open whether any sum shall be applied out of the surplus for a scheme of concurrent endowment, and what this sum shall be if it is to exist at all, all the amendments in favour of the Anglican Church must be proposed and carried in the dark. There is no reason whatever, as matters now stand, why the whole surplus should not be used up by specific appropriations in favour of the Anglican Church before the Romanists and Presbyterians get a penny for their buildings. If the Bill was discussed in its earlier clauses on the hypothesis that the last clauses were to make everything even, every amendment intended to increase the funds of the Anglican Church would have an equal chance of being carried. There would be no one to bargain with the Government and to say that if this is conceded, that shall be withdrawn. Each of the friends of the Church would be able to call on all the rest to support his proposal, for each might say that what he asks for will be covered by the equivalent to be given to the rival sects. The necessary consequence of this would be that the Commons would reject the whole of the amendments. They would find that a glaring inequality was introduced under the colour of a scheme for balancing the advantages accorded to one set of claimants against those accorded to another set. The friends of the Anglican Church would be tempted to overdo the prosecution of their claims, and the scheme of concurrent endowment would fall through because the Anglican Church had asked very much more than Parliament was inclined to give.

Serious, however, as are the difficulties which might thus arise in the way of concurrent endowment, they are by no means the most serious with which it is threatened. If Mr. GLADSTONE's speech at the Mansion House is to be understood in the sense which the majority of the commentators place on it, it is obvious that no scheme of concurrent endowment can be carried if the present Ministry is to retain office. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues will then have to say that they entered into an express compact with the nation not to entertain any suggestion such as that made by the Duke of CLEVELAND. It would, we think, be a national gain if the Duke of CLEVELAND's amendment could be carried in the Lords and accepted by the Commons. But it is quite open to the present Ministry to refuse to acquiesce in it. They may say, and we are confidently told they will say, that they have come into office and have framed their Bill on the express understanding that they will have nothing to do with any scheme for giving any new benefit to the clergy of any religious sect. They may have been right or wrong, but this was their programme, and it would be quite out of place for them to propose to the House of Commons to adopt a scheme for giving the Anglican Church a large slice out of the surplus in return for a slice more or less large to be given to the Romanists and the Presbyterians. A Ministry that would consent to such a radical alteration of their Bill would be, Mr. GLADSTONE may urge, a very poor Ministry—a Ministry that, by clinging to office, would greatly damage its own credit and that of the Reformed Parliament. This Mr. GLADSTONE may say, and we are inclined to think that this is what, in a very cloudy way, he meant to hint at the Mansion House; though still the question arises why, when the opportunity was open to him, Earl GRANVILLE did not say this distinctly in the House of Lords? It is of the essence of free government that the Ministry of the day should respect itself, and should refuse to be the vehicle for proposing, at the dictation of others, schemes to which it has declared itself radically opposed. If this is Mr. GLADSTONE's intention, the Government leader would have done, we think, a great service to the House of Lords by declaring, at the very outset of the discussion of the Bill in Committee, that it is not for him or his colleagues to accept any such alteration of the Bill as Lord GREY shadowed forth or as the Duke of CLEVELAND has embodied in his modest and inoffensive amendment. This amendment is in itself justifiable on grounds that seem to us conclusive; but the peers who support it at the present crisis ought, if such is the resolution of the Government, to have been distinctly informed that they can only do so successfully if they are prepared to form a Ministry that will possess the confidence of the nation in a greater degree than the Cabinet of Mr. GLADSTONE possesses it.

FRANCE.

THE Imperial letter to M. DE MACKAU has not been suffered to remain without qualification. When even the faithful SCHNEIDER could be disturbed at the reactionary measures the EMPEROR was supposed to be meditating, it was plainly necessary to devise a phrase or two on the side of liberty. M. SCHNEIDER himself was accordingly made the recipient of an assurance that the policy of the Imperial Government is too transparent to admit of any misconception. It was a strange form for consolation to take, since it left M. SCHNEIDER no alternative but to credit himself with a power of performing impossibilities, or to conclude that his interpretation of the Imperial intentions was strictly correct. What this interpretation really amounted to does not appear from the correspondence, but inasmuch as it compelled M. SCHNEIDER to send in his resignation, it must have been something terribly bad. As this extreme step was not persisted in, we may assume that the President of the Corps Législatif has become convinced that he had achieved the impossible, and mistaken the unmistakeable. He had failed to see that the work of the Government was to be the same, now that the elections are over, as it was when they were still in the future, and that this work is the conciliation of a strong Government with sincerely liberal institutions. Perhaps M. SCHNEIDER had doubted whether the latter half of the task was not to be dropped altogether, but as his scepticism yielded to such very mild treatment, it could hardly have been of a very inveterate kind. Only a man of unusual facility of conviction could have found his peace of mind restored by the EMPEROR's letter. Nor can it be said that M. ROUHER's allocution in the Corps Législatif was much more to the purpose. The statement that the renewal of the Corps Législatif by universal suffrage "is a natural opportunity for the nation to manifest its thoughts, its aspirations, "and its requirements," depends for its value on the interpretation given to the word "nation." If the Imperial Government tends to found its conclusions on the whole body of facts disclosed or indicated by the recent elections, the intimation has great importance. But if the mere existence of a large Government majority in the Corps Législatif is to be held, as no doubt it technically may be, to imply the existence of a corresponding majority among the electors, the study of political results which M. ROUHER promises by-and-by is likely to be extremely unfruitful. It is true that further legislation of some kind is distinctly hinted at, and that the return of the ordinary Session is to put us in possession of those resolutions and projects which the Government will then think best calculated to realize the wishes of the country. Still this need mean nothing more than some fresh development of paternal supervision. The projects which the EMPEROR may think calculated to realize the wishes of the country are not necessarily identical with the projects which the country itself may think calculated to realize its own wishes. There is not much chance that NAPOLEON III. will choose to see that, so far as the recent Opposition victories were not declarations in favour of a Republic, they were protests against personal government. He is far more likely to ignore the latter element altogether, and to act as though the complaint against the Empire were that it has done too little, and not that it has done too much. No doubt the study of the political results of the elections which M. ROUHER spoke of, will, within certain limits, be carried on with abundance of appreciative zeal. The EMPEROR is not a man to have no sympathy with the wants and aspirations of his subjects. He is a long way removed from the mere vulgar tyrant to whom power is only valuable in so far as it ministers to his own selfish ends. His theory of government makes the sovereign the most complete expression of the national life, and the most trustworthy exponent of the national will. A ruler who does not discharge these functions has only himself to thank if they are taken from him; but, on the other hand, a nation which, having a ruler capable of discharging them, wishes to find other exponents of its will, has only itself to thank if its liberty of doing so is fettered in its own interests. That if France wants self-government and a Parliamentary Constitution she does not know what is good for her, and consequently that, in refusing to concede a responsible Ministry or any of those "necessary liberties" which are so often in M. THIERS'S mouth, the EMPEROR has but treated her as a careful mother treats an infant who cries for what will hurt it, are theories which to NAPOLEON III. have all the force of genuine conviction. It is this fact which makes us so sceptical of any reconciliation between the Empire and liberty. This or that Liberal result France may be permitted to enjoy, but she will never, while the EMPEROR reigns, be suffered to arrive at it by Liberal methods. As we have before pointed out, the conversion of the Empire into a constitutional kingdom would be in the EMPEROR'S eyes as disastrous a change for France as for himself. The good as well as the bad points of his character will therefore dispose him to run any risk rather than seek in so tremendous an humiliation an escape from present difficulties. The language he put into M. ROUHER'S mouth at the opening of the Session shows no change of tone in this respect. The measures calculated to realize the wishes of the country will have their origin in the Imperial brain, and, when perfected in that intellectual crucible, will be offered for public adoption. In all important respects the Government is still to anticipate, not to follow, the nation.

In the meantime the European public waits with such languid interest as has survived a long series of false alarms to know the meaning of the speech at Châlons. The warlike significance which it seemed to wear at first sight would hardly stand the test of examination if there were no other symptoms suggesting the same conclusion. The master of a great army must occasionally flatter its vanity, and it might be difficult to do so more cheaply than by the theory of an invariable coincidence between French invasions and the progress of civilization. A forced reminiscence of a victory over Austria is hardly a natural prelude to an attack upon Prussia; indeed there are some people who have let their logic run away with them, and have drawn the inference that this appeal to the victors of Solferino can mean nothing but a repetition of the drama of 1859, with the substitution of Prussia for Italy—an over-ingenious speculation which suggests that its authors are not proof against the fascination of superficial resemblance. It must be admitted, however, that the speech at Chalons does not stand quite alone. The alarm which seems to be felt at Rome points to an expected withdrawal of the French troops, and this is so obviously the bait which would be held out to induce Italy to join France against Prussia, that the fears of the Roman diplomatists may be worth something as an index of what is in the wind. The Imperial reply to the address of the Bishop of BEAUVAIS deserves a passing notice for the assurances it did not contain. The Bishop's speech had recalled M. ROUHER'S "Jamais," and treated it as embodying the Imperial policy in the matter of Rome. It would have seemed only natural if the eldest son of the Church had said something on the same subject, and had expressed some appreciation of the position he at present occupies as the Protector of the Holy See. Instead of this, the EMPEROR contented himself with giving utterance to a truth more obvious than fruitful. He was always glad to listen to bishops, because their addresses "invariably contained expressions of "piety, and never failed to call to mind holy doctrines." If this is all that HIS MAJESTY looks for, he may find it in every sermon, and we suspect that the Bishop of BEAUVAIS meant his words to have more weight than if they had been spoken from an ordinary pulpit. Nor can the glimpse which the EMPEROR'S speech affords of the subject-matter of his private devotions have altogether satisfied the episcopal judgment. "Should his prayers be heard, religion would "be held in honour, the people happy, and France great and "prosperous." All very well no doubt as far as it goes, but what about the POPE? Does the "honour" in which the EMPEROR prays that religion may be held include the temporal power? And if it does not, what place does the POPE hold in his prayers? We feel that the Bishop of BEAUVAIS must have asked himself this question, and, further, that the EMPEROR must have been perfectly aware that his words would be examined with anxious minuteness in the hope of detecting in them some assurance, even if an ambiguous one, of an intention to maintain the French occupation. Inferences drawn from the mere absence of what was expected are rarely of much value, and a politician may be unwilling to commit himself afresh to a line of action which at the same time he has no fixed purpose of abandoning. But so far as the EMPEROR'S treatment of the episcopal congratulations can be taken to mean anything, it is not of a kind to give any comfort to the Papal party among his subjects.

It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that a change in the Imperial attitude on the Roman question, supposing it to be imminent, would imply war as a matter of course. Such a change would be an almost certain accompaniment of an attack on Prussia, but it would be an equally inevitable accompaniment of any serious effort to conciliate the Democratic party at home. No part of the Imperial policy has given so much offence to the Radical Opposition as the second occupation of Rome, and the very first thing the EMPEROR has to do, if he cares to secure their neutrality, is to wipe out the remembrance of Montana. The Socialist Democracy which has gained so much strength in France has more interest in foreign than in home politics. The latter it views as subordinate to the coming social revolution, but it is of the utmost importance to the ultimate success of this movement that the democrats of Europe should not be prevented by foreign intervention from carrying out their projects. In the eyes of a French republican, to maintain the Papal power is to sanction the most mischievous of theories in order to support the worst of Governments. That the EMPEROR really cherishes any idea of ending where he began, and of carrying out on the throne the Socialist visions which were his solace in prison and exile, is improbable enough. But his is not a position in which mere caution can stand him in much stead, and if once this conviction comes home to him, his is hardly the temperament to be repelled either by the wildness or the danger of an attempt.

EARL RUSSELL.

WE are not about to discuss in this place the policy of Earl RUSSELL'S now defunct amendment on the Irish Church Bill, partly because we have elsewhere gone into the whole subject of the proposed amendments in the Upper House, and partly because the brief existence of this particular suggestion would hardly justify a biography. It lived only to die, but to write the life of a may-fly is otiose. It was, as the Americans say, tabled on Thursday in last week, on Saturday we find on the Lords' paper an item contributed by Earl RUSSELL "in lieu of former amend-"ment." But in the same paper is also announced a parallel amendment from the Duke of CLEVELAND, which seems to have attracted a good deal of favour, and now it is announced that Lord RUSSELL'S amendment is withdrawn in favour of the Duke's. Although the principle of the successive forms of Earl RUSSELL'S amendment and of the Duke's, that of providing glebe-houses and lands for the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, is the same, yet that Earl RUSSELL has in less than a week gone through these changes of mind is significant and characteristic. While both in his first and second thoughts he recommended that the proposed glebe lands should consist of thirty acres, his first amendment seemed to make this provision by grant or purchase compulsory out of "such property"—though the property was not specified; but the revised amendment gave the Commissioners only power to do this. And again, the grant or purchase of land for certain proposed separate graveyards, of the first edition, was in the second form modified into grant—omitting purchase. However, when the Duke of CLEVELAND'S amendment was announced, proposing ten acres for the glebes instead of thirty, and moreover limiting the grant or gift of glebes and glebe-houses to the especial places or persons which should ask for them, Earl RUSSELL has, we are informed, collapsed, and given up the field to his ducal friend.

Now this is precisely what Earl RUSSELL has always been doing, very notably and consistently with the Irish Church, but with politics generally all his life long. Qualis ab incepto. Earl RUSSELL is now singing his swan's song, and it is in a good many parts, and, as the music folk say, it contains a good many variations on one and the same theme; and there is about the autobiographical dirge which the great Whig Earl has now for the very last time been singing upon himself, as there is in a good deal of very fine music, what looks to those who are not great musicians very like not only tautology, but a sonorous repetition of a majestic turn or cadence which is always beginning anew, and never quite gets to an end. During the years 1868 and 1869 Earl RUSSELL has been talking about the Irish Church, and about his various views of it. He has talked over the Irish Church and himself and the Whig party in three successive letters to Mr.

CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in sundry speeches in the House of Lords, and in the amendments on the Government Bill, last week proposed, modified, and abandoned, of which we have already spoken. In January, 1868, Earl RUSSELL began his epistolary trilogy; after Mr. GLADSTONE'S famous production was carried he resumed his pen. as letter-writers say. On the 18th of January Earl RUSSELL wrote his last letter. Here we are just entering July, and he has been at it again, proposing, changing his mind, and finally doing nothing. And, as he frankly says in his very agreeable set of letters, this is just what he has always been doing. There is an engaging freedom in almost all senescent confessions, and a pleasant air not altogether of vanity, but of self-conscious urbanity, which characterizes autobiography when it relates to declining years, which is almost always pardonable, and is often very taking, or at any rate amusing. A septuagenarian discoursing about himself is always kindly listened to when he can begin his pleasant prattle with, "I said forty—aye, five-and-forty—years ago," so-and-so, which is no great matter; but the saying or the thing, be it large or small, has got the crust and venerable ærugo of half a century about it. Old experience does not always attain to anything like a prophetic strain; but if there is the vaticinal beard of a prophet, and if the oracle is delivered in flowing but grave accents which suggest the wisdom of age, it is always listened to. One of DICKENS'S heroes, Mr. CASBY, found his fine noble bald head, and smooth septuagenarian old-apple face, stand him in stead of many virtues. Earl RUSSELL has now acquired something of this dignity, and is generally looked upon as the political "Patriarch "in the list shoes." That Earl RUSSELL can tell us anything authentic about the interior of Lord GREY'S Cabinet excuses something of the smallness of the relics which he exhibits, when we remember what a very old Cabinet he has dragged them out of. But if we had not got it all in this agreeably garrulous form, we should say that Earl RUSSELL'S own account of his relations to the Irish Church question are not exactly those reminiscences of single and consistent statesmanship which we look for, say, in a SULLY, or, which is more to the point, in a SOMERS.

In January, 1868, writing to his "dear FORTESCUE," Earl RUSSELL passed in review the successive attempts to mete out some measure of justice in the way of religious freedom to the Roman Catholics, and pointed to the year 1801 as the date of Mr. PITT'S first and timid suggestion of a pecuniary provision for the Roman Catholic clergy. No doubt, had not GEORGE III.'s prejudices proved insurmountable, PITT'S policy in this, as in other matters, would have succeeded. The Irish priests were not then Ultramontanized; they embodied a good deal of Gallican feeling, and would, it is well known, have been well content to be well paid. But it is as well to remember that Mr. PITT'S plan did not involve disestablishment or any dealing with the resources of the Establishment at all. All that he thought of was to make an Imperial grant, whether large or small, to the Irish Catholic clergy. Without going into the tedious history of the Appropriation Clause, or into Earl RUSSELL'S defence or excuse first for its proposal and next for its abandonment, it is enough to say that in January last year the noble Earl declared that, in his opinion, "the destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland, the "withdrawal of the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum, "together with a refusal of all subsidies by the State towards "the building of Roman Catholic churches, and furnishing "glebes and incomes to the Catholic clergy would be a misfortune for Ireland . . . would check civilization, and arrest "the progress of society in the rural parts of Ireland." And his conclusion was, that the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church and of the Presbyterians, and the reduction of the Irish Establishment to one-eighth of its revenues, would be just and salutary. In other words, Earl RUSSELL condemned by anticipation every principle and detail of Mr. GLADSTONE'S unborn measure. A very few months later, when all that was done was the triumphant victory of Mr. GLADSTONE on the 30th of March, Earl RUSSELL wrote a second letter, from which it appeared that whatever Mr. GLADSTONE was about to do became a sort of open question to Earl RUSSELL. Now he only timidly recalls his own old plan for a tripartite endowment; he no longer characterizes the destruction of the Established Church as a wrong to Ireland; but rather he takes occasion in his second letter to say that "he "was perhaps not far wrong when in 1866 he expressed "an opinion that a division of the Church revenues between "Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Catholics, would pro- "duce fresh discord in Ireland," which we take it is only a euphemism for saying that he was very far wrong in 1868 when he actually proposed this very arrangement. Here then towards the beginning of last summer we have Earl RUSSELL backing out of the large policy which he had seriously and solemnly propounded just after Christmas, and falling back upon an old but quite opposite view of his, dated 1866, "not deeply considered" and therefore probably "not far wrong," but which he had given up in 1868.

How stands Earl RUSSELL in January, 1869? He reviews the three possible plans for dealing with the Irish religious question. First, Mr. PITT'S complete preservation of the Establishment, with an endowed Roman Catholic clergy; next his own, which he now prefers to call Earl GREY'S, of the threefold division of the revenues of the Irish Church; and lastly, what is known as disestablishment and disendowment. The first is dismissed as too late; the second, Earl RUSSELL'S own, in a single sentence of three lines, is got rid of as "equally impracticable," and he adopts, with a difference, the third. As regards Earl RUSSELL himself, the only observation which his third letter really calls for is that he had all his political life favoured a policy which in a few short months he denounces as impracticable. Perhaps Earl RUSSELL thought, and we agree with him, that if posterity is certain to pronounce an unfavourable verdict on a statesman's life, it is better for him to anticipate posterity, and write his own epitaph. If a man writing an autobiography discredits himself, he takes out the sting of every unfavourable biography from another hand. This is really the true picture. Earl RUSSELL takes credit for proposing the Appropriation Clause, and abandoning it. He takes credit for threefold endowment, and for abandoning it; just as he took credit for chalking up No Popery in the Papal Aggression, and running away from Cardinal WISEMAN'S door, and as he took credit for serving with Lord PALMERSTON and supplanting him. Prolific in various policies, he has throughout his career been equally easy in adopting a scheme and its opposite. His old experience has not failed him. Last January he adopted disendowment, but it was a strange sort of disendowment—a disendowment somehow consistent not only with the retention of the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum, but with a sentimental retention of what are vulgarly called "the ano- "malies and abuses of the Establishment," but which he thought "in reality were among the most useful parts of the Establishment", and among those most useful parts, he specified the Protestant clergyman with a congregation of ten surrounded by a Roman Catholic population of four or five thousand. And he further suggested that any available surplus after, not endowing, but subsidizing, the three religious communities, should be devoted to land drainage, and loans to landlords and tenants for farming improvements. It is enough to contrast in this present year 1869 the Earl RUSSELL of January 18, writing to Mr. C. FORTESCUE, with the Earl RUSSELL of June 25, accepting Mr. GLADSTONE'S Bill with a faint and irresolute appeal for a compulsory assignment of glebes of thirty acres for all the three denominations, and at the last moment shrinking away from even this timid recurrence to his old self, and finally collapsing into acquiescence in the Duke of CLEVELAND'S cautious and perhaps reluctant, but more popular, grant of ten acres to those who would descend to accept them. A political autobiography such that of which Earl RUSSELL has not only furnished the materials, but has himself given the details, is very interesting. We know few more interesting publications than Earl RUSSELL'S three pamphlets; as a literary work the series is the pleasantest reading. But it hardly does honour to that cause to which the noble author thinks his life has been dedicated, and to that political confidence which he has himself contributed to elevate the dignity and wisdom of Whig statesmanship.

POLITICAL PENSIONS.

THERE is no reason to regret the failure of Mr. FAWCETT'S plausible arguments against the Official Pensions Bill. Democratic sympathies would perhaps incline to liberal remuneration of successful politicians, if Parliamentary prizes had not hitherto been for the most part restricted to a comparatively limited class. There are good reasons for restricting the numbers of pensions, although it might be urged that one needy veteran in the public service deserved as well as another who had been more lucky in lighting on a vacancy. It is desirable that a large portion of the higher functionaries should be men of independent fortune; and in practice it has been found that sometimes only two or three first-class pensions have been actually claimed. The proposed limitation to persons who have exchanged trades or professions for office would have been almost equivalent to the abolition of pensions. The custom or understanding which prohibited members of the Government from carrying on a trade was tacitly abrogated as soon as traders became competitors for high office. Two or three of the present Ministry are still manufacturers, although their business is necessarily conducted by their partners. No profession, except the law, is likely to be exchanged for office; and Mr. WALPOLE is the only living lawyer who has abandoned good practice at the Bar for a political career. It is perfectly true that, as Mr. FAWCETT contends, the acceptance of office seldom or never involves a pecuniary sacrifice. Lord RUSSELL must, if he has ever taken the trouble to examine his accounts, long since have satisfied himself of his mistake in assuring a Select Committee that he was impoverished by the receipt of a salary of 5,000*l.* a year. The expenses of the highest office would be covered by a fifth part of the income, and, to a wealthy peer who habitually maintains a large establishment, a seat in the Cabinet cannot cost a shilling. As rich men hold no pensions, the only persons to be considered in discussing the question are those who devote themselves to public life with scanty private means. Their sacrifice is made, not on their appointment to office, but when they relinquish the prospect of some more profitable pursuit. It would be neither reasonable nor possible to compensate the adventurers who fail, but it is not impolitic to reserve a few modest prizes for the winners in the lottery. PITT and CANNING are familiar instances of statesmen who would certainly have made large fortunes at the Bar. If BROUGHAM had not pursued the profession of the law for a maintenance, it could not have been thought unfair that his political exertions should in his later years have been rewarded by a pension. If sufficient securities were provided against corruption, an old leader of Opposition might perhaps deserve a pension as well as an ex-Minister; but the class from which public offices are replenished would prefer a lottery with numerous blanks to a total refusal of reward.

In America, where pensions are unknown, the Federal and State offices are generally filled by lawyers who, after a comparatively short term of service, find no difficulty in resuming their profession. If an ex-President or an ex-Secretary of State were reduced to poverty, the spectacle would probably be distasteful to the people of the United States, and the precedent would not be deserving of imitation in England. In a land of social inequality there is a general feeling that a descent from the position of a Cabinet Minister to a rank below the condition of a gentleman would on the whole be inexpedient. One of the most conspicuous political leaders of the present generation, although on grounds of principle or prejudice he refused a pension, was compelled to accept the bounty of private friends and admirers. If remuneration is to be awarded for public service, it is more seemly that it should be given at the public expense than that a tax should be imposed on munificent volunteers. The petty salaries of American functionaries are the object of more intrigue and corruption than the largest rewards of office in England. It is doubtful whether an increase of pay, immediate or deferred, might not raise the standard of qualification; but the whole subject is beyond the competence of foreigners. The provision made for ex-Ministers in France is far more liberal than in England, although it depends on the favour of the EMPEROR. When a member of the French Cabinet retires, he is almost always relegated either to the Senate or to the Council of State, where easy duties, which men of busy habits prefer to entire exemption from labour, furnish a pretext for liberal salaries, and provide occupation until, in many cases, the term of promotion once more comes round. It is almost surprising that in the good old times before the Reform Bill the sinecure of a seat in the Privy Council was wholly unpaid. A salary attached to a nominal duty might for a time have survived a pension granted without ostensible reason. Imperial munificence is administered on more enlightened principles.

The abuses of the Pension List of fifty years ago, while they were not unconnected with political immorality, dated from a time when the Civil List was, like the income of a private person, supposed to be at the disposal of the Sovereign. A nobleman or commoner of large fortune can pension off old servants at pleasure without consulting either his neighbours or his less fortunate dependents; yet it is not impossible that if the accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few owners proceeds at the present rate of increase, the proprietor of half a county, or of a section of the metropolis, may become responsible to law as well as to public opinion. In early times the bounty of the Crown was either exempt from criticism, or it was denounced as a mode of corruption rather than as a misappropriation of public money. Long after political power had passed into the hands of Parliamentary leaders, the King himself was in the habit of higgling with his Ministers on the grants which they demanded for the benefit of themselves and their adherents. Even in the distribution of patronage the Sovereign sometimes displayed a prudery which seemed to the managers of Parliamentary parties ridiculous or shocking. Sir ROBERT WALPOLE, according to Lord HERVEY, reported as an almost incredible proof of folly the declaration of GEORGE II. that he would not allow commissions in the army to be given in exchange for votes in the House of Commons. GEORGE III. in his turn surprised Lord NORTH by insisting that bishoprics should be given with a certain regard to piety and learning, and that Regius Professors in the Universities should know something of their respective branches of study. In the bestowal of pensions there was no similar question of fitness, because any man is capable of receiving quarterly payments; but the indifference which the King might have felt for the qualities of the recipient was removed by his own interest as paymaster. By degrees successive Ministers obtained the control of the Pension List, as they and their predecessors had already deprived the Crown of more important branches of the prerogative. At the date of the Reform Bill the great bulk of the pensions had been given in payment for the votes of the relatives or patrons of the annuitants in one or the other House of Parliament. There were poor peers who, with all their male and female cadets, were quartered on the public purse in return for their support of SIDMOUTH, of GRENVILLE, or of LIVERPOOL, and some pensioners had claims far less creditable. The changes which were adopted in deference to a general feeling of indignation were, on the whole, well considered. The limited amount of pensions of which the Prime Minister for the time can dispose would have been better distributed if statesmen had condescended to know more of the condition of literature and science; but during thirty-five years scarcely any pension has been given for the furtherance of a gross political job. Political pensions were properly withdrawn from the control of official discretion or partiality, and the modest allowances which have been received by a few retired statesmen form but puny substitutes for the patent offices, of which a few specimens remain like gigantic skeletons to record the prodigality of a former generation. It is no longer possible for a great peer to negotiate with a Minister for the sale of half a dozen steady votes in consideration of grants to his nominees; but the State, in superseding private dispensers of patronage, has in some degree inherited their obligations. The further curtailment of pensions which Mr. FAWCETT recommends would produce no advantage except in the money which might be saved. The condition of a comparatively long tenure of office renders it impossible for a Prime Minister to grant indirectly the pension which is no longer nominally in his gift. There is no difference of opinion in the propriety of securing to the members of the permanent Civil Service a provision for their old age, which they would certainly obtain if they were in the employment of Corporations, of public Companies, or of wealthy traders. A Parliamentary Minister or Under-Secretary who has shared the same duties for a shorter time has probably spent the earlier part of his career in an apprenticeship to public business in the House of Commons. It is not commonly thought that official salaries are too large, and the amount of pensions under the present rule will be comparatively insignificant as long as Ministers are selected from the higher classes. There is probably not a member of the present Cabinet who would require a pension on his retirement, unless he chanced to suffer some reverse of fortune. Frugality in the expenditure of public money ought to be the rule, but it is subject to many exceptions.

BETTING-HOUSES AND THE TURF.

WE have no very solid expectations of the good which may result from the present raid on the lower class of betting-houses. Experience teaches us to distrust the spasmodic activity of the police. We hear periodically of raids on Holywell Street, but Holywell Street and its trade survives. A foul neighbourhood is cleansed to become foul again. The very term "raid" suggests strong and turbulent but evanescent action. Just now public opinion is going through one of its violent fits of tumultuous morality. It is all too hot to last. No doubt there is much to drive us to fever heat, but violent virtues are to be distrusted. A revival whether of religion or of public conscience is not to be depended on. No doubt there is much to excite us. The crash of three or four noble houses, sumptuous and ancestral mansions seized by the sheriff to defray Turf debts of ducal spendthrifts, heir-looms and priceless pictures and the corrupti undique nobiles libri, household familiarities ranging from jewelled vases to the heir's toys, the sacred things of old renown and of private life, becoming the subjects of unseemly wrangles with bailiffs—to say nothing of embezzlement, suicide, and murder among the lower classes—and all these evils to be traced to the Turf, may well provoke a tempest of indignation. The plague is universal, from the first-born of PHARAOH that sat on the throne to the first-born of the captive and to the draper's clerk; history, past and present, has told us what comes of the Turf, and what seems to be necessary to the Turf. At the worst, it is said, things must mend; but we own to not being very sanguine as to any remedy which begins, as it will probably end, with domiciliary visits to a small tobacconist in Oxford Street, or with a successful haul of betting appurtenances somewhere down at Deptford or Whitechapel. Indeed, this sort of thing will lead to social consequences of no small gravity. For once the stern reply that there is one law for the rich and one for the poor is incapable of being evaded. TATTERSALL'S defended and protected by the immunity of its privileges, and the betting-offices raided by detectives, is just the sort of thing which looks equivalent to those privileges of wrong accorded to the upper classes which have in European history produced Reigns of Terror.

The subject is one beset with difficulties, and it is so because, on the first blush of it, it seems so simple. Just, it will be said, as the Prize Ring was put down, so Betting can be put down; and now that the whole Turf and all that belongs to it are found to be quite as dangerous to public morals, the law can deal with one as sharply and severely and successfully as with the other. But this is not so; the parallel is not exact, nor anything like exact. The Turf is not as unpopular as the Ring was. Nor does it deserve to be so. Besides, all sorts of respectable people are interested in racing who only, throughout its greatest popularity, entertained sheer and unmitigated disgust at prize-fighting. The great annual races are, in every sense, English institutions; and a lamentable blank in social habits would ensue were Epsom and Doncaster and Ascot to subside into their natural insignificance. We should be diverting a sort of Gulf Stream in national life were horse-racing to cease to exist among us. No doubt to do anything less than this is not to deal effectively with the evil. Put down the betting-houses, and you are bound to put down TATTERSALL'S. Put down the centres of betting, and you are bound to put down betting itself. Put down betting, and you must prohibit horse-racing. All this is very logical and consistent, but will it work? It is open to objectors to this summary and consistent cure to urge, as fairly may be urged, that the present universal passion for betting on Turf matters has been fed and fostered by our recent, and in a way successful, prohibition of gaming-houses. Whether we and the noble houses and the young patricians have been much the gainers by exchanging faro and hazard for the betting-book and the betting-ring may be fairly doubted. It seems to make mighty little difference whether dukes and earls laid down and lost their broad acres on a green table or on a green race-course. On the whole, perhaps, we are in some sense worse off than before; for if the annals of WHITE'S and the Cocoa-Tree and CROCKFORD'S are to be depended on, gentlemen lost their money with their social equals, and we did not hear so much of the PADWICKS and MORRISES and BEYFUSES of that period. Nor will ingenuity be wanting, when races and betting on races are forbidden, for ingenious gamesters to divert the passion for betting into new and strange channels. Cards, dice, and the Turf are only the raw material for which plenty of substitutes will be found to engage what very nearly amounts to a universal passion and proprium of modern man.

No doubt the immediate form of the evil might be suppressed. In deference to what is called public opinion, and to the present tumultuously virtuous state of the public conscience, those most concerned and the most respectable among racing men might perform a great sacrifice on the altar of their country and humanity. The Jockey Club might execute the happy despatch and plunge a moral knife into their bowels. Messrs. TATTERSALL might sell themselves up. All owners and breeders might shoot each and every one of their fiery-footed steeds. Admiral Rous might apply to the Admiralty for the Channel Fleet, and Mr. PADWICK might open a neat chandler's-shop or take to any other useful calling. Or we might pass a law to make a bet a capital crime. Public opinion no doubt could, the Legislature no doubt could, go to the root of the matter. But the one remedy is just as possible as the other. The old impotent shriek that we can neither bear our evils nor their remedies, is likely to last as long as the civilization of which it is the unsatisfactory expression. What, then, is to be done? The possible remedies are twofold. We might formally legalize betting—in fact, to some extent we do—and betting-houses to boot; and of course place the whole thing under restrictions. Indeed, we believe such a remedy has been thought of, and it has at least so much of analogy in its favour, that it treats this vice as public feeling treats, or ought to treat, other social and uneradicable evils. We do not say that this remedy is, in the present state of feeling or prejudice, likely to be applied to the evil; we know too well the difficulties which lie across other attempts to do only what is possible when extreme and consistent courses are impossible. But there is one objection to it sure to be urged, which is plausible, though not substantial. It will be said that this, after all, is only the present state of things under another form. We should pass very strict laws about betting-houses, and public sweeps, and Turf agents, and we should punish very heavily the shop-boys and small tradesmen who delight in their Sporting Life and the Turf prophets, but we should leave the Newmarket Rooms just as they are. This is quite true; yet it is not only what we are doing, but what we always must do. There is, and must be in one sense, one law, or practice, for the rich and another for the poor. We can prohibit cards and dicing and drunkenness in public-houses which are licensed; we cannot, however much we may wish to do it, prohibit luxury, extravagance, and gambling in clubs. And the reason for this is because there is a difference in the two things. Morally, the sin is often the same; but the public wrong and evil is not the same. A prostitute is a prostitute, and incurs the same moral obloquy whether she is ANONYMA or frequents the streets of Portsmouth; but her actions in the one case are, and in the other are not, matters of public concern. That is to say, the law is bound rather to concern itself with the general public consequences of vice than with the moral character of actions. We are not to shrink from the imperfect possible because we shall be met with taunts of inconsistency that we are not doing the impossible perfect. Even the greatest Teacher regulated his teaching by the practical standard of knowing what was in man. They were deemed fools of old time who did not understand that there were conditions in which the half was more than the whole.

Something however, we insist, may be done, because something must be done. He would be unwise who ventures beyond this safe and timid generality. We doubt whether much can be done in the way of legislation except indirectly. Turf gambling is not likely to be made the subject of specific statute; but the vultures intimately connected with Turf gambling may be struck down, or crippled. Law and legislation have already plenty of the opprobria legis to deplore, and amend as they can; but Courts of Equity are a mockery if they cannot be invested with powers—new powers if need be—of dealing with the kind of transactions which have lately become so scandalously notorious. It does not want the revival of the Usury Laws, or it ought not to want it, to devise a new remedy for a new evil. And if we can make Turf speculation an unsafe speculation, we may well decline to attempt, and attempt in vain, to deal with its immorality. Something, too, might be done by social discouragement. Racing lives because it is a very composite affair. Some, though a decreasing minority, patronize the Turf from old associations, from love of the horse and of sport generally, and from the picturesque associations of racing. They will have to give up a good deal by giving up an amusement not a malum in se; but the time has come when such a sacrifice may perhaps be demanded from those who love racing only for racing's sake. As it is, the unquestionable evil so far outweighs the possible good of the whole thing, that we see no good reason why the non-betting owners of horses should not give up the Turf entirely and take their names off Jockey Clubs and Newmarket Rooms and such privileged places. The Turf would then be abandoned to the Turfites proper. To be a member of TATTERSALL'S would come to be as complete a social disqualification as to be a partner in a Baden Bank, or a dealer in accommodation acceptances. Man, especially the English variety, is an imitative animal, and if we get the Turf as fairly discredited as the Ring is—that is, if betting on races is given up like duelling and milling the Charleys—it will die off in Fleet Street because voted low in Pall Mall. But we are not Utopians. We fear that we are a long way off this. As to TATTERSALL'S, there cannot be two opinions about it. We are of plain, unrefining Mr. MANSFIELD'S mind. Just now we are all for justice, simple, single-minded justice. TATTERSALL'S is an institution, perhaps something of an establishment. It stands in the way of our austere love and practice of pure, simple justice. This particular establishment hinders us from doing as we would be done by. Well, then, if we destroy Established Churches, and all in the name of Justice, we may perhaps pluck up courage, and take in hand Established Betting Clubs at Knightsbridge and Newmarket.

A SPANISH CATHOLIC ON THE GENERAL COUNCIL

IT is not an uncommon impression even among educated Protestants that the Roman Catholic Church is a vast hierarchical organization in which the laity and even the bulk of the priesthood, though called by courtesy part of the Church, neither have, nor care to have, any other part than that of obedient listeners to whatever their authorities may choose to tell them; that they are too docile or too indifferent, as the case may be, to recalcitrate against any dogmas, however extravagant, which the Pope or the Bishops may order them to swallow. As Dr. Newman puts it, it is supposed "that a Catholic, layman or priest, is indifferent to the subject, or, from a sort of recklessness, will accept anything that is put before him." And it has accordingly been widely assumed that whatever the approaching Council may proclaim as matter of faith will be quietly, even if reluctantly, acquiesced in, though it may be in trenchant opposition to the verdict of history, and may contradict the traditional belief of the Church no less than the convictions of reason and the moral sense. We have ventured to doubt whether this estimate is a correct one, and we have given from time to time strong evidence of a contrary tendency among the deeper thinkers of Catholic Germany. Only the other day a very outspoken address, from laymen of the diocese of Trèves to their Bishop, appeared in the German newspapers. And a pamphlet on the Council, published at Munich, under the title Die Kirche Gottes und die Bischöfe, is now before us by Señor Llaño, a Spaniard of noble birth who has made his home in Germany. He is a writer whom even Ultramontane malevolence cannot venture to stigmatize as "a bad Catholic," for he is known to be a man of devout and ascetic life, much given to prayer and fasting. He is a follower of St. Augustine, an admirer of Port Royal, and a friend of the illustrious Thiersch, whose book on the Apostolic Age will be familiar to many of our readers in its English dress. Llaño writes like a man of profound convictions, ardently Catholic in belief, and deeply in earnest in his alarm and grief at the present crisis in the destiny of his Church. He tells us, in his preface, that he is moved to speak out "at this fateful moment" in the most sacred interests of the Church to which he is above all devoted, by observing the machinations of a party never before permitted as it is now to identify its own crotchets with dogmatic truth, while "he knows what immeasurable dangers threaten us should the plans of that school be even in part realized." He accordingly addresses himself first to the pastors and chief pastors of the Church, then to the depositaries of knowledge, whether secular or religious, to all members of the Church, especially fathers of families, to all well-disposed Protestants who wish to hold fast to positive Christianity, and to all well-disposed statesmen, whatever confession they may belong to. We will attempt to put our readers in possession of the main outlines of this remarkable work, though we can do but inadequate justice to it within our present limits. Those who are interested in the subject, and who read German, would find the whole work repay a careful perusal.

After some comments on the present situation, the author refers to a speech made at the recent Papal Jubilee expressing the same desires as those put forward in the Civiltà, which he also quotes, that the Pope's infallibility and the bodily assumption of the Virgin may be defined by the Council as "a wholesome humiliation of human pride." And he expresses his surprise that none should have felt bound to oppose this "wicked playing with what is most holy, with the faith and the contents of divine revelation." He then urges that nothing can be defined as de fide which is not contained in the original revelation, that the faith of the Church is unchangeable, and that "latent doctrines" which have been openly denied for eighteen hundred years cannot conceivably become points of faith now. But this is precisely what is being attempted by Ultramontanism—or, as he prefers to call it, Curialismus—namely, "the sentiment of the Roman Curia which surrounds the Holy See, and constantly exerts the most deplorable influence upon it." For the divine guidance of the Church in its full and manifold organic action it would substitute a pretended inspiration, like that of the Quakers, confined to the person of the Pope. In its theory of "latent dogmas" it comes near to the old Protestant notion of an invisible Church, and with its unlimited development, of which the Pope is the sole organ, it stands on the ground of Hegelianism. This Papal infallibility is "a deadly assault on the sacred constitution and divine idea of the Church." The Ultramontane system took its rise from the time of the Council of Constance, but was less dangerous doctrinally under the "Sadducean" Popes of the Renaissance who cared little for spiritual things. With the movement of internal reform which led to the Protestant schism, Ultramontanism took occasion to strengthen its theological position. The Council of Trent left open a back door whereby the Pope came into possession of centralized despotic power, and the Spanish Inquisition, the nunciatures, and, above all, the Jesuits, helped it on. This led in time to a complete, though silent, revolution in the whole constitution of the Church, and it was promoted by the political movements of the eighteenth century, especially by the French Revolution which destroyed the last stronghold of ancient Church principles and freedom, the Gallican Church. The teaching of the catechism, preaching, and public worship have been affected by the change. The pulpit utters "a strange language" out of harmony with the thoughts and needs of the people; worship is become lifeless and unreal, no Scripture is read, and the people can take no part in the liturgy. National rites are everywhere abolished to make way for the Roman. Instead of the Church being defined as the assembly of the faithful instituted by Christ and by legitimate pastors, of whom the successor of Peter is first, but only ministerially as the visible representative of Christ, it is defined simply as "the great visible company of all Christians under their common chief pastor the Pope," Christ not even being mentioned. The Pope, instead of holding a purely ministerial office as the president of the whole episcopate, is become an absolute monarch, with the bishops for his vicars, who have merely to obey his commands, and are to be deposed or got rid of by appointing a coadjutor over their heads, if they demur to this position. And in pursuance of this bureaucratic and revolutionary policy it is sought to make parish priests everywhere removable at the mere caprice of their bishop, of which we have abundant examples in France. "What Christian rule can that be," asks Llaño, "under an irresponsible tyranny, where bishops, themselves the creatures of Rome, suspend or depose their priests for any reason or no reason, and the sacraments are openly refused to pious laymen against whom no charge can be brought but of opinions displeasing to the dominant party?" So rapidly has this "system of the Curia" developed itself during the last few years that Cardinals Pacca and Consalvi, who promoted it in their day, could they rise from their graves, would wonder whether they were waking or dreaming. The Pope, indeed, calls himself "servant of the servants of God," but so did Frederic II of Prussia call himself "the servant of the State," in the sense of Louis XIV when he said "L'Etat c'est moi." The bishops are expected to hear and obey without a word, as though under military discipline, on the principle introduced by Ignatius Loyola, and which all sound theologians agree in regarding as a caricature of genuine obedience. It is remarkable that the Jesuits have pushed this principle to the uttermost excess of what Bossuet called hérésie de la domination, while in all other points their moral theology has been of the laxest. Meanwhile the Catholic periodical press of Germany—probably the author would say much the same of the English—is either in the hands of ignorant and fiery zealots who exercise a most pernicious influence, or of those who groan under the tyranny of a party, and dare not tell the naked truth. A Regensburg journal has had a series of articles on the Œcumenical Council, written by men equally ignorant of Scripture, the Fathers, the early scholastics, the really great divines of the last five centuries, and of Church history, while yet "they are furious with every one who will not swear by their rhapsodies."

Llaño goes on to trace the result of this state of things on the present condition of Christendom and the prospects of the General Council. It has been thought necessary to merge the honour of the Episcopate in the interests of the Primate, whereas he is in truth limited by it, and not it by him, as Pope Gregory the Great has shown. Historical faith has been discredited, and the people have had a mere shadow put before them—an easy but purely mechanical rule of belief—in place of the living and life-giving idea of the Catholic Church. The natural consequence has followed, and instead of being united to the Church by a living bond of sympathy, they have become indifferently or altogether alienated, even where habit or temporal interests have held them back from any overt act of separation. Yet a rightly instructed Catholic will feel the sufferings of the Church to be his own; and if he suffers from the tyranny of those who bear rule, as St. Augustine tells us may often happen, and is thrust out of her Communion for no fault of his own, he will bear it patiently, knowing that he is recognised and rewarded by the Father who seeth in secret. Llaño proceeds to examine what is the true office of the Church in regard to Christian doctrine, of which the Apostles were the sole "original organs," and which it is left to her not to create de novo, as though there could be any further revelation, but to interpret only, the human element in her constitution acting in union with the divine, but not being absorbed by it. At some periods, as in the days of Athanasius, truth has been in a minority, for there is no promise that the greater portion of the Church shall always remain in possession of it, as Cardinal Turrecremata says, "Nunquam fides deficiet de Ecclesiâ, quoniam semper in aliquibus, multis aut paucis, fides permanebit." The Bishops, as the special representatives of Christ on earth, and "the chief and noblest instruments" set in His Church, have the principal part in the maintenance and guardianship of the true faith, but it is an indispensable condition of the legitimate exercise of their functions that they should be loyal to their trust. A true Œcumenical Council must not only be lawfully assembled, but must act lawfully. It can no more hand over to the "ministerial chief pastor of the Church" the gift of infallibility which it possesses only so far as it represents the Universal Church—on which, and not on bishops per se, still less on the Pope, God has bestowed the gift—than a priest could depute a layman to say mass for him. Such a decree, if passed, would not be worth the paper it is written on. The great Gerson, who was the life and soul of two General Councils held during his lifetime, has laid down the conditions under which alone such Councils can be deemed legitimate, and one is that no single member of the Church who has anything to say can be denied a hearing. His four conditions are—that the Council be lawfully assembled, that it be assembled for a lawful cause, that its members fully discharge, and do not alienate to others, their duties in the investigation and settlement of the points in controversy, and that there be perfect freedom of speech, consultation, and voting. If any of these conditions fail, the assistance of the Holy Ghost cannot be expected, and the acts of the Council are null and void. But on the Ultramontane principle Councils are both unnecessary and useless, for what one man can do he does best alone, and the universal and constant practice of the Church in summoning these representative assemblies is itself a clenching condemnation of that principle; so that one can only wonder at the policy of the party just now all-powerful at Rome in summoning a Council in order by its means to render all future Councils superfluous.

The author defends his view at length from the writings of Bossuet and the principles of the Gallican, which are those of the ancient, Church. He shows that bishops sit in Councils as representatives of the Universal Church, as judges of doctrine, not as its legislators and creators, and ought to be instructed by learned theologians and the members of Theological Faculties. These necessary conditions were not fully attended to at the Council of Trent, and any further "modernization of practice" would make the possibility of a Council really Œcumenical very doubtful. "We ought not to hear of the matters for debate being prepared beforehand by bishops and others summoned to Rome for the purpose, at the caprice of the Curia, and who hear those witnesses only whom they choose to call; or of some bishops only being allowed a seat and vote in the Council, and only those priests—to say nothing of laymen—being allowed to speak whom the Curia approves. There should be nothing in the slightest degree like the method of procedure in 1854 (in reference to the Immaculate Conception). And therefore, great as is the need for a Council, the present design cannot but be viewed with the greatest suspicion." Laño then traces out the work which a Council of the present day might profitably undertake, very much in accordance with the suggestions we recently quoted from the address of lay Catholics in Germany, but more in detail. But he does not conceal his fears that matters have come to a pass when, through "the fundamental upsetting of the true constitution of the Church," nothing can hinder the fabrication of unauthorized dogmas, and, if so, a terrible judgment is impending over the Church like that which came upon the people of the old Covenant when they rejected the Redeemer. Why, he asks, is authority everywhere despised as it never has been at any previous period of Christian history? "Because one authority has been straining every nerve to destroy the rest, because the true and genuine authority of the Church is contemned and violated (genothzuchtigt) by the Curia which surrounds and tyrannizes over the first See of Christendom, and the notion of the Church and its authority is so deformed that the people cannot recognise it at all." The author points out the utter hopelessness of winning back either Protestants or Greeks to unity while the present system dominates in the Church, and winds up with a passionate appeal to the pastors and the flock of Christ to look what a wretched spectacle the Church presents, imploring them to weigh in the balances of the sanctuary the intellectual creators of the present system—Bonald, Lamennais, De Maistre—who began by making a tabula rasa of the past, against the sound and genuine doctors of the Church in every age from the patristic downward; and he reminds them of the end of Lamennais, whose "process of development" led him, by a natural transition, through Ultramontanism to atheism. And he contrasts the feebleness, the party-spirit, the tyranny, the formalism and bureaucracy, the zeal for the shell and disregard for its inner kernel within the Church on the one hand, with the growing hatred and contempt of an age sinking constantly more deeply in materialism on the other.

No reasonable man can wonder that a devout Roman Catholic should speak in this strain. Even the Ultramontane press of Germany, which at first welcomed the programme of the Civiltà, is now, as we learn from the Allgemeine Zeitung, shrinking back in alarm and beginning to deny the official character of that journal. But it is no secret in Rome that the statements which have raised such a storm were prepared and sent for publication by Jesuits in France, with the express sanction of the Pope. This, by the way, disposes of a transparently futile and disingenuous criticism on some former articles of ours in last week's Tablet. The fact appears to be that the Court of Rome is using the Civiltà much as Ministerial organs are sometimes used in this country, for the purpose of feeling the pulse of the public about measures which the Government are resolved to bring forward if they see a fair chance of carrying them. But the Curia has done more than this. It has been making the bishops of various countries hold provincial synods, and send their decrees for revision by a Roman Congregation, after which they are published so as to give the appearance of a general consent to Papal infallibility, and the Jesuit organs have trumpeted the result. Antonelli has openly said that there can be no difficulty about the proclamation of Papal infallibility, as it is held already by all good Catholics; and this is the watchword of the whole party in Rome. The matter has been laid before a preparatory Commission in Rome, which has decided in favour of it though the decision has not yet been made public. Some people flatter themselves that the decree proposed will be guarded by a "quasi," but there is no ground for such an expectation as long as the Jesuits, who hold Pius IX. completely in their hands, bear sway. They are well aware that at his death power may pass into other hands, and are determined to press for an absolute definition first, if possible, especially Father Picirilo, who is the leading man of the Civiltà staff. Meanwhile one section of the French Episcopate has manifested signs of opposition. Mgr. Dupanloup, in two articles in the Français, has protested against these tendencies, and expressed the desire of the French bishops for reforms in the Church in accordance with the spirit of the age, and a reconciliation of her claims with modern culture and freedom. But the Court counts on a majority. Seats are prepared for 850 bishops, the question whether bishops in partibus are to have votes being still undecided. To these must be added 70 Cardinals, of whom 40 are Italians. Of the bishops 600 are of the Latin nations, 294 Italians, 66 Spanish, 22 Portuguese, 90 French, with whom must be reckoned 77 of the Brazils, Mexico, and South America. But sixty Italian sees are vacant. There are 65 German bishops, 48 English and Irish, 52 North American, 6 Belgian, 16 Canadian, 5 in Holland, 20 in Greece and Turkey. The Polish and Russian bishops, and the Greek and Armenian Uniates, would make about 50 more, if they come. Antonelli is said to reckon on from 500 to 600 votes of those present. From a political point of view Prince Hohenlohe has very naturally called the attention of the European Courts to the crisis, and is anxious, in the interests both of Church and State, that they should put themselves into communication with their bishops beforehand, in the hope of averting the grave complications that would inevitably ensue if the Council were to elevate Papal infallibility, and the propositions of the Syllabus, into dogmas, and thereby place the Church directly at issue with the acknowledged principles of every Government in Europe. It appears that the Italian and Prussian Governments have already adopted Prince Hohenlohe's Circular, and the adhesion of France anticipated.

CONFUSION OF IDEAS.

IT is a favourite view with some people that all fools are knaves. We can understand the value of this theory to an impatient temper exasperated by folly, as it affords a moral ground and justification for the anger that stupidity brought to bear on our private affairs is apt to excite. In so far as it is a true theory—and everybody's experience will supply some instances in point—this must arise, not from any necessary alliance between folly and knavery, but from confusion of ideas, from the inability to hold abstract principle in immediate contact with a visible and present expediency. The weak intelligence can only see one thing at a time. There are rigidly conscientious fools, who give even lawful expediency the go-by altogether, and are strict and punctilious about absolutely trivial matters to a degree which disqualifies them for any active part in life. But we more commonly see folly start on its career with only average conscientiousness, and then there are certain to be occasions when mere want of sense and of power to embrace the situation and realize consequences will betray the fool into knavish conduct, or into ready condonation of knavery, from which better capacity rather than stricter conscience would have saved him. We have read of a Fiji native missionary who, in white tie, black coat, and spectacles, went to remonstrate with a compatriot who had stolen a pig. "It is true I did steal it," said the thief; "and I am sorry for it, but what is to be done now, for the pig is roasted, and I was just going to eat it? It would be a pity to waste it, come and eat it with me." The argument was irresistible, and the thief and his reprover sat down together. Nor was our black-coated friend in the least aware, as he told his tale, of a weak point in his line of action, the shame and sin of wasting good things naturally obscured more abstract considerations. And so it is constantly with the knavery of folly. The present and particular puts the absent and general out of sight. And in this respect the fool takes his stand with the barbarian and the savage, who are necessarily subject to confusion of ideas where their notions of expediency are confronted with abstract principle. A Cossack general, having recommended an Empress of Russia to kill all the nobility of Sweden, in after years made no secret of his advice. "But," said an objector, "that would have been barbarous." "I do not see that," was the answer, "they are all dead now." He could not argue the case on general principles, nor regard an act of injustice on ethical grounds. There is no reflection, no reference to precedent and law, either the conclusions of the savage or the counsels of folly; and though the very lowest rational being may be held to have sense enough to act rightly, yet it will not be denied that the weaker the intellect the more stringent must be the conscience in order to bring this about—that it needs a full share of its to carry the majority of men through a moral difficulty creditably.

The more complicated are social relations the more must this be the case. The barbarian goes right, when he does go right, from ignorance of any other course than one. Even his incapacity for any intricate intellectual process is often a moral safeguard. M. Vámbéry, having been asked to assist where bargains were made on credit among the Turkomans, was employed to draw up their cheques, and to his surprise saw the debtors pocket these documents. When he questioned the creditor on this remarkable proceeding, the answer was, "What have I to do with the writing?—the debtor must keep it by him as a reminder of the debt." This beautiful trustful simplicity is a trait of the greatest robbers, pillagers, and kidnappers in the world; they are honest because their minds are not open to the ingenuities of fraud, nor equal to the comprehension of an I O.U. Once let them be as well instructed as the fool of civilization is in this road to their neighbour's purse, can we doubt that they will turn sharpers as well as thieves? It follows that there cannot be a greater error than we have known committed in mistaking that aptitude for arithmetic which is sometimes seen in capacities generally inferior for a talent for finance, and placing one so gifted within reach of the attractions and temptations of money-dealing. The fool of the money-market, strong in his supposed speciality, does not recognise confusion where a wiser man needs little skill in figures to see the densest confusion of all. He sees things straight that are intricate and perplexed, and woe to the friends who trust this exceptional clearness of vision. And here he often gets himself the character of knave as well; with hypocrisy very probably superadded. For his conscience will retain its scrupulosity in its own field, and will never own responsibility where he has never recognised danger.

Few can follow this subject without some personal application. Most men are familiar with the feeling of intellectual confusion, jumble, and misfit. Real clearness of view, and an eye for consequences, is not a gift granted to many. We all suffer from a blindness to cause and effect not wholly dissimilar in kind from the broad examples we have given. We see a hundred matters through the distortions and zigzags of our habits and wishes. Our immediate subject, however, does not extend itself to mere confusion of thought, but only to such confusion developing into absurdity of speech or action. We do not even enter into that mistiness of the intellectual and moral sense combined which so often issues in

> Confounding the difference 'twixt meum and tuum
> By kindly converting it all into suum.

Confusion of ideas of the pronounced sort we mean may be divided into the eloquent and the passive; into that which rushes into self-exposure, and that more respectable form which betrays itself only under undue pressure. The one may be illustrated by the member of Parliament who rose to ask if the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been called to the number steeples in Holland that had lately been struck by lightning. We have an example of the other in the case of a worthy policeman who, being asked as to the general character of the man at the bar, blurted out, "Four months ago I had him in custody," and, being again and again checked, and told to speak as to his general knowledge, could only repeat "Four months ago," till, appearing deficient in the faculty of generalization, he was ordered to stand down. Conspicuous confusion of this sort is generally due to a fixed idea. The unbending, unsociable nature of a fixed idea stands in the way of all combinations and associations of thought on equal terms. It is master of the field, and will infallibly betray itself by some eccentricity, as in the stories of absent philosophers possessed by an idea, or in cases of all-absorbing egoism like that of Peter the Great, who went to war with a people who had not paid him royal honours when he passed through their country in disguise. There were in this case two trains of thought which a man of strong blind will could not connect. He could not suppress the notion of self so as to suppose it out of the general knowledge; the complicated idea of pretence, assumption, disguise, with all its consequences, had no chance against the absorbing sense of royalty and power. The point of this confusion, as in bulls, lies in the misfit. In fact, all telling examples of it are bulls, and exhibit an incongruity missed by the actor, and by him only. And as our pleasure in bulls has been said to lie in a sense of superiority, so it is with these instances of a muddled brain, more especially where the muddle co-exists with powers of an exceptionally high order. As a clear view is a delightful sensation, so to see clearly where a deep thinker encounters an absurd entanglement carries with it a double, though perhaps transient, exultation. And this is often afforded us by a concentration of the mind on one subject. The same may be said where, not thought, but duty, interferes with the power of connecting, assimilating, and reconciling new and foreign collateral ideas with the prevailing and over-mastering one. A vast deal of wit consists in playing with this confusion of ideas, in plunging into a cloud of vagueness, in knotting an unintelligible tangle, and imparting the mystification for the fraction of a moment to the hearer or reader: as where Charles Lamb, vexed with an adverse critique, exclaimed, "Hang the age; I will write for antiquity"; and Horace Walpole, grumbling over his summer fire, "For we are forced to raise an English July in a hot-house like grapes."

Many people cultivate this confusion as a justification or excuse for unreasonable expectations. They refuse to be enlightened. It is this that makes some women so difficult to transact business with. Sheltering themselves under the necessity of self-protection—women, as such, being of course victims—they assume a greater incapacity for understanding matters of fact than really belongs to them, from a secret fear that they would lose something by understanding them. They would not for the world be better informed. They are grasping and exacting under the cloak of an incurable incapacity for all legal or business details that require close and sustained attention. This confusion is also cherished by the lover of a grievance, whose vocation would be gone if he could once see any other side than his own, and that in convenient indistinctness. Not seldom confusion gives the impression of richness and fulness to the mind clouded by it. Pope has drawn too painful a picture of the would-be author sitting down, under this delusion of fertility, to utilize his stores:—

> Then gnaw'd his pen, then dash'd it to the ground,
> Sinking from thought to thought a vast profound;
> Plunged for his sense, but found no bottom there,
> Yet writhed and flounder'd on in mere despair;
> Round him much embryo, much abortion lay,
> Much future ode and abdicated play.
> Nonsense precipitate like running lead
> That slipped through crags and zigzags of the head.

Probably there is no surer manufactory of intellectual confusion than the short roads to learning and knowledge which are devised to remove it. The state of a young lady's mind after a course of lectures on chemistry or philology, or some fashionable branch of metaphysical inquiry, might be matter for curious investigation to any one admitted to close quarters—a privilege, however, rarely granted, as mother-wit is generally on its guard to stave off impertinent scrutiny. There may be a general sense of enlargement and stimulated intellect without any clear knowledge whether the theories which have been the lecturer's theme have been asserted or refuted by him. The real victims, however, under this head are the members of an average congregation subjected to the teaching of a controversialist who expects them to follow the windings of his logic, and to accompany him with minds alert and attention unflagging through the difficult, the abstract, the knotty, and the involved argument that leads to the remote conclusion. Tell them his conclusions, and the preacher has some chance; argue them through all their subtle proofs, and not one in twenty knows what he would be at, while not a few believe him to be undermining instead of defending—superfluously defending—what are to them self-evident truths. Early in his ministerial career Bishop Blomfield was taught a lesson on this point. He preached before a country congregation on the being of a God, and used all the arguments which are brought against the Atheist. Walking home he asked one of his hearers how he liked the sermon. "Well, Mr. Blomfield," replied the man, "I liked the sermon well enough, but I can't say I agree with you, I really think there be a God." Thenceforth the future bishop was, if anything, almost too practical.

ENGLISH HOSPITALITY TO DISTINGUISHED FOREIGNERS.

It need not be formally proved that hospitality is a good thing. When any conspicuous person visits our shores, we should certainly receive him with all the politeness in our power, fire off our cannon, sound our trumpets, beat our drums, and generally make his life as busy, noisy, and intolerable as possible. The special reasons which make such a proceeding desirable in the case of a potentate whose dominions have such an interest for us those of the Viceroy of Egypt are also far too obvious to need explanation. The more private manifestations of hospitality would doubtless be in every way calculated to make his stay amongst us agreeable. We would fain hope that he will also have enjoyed the more conspicuous ceremonials in which we, the British public in general, have been invited to take part. The review at Windsor, for example, could not fail to be a stirring spectacle to every foreigner. He must have more than human stolidity not to be overwhelmed by the contemplation of the fact that we can collect from four to thousand human beings so like machines that they will, in case of necessity, ride straight over each other, or anybody else. If the numbers might be larger in other countries, it is to be remembered that these are Englishmen, and as our great poet has very properly remarked,

> Upon one pair of English legs
> Do march three Frenchmen.

At any rate they are a good sample, and the Viceroy would not forget that a certain number of their brethren succeeded very creditably in catching King Theodore. Then the Crystal Palace has become one of the wonders of the world. In former days a foreigner in a distant corner of the earth who wished to show his appreciation of England always asked after the Thames Tunnel. More remarkable pieces of engineering have lately put the nose of that stupendous work rather out of joint. The Crystal Palace has succeeded to the place it occupied in public estimation. We need not inquire too earnestly whether the Crystal Palace has quite fulfilled all the prophecies which were made about its civilizing influence; and whether, for example, fireworks and rope-dancing have not put the more instructive parts of its contents rather too much out of sight. The anthropologist may perhaps regret that the museum illustrative of the varieties of the human race is reduced to one wooden savage something like the Highlander in a tobacconist's shop. Still the Palace, as it chooses to call itself, is a show not easily to be equalled in its way, and is one of the most attractive baits for sightseers in the world. It is specially adapted for music on a gigantic scale, and the Viceroy might be gratified by the delicacy of feeling displayed in respect to the subjects selected. The sacred music was confined to the first part of the concert, previous to his arrival, so that the audience might gratify their feelings of religious veneration without offending the prejudices of different creed. The one exception to this rule—the song

"Philistines, hark"—had, we presume, no application to the distinguished visitors. It is always pleasant to see religious ardour combined with civility. The Crystal Palace is in one other respect incomparable; there is no such place for fireworks known to us; and, so far as rockets and coloured lights and set devices can afford adequate expression to national enthusiasm, the Viceroy must have felt that his reception was worthy of him and his entertainers.

There was, however, one little interlude which, we should fancy, must have suggested mingled reflections to an Eastern ruler. The Duke of Sutherland, it seems, entertained the distinguished visitors at dinner in an apartment provided for the occasion. Hereupon five thousand ladies and gentlemen crowded that end of the transept, and for an hour and a half continued stamping their feet and cheering, with the object, as we are pleasantly told, of "drawing" the distinguished visitor. The metaphor is taken, we presume, from the national amusement of badger-baiting. The guests stood this apparently with a heroism deserving of the highest commendation; but human flesh and blood, especially at dinner, cannot stand the indefinite trampling of ten thousand feet and yelling of five thousand throats. Accordingly, the Viceroy was at last compelled to appear, entertaining, as we would fain hope, no lurking suspicion that he was about to fall a victim to Christian fanaticism, and to be presented with the alternative of immediate baptism or assassination. The vast crowd seems to have dispersed after raising a howl, pleasantly described as a "hearty round of applause," and the poor Viceroy was allowed to return and finish his dinner in peace. This pleasant specimen of British cordiality is only too significant. In official language, we describe the whole performance as extending the national hospitality to a distinguished foreigner. In the vernacular, it would be more forcibly described as "drawing" a potentate. The Viceroy seems to have afforded excellent sport. We value a beast of prey according to the obstinacy of his resistance, and an hour and a half would be a very long time for the boldest of animals to withstand the inarticulate yells of five thousand English "ladies and gentlemen"—to say nothing of the fact that squibs and crackers were in the background ready to be employed in case of prolonged obduracy. He was quite right to yield, as possibly the glass of the marvellous building, constructed of a single window, might have suffered; but, had we been in his place, we should have reflected that constitutional Government has its drawbacks, and that a sovereign people is apt to be as careless of the feelings of its victims as any despotic ruler.

Indeed it is the weak point of our national hospitality that it is too apt to degenerate into a process of "drawing." If our own Royal Family venture to indulge in a period of retirement, they are "drawn" with singular emphasis and vigour. If they go on a railway journey, they are in danger of being drawn at every station; if they attend any public ceremonial, they are significantly reminded that their position in life is to serve as prompters for outbursts of loud applause, and having subjected them to this performance, we all go home and boast loudly of the strength and delicacy of our loyal sentiment. When the plan is adopted for the benefit of foreigners, it must become rather puzzling to the recipients of the compliment. The Emperor of the French, for example, was received at the Crystal Palace several years ago, and was applauded much in the same spirit as that in which we welcomed the Viceroy of Egypt. For some time previously we had been assuring him with great energy that he was one of the most unmitigated scoundrels who ever ascended a throne by means of a dark and bloody conspiracy. The high spirit of the English people, their ardent love of freedom and hatred of despotism, would not allow them to choose their expressions in denouncing the assassin of French liberty. Yet somehow the whole of London turned out to cheer him to the echo, and he enjoyed the delightful ceremony known to the public as an "ovation" from a multitude which crowded the Crystal Palace. There was apparently a trifling inconsistency in our language, but it is easily explained by remembering that, in fact, we were merely drawing a potentate. When, some time afterwards, Garibaldi paid us a visit, we were ready to draw him with equal vigour and enthusiasm. We do not inquire whether the small sediment of sincere admiration which of course existed at the bottom of the popular feeling in both cases was stronger in one instance or the other. In both of them the great mass of shouters, stampers, and cheerers were actuated, above all, by the delights of our national amusement, and they would doubtless have been as ready to do as much for anybody else who would offer them a tolerable excuse for making a noise. Mr. Reverdy Johnson was drawn, with rather unfortunate results, at innumerable banquets; if General Grant should come over, he would be drawn with equal zeal; and we have no doubt that Mr. Jefferson Davis, if the event of the war had not made the process palpably out of place, would have been the nucleus of a crowd as noisy and demonstrative as any of its predecessors. If we put any kind of stick or straw into the proper solution it will become the centre of a crystalline deposit; and it is only necessary to insert some conspicuous foreign body into an English crowd to produce such an effervescence and noisy disturbance as that which we have been witnessing. It is to be wished that we had some more delicate mode of testifying our enthusiasm; but, as it is, we must only be glad that the popular explosions which take place on so little provocation are generally as harmless as they are noisy.

We would not, indeed, deny for a moment that there is something very flattering to the Viceroy in the interest with which he has been received. It should be inexpressibly gratifying to any man to reflect that an animated controversy has been carried on in the papers, and questions asked in Parliament, as to the mode by which he was transferred from the steamboat to the railway, whether by a vulgar cab or an elegant brougham, or simply by those modes of progression with which Providence has furnished him. Undoubtedly the British public has regarded him with a keen interest. In saying that he was not more frequently drawn than the Emperor of the French or Garibaldi have been, or than the Pope or General Grant or Count Bismark would be, we merely say that he was as attractive an object as some of the most distinguished people in the world. Only it would be still more gratifying if there were some sort of discrimination in our attentions. We are apt to treat any and every visitor as we treated the hippopotamus on his first arrival in England, before he had made himself rather too common by the extreme bonhomie of his manners; we shout and whistle opposite their cages until they come out and show themselves, and then treat them to the same sort of howl with which we greet kings or acrobats or winners of the Derby. It would be pleasanter if there were some reason to suppose that the British public knew whether the Viceroy was a Christian, a Mahommedan, or a Buddhist, and in what quarter of the globe his dominions were situated. Meanwhile, if we cannot discourse very delicate music, we can at all times be certain of getting up a good noisy chorus, and may hope that the tastes of our guests are not too particular.

COUNTERFEITS.

THE relation between art and morals involved in the production respectively of a good picture and a bad shilling is capable of very easy definition. In the border-land which lies between the two extremes it may not be so easy to draw the separating line, or to decide at what point the admiration which has faded into acquiescence must give place to the condition of mind in which we despise the counterfeit while it still stops short of actual fraud and crime. The summary method of escape from the necessity of any such decision which the author of the De Republicâ proposed to society in his time would scarcely be acceptable in ours, even were it possible. The ingenious artist who could offer to us an illusion either of hearing or sight—let us say Mrs. German Reed, or Professor Pepper—was to be received with something like semi-divine honours, and conducted over the border. If he should come to London, and announce by advertisement his exhibition or his entertainment, it would be our duty, through the agency of either the Lord Mayor or Mr. Gladstone, to pour ointment on his head and crown him with wool—unless we preferred to invite him to dinner—but to inform him that there are no persons of his class in the metropolis, that their residence here is illegal, and that therefore we are compelled with great regret to dismiss him to another city, probably to Paris. The world, however, has not made any very marked advance since Plato's time, notwithstanding the temporary spurt of Puritanism, towards the "austere and unpleasant" social tone after which the philosopher professed to long, and the day is still at some distance when his agreeable theory may become popular, that a consummate artist is, in termini, a consummate liar. The ethical difficulty therefore remains unsolved, and the art of counterfeiting pervades the whole of our social life. We propose now to deal with this eminently popular art only as it appeals to the eye in the ornamental accessories which mark, or are supposed to mark, the various degrees of wealth or social position, and independently of personal shams, such as rouge, false hair, and the stock-in-trade of Madame Rachel.

The simplest rules of natural and unconventional existence would require that everything in a man's surroundings should seem to be exactly what it is; that the furniture of his life should be in keeping with his station and means, and that there should be no affectation either of a lower or a higher position, nor any pretence in the direction either of meanness or of luxury. But probably this ideal of life would be found in practice as unattainable as Plato's absolute banishment from the State of all imitative artists. An unsettled time, when the possession of wealth and the appliances of luxury become a positive source of danger, will render the dissimulation of wealth a social necessity, and a highly civilized and luxurious time, when men are measured by what they have rather than by what they are, and when loss of social estimation follows almost as a certainty on the failure to keep up an outward appearance, will make the simulation of wealth a matter of almost equal obligation. To cover a marble pillar with a coat of plaster and whitewash, and to overlay a rough brick column with graining and polish in imitation of marble, are equally substitutions of the counterfeit for the true, whether adopted, in the one case, as a protection against fanaticism in the seventeenth century, or, in the other, as a concession to the uninstructed public opinion of a later time. In our own day the counterfeit is adopted solely for the purpose of giving to the less costly fabric or material the semblance of the higher value; and the influence of such a habit on the national character, and even in some cases the morality of the process, may fairly be called in question. The whole class of fraudulent imitations have a distinctive character of their own, and they may be set aside at once as more or less nearly approaching to the bad shilling or the forged bank-note; but short of these there lies a wide field of social shams, the construction or adoption of which is supposed to bring in a return in value received, though the value is not measured by a money standard. Of these

it may perhaps be safe to assume generally that they become absolutely harmless as soon as they are confessedly found out. That which is recognised and admitted to be a counterfeit can deceive no one, and it can do no harm, for the very reason that it can do no good. You may be supposed to be a very substantial and well-to-do person so long as all the wood-work of your house, and all the furniture you possess, is thought to be of solid oak; but no one is really deceived for a moment by the graining of a painted deal door or bookcase, and the painted wood ceases absolutely to be a counterfeit, because no one imagines it to be anything else. The same rule holds good of stucco in imitation of stone-building, and also, though perhaps not quite in the same degree, of veneering as a substitute for the solid wood. But the counterfeit afforded by veneer is a sham of a different kind from that which is supplied by paint or stucco. It is a counterfeit of quantity instead of quality, and corresponds to the artifice by which the garrison in a siege has occasionally exhibited to messengers from the besieging force the heads of empty barrels covered with flour, so as to give the impression of an abundance of provisions. But in this, and in the somewhat analogous device by which the use of mirrors is made to counterfeit a large extension of interior in shops and hotels, the imitation is so easily discoverable as to be exempt from any appearance of trickery, and may be defended as a perfectly legitimate gratification of taste. Such a defence fails altogether in the case of what is probably the most extensive as well as the most objectionable form in which the modern art of counterfeiting is exhibited—that of imitation jewellery and shams in personal ornament. For these we do not know that a single word can be offered in excuse. Their natural place is on the stage, where they are in keeping with everything else in scenes which do not profess to be other than unreal. But in actual life they are used with an express intention to deceive. Every lad who sports a base metal chain, and every girl who wears ear-rings of the same material, does so in the hope—silly enough as it may be in fact—that the trash may be mistaken for gold, and is as consciously putting forward a false pretence as the lady of higher social standing who displays a set of paste ornaments when she has pawned the diamonds which they replace. It makes no difference to the moral character of a sham of this kind that no one is actually taken in by it. The failure of its intended effect merely makes it ridiculous, without making it any the less objectionable. A counterfeit, however, of this class may become perfectly harmless by lapse of time, when the reality which it imitates has so far passed out of ordinary experience as practically to have ceased to exist. This is the case with the grotesque absurdities attendant on what is popularly called "a fine funeral." They have lost their character as a counterfeit, and remain simply as a ludicrous and unmeaning display, not one man in a thousand probably knowing anything about the ancient privileges of the Heralds' College, or having the slightest idea of what is meant by the name of an "undertaker."

The counterfeit in other cases loses its character as such by openly proclaiming itself to be the sham which it is. In a few years it may be hoped that the rhubarb champagne with which the guests at third-rate wedding breakfasts are at present systematically poisoned may have vindicated its own moral character, and that of its givers, in this way. Mock champagne has nothing in it more essentially immoral than mock-turtle soup, but the last-named luxury is perfectly honest, because it does not profess to be anything more than a counterfeit of the civic delicacy whose name it adopts. Indeed, since the publication of "Alice's" delightful "Adventures in Wonderland," we seem to have a personal knowledge of the "Mock Turtle," and to sympathize with him in his sorrows as we may with any other hero of fiction. But though we may accept at a modest dinner-table a menu which includes this humble and unpretending luxury, we feel at once that the case is altered if our host has proposed that we should eat it with an electro-plated spoon. Here, at any rate, we are met with a sham, deliberate and of malice prepense. With the highest possible respect for Birmingham and its trade, we are bound to admit that between an electro-plated dinner-service and a bad half-crown there exists a very near degree of consanguinity. The one is as much a counterfeit of the social tender of respectability as the other is that of the legal tender of value. The touch of an ordinary guest is not so delicate as to appreciate the distinction in weight, nor is his ear in the midst of a dinner-table conversation so accurate as to distinguish the metallic ring by which the counterfeit silver is detected; and as yet, although the sham is widely prevailing and its use notorious, there has not been found among either producers or consumers sufficient honesty and candour for its open acknowledgment. In the present condition of the electro-plating trade, therefore, we fear that there must be allowed to exist a large amount of admitted deceit and social fraud, and this state of things may be found to bear rather hardly on honest and straightforward men of small means, for the questionable benefit of that considerable class of social pretenders whom Mr. Thackeray has taught us briefly to describe as "snobs." In itself, there is clearly no more harm in an inferior metal silvered than there is in silver gilt. No one ever professed that in the "parcel gilt" plate of a mediæval church, or in the earlier glories of ecclesiastical furniture "overlaid with gold," there was any pretence to the solid value of the more precious metal. Some question might indeed arise in reference to the plate of an English cathedral which—if we were content to blunder in good company—we might describe as metropolitan, where it is whispered that the gilding, as it wears away, reveals a basis, not of silver, but of copper. But, for the most part, the use of gilding is confessedly ornamental, and has in it nothing of the counterfeit; and there is no reason whatever why the same rule should not hold good for silvering. As matter of fact, however, while gilt-plate in no way pretends to be gold, silvered metal does pretend to be silver, and is so far a counterfeit, and, it must be added, so long as it does not openly acknowledge its character, a fraud. The counterfeit hall-marks used by some manufacturers of electro-plate cannot be justified by any rules of common honesty or by any customs of trade. They are devised, we will not say intentionally, but with an ingenuity which could not have been greater if it had been intentional, so as to mislead and deceive the ordinary observer, and to obtain for the possessor of the counterfeit the credit of personal means and appliances of domestic luxury to which, in nine cases out of ten, he is not entitled. And this kind of sham bears hardly upon men who, while they appreciate the conveniences which enable households of moderate means to enjoy more of the minor comforts of modern life than would otherwise be in their reach, yet detest trickery and pretence in any shape. Such men no more want to go back at their dinner-tables to the three-pronged iron forks of their grandfathers than they propose to exchange their morning tub for the partial ablutions—in many cases, it is to be feared, postponed till after breakfast—of their grandfathers at the pantry sink; but they would rather even do this than be supposed to condescend to the meanness of pretending to a table covered with silver plate when all the while they are rejoicing in the payment of each successive quarter's bills as a hard-won victory over fortune. It is probable, however, that the "Brummagem" manufacturers of counterfeits in the present day would reply to any such objections as those which we have suggested, on the most approved principles of political economy, that the demand for honest wares is not sufficient to justify the production of a supply, and that the demand for dishonest wares is more than sufficient.

ICELAND FOR THE AMERICANS.

SOME years ago the Icelanders were officially declared to be "friends of the human race" in general, and therefore looked upon as neutrals in all warlike proceedings. It seems that an attempt is now likely to be made to induce them to become friends of the American race in particular, but whether the attempt will meet with success appears somewhat problematical. What is certain, however, is that "A Report on the Resources of Iceland and Greenland," dated 1868, has been compiled for the Government of the United States by Mr. Benjamin Mill Peirce, and that Report appears to have been drawn up with the express view of throwing light on the subject of a proposed purchase of those dependencies from Denmark. It is very possible that Denmark may care for them as little as Russia cared for Alaska. But in the present case the wishes of the people whose allegiance it is proposed to transfer seem to deserve to be consulted. According to the author of the Report, the Icelanders, who have long been complaining of the way in which Denmark neglects them, are looking hopefully forward to a union with America. The latter part of his assertion appears to be about as well founded as is his calculation that the island, which now yields a bare existence to some 70,000 souls, would, under American management, easily support a million. The Report goes on to say that the acquisition of the island "is a question of vital magnitude" for the American nation, but that it is a question which can easily be solved, as the island is geographically "an insular dependency of the North American continent."

The Icelanders themselves seem to know nothing of this intended transfer, but it can scarcely be carried into effect without their consent being first obtained. If Iceland were a mere province of Denmark, it might be arbitrarily dealt with by the Cabinet of Copenhagen, but it claims to be considered as a dependency with a Constitution and laws of its own. According to this theory the King of Denmark has very little more right to hand over Iceland to the United States than the Emperor of Austria would have to make a present of Hungary to Russia. As the leading facts relating to the constitutional history of Iceland are probably to be ranked among the things which are not generally known, it may be as well to say a few words about them.

The island was originally peopled from Norway and Great Britain in the latter half of the ninth century. The form of its government remained an aristocratic republic for nearly four hundred years after its first settlement. The hereditary chiefs—goðar—held the sovereign power in the country, each in his own district—goðorð. This period of active freedom stamped the national life and character with the impress of a strongly-marked individuality, while the nature of the land and the mode of living gave birth to an administration founded on principles peculiar to Iceland alone. The individual temper and the political experiences of the people resulted in a code of laws emphatically Iceland's own—original, precise, laconic. The institutions of the people were their own, as were their tribunals and judicature; and, lastly, the representation of the people was of an exclusively Icelandic origin and organization, embodying in the assembled Diet all the supreme powers of the State. In 1262 the Icelanders made a convention with the King of Norway, by which they agreed to acknowledge him as their sovereign under certain conditions. It was thus that they spoke when they came to terms with him:—

So long as you and your successors are true to us and to the stipulations herein agreed upon, we and our successors will be faithful to you. But if you, in the opinion of the best men, break faith with us, we are to be absolved from our promises.

The most important of the stipulations they made were that all their public functionaries were to be Icelanders, chosen from the ancient families of the goðar, and that no Icelander was to be made amenable to the jurisdiction of a Norwegian court of law. The treaty left them, so far as their own affairs were concerned, in full enjoyment of the autonomy which they had exercised in the days of the republic. This state of things lasted for 118 years. At the end of that time, in the year 1380, Denmark, Norway, and Iceland became united under one Crown, but the Icelanders were very little affected by the change. In applying to them to take the oath of allegiance their new kings employed phrases which, in engaging to preserve the rights and privileges of the Icelanders intact, set forth their own relations to their Icelandic subjects with unmistakeable clearness.

But in 1661 the crown of Denmark, which had hitherto been elective, became hereditary. At the same time the constitutional privileges of the people were greatly curtailed. The consent of the Danish Estates was secured to the so-called Sovereignty Act, one which gave the King absolute power, and a similar proceeding was carried out in Norway without difficulty. The next year orders were sent out to Iceland to convoke the representatives of the people, for the purpose of taking the oath of allegiance to Denmark. Accordingly the representatives met; but as the Royal Commissioner who was to receive the oath had not yet arrived, they passed a resolution embodying a petition to the King to be excused from going through what they considered an unconstitutional form. But the Commissioner soon afterwards appeared, and hastily convoked a meeting of the Deputies at Bessastaðir, whence they all proceeded to the old Thingstead of Kópavog. The oath of allegiance was first taken, and then the Commissioners produced the Sovereignty Act, and requested the members to sign it. As it was written in Danish, it proved unintelligible to the assembly; but when its purport had been discreetly explained to the Deputies, and they had been assured that the King was fully resolved to maintain their old privileges undisturbed, they consented to append their signatures to the document. But before doing so they made a solemn and explicit declaration that what they did was without prejudice to the ancient laws and rights of the island. At first no attempt was made to interfere with those rights, and twenty years later a Royal rescript, dated May 18, 1683, declared them to be still in full force, and refused to abrogate them, although the occasion was one which offered to an absolute ruler the strongest temptation to do away with them. Gradually, however, they began to be set at nought. Then came a long period in which, though still existing, they proved utterly inefficacious. For many years the power of Denmark in the island was absolute.

But the political agitation of 1830 did not leave even Iceland untouched, and the result was that the King of Denmark was obliged to allow the Estates of the island to be convened. At first the representatives of the people were nominated by the Crown, but this arrangement proved so unsatisfactory that it had to be abandoned. Then a meeting of the higher functionaries of the island was called at Reykjavik, with a view to their discussing drafts of laws, and settling various local matters. This, too, proved an abortive attempt, and at last the only plan which was in accordance with the ancient national traditions was resorted to by Christian VIII. The old Althing was revived, after the lapse of more than forty years. On April 4, 1848, the King announced his desire to give a constitutional character to his monarchy. As soon as the news reached Iceland, the people petitioned that a special assembly might be convened for the purpose of discussing what form of constitution would be most suitable to the country. In reply to this the King promised that no change should be made in the old relations of Iceland to the rest of the monarchy until such an assembly as had been asked for had been convened, and allowed to debate in the island. A Bill relating to the establishment of such an assembly was soon afterwards laid before the Althing, and, after being considerably amended by that body, it received the Royal assent, and passed into a law, on September 28, 1849. The assembly was to meet in the course of the next year.

But in the spring of 1850 the Icelanders learnt that the meeting was adjourned for another year, on the ground that the Ministry had been unable to make all the necessary preparations. Accordingly it was not till the 4th of July, 1851, that the new Constituent Assembly met. A Danish man-of-war, with a detachment of soldiers on board, had been sent to the island, much to the surprise of the Deputies. But their astonishment became still greater when a Ministerial scheme was submitted to them in which it was proposed to turn Iceland into a mere province of Denmark, abrogating its ancient privileges, and putting an end to its old independent existence. The Committee before which the scheme was laid instantly rejected it, and drew up a Report in which a strong protest was made against the breach of faith involved in proceedings of so arbitrary a nature. But when this Report was given in by the Committee, the Royal Lieutenant called a special meeting of the representatives, and informed them that, as they had proceeded to illegal measures, he should put an end to the Session. A great deal of indignation was naturally produced by this proceeding, and for a time there seemed likely to be much confusion in the isle, but it finally embodied itself in a peaceful protest against what had taken place, and a petition that the King would carry out the promises he had made in 1848.

Several years passed, and the Icelanders were still unable to obtain the rights which they claimed. At length a new scheme was drawn up at Copenhagen, and in 1867 it was laid before the Althing. Although more liberal than that which was suggested in 1851, yet it was in many points antagonistic to the wishes and hopes of the Icelanders. In spite of this, however, thanks to the tact and moderation of "the Deák of Iceland," Jón Sigurðsson, and the honest and straightforward behaviour of the Royal Lieutenant, an amicable settlement was at length arrived at, and the new Constitution was despatched to Copenhagen, there to receive, as was fondly hoped, the Royal sanction. But again the hopes of the Icelanders were doomed to be disappointed. For some reason or other the proposed Constitution was set aside. Negotiations had once more to be begun afresh, and another new scheme had to be drawn up. This year it is to be laid before a recently elected body of representatives of the people. Whether it will be accepted or refused will depend upon the nature of the proposals it contains. But unless it proves to be more liberal than its predecessor, it is not likely to be at all cordially received by the "still-vexed" islanders.

Still less is the plan of transferring them to the rule of the United States likely to commend itself to their untutored minds. Having protested vigorously, and without interruption, against the right of Denmark to treat Iceland as a mere province, one destitute of any independent political existence, they will probably cry out loudly against the idea that it may be bartered away at will by the authorities at Copenhagen. What the Americans would do with the island, if they purchased it, is not very clear. On the occasion of its being taken possession of by an erratic English captain, the English Government hastened to disclaim any desire to retain their new acquisition. Perhaps the American Government may be just as free from any longing after so distant an outpost. It is "a far cry" from Reykjavik to New York.

THE OVEREND AND GURNEY PROSECUTION.

THE threatened collapse of the Overend and Gurney prosecution is disagreeably suggestive in more ways than one. Should it end in a discreditable break-down of justice, we may hope that it will bring good out of evil, by creating a widespread present difficulty. But if we admit the abstract right of the public to feel dissatisfied, we must still wonder at the audacity that ventures to put the sentiment in words. It seems to us that, whatever may be its upshot, the whole history of the case, as far as it has gone, has been nothing short of a national disgrace, and, with perhaps the solitary exception of Dr. Thom, we must all be content to bear our share of the discredit. Never has it been borne in upon us more irresistibly how little to be trusted is the humour of what calls itself public opinion. After this, who need affect astonishment at the spread of a commercial cynicism which contemptuously ignores all that used to do duty for the moral law, or which laughs at public opinion when public opinion so extravagantly stultifies itself. This public opinion is active enough to be sure, always flying out at one thing or another—vehement, voluble, unreasoning as a passionate woman. The Horse Guards, the Admiralty, hotel bills, everything on earth and sea comes in periodically for its turn. But the guardians of vested interests know their critics of old, and how to deal with them, and the public still have their wares at the good old price, from a Trotman's anchor to a bottle of Bordeaux ordinaire. But never does our noble public show itself so grand or so formidable as when, seeking courage in its own noise, it lashes itself up in a passion of morality, singling out some unhappy scapegoat for sacrifice. Then the match is less unequal than usual, and it is just possible that justice or injustice may be done. The victim has not a long series of hair-breadth escapes from similar onslaughts to encourage him in the consciousness of innocence or the hardihood of guilt. He gets frightened, he is apt to permit himself most unwisely to lose head or temper, to take seriously, or at least as likely to lead to something serious, the eloquence of savage morality daily thundered at him in burning leaders; to be startled into faith in the wild threats of indignant letter-writers, to believe it impossible that so much good passion can run to waste. In sheer desperation, and a nervous longing to have it over, he is ready to court the conflict, and rush on the enemy. On the other hand, if, luckily for himself, he be phlegmatic of temperament or amenable to professional counsels, he simply stoops to the storm, and waits hopefully till it blows over. If prudent or far-sighted, he throws a sop to the avenging furies that are abroad, in the shape of a high-minded letter, offering, in terms as general as generous, to refer everything at issue to arbitration, and hinting vaguely at unstinted restitution in the remotely conceivable event of an adverse decision. It takes no one in, it is true, for at the moment every one has condemned him unheard without benefit of clergy; but when the hurricane has passed, and he once more walks erect in the City among his fellow-men, he can refer back to it as an undoubted certificate to character. This is the wise course, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the safe one. It is so rare that the vague bellow of public denunciation embodies itself firmly in a representative man with sense and determination of purpose; one who, whether successful or not, resolves to shape his action by some conception of the duty he owes to himself and the public.

We must say, however, that until now we had believed that, the man once found, the motive energy to push him into battle, if not to victory, would not be wanting. We are certainly not inclined to rank parsimony among the national failings, and if there is anything for which money usually is freely forthcoming it is for a good stand-up fight—physical, political, or legal. If you have committed yourself to strong sympathy with a side, it is scarcely an English reason for holding back that your champion seems to be overmatched in brute force. But if Dr. Thom has shaped his strategy on the commonly received conceptions of the national character, he must feel exceptional surprise and disgust at finding himself left in the lurch by the very men whose battle he is fighting. We do not prejudge for a moment the question of the Directors' guilt or innocence. It is sufficient that the preliminary tribunal has decided, after long and patient inquiry, that there are primâ facie grounds for a committal, and consequently at least some show of foundation for the violent denunciations of which the Directors were the object. Then what has become of all those indignant shareholders and high-flying moralists who, in anticipation of evidence and contempt for nice distinctions, scorned to dwell on shades of guilt, and condemned all the six Directors equally and impartially; who put consistently perverted constructions on the motives and conduct of all, and denied even to those who had staked most heavily on the prospects of the scheme such benefit as they might derive from that extenuating circumstance? To bring the question to a money test, all their honest indignation, their lofty sense of what was due to the commercial reputation of the first city in the world, does not represent, when converted into subscriptions, a money value of 5,000*l.*, or any fraction of it. 5,000*l.* is the sum for which the solicitors for the prosecution guarantee to conduct the case. Without for the moment expressing any opinion as to the Home Secretary's official and prim view of his concern in the matter, we must say that, whatever may be the strength or weakness of the case with which Dr Thom went to Mr. Bruce, there was never a decision of the Home Office at which the public cavilled with a worse grace. If ever there was an instance when what we may call the system of voluntary prosecution pressed lightly on the parties interested in seeing justice done, it was this one of Overend and Gurney. In the first place, there have seldom been stronger lists of shareholders than the unlucky contributories of that Company, and as a body they remain still rich, if somewhat impoverished. The question of prosecuting lay with them in the first instance, but when once the case was carried into a criminal court, it became equally the concern of every shareholder in every limited company, whether in work or liquidation. Then every one who cared for the commercial character of his country, and for that of the City of London in particular, has a subsidiary, although by no means a remote, concern in seeing a great scandal like this cleared up. Let the disclosures at a trial be what they might, they could hardly tell worse for our national reputation than the rumours that have been bandied about and the impressions that have been very generally received. On the other hand, if the prisoners are innocent, to have them publicly acquitted and sent from the bar without a blot on their characters would be no less desirable in the interests of trade than in those of justice. In any case it is scarcely conceivable that their reputations would not gain rather than lose when the defence which they have elected to reserve is made public.

No one, indeed, has more substantial reason for complaining of the stolid apathy of the public than these six inculpated gentlemen. Even were a tardy liberality to be exhibited at the eleventh hour, it would come too late to redress entirely the injustice that has been done them. Whether the case breaks down altogether, whether Dr. Thom conducts it in person, or by the counsel he may retain at the eleventh hour, the trial can scarcely be regarded as entirely satisfactory. The Directors may be pure as saints from all criminal intent, yet they must painfully feel the results of the interim decision given at the Mansion House. Now that they have been impeached criminally, if they are debarred of the right of explanation and rehabilitation before a competent court with its practical experts, we know how readily the charitable world will listen to their enemies. Any appeal made through one of those exculpatory and recriminatory brochures which have come into fashion in the City since the days of the panic will fall on deaf or incredulous ears. Because the public shows itself apathetic now, it by no means follows that it will neglect to take quiet revenge when occasion offers. What puzzles us indeed, to the full as much as the indifference of the public, is the apparent supineness of the accused. Never had men whom error or misfortune had landed in a false position so happy an opportunity of extricating themselves. On the assumption of their innocence, a winning card is literally forced upon them. All of them were men of the highest consideration in the City, men to whom a good name is not only fame, but money as well. Some of them are understood to be still wealthy, and all are known to have rich and steadfast friends. These friends can come forward in the House of Commons with testimonials, let them be as liberal with their purses as with their tongues. Why should they not come forward and guarantee this comparatively trifling sum, which must be forthcoming from some source or other if their characters are to be cleared? Strong in the consciousness of nothing worse than imprudence, men who acted thus might rely on the almost overstrained tenderness of construction which their countrymen would be ready to apply to their past conduct. It would take very cogent evidence to induce any jury to convict under such circumstances; and even in the event of a conviction, there would be an under-current in public opinion that would qualify the severity of the verdict. Ingenuity would exhaust itself in excusing the man who had voluntarily placed himself within reach of a criminal prosecution; it would credit him with some peculiar moral idiosyncrasy, with anything sooner than a deliberate felonious intention. Yet, after all, it would be scarcely fair to insist on referring a man's guilt or innocence to this seemingly simple test, and we can quite understand that some of the six may be restrained from resorting to it by honourable if mistaken motives. Their positions are by no means identical, and while one may court a searching investigation on his own account, he may hesitate to invite it in consideration for his fellows. But no slight attraction to the course we mention would be found in the humiliation with which those who adopted it might overwhelm their obstreperous enemy, the public. What more telling retort to the bitter abuse and unmeasured threats that have been lavished on them from first to last, than to say, "We have proved your morality a sham and your indignation a farce. We have proved that you have not the courage of your convictions or your menaces; and now, to show how little we fear the worst you can do, we challenge you to the war you shrink from, and offer you its sinews." The famed British bulldog would show pitiably when dragged out by the ear from the kennel into which he had slunk after yelping himself hoarse. There can be no question that the animal's lungs are sound, and that he can bark and growl as loudly as ever, but are the Americans and Fenians right in saying that he is fast losing his teeth? It is at least clear that he has no idea of holding on as he used to do.

COUNTY FAMILIES.

At certain or uncertain intervals, not exactly, we believe, either annual or biennial, a bulky volume, edited by the industrious Mr. Edward Walford, undertakes to give us the latest information as to the "County Families" of the United Kingdom. A book of this kind puts us in mind of the books which we ever and anon get from Freemasons, which tell us everything about Freemasonry, except what Freemasonry is. So a book of "County Families" tells us all that we can want to know, except what a "County Family" is. Can Mr. Walford or anybody else tell us what it is? Etymology helps us not at all; every family must live in some county, even if it be what we take to be the smallest of counties, the county of the town of Haverfordwest. Nor does the usage of other languages help us at all. The only phrase in any other tongue that we can think of as at all promising to translate it is the Italian phrase of contadini. Literally and grammatically, "contadini" and "county people" exactly translate one another; but, as far as we can venture to guess the meaning of "county people," the "contadini" of Italy are just those who would not be "county people" in England. What then is a "County Family"? We have made many guesses in vain. It is not necessarily a family which has a really ancient pedigree; for of the families in Mr. Walford's book many have no pedigrees and many have sham pedigrees. On the other hand we know of people whose pedigree can be really traced over many centuries who find no place in the book. Birth failing us, let us try wealth. This comes nearer to it; we have often suspected that a "County Family" simply meant a rich family; but even this does not quite do; Mr. Walford's list contains the names of several people who certainly are not particularly rich. Or is it a family whose members are entitled to go to a County Ball? This theory looked well, but it soon broke down before the fact that, in some places at least, admission to a county ball may be purchased at no very ruinous cost. Still we are not sure that this guess may not have, after all, put us on the right track. May not a County Family mean a family whose members, if they go to a County Ball, are entitled to civility when they get there? This, however, requires some one undoubted County Family to start from which may show the needful civility or incivility to the others. We once heard an Esquire defined as a man whom another Esquire would ask to dinner—a definition which will do very well, if we have only one undoubted Esquire to start from. In short, Mr. Walford's first edition was hopeless. We made many attempts, but we could find no clew. In one county we knew two gentlemen bearing the same name, a name which each had taken in exchange for another name, near neighbours, each of them entitled to put the letters J.P. and D.L. after his name, each what is generally understood by a country gentleman; but when we came to look for them in the Book of County Families, to the one was taken and the other left. We speculated much on the cause. Was it because one had a deer park and the other had not? Was it because one was Chairman of Quarter Sessions, while the other was only an ordinary magistrate? Or—the suggestion was uncharitable, but it did occur to us—had one subscribed to the book, while the other had not? Since then Mr. Walford has relaxed his rule, whatever it was. A County Family seems now simply to mean the family of a Justice of the Peace for some county. This definition, if accepted, would no doubt greatly simplify matters; but will all County Families accept such a definition? It is a fact, perhaps a fact to be regretted, that some Justices of the Peace are actually appointed, without much regard to birth or wealth, merely because they are likely to be really useful men in public business. Can the families of such Justices—Life Peers, as it were—be entitled to rank as County Families? For one thing at least is plain, that the claim, whatever it be, to a County Family rigidly shuts out all regard to anything so low as personal distinction. It may sometimes happen that a man who is entitled on other grounds to a place in Mr. Walford's volume is also entitled to distinction on some personal ground. But no such claims can be admitted within the sacred pages of "County Families." For them the laborious editor has another place. Inferior claims of this sort, which cannot be registered in the "County Families," may be registered in the book which used to be called "Men of the Time, including Women," but which is now called "Men and Women of the Time." The inference obviously is that the nature of a County Family is something which may be looked on, according to taste, as either above or below the nature of men and women, but that it may now and then incidentally happen that a man or a woman is a member of a County Family.

The long and short of the matter is that the position of the County Family is in truth a position of mere wealth. The fact may be a little disguised, but a County Family is simply a rich family. A pedigree, if a pedigree can be either found or invented, is no doubt convenient; it helps to do something in the way of gilding and decoration; but the pedigree may be dispensed with, the wealth cannot. The man who has made a fortune and bought an estate may perhaps feel uncomfortable for a moment in the new society into which he has made his way, but riches, if helped by a little tact, will soon smooth everything for him. And if he has any sense, he will stop and think that the great grandfathers of those before whom he feels uncomfortable themselves felt equally uncomfortable before the acknowledged County Families of their day. If his taste leads him another way, he may practise a little genealogical invention; he may find out that his own grandfather was a younger son of some County Family in some distant shire, and he may comfort himself with the old heraldic adage that "apprentissage extinguisheth not gentry." This last seems to be the normal origin of the County Family. The real founder, the man who bought the estate, was Mayor or Alderman, perhaps of London, perhaps of some smaller place where men do make wealth. But somehow the pedigree-book always adds that he or his father came from some place very far off, and brought good blood with him, though the particulars are not mentioned. This is on the same principle on which a Scottish nobleman, the beginnings of whose family may likely enough be really traced to the fourteenth or even the thirteenth century, always has some one earlier forefather who did something at the Court of King Achaius. The desperate attempts to patch up a pedigree are sometimes amusing beyond measure. A whole district goes into ecstasies at the coming of age of a lad of large property. So a rich man must have had forefathers. But his wealth has been made on the spot; he and his father and grandfather have never stirred; everybody knows all about them, and no romance can safely be attempted. The deepest genealogical inquiries can find out nothing more than that, about the time of the accession of George the Third, the patriarch of the house was Mayor, not of London or York or Bristol, but of a very small borough indeed. The County Family in search of illustrious forefathers cannot well be brought lower. But much may be done by putting a bold face upon any matter. The family antiquary shuts up the family archives for a season, and devotes himself to the general study of municipal antiquities. The result of his researches is given to the admiring neighbourhood. To be sure the Rudolf or Napoleon of the great house was only Mayor of a small borough rather more than a hundred years back. But then Mayors of small boroughs rather more than a hundred years back were persons of much greater consideration than they are now.

Now nothing is more certain than that, whether a man's great-grandfather made his money in a small town in 1760 or whether he himself made his money in a large town in 1860, none but the lowest minds will in either case despise him for being an upstart. The man whose family became rich two or three generations back is not in himself either better or worse than the man whose family became rich nineteen or twenty generations back. The man who has made himself rich, if he has done it by honest means, by real energy and industry, not by fraud or accident, can hardly be utterly contemptible. The only case in which either of them is to be despised is where either of them attempts to dress himself out in borrowed plumes. The worst is that the plumes of County Families of all sorts so commonly are borrowed plumes. In many cases a family looks exceedingly well; it bears a certain name, it holds a certain estate, and that name and that estate have gone together for some centuries. Here we seem at last to have found the real article; we seem to have lighted on the genuine and undoubted County Family. But when we look a little further we find that it is all a delusion. Snooks of Snooksburgh has indeed gone on for ages, but then the Snooks that now is is connected by name only with the Snooks to whom the manor was granted by the Conqueror. Let no one sneer at a Snooks dating from such early times. Write him in full as Humfridus de Sevenokes and we do not see but he looks as well as Willelmus de Porco Mortuo, as Rogerus Deus-salvet-dominas, or even as Ricardus filius Scrob. Well, our present Snooks pretends to be, but is not, a true alter ego of Humfridus de Sevenokes. At the outside he comes from him only by roundabout female descent; perhaps he is not descended from him at all; he has taken the name to please his own fancy or to obey the provisions of somebody's will. In fact our Snooks is in truth no Snooks at all, but only a Tomkins. Let us not be suspected of attempting to settle the precedence of Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Tomkins may be as ancient and honourable as Snooks, and Snooks may be as ancient and honourable as Tomkins; still, as a matter of fact, Snooks is not Tomkins and Tomkins is not Snooks, and when we find that our Snooks is really a Tomkins in Snooks' clothing, our sense of historic truth suffers a shock. Sometimes indeed a real historical pedigree is sacrificed to an imaginary one. A large part of this island bows in homage at the name of Sir Watkin Wynn. In writing the name we do not feel that we are saying anything personal. Sir Watkin is an abstraction, not a man; as the eponymous hero of a pudding, he is to us as that elder Sir Roger who gave his name to a dance. Of those who bow down at the name of Sir Watkin Wynn many perhaps honestly think that he really is Sir Watkin Wynn. History and even genealogy will tell them otherwise. The Baronetage gives 1688, a rather awkward year, as the date of the creation of the title. A very slight inquiry will show that Sir Watkin of the pudding is really not Wynn, but Williams, a lineal representative of that Sir William Williams whose name is written in Macaulay.

After all this, there undoubtedly are real County Families, families whose real forefathers have for centuries held the estates which they now hold. These are the reality, of which the others are the pretence. And it is a reality to which a certain amount of sentiment undoubtedly attaches. The position is an honourable and a useful one, and if it has been from generation to generation honourably and usefully employed, the feeling of hereditary attachment is neither unjust nor unreasonable. Still it is after all a position of mere mediocrity, not to say obscurity. One cannot forget the saying of Charles the Second, "Strange that in all that time there has been neither a wise man nor a fool in the family." It is a position which offers a man certain advantages of which he may make good use; but it does not really make him either better or worse than other people. The Aristotelian definition of aristocracy, as distinguished from mere oligarchy, is not simply πλοῦτος, not simply ἀρχαῖος πλοῦτος, but ἀρχαῖος πλοῦτος καὶ ἀρετή. And the sight of the union of ἀρχαῖος πλοῦτος καὶ ἀρετή is certainly very attractive. It is a sight which has commanded hereditary reverence even in very democratic communities. Here, if anywhere, we have the genuine County Family, the true diamond of which the others are only imitations in paste. But, after all, the attractiveness of the real County Family is mainly sentimental and archaic, something which is dying out before new facts and new ideas. And if we trace up such families to the beginning, the way in which they first gained their estates was often less honourable than that of the last cotton-spinner who has bought a mansion and a park. The County Family, as a reality, is becoming a thing of the past; what sets itself up in its place is a contemptible sham. The County Family, we repeat, is now simply a rich family and nothing more. So long as it does not turn its back upon itself, it may not only be rich, but respectable and honourable. But when it invents names and arms and pedigrees, it is not honourable but contemptible. And it may sink even lower. Of all contemptible beings we can conceive none more contemptible than the upstart rich man who looks down on the means by which his wealth was made, and forsakes the principles which he held while he was making it. Of all types of political party the worst is that of the man who was Liberal while he was getting rich, but who, when he has become rich, turns Conservative because it is more gentlemanly and respectable.

THE SMITHFIELD POISONINGS.

ON Monday morning a sergeant of police received a letter stating that his attendance would be required at No. 15 Hosier Lane, Smithfield. The sergeant went to the house thus indicated, knocked, but could obtain no answer. He then went to the next house, and by the help of the occupier obtained access to the house to which his attention had been directed. In a room on the first floor of this house he found a bottle labelled "hydrocyanic acid," and a family Bible. There were appearances of a recent fire in the grate. In the back room on the second floor he found a dead man lying on his back in bed. He was undressed, and his arms were at his sides beneath the bed-clothes. On a chair close to the bed was a bottle exactly similar in appearance and size to the bottle found below, and having a similar label; and there was also a small glass. Both bottles were empty. In the front room on the second floor the sergeant found seven dead bodies. In a cot was the body of a boy. In a bed were the bodies of a woman and two children. The bed-clothes were up to the woman's neck, and her hands were underneath. At the foot of the bed was the body of another child with its feet toward the others. Two more children were in a small bed. In all the cases there did not appear to have been the least struggle, and the bodies lay as if asleep. There was a tablespoon on the cover of the bed in which the deceased woman was found. It appeared as if it had been placed there carefully, and not accidentally. A surgeon was fetched by the police, and he examined the bodies shortly before nine o'clock in the morning. The children had been dead several hours. The woman had not been dead so long by a few hours. All the deaths had been caused by prussic acid, and the bottles found in the rooms had contained this acid. The woman had taken a strong dose. It appeared impossible that, after taking such a dose, she could have lain down, put the bed-clothes to her neck, and put the spoon outside. The man who was lying in the next room had been dead about as long as the woman. His eyes and mouth were open. The surgeon inferred from this circumstance that the dose was taken by him while he was awake, and that the others had it administered to them in their sleep. The glass was apparently put back on the chair after the dose had been taken by the man. A woman who lived opposite awoke about four o'clock that morning, and looked out of the window. She observed a flickering light in the opposite room. It was not gas, but more like a fire or a candle. She did not see any person in the room nor any shadow on the window-blinds. The bodies were identified as those of Walter James Duggan and Emma Duggan, and their six children. The man Duggan had become, or fancied himself, unable, through impaired health, to maintain his family, and so he had poisoned them to preserve them from starvation.

The Coroner's jury have found a verdict that Duggan and his wife murdered their children, and afterwards destroyed themselves. But the appearances described by the witnesses rather point to the conclusion that Duggan murdered his wife as well as his children. The position of the spoon near the wife, "which looked as if it had been placed there intentionally," indicated that it had been so placed by some other hand than hers. But it was possible that the spoon might have fallen from the woman's hand. We understand, however, that the eyes of all the bodies except the man's were closed, and the inference from this circumstance would be that the poison was administered to all, except the man, sleeping. If force had been used in administering the poison to the woman, some trace of it would have remained, but there was none. There seems to be no doubt that both the man and the woman were alive for some three hours after the children.

Appearances, if accurately observed, cannot deceive; but another more doubtful source of information was furnished by a letter written by the man Duggan to his brother, and received by him at Bristol about noon on Monday. We shall speak presently of the account given by Duggan in the letter of his employer's conduct to him, which was certainly untrue, and which therefore afforded a presumption against the truth of the account which he gave of the night's proceedings. But he merely says that "we prefer" death by poison to starvation or the workhouse. The mother of Duggan thought that the wife would be very likely to be affected by the same feelings as the husband in all things. But it is a long step from this opinion to the conclusion that she consented to her own or her children's death. The man may be described as one of the most objectionable products of civilization. He had no vulgar vices. He was a sober man and was deeply attached to his wife, but he was a coward, a liar, and a murderer. The deliberation of his proceedings is remarkable. The letter to his brother shows that, like some other murderers, he had a considerable talent for composition, and he exercised it on his last night of life in endeavouring to throw the blame of the crime he was then meditating, or had partially committed, on his employer, whom he most unjustifiably describes as "a hard, selfish, narrow-minded man." He represents his employer as having given him notice to leave his service and threatened to turn him out of the house he occupied. But the employer, Mr. Adams, of the firm of Chawner and Co., appeared as a witness, and stated that Duggan had given him notice to leave on account of ill-health. It appears from the medical evidence that Duggan's lungs were diseased, and the effect of this disease would be to render him less able to work, and to depress his spirits. But it need not have made him a liar, slanderer, and murderer. Besides receiving wages, he occupied the house in Hosier Lane, which was the property of his employer, rent-free, and on giving up his situation he would also terminate his tenancy. This was the foundation for the charge which he made against his employer of threatening to turn him into the lane. The position of a husband and father who has an incurable complaint, and whose livelihood depends upon his labour, is sufficiently depressing even to a cheerful and well-balanced mind. The occurrence of such cases almost reconciles us to charitable institutions which exist principally for the benefit of their secretaries. But it is difficult to be reconciled to the existence of a Duggan; and if his children resembled him in having consumptive bodies and weak and selfish minds, it is true, although harsh to say, that the world has suffered no loss by the extinction of the entire progeny. Civilization brings into operation causes which resemble in their effects the destruction of feeble grouse by vermin. A Duggan in a barbarous age of the world would hardly get a chance to live at all, and thus the human race would be preserved from danger of deterioration. In a refined age the external influences tending to the extirpation of Duggans diminish, but certain compensatory influences, which may be called internal, come into play and produce the same result, and thereby prevent the population of great towns from becoming mentally and physically effete. As nobody thinks of removing Duggan he is good enough to remove himself, and it appears to be an unalterable condition of civilization that, if people want to poison themselves or others, they shall be allowed unlimited facilities. The two bottles found in Duggan's house had contained hydrocyanic or prussic acid, of which thirty drops would cause death. A wholesale chymist at first supposed himself to have sold those bottles, but that was before he had seen the body of Duggan. He had sold two bottles on the 24th ult., three days before the murder, to a person whom he knew as Fearon. This person signed his name in the book which the chymist kept for the purpose, but he gave no address, and the chymist did not know where to find him. We shall be curious to hear whether he ever comes to the chymist's shop again. A murderer who does not wish to be found out will hesitate about using prussic acid, but it is highly convenient for murder which is to be followed by suicide. Everything has its place in the great economy of the world, and we suppose that wholesale chymists exist for the purpose of what naturalists call redressing the balance of creation. It might be feared that Duggans would increase too rapidly when stronger men had ceased to knock them on the head, just as fish are increasing in the Nile now that steamboats have driven away the crocodiles. But it is ordained that Duggans should have the inclination and opportunity to poison themselves.

The jury found by their verdict that both Duggan and his wife committed murder, and that both were of unsound mind. The evidence of the wife's guilt seems to have been the husband's letter, and the evidence of her insanity seems to have been her supposed guilt. But we have no wish to criticize the use of what seems to have become a common form. The question of Duggan's sanity may be left to the discussion of the psychological journals, in case they deem it worth their attention. The letter to his brother, and the letter to the police-sergeant informing him that his attendance would be required at the house where the murders were about to be, or perhaps had been, perpetrated, are certainly extraordinary compositions. After describing the harshness which he wrongly imputed to his employer, he goes on to infer that there is no alternative but to perish speedily or slowly, and he prefers to meet death rather than wait for it. "Prussic acid was the thing used." It almost seems as if he had written and gone out to post these letters in the interval between the deaths of his children and of himself and wife. In the glimmering of the summer dawn, when the earliest voice of half-awakened birds is heard, the last act of that horrible tragedy was completed, and the sun, as he climbed the heavens, looked down into a still and silent house.

SKETCHING A YANKEE LION.

EACH fresh mail from the United States brings us more serious news than the last. As the eye runs over the files of advices from all parts of the Great Republic, it sees in every column matter for the gravest reflection. If the course of events in the Old World has not, during the last twenty years, been sufficiently striking to rouse us from our insular security and strip us of our national self-satisfaction, we can at least scarcely refuse our attention to the warnings which are coming to us from Greater Britain. If no deep desire for self-improvement has been called forth in us by such evidence as that of the industrial development in Germany, of the artistic and intellectual progress of France, and of the military advances of Russia, or by the transfer of several of those insoluble political difficulties and complications for which we have been accustomed to pity, to patronize, or to snub most of the Continental nations, from their shores to our own, it is perhaps well that we should now be offered that last chance of late learners—a course of instruction from our grandchildren. Just as there are some mothers whose pride and presumption can only be abated by the loftier pride and more supreme presumption of their daughters, and as there are some fathers for whom Providence appears to have provided no wholesome discipline until they receive it from their sons, so it may be that our British habit of ignoring our defects can only be cured by the painful but wholesome process of compulsory contemplation of the perfections of our offspring across the Atlantic. In some particulars it seems probable that the valuable lessons which, ever since Sherman's march, we have been continuously receiving from North America have not entirely been without their effect. Acute observers think they have remarked that some of our leading statesmen have recently taken a leaf or two from American note-books. Some people say that since Lord Palmerston's death there have been speeches at St. Stephen's which were not altogether unworthy of the Washington House of Representatives, and every one must have remarked how some of our journals have recently striven to assimilate themselves to an American type. There are changes, no doubt, in these and some other respects; but after all, when we have made the most of them, they are but very inadequate approximations to the Yankee models. If we run over the whole roll of living English politicians, it is not likely that we shall be able to produce one who would not cut a pitiful figure if matched against any leading statesman at Washington, from the veteran Senator Sumner to the last young Conscript Father, Governor Sprague. And even if we had among us such men as Sprague, what would the world know of them? Where should we find a chronologist capable of recording the looks and deeds of our worthies in the style of a Washington Correspondent of a New York periodical? The sort of fame which the New York Herald lately conferred upon Senator Sprague, when its Special Correspondent at Washington visited him "at his splendid residence on the corner of Sixth and E Streets," and described his rooms, his furniture, his secretary, his personal appearance, his clothes, and his conversation, is at present beyond the reach even of the most popular of English politicians. In this respect Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright must feel that, however popular they may be, and however well they may now or hereafter deserve of their country, their fame among posterity, when compared with the fame of Sprague, is likely to be that of the brave who lived before Agamemnon.

It is true that one or two of our respectable daily and weekly journals have recently adopted the practice of sending smart sketchers into the House of Commons, who, in describing the speeches of prominent or peculiar members, have not altogether abstained from personalities; but at present it must be confessed that we are as far below Yankeedom in the art of portraying as in that of producing politicians. At Washington it is as much a matter of course that a Senator or Representative, who has attracted attention to himself by a speech, should undergo the necessity of sitting for his portrait to the Special Correspondent of some newspaper, as that the features of a criminal, when first committed, should be photographed by the prison authorities; and long practice, working with the special American genius for sensationalism, has made the Correspondents of some journals, such as the New York Herald, quite perfect in this art. The sketch, for example, of Governor Sprague, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, and son-in-law of Chief Justice Chase, to which, under the title of "Little Rhody at Home," the New York Herald recently treated its subscribers, was a masterpiece. This great man has lately been attacking in the Senate the administration of the United States Treasury, and has been otherwise rendering himself notorious and influential by means which are well known to those who study American politics, and would not be particularly interesting to those who do not. But every lover of high art will be interested in the skill with which "the lion of the hour and the coming man of the nineteenth century," as the artist styles him, is depicted for the delectation of all the readers of the Herald.

The Correspondent required, of course, no introduction to gain admission into the Senator's house. Even if the excellent American usage did not constitute Special Correspondents a privileged class, to be admitted and entertained by public men, as angels by the patriarchs, whenever they might deign to visit them, that statesman must be very indifferent to fame who should decline to have his portrait taken gratis by such a consummate artist as the writer for the New York Herald. But the soul of Sprague was not so dead to glory. The artist had no trouble in gaining admission; and plunged at once into his task, after the fashion of a great master, qui nil molitur inepte. While bestowing, of course, his chief attention on the central figure of the great Senator himself, he does not, like some careless Academicians, neglect the accessories of his composition. He tells how the house "on the corner of Sixth and E Streets" is jointly occupied by Sprague and his father-in-law; and how it has "a wide hall-way, and all sorts of apartments up and down stairs, adapted to the needs of a refined and luxurious family." He describes the furniture, which is "of the richest kind, and distributed about the rooms in that style of careless elegance which so much pleases the artistic eye." He sketches slightly the appearance of the people whom he meets coming down the stairs, and of the Secretary, one General Halsted, "a gentleman with an iron-grey moustache as large as a cataract," who sits at a side table in the Senator's study "driving away with a pen." And as he enters this interesting sanctum, and approaches nearer to the central figure of his picture, he becomes more careful and minute in his delineations. "This study," he most elegantly remarks, "appeared in itself a study; with all kinds of curious traps lying around, loose books on top of Bohemian vases, wonderfully carved paper-knives, odd-looking ink-bottles, pen-wipers, and a host of other articles of stationery on the mantelpiece, on the marble wash-stand, on the writing-table, and on the floor. Books and pamphlets everywhere, and the New York Herald spread out to throw a flood of light over all." Having thus arranged and grouped his accessories, and most ingeniously introduced and distributed his light, he begins without further delay to handle his central figure. And here, as descriptions of works of art are generally more or less unsatisfactory—those who have seen the originals usually considering them inadequate or unfair, and those who have not, often finding them unintelligible—the reader will perhaps in this instance be glad to have a portion of the original placed before him:—

> We took a long look at the Senator's face, to see if we could find therein any trace of the malady called craziness, which his enemies conveniently attribute to him. There was none in the eye at least, and the other features are not generally known to offer any sure indication of the complaint in question. Sprague looks old on near acquaintance. He has a small head, small features, large, lustrous eyes, slightly dashed with dimness, that necessitates the wearing of glasses. His face is of the progressive American type of the present generation, just such as you see hurrying along Broadway in the morning tide of travel to Wall Street and the down town regions of wealth and commerce. Sprague might have been a fast young man at some period of his life, or he might have been a very hard-working student of business; for on the outer edges of his face there are furrows that one of his age should not have. He wears his hair somewhat long, and with extreme carelessness, as though the comb that nature provides in the fingers had been the only one he ever made use of. It certainly presents a very dishevelled appearance; but it shows at least he is above the small vanity of lavishing, on the outside of his head, the time that is better bestowed in cultivating the inside. In speaking on the great subject of reconstructing the present vicious system of finance and taxation, he appears like one who had in his mind's eye something of such colossal proportions that the bald vocabulary of the English language, and the finite powers of expression vouchsafed to man, were wholly inadequate to represent its immensity. Therefore it is that he hesitates as he speaks, and his eye moves troublously as though he were inwardly swearing at the inefficiency of words to translate at once the thoughts that heave tumultuously in his soul. He has one of the elements of greatness—tenacity. Those who suppose he intends to subside, quit the busy stage, and retire for ever from the living drama, after startling his audience with one or two spoken pieces, are wofully mistaken. He has but fairly commenced; and as Samson, by a vigorous and persistent application of an assinine (sic) jawbone to the heads of the Philistines, made everlasting smash of that unhappy community, so shall Sprague, going forth on the war-path, with the club of truth in one hand and the State of Rhode Island in the other, spread terror among the tribes of money shysters and Shylocks.

It would be a work of supererogation to direct the reader's attention to the merits of this picture. The dullest amateur can hardly fail to be smitten by its prominent beauties. The stare with which the interview is commenced, and which is confessedly directed to the object of ascertaining whether his host is or is not a lunatic; the masterly strokes wherewith the outlines of the head and face are blocked in and assigned to their distinctive type; the ingenuity wherewith the furrows are made to tell an alternative tale of vice or labour; the clever apology for the Senator's shock-headedness; the still more able defence of his hesitation in speaking; and the inimitable combination of the character of the ancient Israelite with that of the modern Red Indian, in which Sprague is represented—all these are touches which belong to the region of the highest art, and tell their own tale. But the Special Correspondent is not yet at the end of his resources. He not only depicts the great Senator so as to bring before us a lifelike portrait [illegible]

this contrivance, which brings the [illegible] ero home to even the dullest imagination, may [illegible] sufficiently gathered from a brief extract:—

> "Well, Senator," said we, "the working men of Washington call upon you to-night. What will you have to say to them?"
>
> "There it is," he replied, pointing to seven or eight pages of manuscript which General Halsted was diligently engaged in copying.
>
> "Does that complete the series of your speeches, Governor?" we asked, urging his titles alternately for the sake of variety.
> "Yes, Sir! that's the first series complete. I have got the Senate now, sure. I have got 'em; yes, Sir! I have got 'em right so!" saying which the Senator laughed grimly, held up his hand, and gave an illustration, by doubling up his fingers, of the firm hold he had on the entire body of the United States Senate

The Correspondent is, it will be remarked, just as perfect a master of the art of making his lion talk, and of playing second fiddle to him in a conversation, as he is clever at making up a pen-and-ink sketch of his personal appearance. That last touch—which enables us not only to hear the great man speaking, but even to see the very expression of his face as he speaks, and the forcible gestures wherewith he enriches his emphatic phraseology—is really almost startling, and certainly quite inimitable in England. If there were among us—which there is not—a "coming man of the nineteenth century," which of our influential journals has upon its staff an artist capable of sketching him with the skill of this Washington Correspondent of the New York Herald? Yet the importance to the public interests of having such artists among us can scarcely be exaggerated. Publishing these sketches of men like Sprague must have a tendency to propagate men like Sprague, and it would not be easy to say how far our present lack of great political lions may or may not be caused by our ignorance of this mode of exhibiting them to the public. Is it quite impossible to naturalize this school of art among us in England? We have succeeded pretty well in naturalizing Nigger Minstrelsy and Blondinism, then why not Yankee Lion-sketching? If Mr. Lowe, in his present anti-artistic mood, refuses to let Government take the matter up, might not a Lion-sketching Company (Limited), with Mr. Charles Dickens or Mr. Sala as Manager, be started with good prospects of commercial success? Or if, even in the hands of these brilliant sketchers, native talent were found unequal to the task, is it not just possible that we might induce the Herald's great artist himself to come and live among us?

ALTHOUGH the existence in Germany of so many separate centres of intellectual life has been favourable to civilization and culture, there are occasions when waste of literary effort is hereby entailed This moral was clearly pointed last year, when editor in Vienna was garbling some letters which an editor Heidelberg was publishing entire. The correspondence in question was from the pen of the great Gentz, and the story of the mutilated text deserves to be pondered by all votaries of the Higher Criticism. Gentz, who had done more than even Körner or Fichte to excite the princes and people of Germany against Napoleon, subsided in after years to be a mere Hapsburg hack. As such he was in close intimacy with Metternich, as well as with Pilat, the editor of the Vienna Beobachter, the Morning Herald or Kreuz Zeitung of those parts. Pilat died in 1865, leaving a mass of letters from Gentz, which Dr. Mendelssohn acquired. While Dr. Mendelssohn was at press, Baron von Prokesch Osten, the Austrian Internuncio at Constantinople, published the first volume of his Remains of Gentz, which contained, besides other documents, forty letters from Gentz to Pilat. For a diplomatist, the Baron is a wise and learned man, nevertheless he had been deceived by some designing persons, so as to be made to play a most scurvy editorial part Compared with the Heidelberg originals, the Baron's letters were found to be a cooked series. Some were incorrect copies; in some, where Gentz had called a spade rigorously a spade, the cook had called it something else; some had been concocted for the occasion by joining the head of one letter to the tail of another

The astute diplomatic editor was, however, we repeat, the dupe of others, and for Dr. Mendelssohn also some earlier editorial delinquent had prepared troubles. It seems that at some previous time there had been a question of preparing these letters for publication. But Gentz had handled his topics with a healthy objectivity which alarmed the intending editor. As a preliminary, then, all objectionable passages had been scored first with a red pencil, and also with ink, so that the text was utterly obscured. Over the blotted places the Vienna Dr. Bowdler had written his own inimitable emendations, by the help of which he proposed to prepare a family Gentz. Of these palimpsests the Heidelberg series unfortunately gives but two specimens, which are gems in their way. Gentz wrote (how we know what he wrote will be told directly), "the behaviour of the Prussian employés was thoroughly Prussian; that is, dry and disgusting." The editor wrote, "the Prussian employés behaved politely!" Gentz said, "Cardinal Spina spoke like a nightcap"; Dr. Bowdler wrote, "Cardinal Spina spoke with much timidity!" The restoration of the original words was effected by the contrivance of Dr., or rather of "Herr Privy Councillor," Bunsen, who dosed the surface of the second ink with diluted hydrochloric acid. When the ink showed a violet hue, the acid was washed off, and the writing was dosed with ammoniac; after this the superscripture was reduced to a mere blue shadow, through which the original letters stood revealed in a brown tint. It strikes us as probable that the person who objected to Cardinal Spina being called a "Nachtmütze" may have been no other than Prince Metternich. For, according to Baron Prokesch Osten, who is likely to be well informed, the Prince at one time talked of the publication of some of the Pilat correspondence.

The English appetite for knowledge about Gentz would, we imagine, be quite satisfied by a perusal of the biographical sketch issued by Dr. Mendelssohn as an introduction to the letters. The biography, however, is a peg on which the learned Docent hangs the internal history of the Fatherland from 1789 to 1832, and we do not know where the events of that period are more ably told, and within so small a space. He is especially full on the abortive North German Confederation of 1806, suggested by Napoleon as a sop for Prussia, and on the events which preceded the campaign of Jena, where, for a "nicht-Preusse," he is tolerably impartial. Dr. Mendelssohn seems to hate both Austria and Prussia, he remembers how Tilly stole the Heidelberg library, and knows how some one else has an eye on Heidelberg itself. His view is much the same as that of Napoleon before Jena—"Les Prussiens sont encore plus stupides que les Autrichiens." But while he hates the Austrians because of Metternich, because the old Swabian Adam delights overmuch in beer and ballets, and for other defects of a remediable sort, he hates the Prussians because they are Prussians—which is a much more serious affair. Not to accident alone do we owe the learned Docent's reproduction of the delicious sentence above given on the Prussian officials—"Die preussischen Beamten benahmen sich echt preussisch, das heisst trocken und schnode." This synonym has surely received a hearty response from many German readers of Dr. Mendelssohn's book. Dr. Mendelssohn is liberal, objective, and pungent, but he often writes, as to style, as if Goethe and Lessing and Gentz had not written before him. He is fond of those mechanical devices, so dear to the German mind, whereby attention is drawn to particular sentences or expressions. That we should be incited by such stimulants to purchase Thorley's Food for Cattle or Horniman's Pure Tea, is natural enough, but we do not see why the most unimportant facts and the most ancient maxims in a German book should invariably be set up in great primer. That big letters do not always make big ideas is evident from this passage:—"Social life is a compromise" (from this word he proceeds in spaced type) "between liberty and law, and when different individualisms freely develop themselves in social intercourse the individual cannot escape the destiny which makes him suffer from the legitimate development of others." This is the way in which people cognize the noumena of society in the University of Heidelberg. In England we should stupidly say that, if you mix in the world, you must give and take, but who does not see the superior "sweetness and light" of the German periphrasis?

Gentz was born, in 1764, at Breslau, where his father was employed in the Mint. In 1778 he went to Konigsberg, where Kant was lecturing. When one German gets another German to Königsberg in Kant's time we know what is coming. We know we shall have to go back to the twin egg of metaphysics, and then to wade through a conjectural analysis of the working of Kant's philosophy on the person concerned. But we are bound to say that Dr. Mendelssohn lets us off cheap. Kant and Gentz lie, in fact, as far apart as Reason and Understanding, so that Dr. Mendelssohn does not tell us much more than that from Kant Gentz got certain formal advantages, such as the sharpness and systematic order of his logic. Whether these qualities exist in Kant we do not inquire here, but proceed to mention that Gentz already overflowed with that feminine sensibility, that Schwarmerei, that inordinate vanity, which he displayed to the last. He was Werther, Ossian, Chateaubriand, and Lamartine, all in one. If he did not trouble himself with the Categories or the Pure Reason, the Categorical Imperative was not so easily put down. At Konigsberg he felt deep esteem for the beautiful wife of Mr. Privy Councillor Graun, when there ensued what Heidelberg people appear to call "soul-tunings, confidences, and succour"; likewise "screwing up the culture of the individual I to the highest height, and sinking ourselves with tears and raptures to the poetical, vague, and sentimental" These are very dexterous euphemisms indeed, and it must be a comfort to Heidelberg students to hear that, if caught in a violent flirtation with the wife of a Docent, they will only be accused of "confidences and succour," or perhaps of tuning the individual I up to concert pitch. According to Tartuffe,

> L'amour qui nous attache aux beautés éternelles
> N'étouffe pas en nous l'amour des temporelles.

So Gentz found room for a side flirtation with Miss Celestine Schwinck, a cousin of Mrs. Graun, after whom the catalogue of his conquests rapidly augmented, closing in his old age, when he had taken to green spectacles, with the illustrious Fanny Elssler. Of chains of another sort we do not speak; sufficient to say that Lycoris and Arbuscula likewise received, at all times, a certain share of his attention.

corruption. The Orontes had poured its muddy waters into the Tiber. The pure and honest citizens of the Great Elector, King Frederic William, had been succeeded by the debauched and knavish generation which surrounded the dotage of the Great Frederic. Gentz, now married, gave up the intervals of business or study, like most husbands of the period, to gambling, women, and wine. His last biographer, who can see as far into a millstone as Camille Desmoulins himself, considers that the French Revolution was the torpedo whose shocks turned the Prussian Sardanapalus into Socrates. Gentz at any rate chimed in with the jubilees raised by Schiller, Klopstock, Fichte, and Johannes Muller over the taking of the Bastille, and the decree of the 4th of August. But his Schwarmerei for the golden age that had dawned on the earth from the horizon of Paris was soon spent. He translated and annotated Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, also the works of Mounier and Mallet du Pan, repudiating Kant's heretical deductions from the principles of liberty and equality as dangerously allied to the barbarous practice of Robespierre and St.-Just. He now drifted into reactionary convictions, and though his Memorandum addressed to King Frederic William III. on his accession in 1797, advocated the liberty of the press, all his intellectual energies were devoted to combat with his ancient friend and new enemy, political progress. His "Historical Journal," founded in 1799, preached war to the knife against French principles, and recommended England as the proper object of German admiration. By England, however, Gentz meant, not the English people and their institutions, but the English Government, which paid the Prussian publicist for his puffs at a very handsome rate. Such conduct cannot be held up for imitation. Nevertheless, as was said by Count Nesselrode, Gentz, although in a certain sense venal, did not accept money from the party opposed to his own.

The 600*l.* which he received from Lord Carysfort in 1800 must have been a godsend to a man who had lapsed into his old riotous life with actresses, dancers, and dicers. To those who know the social constitution of contemporary Germany nothing can be more surprising than the fact that the mere Federvieh, or "quill-beast" (according to the old King of Hanover's pun), without sixteen quarterings or high military place, was able to worm his way into polite society. No German author, savant, or artist could thus write in 1868:—"Ich begann à figurer sur la scène du monde; die hohe Gesellschaft wurd un des principaux objets de mes occupations, de mes études et de mes puissances." Still less could any modern German maid of honour, like Hoffräulein Amalie Imhoff, descend to flirtation with a writer of books and pamphlets. In that period of "storm and pressure," men and women were not as bad as they might seem if taken in the literal sense of their own frantic language. But whether the Weimar maid of honour indulged Gentz with more subjective delirium, or how, it is clear that the actress Christel Eigensatz postulated a method of unconditioned syncretism. On this, as on many other like occasions, Gentz poured out, in his letters and journals, whole whirlwinds of such tempestuous sentimental and sensual nonsense as has rarely come from the pen of a man neither a mere voluptuary nor an ass. Soon he separated from his wife, lost his whole property at hazard, and began to reap the fruits of his contempt of those decent observances with which even Berlin society expected a rake to veil his progress. When his more intimate friends, like Rahel (not yet the wife of Varnhagen), and Henrietta Herz, joined in the chorus of aristocratic reprobation, his position at Berlin seemed no longer tenable. Stadion, Austrian Minister at Berlin, recommended him to Cobentzel at Vienna, who offered him a salary of four thousand florins to enter the Emperor's service, whereupon Gentz resigned his office at Berlin, assigning as his motive the mean sphere of his official functions, and other reasons not altogether satisfactory or ingenuous.

Gentz now received fresh subsidies from England, and opened fresh batteries against France, whose Emperor he held up to the execration of Europe as a monster who should be removed by any available human means, assassination itself hardly excepted. So long as Harmodius and Aristogeiton are praised for putting to death the mild Pisistratus, it is unreasonable to find fault with a German who, after the battles of Austerlitz and Jena, and in the face of Napoleon's abominable treatment of the German people, looked to secret societies as an inevitable and "holy resource" against the one evil of the time. To the Germans Napoleon, especially after the infamous murder of Palm, shot for selling a pamphlet by Gentz, was no better than a Zinghis Khan or a Mohammed of Ghuznee, and if a Staps or a Gentz had taken the Corsican's life they would certainly not have been classed with Ravaillac or Balthazar Gérard. In his detestation of Napoleon Gentz was sincere, and it will be his eternal glory that he was able to inspire his countrymen with his own "immortal hate." The system which he recommended to Pitt and Cobentzel was the union of the two German Powers, and one of his letters to Pitt, dated September, 1805, shows deep political foresight. He reproaches the Minister for beginning the war without a change in the Government of Austria, and without securing the aid of Prussia, and he prophesies that defeat will be the result. Gentz disapproved of the policy which broke down at Austerlitz in 1805; he disapproved the feeble and isolated attempt of Haugwitz in 1806, which collapsed at Jena; he disbelieved in the results anticipated from the fatal campaign of Aspern and Wagram. He wrote the Austrian war manifestoes of 1805 and 1809; but he knew that Germany's hour and man were not yet come. If Wagram broke Stadion's more earnest heart, Gentz continued to hope against hope, and to spread his own courage around him. In Gentz it is often hard to distinguish between the mere literary artist and the serious patriot. His enthusiasm may have been real or æsthetic, but in a time of general dismay his addresses and letters breathe a spirit of defiance and courage which remind us of the unconquerable temper of Milton's Satan. His impassioned appeals to the German people left their mark everywhere except on their author, who by degrees began to feel the influence of the atmosphere of the Danubian Capua. The failure of his English pecuniary supplies helped to cool his ardour, and obliged him to moderate his anti-Napoleonic zeal. Metternich succeeded Cobentzel at the Ball-platz, and the Metternichs were born to cringe to France. Following the traditions of Kaunitz, Metternich adopted the order of things which issued in Napoleon's marriage with the Archduchess Marie-Louise. There is no doubt that the res angusta domi drove Gentz to accept the Prince's protection, and thereby the necessity of silencing his hatred against the "incarnate devil of the Revolution," now the son-in-law of the Emperor Francis. His purse was again filled, pleasure was once more his chief object; he turned his serious thoughts to the acquisition of fine furniture, which he placed in grand rooms full of perfumes and flunkeys, living in all respects like any "hog of Epicurus' stye."

The golden days of Aranjuez, as Schiller says, were now over. When the War of Liberation came, Gentz had no longer any interest in the struggles of Germany, and he even treated them with scorn. In 1813 he wrote to Rahel, who was always the depositary of his intimate thoughts, "I am too reserved, too diplomatic, too lazy, too blasé, too wicked, to speak; and for writing I have no time, courage, or youth, I am grown horribly old (forty-nine), and bad." He was Secretary to the Congresses of Vienna and Paris, but not even Leipsig or Waterloo gave him a ray of satisfaction. On the other hand he writes to Rahel, "I am alternately in Baden and Vienna, I breakfast alternately on brioches and splendid butter, or other godlike cakes, I have got furniture which is a real joy to the heart, and am much less afraid of death." There was, however, yet life in the old lion, as was shown when Prussia, backed by Russia, had determined to annex Saxony. England, France, and Austria engaged to uphold Saxony, and it was Gentz who decided Metternich to adopt the policy of Castlereagh and Talleyrand. He says in his diary, "Ce jour (October 12, 1814) est un des plus marquants dans l'histoire de ma vie publique. Il sera peut-être le plus beau de ma vie." One wishes, for the honour of German humanity, that his diary did not also contain this terrible entry:—"Diné chez Talleyrand. Il me remet un cadeau magnifique (24,000 florins, 2,500*l.*) de la part du roi de France." Here we can only append what Napoleon, in one of his paroxysms of passion against Gentz, wrote in the Moniteur:—"Misérable scribe, qui se vend pour de l'argent!"

After the general peace Gentz revived, settling down into an energetic champion of Metternich's reactionary system. He was Secretary to the Congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle (1818), Troppau and Laibach (1820), Verona (1822), and his letters to Pilat during this period brim over with genuine Hapsburg feeling. Thus he writes from Troppau:—"England, the real source of all real rebellion and all real corruption, must drain the cup of sorrow and shame to the dregs. England has murdered the Church, and after that the State." Of Canning he said to the Sardinian Minister at Vienna, that he always thought him a blockhead at business, in spite of his brilliant qualities as a speaker or in a salon. On Canning's death he expressed his joy without reserve; it was an inexpressible blessing that we had got rid of that fatal fellow! To Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, afterwards King of the Belgians, he was more complimentary still. "Prince Leopold is not only a blackguard, but the head blackguard (Haupt-Canaille), and will be held as such by all of his sort in London." While thus foaming at the mouth, Gentz was giving serious help to Metternich's fight against the German Liberal movement. After the celebration of the Wartburg in 1818, the danger apprehended from the gymnasts and students (Turner and Burschenschaft), and the murder of Kotzebue by Sand, the German Governments took deadly alarm. A Congress of Ministers was held at Carlsbad, in 1819, and it was Gentz who suggested the vile quibble whereby Metternich proposed to break the solemn pledge of the 13th Article of the Act of Confederation, which guaranteed representative institutions to every German State. Thanks to Metternich and Gentz, Prussia being no whit reluctant, it was settled at Carlsbad that the press should be muzzled, the Universities placed under control, and constitutional developments stopped. The necessary decrees were smuggled through the Diet of Frankfort by Austria and Prussia with a wholesale disregard of legal form, and a recourse to positive fraud and violence. Such conduct, wrote the Bavarian Finance Minister to a friend, no German Kaiser had ever dared to employ against the smallest prince of the Reich. These proceedings of the royal mastiffs, perfected by the Ministerial Conference at Vienna (1819), were, however, hardly up to the Metternich ideal. For Gentz was of opinion that all printing whatever should be absolutely forbidden in Germany for a term of years, no exceptions being granted, except in very extraordinary cases to be certified by a special tribunal. This rule, said Gentz, "would soon bring us back to God and truth."

Against the Greek movement Gentz raged with unabated vigour; but the French Revolution did not kill him, as it did Niebuhr. He rather accepted that and other signs of European life as accomplished facts, with which it was as idle to fight as against the precession of the Equinoxes. In the growing moderation of his language Dr. Mendelssohn traces a return, as Macchiavelli said, al segno, to the liberal tendencies of his youth. We should prefer to say that the segno was that of the period which followed Wagram, when Gentz became dead to all that he once had lived for. To-day the prophet of German freedom, to-morrow he scorns it; to-day the prophet of tyranny, to-morrow he scorns tyranny in its turn. Only the morrow was so short that the rebound from passion to indifference (for his scorn was cynical, and not angry) was stopped half-way. The sole end of the Metternich system was the maintenance of the Emperor of Austria, the eighteen Archdukes, and Prince Metternich (especially the latter) on their actual coigns of vantage. That Gentz, at the age of sixty-five, began to care less for this elevated object arose from the fact that he was now wildly in love with a "theatre-person." In 1830 he went to the Baths of Gastein, with the result which the curious in the physiology of sentiment may find named in the proper medical books. Of this final edition of the Categorical Imperative he wrote the most complete statistical details to Rahel, now almost an old woman. His affair with Fanny Elssler, then nineteen, was, he writes, a real case of conquest. "I have won her purely and simply by the magic of my love." He adds that she is at once his darling and his child, his enchanting ravishment, telling Rahel to try to imagine "all this wealth of enjoyment, and a great deal besides which there is no telling." This connexion injured Gentz in the fashionable Vienna world. He died, in June 1832, leaving just five florins and a few kreuzers to meet expenses. The poor and obscure Beamte from Breslau had shaken the power of Napoleon, been the right hand of Hapsburg reaction, and made the conquest of Fanny Elssler. Yet it must be written that he died disapproved by the good society of Vienna; and who can estimate the amount of misfortune implied in that?

The manifestoes of Gentz are models of declamatory political argument. Clear as crystal, glowing with patriotic fire, large in construction, pathetic in effect, sonorous in style, they seem to follow the fashion of old Italian eloquence. The vigour of Burke they do not reach, they have not his variety of intellectual and rhetorical resource, but with the most flowing periods of Guicciardini it were not unreasonable to compare those of Gentz.

A SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF GRAMMAR.*

IT is no new thing to hear of "more last words." And the expression is not altogether so much of an Irish bull as at first sight it appears. What was last may in process of time yield its place to that which is later than itself. But it is difficult to extend the same allowance to the other end of the series. And nobody, either English or Irish, has yet invented a term to correspond to the impossible conception of Previous First Words. Nevertheless, when first we heard of an Introduction to the Public School Latin Primer, we could not help thinking that, though such a work was eminently needed, its publication would prove that the compilers of the Primer had at last condescended to acknowledge that the Grammar which has been forced into public use was not fitted for the elementary instruction of boys. That nearly all the rest of the scholastic world thought so may be inferred from the almost unanimous condemnation of the Primer by the public journals on its first appearance. We therefore thought that an introduction to the Latin Primer would supply a generally acknowledged desideratum. And as this is the only designation that appears on the cover, it is not till the reader comes to the first page of the work itself that he discovers that what he is going to read is in no sense whatever an Introduction to the Latin Primer, but that the 43 pages of which the pamphlet consists are made up of an account of recent discoveries in grammar, and are therefore very properly headed "A Sketch of the History of Grammar."

Let it be understood that we have no fault to find with the Sketch itself, which contains much that is interesting; but we must remark that it has no other connexion with the Primer than that it is published by the same publishers, and bound so as exactly to match it, and that it contains on its first page a puff of the Primer, to do justice to which we must quote the writer's own words:—"It is beyond dispute that the Latin Primer, and the vast change in the national method of elementary classical teaching which the publication of that work establishes, is due to the conquest of India by British arms." Now of this indisputable proposition we venture to say that it contains exactly as much truth as the ascription of any event in history to any previous occurrence whatever as its cause. It is exactly as true as the parallel paradox with which the writer begins his "Sketch"—namely, that "the first French Revolution was due to the loss of a lady's slipper in the mud of a street in Paris." We need not, perhaps, have noticed these absurd statements, excepting by way of calling attention to the difficulty which an unpractised writer feels in beginning his subject. If authors would adopt the plan of writing the first three pages of their work after they have finished the rest, or if they would only tone them down afterwards to the level of the rest, readers would be spared some unnecessary labour, and critics perhaps some of that fault-finding which they are said to delight in. But after we have dismissed the contemplation of the conquest of India, and come down to the more domestic considerations bearing on the subject of Latin Grammar, we really must demur to the extravagant puff implied in the apposition of the two ideas of the "Latin Primer" and "the vast change in the national method of elementary classical teaching which the publication of that work establishes." We confess ourselves at a loss. We do not see the vast change. We have already reviewed the Primer at considerable length;* and it may be remembered that it was not only our opinion, but the concurrent view of nearly all critics, that the changes introduced into the Primer were in almost every instance objectionable on the score of making the subject of grammar more difficult than it was before. Nine-tenths of the changes introduced had no connexion at all with the conquest of India, even on this ingenious writer's estimate of the sequence of historical events. The ridiculous attempt to make the Syntax of a Primer more philosophical than earlier writers had thought desirable may possibly have had one good effect, we dare say it has brought pupil and tutor into more frequent intercourse, in order to enable the latter to explain to the former a horrid jargon of newly invented terms, and to tell him how many of the rules he may for the present skip on the ground of their being hopelessly unintelligible. We need hardly perhaps explain to our readers that the conquest of India, when brought down to the level of ordinary intelligence, means the knowledge of Sanskrit, and as for any connexion between this knowledge and the composition of the Public Schools Latin Primer, it is tolerably certain that nineteen-twentieths of that unfortunate production would have taken precisely the form in which it now appears had the Sanskrit roots of words never been discovered. After deducting the whole of the Prosody and Syntax, all the memorial lines, and the Paradigms of Declension and Conjugation, we light at last upon the classifications of Nouns and Verbs according to their STEMS, and in connexion with this subject we are introduced to the terms, not now for the first time introduced into grammars, SUFFIX, CHARACTER, and ROOT. Still it might fairly be said that a new classification of Nouns and Verbs, founded upon these distinctions, might entitle him who introduced it to the praise or blame of having revolutionized the study of Latin Grammar. Instead, however, of any such revolution, we find the declensions and conjugations arranged exactly as in other grammars, the only marked difference consisting in the transposition of the order in which the cases follow each other, and the designation of the third conjugation as the consonantal conjugation, instead of, as it used to be called, the conjugation which has e short before re and ris. The calling attention to the STEM by printing it in different type may or may not be an advantage to the beginner. We are not quite sure about this point, but at least it has not effected a revolution in the system of teaching grammar. We have no reason to think that "J. M. M.," whoever may be meant by these initials, is in any way connected with the author or authors of the Primer. We must, therefore, suppose that he is the one really enthusiastic admirer of the production, and that his enthusiasm carries him away to express his admiration of it when his subject has no closer connexion with this than with any other treatise on grammar.

Setting aside the extravagances we have been noticing, the Sketch of the History of Grammar is extremely interesting as well as instructive, and in the author's recommendation of the use of the term STEM instead of CRUDE FORM, to represent the word anga of the Hindoo grammarians, we entirely concur, though still protesting against the principle of forcing upon children ideas which they cannot grasp. We have no doubt ourselves that the scholars of the next and all succeeding generations will have been familiar with the accidence of grammar at an earlier age than allows of the supposition of their philosophising on stems, clipt stems, suffixes and prefixes, and characteristic letters. The writer gives us a succinct account of the manner in which the method of the Hindoo grammarians was adopted, first by German, and latterly by English scholars, and in the course of his narrative he intersperses illustrations which can be understood and appreciated by any ordinary scholar. And therefore the "Sketch," so far from being dull, must, we should think, be extremely interesting even to a scholar to whom the subject is entirely new. Thus, after stating the theory that the detection of the root and the separation of the stem from its inflexions is the only legitimate means of clearing up the difficulties of etymology, the writer proceeds to say that it is necessary to distinguish the essential letters of a root or stem from those which are merely adventitious. He then takes the verb ponere as an example, the root of which is pos, the letter n being adventitious, whilst in rumpere the m is adventitious, the root being rup; both these verbs belonging to a class which has what may be called a strengthened stem in some of the tenses, and the dropping of the s which preceded the adventitious n in the former of the two words being accounted for on obvious principles of euphony.

The inference from all this, which the editor states in Professor Long's words, is as follows:—"That the beginner should be early, very early, taught to compare the words in this manner and to classify them for the purpose of aiding the memory, improving the understanding, and learning the language more expeditiously and completely." In this, in the abstract, we entirely acquiesce, and if we had to teach men the elements of either of the classical languages, we should not be at issue either with the writer of the "Sketch" or the compilers of the Latin Primer. What we protest against is the absurdity of expecting boys of eight years of age to exercise powers of mind which they do not yet possess, and which may be spoiled in the attempt, rather than to learn by memory, which they can make use of, and which both admits of and requires being developed in this way. The opposition, therefore, which we and others have made to the Latin Primer is much misrepresented when it is said to be characteristic of a moderately conservative temper prudently to wait till a learner has made some way under the old familiar system before introducing him to more philosophical views. On the contrary, we assert that if philosophical views are true, the sooner they can be inculcated the better; and in this instance we have no quarrel with the views. We find no fault with their adoption in a grammar intended for students who can comprehend them; but we think it simply ridiculous that they should be inserted in small type, as if for the purpose of making them more repulsive, on the third page of a Primer which ought to be in the hands of boys of eight years of age, if not earlier. The design of that work, as stated by its editor, "to carry learners forward in the right direction, to that stage of progress from which they may advance to wider philological studies without having anything to unlearn," we entirely approve. It is of the absurd method in which that design is carried out as regards the learner that we, in common with nearly all the scholars of England, venture to complain.

The latter half of this pamphlet is taken up with the explanation of the person-endings of the tenses of verbs and the case-endings of nouns, with interesting references to the mode in which the meaning of the former was established by the researches of Professor Grimm in Teutonic, and of the late Dr. Prichard in Celtic. There can of course now be no manner of doubt that the person-endings of the verbs are contracted forms of the personal pronouns. But as regards the case-endings of nouns the matter is far from being so clear. We cannot but think that philologists have taken far too little into account the tendency to drop the letter s out of the genitive case. We are always told that the regular ending of the genitive singular is is; but the ai of the first declension, the i of the second, and the ei of the fifth, look very much as if the dropping of the final s of the nominative was characteristic of this case. We have little doubt that s is the characteristic of the nominative even in words of the first declension which now always appear with the termination a. Thus, if familias was once a nominative, we make little doubt that familias was the original form of the genitive. And hence it would appear that this case may be said to have been formed by the insertion of the vowel i before the final consonant of the nominative. And whilst we are on this subject, we may call attention to the neuter nouns of the second declension, which do not appear to have had an s either in the nominative or the genitive.

In concluding our notice of this Sketch of the History of Grammar, we may say that we have seldom seen a pamphlet of 43 pages containing so much interesting matter as well as actual information. We much regret that it has been disfigured by such fulsome adulation of the Latin Primer, such a pompous introduction as the assertion about the conquest of India by British arms being the prime cause of the adoption of that work in some of our Public Schools, and the absurd comparison of the case with that of the French Revolution having arisen out of the loss of a lady's slipper in the mud of a street in Paris. Neither, again, can we see any ground for introducing into such a work a defence of hypotheses, which everybody who knows anything about any inductive science whatever must know to be not only admissible, but even indispensable before any law can be established or rendered probable. And we can only wonder at the lengths to which enthusiasm can carry a votary of the science of comparative grammar when he thinks that it has established a royal road to the acquisition of Latin, and that this language will at last be placed within the reach of a section of the community that has hitherto been deterred from it because it absorbs too much of the time that must be given to the acquisition of practical knowledge.

CHAMBERS'S TRADITIONS OF EDINBURGH.*

THERE is certainly an attraction about Edinburgh and all that has to do with Edinburgh which attaches to very few other towns. One thing, perhaps, is the peculiar position which it holds among other cities. It is a capital; it once was the capital of an independent State; it still is the capital, for many purposes retaining the rank of a capital, of a division of the United Kingdom which, though no longer an independent State, is still much more than a mere province. As far as memories and traditions go, this is a favourable position. A capital of the first rank—London, for instance, or Paris—is eaten up by its own greatness. It becomes so simply the centre of a great kingdom that it ceases to have any strictly local being, to attract any strictly local affection, or to preserve any strictly local memories. On the other hand, the traditions and memories of a mere provincial town are not likely to awaken much interest except in those to whom they appeal on the ground of local association, and in those in whose eyes they have an antiquarian value. Edinburgh, a capital, but not an overgrown capital, is great enough for every one to know its name and some of the most marked events in its history. But it is not great enough to have lost its purely local being. It is the capital of Scotland, but it is not merely the capital of Scotland; besides this official kind of existence, it has a more purely personal existence as the good town of Edinburgh. Yet Dublin, which is in somewhat the same position, certainly does not awaken the same feeling. We think of Dublin almost wholly as the capital of Ireland, hardly at all as Dublin itself. There are two or three reasons for this. Englishmen know very little of Ireland or of Irish history. We suspect that Irish history is not in itself so capable of being made interesting and picturesque as Scottish history; at all events no one has yet succeeded in making it so. Scottish history, on the other hand, or what passes itself off as Scottish history, has taken such firm hold on the general English mind that most Englishmen have learned to look on large portions even of English history in a purely Scottish light. Dublin, moreover, has hardly been at any time the centre of Irish history in the way in which Edinburgh may fairly be called the centre of Scottish history. Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dunfermline pretty well divide Scottish history among them. Nearly everything that ever happened in Scotland happened at least within sight of one or other of those three places. And through the later and some of the most exciting centuries Edinburgh holds a distinct superiority over the other two. Edinburgh again has been in later times the dwelling-place of an unusual number of men who have been eminent and remarkable in one way or another. But if the worthies of Dublin have been at all equal to the worthies of Edinburgh, they have at least been far from equally lucky in making their way to general recognition. And, after all, it is to one Edinburgh worthy that the whole difference is due far more than to any other cause. That we know and care more about Edinburgh and Scotland than we do about Dublin and Ireland and most other cities and countries, is owing, above all other causes, to the witchery with which Edinburgh and Scotland have been clothed by the genius of Walter Scott.

A book then on the Traditions of Edinburgh would in any case have an interest derived from its subject, an interest which only very unskilful handling could destroy; but in the case of Mr. Chambers's book there is an interest of its own about the history of the book itself. Mr. Chambers, as he tells us in his preface, has done in this book "what very few could do without emotion"; he has "revised a book which he wrote forty-five years ago." He tells us that his book first "came out in the Augustan days of Edinburgh, when Jeffrey and Scott, Wilson and the Ettrick Shepherd, Dugald Stewart and Alison, were daily giving the productions of their minds to the public" He was then only twenty years of age, and it seems to have been thought strange that a young man should busy himself about the traditions of the past. To gather together his traditions, he had to go to "aged professional and mercantile gentlemen, who usually, at his first introduction to them, started at his youthful appearance, having formed the notion that none but an old person would have thought of writing such a book." Some of the stories which Mr. Chambers gives of his interviews with persons of more or less eminence in the course of the collection of his materials are to readers of this generation among the most interesting things in his book, and quite deserve a place for themselves among the Traditions of Edinburgh. Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe is one of the men who are still just remembered through their connexion with men of greater fame. But in Mr. Chambers's young days, and to Mr. Chambers himself in those days, Sharpe was a great man. He came, however, across greater men than Sharpe, counting among them the man to whom the fame of Edinburgh is mainly owing. He first won the notice of Scott in a curious way enough; "by writing for him and presenting (through Mr. Constable) a transcript of the songs of the 'Lady of the Lake' in a style of peculiar caligraphy, which he practised for want of any better way of attracting the notice of people superior to himself." In the "frantic time" when George the Fourth was at Edinburgh, Scott procured for Chambers the business of writing the addresses of various societies to the King, for which he was handsomely paid. But he had not yet seen the great man himself. Mr. Chambers's account of their first meeting is in itself a good story:—

I did not see or hear from him till the first volume had been completed. He then called upon me one day, along with Mr. Lockhart. I was overwhelmed with the honour, for Sir Walter Scott was almost an object of worship to me. I literally could not utter a word. While I stood silent, I heard him tell his companion that Charles Sharpe was a writer in the Traditions, and taking up the volume he read aloud what he called one of his quaint bits. "The ninth Earl of Eglintoune was one of those patriarchal peers who live to an advanced age—indefatigable in the frequency of their marriages and the number of their children—who linger on and on, with an unfailing succession of young countesses, and die at last leaving a progeny interspersed throughout the whole of Douglas's Peerage, two volumes, folio, re-edited by Wood." And then both gentlemen went on laughing for perhaps two minutes, with interjections: "How like Charlie!"—"What a strange being he is!"—"Two volumes, folio, re-edited by Wood—ha, ha, ha! There you have him past all doubt;" and so on. I was too much abashed to tell Sir Walter that it was only an impudent little bit of writing of my own, part of the solution into which I had diffused the actual notes of Sharpe. But, having occasion to write soon after to Mr. Lockhart, I mentioned Sir Walter's mistake, and he was soon after good enough to inform me that he had set his friend right as to the authorship, and they had had a second hearty laugh on the subject.

Much personal kindness on Scott's part, and much help in Mr. Chambers's literary work, followed. Others, of less fame than Scott, but whose names are still not wholly forgotten, helped and encouraged him. "The Bard of Ettrick, viewing my boyish years, always spoke of and to me as an unaccountable sort of person, but never could be induced to believe otherwise than that I had written all my Traditions from my own head."

The Traditions, as might be expected, are, for the most part, comparatively modern. The book is not strictly an antiquarian book. It is rather a book of gossip, but of gossip of the best kind, gossip on really interesting subjects and put together with great skill. Mr. Chambers begins, as is proper, with the town itself, and "the Changes of the Last Hundred Years." Few towns certainly have changed more than Edinburgh; but the antiquary is well pleased to find that the change consists almost wholly in addition, hardly at all in destruction. The New Town has been added, but the Old Town is there still. The one great loss is that of Trinity College Church, which we think Mr. Chambers does not mention, and the sacrifice of that building to a railway-station can hardly be called part of the regular development which has changed the Edinburgh of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries into the Edinburgh that now is. Otherwise the chief change has been that the old city has gone down in the world, that wealth and fashion and learning have fled from their old quarters, and have given up their former dwellings to a meaner class of occupiers. The historic Edinburgh is there still, only a new Edinburgh has grown up by its side. In this respect Edinburgh has the advantage of either London or Paris. And certainly, whether in walking through the Old Town, or in reading Mr. Chambers's account of it, it is strange to think of the sort of quarters, not wanting in architectural beauty, or at least quaintness, but narrow, dark, and dingy, in which the aristocracy, social and intellectual, were content to dwell till times which seem quite recent. The change began only in 1767; by the time of Mr. Chambers's youth, in the beginning of the present century, it was pretty well completed, but as late as 1820, and even as 1832, a stray person of distinction might be here and there found living in the Old Town. Mr. Chambers says of his own youth:—

To one who, like myself, was young in the early part of the present century, it was scarcely possible, as he permeated the streets and closes of ancient Edinburgh, to realise the idea of a time when the great were housed therein But many a gentleman in middle life, then living perhaps in Queen Street or Charlotte Square, could recollect the close or the common stair where he had been born, and spent his earliest years, now altogether given up to a different portion of society. And when the young perambulator inquired more narrowly, he could discover traces of this former population. Here and there a carved coat-armorial, with supporters, perhaps even a coronet, arrested attention amidst the obscurities of some wynd or court. Did he ascend a stair and enter a floor, now subdivided perhaps into four or five distinct dwellings, he must readily perceive, in the massive wainscot of the lobby, a proof that the refinements of life had once been here. Still more would this idea be impressed upon him when, passing into one of the best rooms of the old house, he would find not only a continuation of such wainscoting, but perhaps a tolerable landscape by Norie, on a panel above the fireplace, or a ceiling decorated by De la Cour, a French artist, who flourished in Edinburgh about 1740 Even yet he would discover a very few relics of gentry maintaining their ground in the Old Town, as if faintly to show what it had once been. These were generally old people, who did not think it worth while to make any change till the great one.

Take, for instance, the house of the Gordon family, Marquesses of Huntley and Dukes of Gordon, with a good late Gothic doorway (engraved at p. 29)—if, as Mr. Chambers supposes, later than the Restoration, remarkably good—of a style, like all the later Scottish buildings, French rather than English. The House of Mary of Guise, seemingly a building of her own time, has vanished to make way for the Free Church College. One would hardly have expected to find houses built in Presbyterian times containing private oratories. But Mr. Chambers tells us that

In common with all the houses built from about 1690 to 1740—a substantial class, still abundant in the High Street—there is at the end of each row of windows corresponding to a separate mansion, a narrow slit-like window, such as might suffice for a closet In reality, each of these narrow apertures gives light to a small cell—much too small to require such a window—usually entering from the dining-room, or some other principal apartment. The use of these cells was to serve as a retreat for the master of the house, wherein he might perform his devotions The father of a family was in these days a sacred kind of person, not to be approached by wife or children too familiarly, and expected to be a priest in his own household. Besides his family devotions, he retired to a closet for perhaps an hour each day, to utter his own prayers, and so regular was the custom, that it gave rise, as we see, to this peculiarity in house-building Nothing could enable us more clearly to appreciate that strong outward demonstration of religious feeling which pervaded the nation for half a century after the agonies of "the Persecution."

He goes on to mention the private oratory of Colonel Gardiner, not in Edinburgh, but at Bankton House in East Lothian. There

The oratory of the pious soldier is pointed out by tradition, and it forms even a more expressive memorial of the time than the closets in the Edinburgh houses. Connected with a small front room, which might have been a library or study, is a little recess, such as dust-pans and brooms are kept in, consisting of the angular space formed by a stair which passes overhead to the upper floor. This place is wholly without light, yet it is said to have been the place sacred to poor Gardiner's private devotions. What leaves hardly any doubt on the matter is, that there has been a wooden bolt within, capable only of being shot from the inside, and therefore unquestionably used by a person desiring to shut himself in. Here, therefore, in this darksome, stifling little cell, had this extraordinary man spent hours in those devotional exercises by which he was so much distinguished from his class.

For a contrast we may take the house of David Hume in James's Court, a house which he bought and which he afterwards forsook for one which he built in the New Town. Mr. Chambers tells us:—

I lately inspected Hume's cheerful and elegant mansion in James's Court, and found it divided amongst three or four tenants in humble life, each possessing little more than a single room. It was amusing to observe that what had been the dining-room and drawing-room towards the north, were each provided with one of those little side oratories which have been described elsewhere as peculiar to a period in Edinburgh house-building, being designed for private devotion. Hume living in a house with two private chapels!

This falls in well with the story quoted from Mr. Burton, how, when Hume had built his house, but when the street of which it was the beginning had as yet no name, "a witty young lady, daughter of Baron Ord, chalked on the wall the words St. David Street." Hume's servant maid runs in to tell her master that he had been somehow made game of, and gets for answer, "Never mind, lassie, many a better man has been made a saint of before."

About the murder of Darnley—or should we call him King Henry?—we have to thank Mr. Chambers for explaining what the "Kirk o' Field" really was, a point on which most tellers of the story are not very explicit. The house in which Darnley was quartered "was one called the Prebendaries' Chamber, being part of the suite of domestic buildings connected with the collegiate church of St.-Mary-in-the-Fields (usually called the Kirk o' Field." He goes on to say:—

The house, which then belonged, by gift, to a creature of the Earl of Bothwell, has been described as so very mean as to excite general surprise. Yet, speaking by comparison, it does not appear to have been a bad temporary lodging for a person in Darnley's circumstances. It consisted of two stories, with a turnpike or spiral staircase behind. The gable adjoined the town-wall, which there ran in a line east and west, and the cellar had a postern opening through that wall. In the upper floor were a chamber and closet, with a little gallery having a window also through the town-wall.

We might go through the whole book, lighting on some curious and amusing matter at every turn of the page. But we may wind up with the fact of which Mr. Chambers tells us, that one of his informants had "dined with a lady who had dined with a peeress married in the year 1662." This was the well-known Anne, Duchess of Buccleuch and Monmouth, but when we find that the Duchess lived till 1732, the chain linking her to Mr. Chambers ceases to be wonderful.

Altogether this is one of the pleasantest books of the kind that we know, and not the least reason for its so being is that Mr. Chambers is everywhere sensible and straightforward, without any trace of affectation or fine writing.

MOBERLY'S BÆDA.*

WE have no wish to check the newly-awakened energies of the Clarendon Press, above all when they promise us cheap and accessible editions of the sources of our national history, but we must own ourselves a little puzzled by this book of Mr. Moberly's. Thanks to Professor Hussey and to Mr. Stevenson, Bede is of all our historians perhaps the cheapest and the most accessible, while the almost perfect text and the learned apparatus of notes bequeathed by Smith have turned the post of succeeding editors into something of a sinecure. There is perhaps one man living who could add something to our information on the ecclesiastical history of the seventh century, and if an Oxford edition of Bede were really called for, we should have naturally expected to find the name of Mr. Stubbs on the title-page. As it is, the Professor has restricted himself to giving some aid to Mr. Moberly, and we do not wonder that Mr. Moberly found himself a little puzzled as to what the University expected him to do. What he has done he has on the whole done very well; he has reproduced the text of Smith with Petrie's emendations, and has almost confined his comments to a selection from the notes of his predecessors, made for the most part with a good deal of judgment. Had Mr. Moberly stopped there, in fact, we should have had nothing more to do than to recommend his book as a very handy and convenient edition for historical students. Unhappily he has been fired with an ambition to add something of his own, and these additions detract very seriously from the value of the work. The bulk of them are indeed merely the ingenious speculations of a beginner, misled—as beginners often are misled—by a taste for the curious and the striking. Take, for instance, his suggestion that

When Pope Gregorius undertook the conversion of England, it was for Angles rather than Saxons that his mission was intended. The slave-boys in the Roman market-place had been Angles from Deira, and it so happened that the readiest path to the heart of England lay through an Angle prince; for Æthelberht of Kent had already married a Christian, and was at that moment tolerating Christian worship in the city where he resided. The Gospel received a courteous hearing in Kent (A.D. 597), and its missionaries began to think of new conquests. Still it is in Angle kingdoms that it is most tolerantly received. Eorpwald of East Anglia was baptized before A.D. 626. When Paulinus preached in Northumbria, both the thane, who was the spokesman of Eadwine's gemot, and Cefig the high-priest, declared themselves dissatisfied with the popular religion, and willing to receive any other which contained fairer promises. Eadwine of Northumbria was baptized A.D. 627, and Blæcca the ealdorman of Lindsey about A.D. 630. Mercia, the heathen power which longest resisted the Gospel, fell under its sway in A.D. 656.

Nothing looks more conclusive till we remember that Æthelberht—whatever were the relations of the Jutes to the Anglian race—can hardly be called an Anglian prince; that the road from Gaul led naturally through Kent (not to speak of the presence of Bertha); that the Saxons of Essex received Christianity before the Anglians of East Anglia, and that "the heathen power which longest resisted the Gospel," the one great foe that the Church had to contend with, was the Anglian Mercia.

We should be glad, however, had Mr. Moberly confined himself to ingenious theories of this sort; the real blot on his book lies in the pertinacity with which he goes out of his way, in page after page, to thrust on his readers the historic heresy which has lately brought two of its chiefest apostles before the judgment-seat of Vice-Chancellor James. We cannot see why Mr. Moberly need have touched on the peculiar field of Mr. Pike and Mr. Nicholas. If the presence of a large Celtic "stratum" in the English people is to be proved, a small edition of Bede is hardly the place to prove it in; and we must frankly add that if the question is to be argued at all, it must be argued with a certain knowledge of what has been said by real authorities on the subject, which the present editor of Bede shows no sign of possessing. We do not bow blindly before Dr. Guest, and there are some points in which we differ from Mr. Freeman, but we certainly demur to Mr. Moberly's discussing the extermination of the Welsh with (apparently) a total ignorance of all that Dr. Guest has published on the subject, save a single paper in the Philological Transactions, or to his settling the question of the use of "English" without a reference to the exhaustive discussion of the point which Mr. Freeman has thrown into an appendix to his first volume. In default of teachers such as these, Mr. Moberly very naturally falls into the nets of Mr. Wright and Mr. Pearson, and the result is pitiful enough. There is a calm grandeur about the opening of the following passage which is quite in the manner of the last-named distinguished historian:—

The theory which was once received without question, that the Anglo-Saxon conquest had been a war of extermination, and that all the Britons who were left alive took refuge in Wales, Cornwall, or Cumberland, is now generally abandoned. Whatever may be thought as to the numerical proportion, or capacities, in which Britons continued to inhabit England, there now no reason to doubt that there was still to be found a Celtic stratum, overlaid doubtless by many Teutonic strata, among the population. There would be more reason to believe this if, as is probable, the Anglo-Saxon conquest did not begin in A.D. 450, according to the popularly received story, but consisted of a gradual extrusion of the old inhabitants and colonization of the conquered territory, lasting perhaps for a period little short of three centuries. Such Britons as remained then under Anglo-Saxon rule would have been Christians. They may more than possibly have soon lost their Christianity, and it is not to be expected that a race of warlike lords would have brooked the teaching of their inferiors and serfs. But at any rate, though we rate the influence which Christianity gained in this way at the lowest, this will still account for the fact that Christian ideas, when presented by any but foes, were no novelty to the English Teutons.

We naturally shrink from re-stating a theory which, it seems, "is now generally abandoned," but we cannot understand how Mr. Moberly fails to see the very serious difficulties which Beda's story of the Conversion throws in his way. Such a helot-class as he describes in this passage must have either remained Christians or have sunk into heathendom. The first supposition staggers even Mr. Moberly. If Britain, in fact, were but another Gaul, with this difference, that its conquerors had not yet embraced the faith of the conquered, it is hard to explain the language of Pope Gregory or the panic of Augustine. The existence of British Christians, in fact, involves the existence, in some sort or other, of their contact with Augustine when his relations with the actual bishops of the Celtic West are so fully dwelt on? We may dismiss pretty safely a body of Christians whom Gregory overlooks, whom Augustine and Paulinus never meet with, and of whom not a tradition lingers in the most apocryphal of monastic legends. We are not, of course, arguing against Mr. Moberly. According to his theory, the religion of the conquered had been suppressed. "Such Britons as remained then under Anglo-Saxon rule would have been Christians." But his suggestion of the process by which this conversion must have been wrought rests on an absolute misconception of the attitude which the Teutonic invaders everywhere assumed to the religion of their conquered subjects. "It is not to be expected," says Mr. Moberly, "that a race of warlike lords would have brooked the teaching of their inferiors and serfs." A larger knowledge of the general history of the time would have shown him that over a great space of Europe "warlike lords" did brook such teaching—nay, more, that in no single instance did they resent it. Catholics persecuted Arians, Arians persecuted Catholics; but it would be difficult to find an instance where the worshippers of Woden persecuted the worshippers of Christ. Great as were the benefits which Christianity conferred upon the races it converted, it is to the Christian Church that the world owes the gift of intolerance. But Mr. Moberly's theory requires not merely a reconstruction of the history of Europe, but, as he very candidly admits, a reconstruction of our own history. To gain time for this forcible suppression of Christianity by Teutonic heathendom, we must, it seems, roll back the accepted date of the English invasion to a point three centuries removed from the landing of Augustine. It is sufficient to reply that such guess-work sweeps away not Hengest or Horsa only, but the whole of the annals of the English Conquest, even to the very date of Augustine himself. As the story stands, not in the Chronicle or in the earlier portion which Bede borrowed from others, but in his own historic commencement, the conquests of Æthelfrith of Northumbria, the last wave of the great Invasion, were contemporary with the first Archbishop. Eadwine succeeded to these conquered territories, and a large proportion at least of his subjects, if the theory be true, must have been Christians only twenty years or so before Paulinus appeared at his court. Yet no trace of them exists in the story of Eadwine or of Penda. The first bishop of Lichfield must have settled his Church among people the older of whom had been Christians in their youth; but there is not a trace of the existence of such a "stratum" in the story of Ceadda.

We have treated this subject at some length not merely because it seems to have especial interest for Mr. Moberly, but because we are convinced that a misconception of our history on this point vitiates the whole view we may take of its after course. We are not fanatical worshippers of the Saxon Chronicles, nor do we think that short notes of events are more valuable, or necessarily more true, when they are written in English, than when they are written in Latin. But the history of the English Conquest as these annals give it us cannot be pooh-poohed as "tradition." What is really wanted is a cool and unbiassed investigation of their real historical authority, and to such an investigation Bæda, we think, makes a very important contribution. The careful researches of Mr. Earle have conclusively proved, what indeed is plain on the very face of the Chronicle, that in its earlier form it is a mere chronicle of Wessex, and that it was probably drawn up, and from time to time continued, at Winchester. The date of the first complete reduction of this portion has been fixed at a year or two after the death of Swithun, but nothing on the face of the annals themselves gives us any intimation of the era of their commencement. Now Daniel, Bishop of Winchester, was a friend and correspondent of Bæda, and it was to him that the historian was indebted for the West-Saxon details which he has given us. The words of the preface are remarkable:—

> Sed et Danihel reverentissimus Occidentalium Saxonum episcopus qui nunc usque superest, nonnulla mihi de historia ecclesiastica provinciæ ipsius simul et proxima illi Australium Saxonum nec non et Vectæ insulæ, literis mandata declaravit.

Yet not a single fact of the conquest of Wessex or of Sussex or of the Isle of Wight appears to have been transmitted by Daniel to Bæda. Either no such annals as have come down to us existed at Winchester in the beginning of the eighth century, or else Bæda and Bæda's correspondent omitted them as foreign to "ecclesiastical history." The latter supposition, however, hardly squares with the conclusions which we should naturally draw, not merely from the large scope which Bæda gives himself throughout his work, but above all from the peculiar character of its opening. Up to the inroads of the Picts and Scots the book is little more than a copy or condensation of Orosius, with bits from the geographers and Eutropius, and a touch here and there of Bæda's own. From that point to the arrival of the English it is again a mere copy of Gildas, abridged, chastened in style, and corrected in grammar. As yet, however, his work has been confined to the insertion of occasional explanatory notes and historical synchronisms; it is with the arrival of the invaders that his own independent contributions to history begin; the victory of the new-comers over the Picts, the detailed account of their country and their race, their alliance with the Picts against the Britons are distinct additions by Bæda. But these additions are based on no annals which have come down to us; no trace of "the Chronicle" breaks the quotations from Gildas. And that nothing but Gildas in a written shape was before him, we take to be clear from this, that with the abrupt close of Gildas Bæda as abruptly breaks off, and that from this point to the landing of Augustine he is utterly silent. He seeks indeed to hide the gap by inserting an account of Germanus from the life by Constantius, of course utterly out of its place, and by placing here the passage in which Gildas describes the dissensions of his own times. Such an insertion proves at once his desire to give some account of the interval, while it proves as conclusively that he could have had no access to the detailed account which is given in the "Saxon Chronicle." The landing of Augustine again enables us to compare the two accounts for the century which reaches thence to the close of Bæda. During this period (if we deduct the translations from the ecclesiastical history with which it has been stuffed into decent proportions), the Chronicle is a meagre account of the accession, wars, and conversion of the Kings of Wessex, and, with the exception of the mission of Birinus, there is no point at which they touch. One circumstance, however, throws great doubt on the existence of this portion of the annals as a really contemporary account. The single fact which really illustrates the character of West-Saxon politics at the time, the attempted assassination by the envoy of Cwichelm in 626, can hardly have been omitted from the letter of Daniel; it certainly must have had a place among the West-Saxon annals, if annals of Bishop Daniel's time there were. It is very remarkable, therefore, that this particular entry, as it stands in the Chronicle, is a mere translation from Bæda.

We cannot now, however, enter further into the question of the light which is thrown by Bæda on the compilation and date of the existing West-Saxon Chronicle. Many of the minor differences between the two documents have been very accurately noted by Mr. Moberly, and it would be unjust to part from his book without acknowledging that its general tone is careful and scholarlike. There are of course a few slips, such as the use, twice over, of the word "reliable," a quotation from "Matthew of Westminster" whose personality has vanished into thin air before the attack of Sir F. Madden, the description of Wilfrid from a mere misunderstanding of the passage in Bede as "a priest of Bishop Ægilberctus" at the Synod of Whitby, or of the Emperor Mauricius as "Emperor of Constantinople." Such slips, however, are rare and unimportant, nor must we forget that, aided by Mr. Bradshawe, the editor has made a vigorous attempt to restore throughout the proper orthography of names, and that for the first time we have the Northumbrian forms given us as they actually stand in Bede's earliest text. There is very naturally a little exaggeration in the effort. If we allow "Gregorius," we can see no reason for "Nothelmus" in a note of the editor's own; and if the true forms of English names are so rigidly adhered to we do not see why equal measure is not dealt out to "Brunehaut." Still, however imperfectly the attempt is carried out, the attempt is a right one; and it certainly gives one special feature of interest to Mr. Moberly's book.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE.*

THE West Coast of Scotland is eminently adapted for the purposes of novelists, its scenery being everything that could be desired for their picturesque passages, and its inhabitants readily falling into artistic attitudes. The poetic element has entered into the composition of most of these dwellers by the seaside, whether they wear a Highland or a Lowland garb, whether their musical tendencies lead them to warble lyrics with Burns or to smite the harp with Mr. Macpherson's Ossian. And so, in such a county as the Lochshire in which Mrs. Oliphant has laid the scene of her present story, it is as easy to find characters as landscapes which, even when transferred to paper with photographic exactness, retain an air of romance about them, and which require but a few artistic touches in order to become capable of satisfying the requirements of even an exceptionally critical sentimentalist. Of these natural advantages Mrs. Oliphant has made excellent use, and the result is a story which, like the country it describes, is rich in pictures that are pleasant to see, scenes on which the eye gladly lingers, and which, like the people it portrays, is subtle in its reasonings and shrewd and canny in its opinions, eloquent in its outbursts of feeling, very tender in its natural and unstrained pathos, and genuinely, though somewhat grimly, humorous in its unfrequent and subdued jocosity.

The description of the Revival in the parish of Loch Diarmid is excellent, and there is great vigour in the sketches of the meetings which take place there at night, when the cottagers gather together under the impression that the end of all things is at hand, that the Lord is shortly to appear among his people, and that they themselves, poor men and women as they are, may be on the point of becoming the reformers of the world. Especially good is the account of the meeting at which the heroine for the first time hears the voice of one speaking in an "unknown tongue," and feels the full effect produced by its utterance amid the darkness which the few faint lights fail to dissipate in the building to which the enthusiasts have resorted. No character in the book is more interesting than that of the speaker on this occasion—the young girl, Ailie Macfarlane, with her mystical blue eyes, her delicate, half-hectic colour, and her wealth of golden hair, who has suddenly risen from what was supposed to be her deathbed, and has taken upon herself in all good faith the task of converting a sinful world. Her full, unhesitating belief, her wild enthusiasm and her noble capacity for self-sacrifice, are rendered into words with great vigour and feeling, full justice being done to all the nobler side of what is generally looked upon as a merely ridiculous delusion. Only an essentially tolerant and sympathetic writer could have dealt with such a subject as Mrs. Oliphant has treated it, especially in the passages which describe the terrible struggle through which Ailie has to pass when a brother enthusiast suddenly claims her, in the name of the Lord, as his bride.

John Diarmid, her strange lover, forms the subject of a very powerful sketch. Mrs. Oliphant emphatically declares in her preface that the personages of her story are "entirely fictitious," and of course we believe her; but those who are intimate with the religious life of Scotland will be apt to imagine that they have long known John Diarmid, the man who "had lived a wicked, sensual, evil life," and who afterwards "rushed into religion as he had rushed into dissipation, from the same passionate thirst for excitement." Towards the end of the story he becomes somewhat shadowy and improbable, but in the early part of it his figure is very distinctly outlined and lifelike. There is real dramatic power in the description of his visit to the deathbed of the girl whom he had once loved. We are told how her words drive him nearly wild, and he rushes out from her house, and looks for awhile at "the pale glimmer of the Loch before him, its waves running high and breaking against the rocks, sending a salt spray into his face along with the rain, and the shadow of the great hills opposite glooming down upon him with crushing awful shadows;" and he thinks of how he might be swept out to sea and never heard of again, and he suddenly rushes off to Ailie's house and knocks at the door till she opens the lattice window and looks out into the darkness and the wet, "her fair locks braided about her head like a saint in a picture," and he suddenly asks her then and there to become his wife, and go out with him to convert the world. And that also is an excellent scene in which Ailie, humiliated and bewildered by this unexpected summons to the altar, goes up to the braes one silent Sabbath afternoon, and leaves the question of her self-sacrifice to be decided by the chance reply of the young fellow-sufferer, Isabel Diarmid, whom she finds there. It is not easy to depict the visions which sweep across the mental eye of one whose brain religious enthusiasm has almost crazed, without rendering them ludicrous, but there is unmixed pathos in the picture which Mrs. Oliphant has drawn of this poor Lowland maiden as she knelt before the open Bible on her bed, and remained there lost "in one long trance of prayer and reverie, while the short autumn day came to an end, and the twilight closed around her," collecting her energies in order that she might submit to the marriage which she dreaded far more than she would have feared the scaffold or the stake. Only by thorough sympathy and great artistic power could such a character placed in such a position be not merely rendered interesting, but even invested with a kind of saintly glory. And, moreover, a humorous perception of the latent absurdity of the position was necessary on the part of the artist, together with a complete suppression of anything like humorous comment. In such a case as this, if a writer seems absolutely unconscious of the incongruity of the various ideas he suggests, or, on the other hand, if he lays great stress upon it, there is a risk of its overpowering the pathos of the scene, but where he evidently is fully conscious of it, but skilfully avoids all open reference to it, he seems almost to absorb or to neutralize it, so that it exists no longer as a disturbing force. In the analysis of poor Ailie's feelings on the eve of the decision which was to affect her whole life, Mrs Oliphant has succeeded in giving an air of dignity and grandeur to delusions which might have provoked a smile had she not been herself keenly alive to the dangerous proximity to the ludicrous in which her prophetess stood. Ailie's is by far the most striking character in the story, although she is not its principal heroine. Isabel Diarmid, whose marriage with Mr. Lothian, the minister of the parish, gives the book its title, is very charmingly described, but she does not greatly differ from many of her predecessors in fiction; whereas Ailie is completely new and original. Isabel's sister Margaret forms the subject of a very delightful sketch, but she soon fades out of the scene Isabel's first lover and second husband, the frivolous and selfish Horace Stapylton, is an unsatisfactory production. We absolutely refuse to believe that he ever existed. What men would have looked like if they had figured in pictures painted by lions it is difficult to say, but they are, as a general rule, sufficiently caricatured when their portraits are attempted by lady-novelists—that is to say, whenever an attempt is made to depict those of their number who rejoice in youth and beauty. For it is only in portraying the young and outwardly attractive Horace Stapylton that Mrs. Oliphant has not met with full success. Mr. Lothian, the elderly but well-preserved minister, is capitally painted, and the grim old dominie, his friend, is excellently sketched; while the village blacksmith and his gossips are hit off with thorough truth, their different characteristics being brought out in strong relief by a few sure, rapid touches.

The weakest point of the story seems to be the murder which suddenly, and as it were wantonly, drags a ghastly corpse upon the quiet stage. It is something like the conventional flash of lightning which is so often to be seen in the corner of an engraving, utterly at variance with the rest of the composition, and to be accounted for by no theory of electrical disturbance. Throughout the quieter scenes of her story, Mrs. Oliphant displays an amount of skill which deserves the highest praise. We have few artists who could have brought a Kirk Session, for instance, so vividly before our eyes as she has done in the first volume, or who could surpass the vigour and pathos of the scene in which Ailie expostulates with Isabel and Stapylton when she meets them on the hillside, and her heart thrills with warm zeal for their conversion, or that in which John Diarmid visits the deathbed of the woman whom he had loved in the wild days which preceded his conversion. But a murder is easily represented, and a master's hand is not required to depict the "something all covered over with a great grey plaid" which casts a gloomy horror over the close of the second volume, or the "cold mouth of iron" which touches Isabel's cheek towards the end of the third. The introduction of such agents as these in the story will probably add to its popularity with the many, but they may detract from its effect as a work of art upon the few. It must not be forgotten, however, that, after all, it is for the many that novels are written.

With the exception of the blemishes we have just mentioned, there is little to blame in the story, while there is very much to praise. We have already said how excellent is the description of Ailie and of her troubles. A great part of that of Isabel and of her sorrows is also very good. One of the best scenes is that in which she fights against the desire to accept the offer of the man she loves so passionately, and to go away with him "out of this grey atmosphere into the ideal light—out of this chill into the warmth of love—out of this stillness into movement and music and sunshine and all the stir of common life." At a later period, when her troubles are over for a time, the sketches are very pleasant which are drawn of the interior of her little drawing-room, as she sits listening to the conversation going on between the dominie and her husband the minister—when "all uncertainties, all dreams, were over for ever. The wide vague horizon of youth was shut in within certain unchangeable limits. No one and no thing could now come over the hills to change her fate. That was fixed, and she was softly contented and happy." Later still, after she had lost the elderly husband who adored her, and she unexpectedly meets the young lover whom she used to adore, the overwhelming rush of the old passion across her heart is admirably rendered, when she discovers that "when she had thought herself so calm it was only that he was absent—that winter had benumbed her life. When she thought other loves had taken full possession of her, it was but because her heart was dormant, awaiting its resurrection. And now he had come, and the flower had burst forth in a moment; the lights were lit, the woman awoke at the naming of the name; with no will of hers!" And the end of her story also is told in very beautiful and touching words, after her second marriage has turned out very ill, and she has returned to her faithfulness to the memory of her first husband; when, after long and terrible suffering, "common life crept up round her like the rising tide on the beach, and set her softly afloat in the old habits, the old routine, the current of the past," and she "had her life after life was over, like the most of us—the one, an existence brief and full, with sorrow and joy in it, and a crowd of events; the other, long, tranquil, with no facts at all to speak of, marking the passage of the years—nothing to tell, but yet perhaps the life that bulks most largely in the records in the skies."

FOREST LIFE IN ACADIE.*

BOOKS of sporting adventure are liable to two or three common failings. Sometimes they are a mere record of slaughter for the sake of slaughter, which is almost as repulsive as the history of a butcher's shop. Not unfrequently they are defaced by a use of the peculiar and disagreeable slang patronized by sporting newspapers. When they are written with a fair amount of literary skill, and the mere killing of defenceless animals does not occupy too prominent a position, they are often very good reading. As a rule, it is desirable that the creatures whose deaths are commemorated should occasionally have the odds on their side, for there is an intrinsic dignity about a pursuit in which the adventurer runs an appreciable chance of being dined upon as well as of dining; but it is possible to communicate a certain charm to narratives even of the least dangerous sports, where the author has a taste for natural history or an eye for the beauties of scenery. Captain Hardy may be credited with both these qualities, and has consequently written a pleasant record of his adventures in our Transatlantic colonies. He has a proper abhorrence of useless slaughter, and renders intelligible something of the genuine enjoyment to be derived from wandering with a gun or a rod over the still unexhausted wilderness of Nova Scotia. The country has still the charm which vanishes so rapidly before the advance of emigrants and railroads The moose listens without alarm to the horrid bellow of a Transatlantic steam-engine, having discovered that it does not hurt him, and being fortunately ignorant of its more remote tendency to promote further encroachments. The Indians are dying out as rapidly as the game upon which they used to subsist. they are going the way of the Bœothics of Newfoundland, the last of whom, named Shanandithith, died at St. John's in 1829. Before long the only trace of their former presence will be such euphonious names as Nepsigunt, Tobiagut, Musquodoboit, and others applied to their former haunts; yet Indians enough still survive to guide the sportsman and preserve the wonderful instincts in which, according to Captain Hardy, no white man has the smallest chance of rivalling them. There are still large herds of cariboo, the American reindeer, though they too are disappearing; beavers still haunt some of the remoter ponds and streams; and the rivers have not quite been deprived of the salmon with which they once swarmed. In short, Nova Scotia and the neighbouring colonies are in that twilight stage of civilization which is not without its advantages; they have become easily accessible, and have not yet lost the early inhabitants, animal and vegetable, against which colonists seem to rage with undistinguishing fury The early settlers hate a tree with a personal hatred; they kill the natives, shoot down the game in the forest, and extirpate the fish from the rivers. After a time there comes a reaction, and we are glad to hear a good report of the success with which salmon are being restored to many of the streams emptying into the St. Lawrence. There is much, however, which is destroyed finally and for ever. The Indians will never reappear; and, to all appearance, moose and cariboo and bears will follow them to speedy extinction. Before this process is consummated, there is still time for enthusiastic persons to enjoy wild sport in the rapidly changing margin between civilization and the wilderness; and such of them as may turn their eyes to Nova Scotia will find an excellent guide in Captain Hardy.

* Forest Life in Acadie. By Captain Campbell Hardy, Royal Artillery. London: Chapman & Hall. 1869.

We speak, indeed, with a purpose when we mention enthusiasm as a qualification; for, to say the truth, much as Captain Hardy dwells on the delights of a camp in the forest, they are not quite so conspicuous as he supposes to the demoralized inhabitants of London. The drawbacks to the pleasures of sporting may be estimated from some of the hints upon camping out, which evidently rest on long experience. Thus we are informed very sensibly that the first thing to be done at starting is to make a firm resolution not to lose your temper. One of the trials to which you will probably be subjected is described as enforcing the necessity for this admirable resolution. Amongst other varieties of ground, you will probably come across an alder-swamp. This treat for travellers is constructed by taking a substratum of black mud, into which you may sink to the middle, covering it judiciously with a treacherous crust of turf and moss, strewing dead trees, with the branches broken off so as to leave sharp spikes, over the surface, sprinkling it with a few granite rocks, and then covering the whole with a thick growth of alder bushes five feet high, so that it is impossible to see where you are treading. A few boggy streams and "honey-pots," or mud-holes, may be interspersed at intervals. Captain Hardy grimly invites aspirants to walk across this, with a load on their backs and a gun under their arms, without losing their tempers. Assuming that this preliminary trial has been successfully encountered, they may reflect upon the pleasures of a night in camp. Captain Hardy describes an expedition made with an inexperienced companion. After a day in the woods, the mosquitoes had attacked this unfortunate gentleman with such appetite that his features were obliterated, and he remained helplessly blind for a day. Feverish from the heat of the woods and the bites of the mosquitoes, the party discovered an old camp, and lighted their fire. They lay down, and the mosquitoes were succeeded by a still more voracious tribe of ants. To fight this new enemy, they put their birchbough beds in the fire; but the ants came on again. They deserted the camp, and lay down in the woods. They were driven back to the camp by a storm of rain; once more the ants made a successful assault; and this time they lay down for the night on the bare rocks by the side of a stream. Next morning they discovered that with their beds they had committed their tea to the flames, and had consequently nothing to drink except an infusion of hemlock-boughs. They were, however, compensated, as Captain Hardy appears to think, by two facts. In the first place, they had the negative consolation of not having lain down on certain leaves of the poison-ivy close by, which would have "driven them wild with dangerous irritation"; and secondly, they caught five dozen newly run sea-trout. Without being over-cynical, we confess that, rather than undergo such sufferings, we would have slept quietly in our beds and bought sea-trout in the market, or done without them altogether.

The true enthusiast despises such squeamishness, and Captain Hardy commemorates with evident admiration a virtuous person who, on being warned that he was sleeping in three inches of water, refused to move, on the ground that the water there was warmer than anywhere else in camp. The question naturally occurs, what are the pleasures to be bought at this price? and we regret to say that the answer does not seem to be as satisfactory as might be wished. The account of this night in camp is followed by a recommendation to take a supply of magazines and reviews for reading in idle hours. If you are handy at arranging matters, it is not impossible to contrive a lamp out of an old percussion-cap box and a lump of fat, which will enable you to read as you lie on your blanket. Assuming, therefore, that you are tolerably insensible to ants and mosquitoes, that you don't mind sleeping in three inches of water, that you rather enjoy living on "navy pork and pilot bread," and consider peasoup a luxury when it is not burnt, you may possibly have the pleasure of studying the Saturday Review in a blanket by the help of a wick stuck in a lump of grease. Fully appreciating this intellectual pleasure, we cannot help suggesting that it is possible to enjoy it under more propitious circumstances. There is, it is true, another amusement which may be occasionally enjoyed, and which is the pretext for partaking in these luxuries. There are, as we have already noticed, a few wild animals in the American forests. Captain Hardy frankly admits that there are very few, and, indeed, that the traveller is generally struck by the absence of animal life more than by anything else. The moose, moreover, is a beast of singular sagacity; he is provided with a nose of abnormal development, which enables him to scent travellers at a surprising distance; his hearing is of wonderful acuteness, he is exceedingly shy, and possesses a quite unaccountable skill in conveying his huge body and spreading horns even through a tangled forest without giving the smallest signs of his motion. Consequently, the chances are not small that you may stand for hours in a temperature several degrees below freezing, gazing at a clump of trees in which you suppose a moose to be standing; you must not move hand or foot, or speak above the most imperceptible whisper, for fear lest he should take the hint and be off; and when at last patience gives way under the strain, and you advance towards your intended prey, you may find that he has quietly departed some hours before. Indians, however, possess instincts sufficiently keen to enable them to cope even with the wily moose; and therefore by trusting yourself to their guidance, and by "creeping"—according to the expressive local term for stalking—with the due amount of patience, you may at rare intervals be rewarded by getting a shot at a beast as big as a cow; and, if you kill him, may have the pleasure of lugging his flesh and horns, weighing several hundred pounds, back to the settlements. Besides these rare triumphs, there is an occasional [illegible] man as an article of diet; and in some districts you may be lucky enough to find a beaver, a mink, or an otter. The climate is, of course, delightful. The presence of spring is distinctly perceptible about the 20th of May; and though it becomes unbearably hot in summer, the winter does not finally set in till November, and the thermometer only sinks below zero during December and January. There is a great deal of fog, but "there are days," as Captain Hardy assures us, "when even the forest affords sensations of pleasure to the observer of nature." Still he admits that it is extremely agreeable to witness the approach of spring, and to hear from the flocks of wild geese "their wild note of apparent encouragement, 'honk, hawnk!'"

With all these inducements, we doubt not that there will be a rush of British sportsmen across the Atlantic to get a shot at the moose before he disappears into outer darkness. They may enjoy all the pleasures in which the true Englishman delights; they will not, indeed, have much chance of being eaten, unless they wantonly insult an ill-tempered bear, but they may have every variety of discomfort; they may be frost-bitten, scorched, half-starved, eaten by mosquitoes, stuck in swamps, lose their way in forests, and occasionally shoot a big animal. We do not presumptuously inquire into the cause of the intense satisfaction generally derived from such amusements. It is sufficient to note the fact that they have the power of attracting a certain number of human beings, endowed to all appearance with the usual faculties for enjoyment; and Captain Hardy writes with an evident confidence in the sympathy of his fellow-creatures, which we presume cannot be entirely unfounded. At any rate it is plain that he has found great satisfaction in the pleasures which we have faintly endeavoured to describe; and he even deludes his readers, if we may judge from our own case, into a temporary conviction that amusements described with so much gusto must really be amusing. Calmer reflection suggests a certain scepticism as to their charms for the multitude; but some chosen spirits will doubtless sympathize with him, and look upon our imperfect appreciation of his pursuits with something like contempt. It is a comfort that at present there is room in the world for both classes.

PERSIUS.*

THE consistent opinion of commentators, early and recent, that Persius lacked that knowledge of the world which enabled his predecessors in satire to hit such home-thrusts, cannot have been without foundation, nor is it easy to think of him in any other light than as a pale student in his closet, drawing for his materials upon imagination rather than experience. There are in his remains so few tokens of ripe observation, so little evidence of his having actually "seen life," that his high favour with the fathers, schoolmen, and revivalists, and even with scholiasts and grammarians, is no less wonderful than that he should have won contemporary applause. For his Satires are, as Mr. Pretor fairly puts the case, "a series of scholastic dissertations rather than satires, of shadowy outlines rather than flesh and blood realities," and the most characteristic feature in them is the stock of proverbial phrases and out-of-the-way metaphors which would recommend them to the student of language rather than to the keen observer of life and manners. Perhaps, however, this theory of the unworldliness of Persius may be pushed too far. Those three lines from the First Satire (58–60),

> O Jane, a tergo quem nulla ciconia pinsit,
> Nec manus auriculas imitari mobilis albas,
> Nec linguæ, quantum sitiat canis Appula, tantæ, expressive of impertinent gestures on the part of the "gamins" of Imperial Rome, might be quoted as proof that our satirist was curious as to the phenomena of low and vulgar life around him, did it not occur to us that, if he was the recluse he is represented as having been, he may have himself been the butt of these grimaces, and his παθήματα have become his μαθηματα. Two of these gestures might be paralleled by the modern "taking a sight," and the protrusion of the tongue in token of ridicule, though the curious process of supplementing our natural ears with our uplifted hands, in order to convey to a passer-by the suggestion that "he is an ass," does not occur elsewhere to our knowledge, except in St. Jerome. But it is harder to get over the difficulty of Persius having written satire without dipping his pen in the gall of personality, and without an eye to wickedness in high places, in strictures which, without some conspicuous application, would exhibit an aimlessness unheard of in this class of compositions. Such a supposition would present Persius to us as equally innocuous with a court-fool hitting about him with a lath-sword, and it is needless to say that motiveless satire is against all precedent. We rejoice therefore that Mr. Pretor is not only a bold but an able champion of Persius's title to be accounted like his brethren and predecessors in this respect, and that he lucidly and conclusively argues a personal aim and intent in two out of the six satires. The subject-matter of the others is clearly more general than specific. Superstition, avarice, the difference in morals between theory and practice, and in life between the false liberty of the worldling and the real freedom of the philosopher, are the keynotes of the Second and Sixth, and the Third and the Fifth, Satires. But the First and Fourth—the one directed against the literary taste of his day, and the oth against incapacity and immorality in the highest ranks and amo the imperial counterparts of the "ward of Pericles"—fall strangely flat and vapid on the ear unless we recognise Nero in the foreground, and accept the explanation that the satirist's shafts are covertly directed against him.

One of the most helpful annotators of Persius, Jahn, admits this with reference to the First Satire, but assigns to the Fourth a like general scope with the remainder; but this plan seems to u even less reasonable than that of giving up the claim of the First to be a personal attack, and reserving that character for the Fourth. The First Satire, however, besides attacking lines which the Scholiast expressly declares to have been Nero's composition, and containing one verse of which tradition says that Cornutus, Persius's mentor and literary executor, changed the original draught "Auriculas asini Mida rex habet," into "Auriculas asini quis non habet?" from prudential motives, deals in scarcely less obscure hits at Nero's personal appearance in the words,

> Nugaris, cum tibi, calve,
> Pinguis aqualiculus protenso sesquipede exstet, at his affectation of dabbling in Greek poetry (see v. 70), and at his wholesale plagiarisms and manufacture of centos. See, for instance, vv. 99–102, which Mr. Pretor identifies as a rechauffé of a passage in Catullus, after a fashion of which Tacitus tells us in the Annals (xiv. 16) that Nero was notoriously fond. But surely even more direct, as Mr. Pretor justly and acutely urges, is the attack on Nero in the Fourth Satire. To what end could the introduction of the name of the handsome, youthful, petulant Alcibiad serve, unless to enable satire to lash, under cover of it, some contemporary counterpart? There are indeed allusions (e.g. vv. 35–6) to actual facts in the life of Nero, exhibiting conduct too gross and shameless to fit the Alcibiades of history; but what brings the application most home to Nero is the absence of any probable or plausible explanation of the 49th verse,

> Si puteal multâ cautus vibice flagellas;

h. e. "if you take precautions before you flog the puteal (probably the enclosure in the forum where usurers did their business) with many a blow," unless we accept that given by Mr. Pretor. By reflecting upon the passage the light of parallels from Tacitus and Suetonius, Mr. Pretor makes out a case for these word applying to Nero's nightly rounds, in which all sorts of roistering, rough handling of passengers, and raiding amongst the wares of the shops and stalls, were practised by the Emperor disguised as a slave, and girt about with soldiers and gladiators lest he should meet a return in kind for his riotous interference with Roman citizens. (See Tac. Ann. xiii 25, Suet. Nero, 26, and compare Pretor's Introduction, p. xvii.) If anything were wanting to clench this application, and to define the character of the Fourth Satire, it would be found, we think, in the poet's curious dissembling in his prologue. We know that Cæsar could pocket the affront of lampoons, and it is scarcely reason enough for Persius's wish to be anonymous that, out of six satires, one should criticize the Emperor's unreal pretensions to be a popular poet. But the insinuations, if they are insinuations, of the Fourth Satire, are more serious. What more likely then, if the poet had reason to fear the consequences of this attack being traced to him, than that he should try to put the detectives upon the wrong scent in a prologue where the cultivated philosophic student calls himself "semipaganus," pretends in very memorable lines that his only inspiration is the pleading of an empty stomach, and winds up with the expression, as Mr. Pretor interprets it, of an aim at making a fortune, of which in point of fact he had no earthly need. Mr Paley indeed refers the lines

> Quod si dolosi spes refulserit nummi,
> Corvos poetas et poetrias picas
> Cantare credas Pegaseium nectar, to the flatterers who might be bribed to say a crow was a poet, and flatter it accordingly; and Mr Macleane understands the passage of hireling poets spouting their own trash as if it were "Muses' nectar." But it is more in keeping with the context, and with the plausible theory that the poet desired to disguise his circumstances, to interpret the words with Mr. Pretor:—

> A process of starvation may teach pies to talk, but the hope of making a fortune can do more, for it can teach the pies of the poet-world—myself for instance—to produce very respectable poetry.

Other indications of a wish to blind the eyes of the Emperor and his informers as to his real character and circumstances are to be found in his allusion (I. 9–11) to his grey hairs, advanced age, and philosophic asceticism, and in the alteration of the original reading of I. v. 121, of which we have already spoken.

We have dwelt at greater length upon this position of Mr. Pretor with reference to the First and Fourth Satires, because it seems to us the distinctive novelty of his edition, although he does not leave any other question connected with Persius or his several poems unhandled, or, as far as in him lies, unsolved. As to the vexed question of the completeness or incompleteness of the incomplete; and not with Jahn, who regards the Satires, as a whole, as incomplete. Still he entirely differs from Macleane as to the 75th line of the Sixth Satire beginning a new branch of the subject, which is left unfinished, and is convinced that the last six lines, as we have them, "would always have retained their present position as the close of the Sixth Satire, and in all probability of the satires as a whole."

But it is time that we should turn to the consideration of Mr. Pretor's strictly editorial work, wherein it will be seen that he is not less clear, definite, and sensible in the matter of notes, explanatory and critical, than in the general view of his author above referred to. So far as our judgment goes, he deserves nothing but praise for having ventured "to imbed pieces of translation in his notes," and so to facilitate the just conception of difficult passages. We have ascertained, in the course of perusing his notes, that the help which he declines to give is precisely that which is procurable from Smith's or Riddle's Dictionary—the English for such words as "seria," "tucceta," "vibex," and the like—to give which indiscriminately would be in effect to make his edition a crib. But where, as it constantly happens in Persius, there is crowded into a couple of lines a mass of allusions which requires sifting and making clear and square, and then you are in possession of a perfect little picture, in such cases whoever studies this poet with Mr. Pretor's edition will not long be in the dark. Take, for instance, the lines I. 129–30,

> Sese aliquem credens, Italo quod honore supinus
> Fregerit heminas Arreti ædilis iniquas.

In a very few words Mr. Pretor sets before us the provincial and second-rate character of the office on the score of which a lazy and incapable reader gives himself airs; "because luxuriating in some provincial office—say that of ædile—he may have lolled at his ease, and broken up unfair measures at Arretium (a place noted for its pottery)." Another very vivid picture of this sort comes out of the at-first-sight hard-looking lines toward the close of the Third Satire:—

> Hinc tuba, candelæ, tandemque beatulus alto
> Compositus lecto, crassisque lutatus amomis,
> In portam rigidos calces extendit at illum
> Hesterni capite induto subiere Quirites.

The curious allusions here to funereal phrases and customs, even to the fine irony of the epithet "beatulus" (h.e. μακαρίτης), and the implied manumission of slaves for pall-bearers, whose skull-caps would show how recently they had been in the condition of servitude, are illustrated from contemporary or nearly contemporary Latin writers with singular aptness; and the "imbedded bit" of translation here is so neatly turned that we give it as a sample of the sort of bonâ fide help in this kind which the student may expect from Mr. Pretor's Persius. "Then come the trumpet and the tapers; and at last our happy little friend, laid out on a tall bier, and plastered with thick unguents, stretches his stiff heels towards the door, and citizens of yesterday's make put on the cap of liberty and bear him to the tomb."

In adventuring emendations Mr. Pretor is commendably chary. At Sat. I. 13, though he prints

> Scribimus inclusi, numeros ille, hic pede liber,

he is evidently bewitched by Mr. Paley's ingenious emendation, "inclusus numeris," which we admit would give a very neat antithesis. It is well that he resists the temptation however, for it might be a fair question whether such neatness is not a little alien to Persius. In two cases in the Third Satire he makes out a very strong plea for bracketing a line, where he suspects a "double recension." The first passage runs

> Tunc queritur, crassus calamo quod pendeat humor,
> [Nigra quod infusa vanescat sepia lympha;]
> Dilutas queritur geminet quod fistula guttas.—12–14.

Here, because v. 13 and v. 14 are both of equal merit, but together give the impression of weak repetition, Mr. Pretor decides on retaining the 14th verse because of the artistic reiteration of 'queritur.' And his decision in the second passage, which ends with the verse

> Mænaque quod prima nondum defecerit orca (76), to retain this line in preference to one of nearly similar point immediately before it, because "quod" artistically connects it with the foregoing "quod multa fidelia putet," supplies a justification for his first criticism, and gives one a favourable impression of his shrewdness in textual recension. There is equal acuteness in his reading and punctuation of a line in Satire II., as to the arrangement and punctuation of which the views of commentators are "legion." The poet, representing the superstitious man intent on riches, and confident till his smash comes, winds up a striking passage with the words,

> Donec deceptus et exspes, > Necquicquam fundo suspiret, nummus in imo (50–1);

h.e., Until, deluded and despondent, he sighs forth, "All useless; see my last penny at the bottom of my chest."

In interpretations of curious expressions Mr. Pretor is mostly clear and convincing; though we are not quite sure that "excusso naso," in the famous passage about Horace (I. 118), may not mean "on a laughing nose," rather than an "unwrinkled nose." Our notion is based upon the use of "excutiat risum" in Hor. Sat. I. iv. 15. Of his archæological notes a good sample is that at II. 3, on the attributes of the tutelary "genius." Altogether, we are sure that this volume will very greatly facilitate and extend the intelligent study of a difficult poet of the Empire.

THIS book was designed to correct alleged errors in a recently published volume of Bancroft's History of the United States, having reference to the character and career of Major-General John Sullivan of New Hampshire, a noted leader in the War of Independence. It was the fortune of General Sullivan to take part in several important actions which ended unfavourably for the continental forces, and political animosity gratified itself by blaming him for results which were probably inevitable. Washington himself was sometimes censured as heavily as Sullivan, and indeed the opinion was frequently and loudly expressed that he was no general; but Washington has long since occupied the foremost place in the memory of his countrymen, while Sullivan's reputation remains involved in controversy.

It is remarkable that this champion of liberty was the son of an Irishman who emigrated to America in 1723, after being concerned, as is believed, in efforts to restore the Stuarts. It may be that the Sullivans did not so much love liberty as hate the Hanoverian kings, or it may be that, like others of their nation, they thought any cause for fighting better than none at all. It is supposed that the father of General Sullivan, like many other Irishmen, was educated at some seminary of Continental Europe. He certainly received a good education somewhere, and he turned it to account by becoming schoolmaster to the youth of New Hampshire and Maine. He is stated to have lived to the age of 105 years. He necessarily must have been in his youth a Roman Catholic, but his religion seems, like that of many of his countrymen in our own day, to have been damaged by a voyage across the ocean. His son, at any rate, was either not instructed by the father in the ancestral religion, or did not profit by the teaching; for the present biographer, while defending his hero against a charge of irreligion, mentions that his mind "refused to receive dogmas upon authority without investigation," which we take to be a mild way of saying that he had practically renounced the Church for which his forefathers sacrificed their estates and lives. The Sullivans were eminently Jacobites and Roman Catholics, and yet they helped to found a Republic without a State religion. They were also, and perhaps their descendants still are, aristocrats. When General Sullivan desired to excite his neighbours to larger efforts for self-defence, he addressed "the gentlemen of family in New Hampshire." When the father was asked to state some particulars of the history of his family, he wrote that he was the son of Major Philip O'Sullivan of Ardea, in the county of Kerry:—

> I have heard that my grandfather had four countesses for his mother and grandmothers.

We have a difficulty in seeing how even an Irishman could have three grandmothers, whether countesses or of humbler rank.—

> My mother's name was Joan, daughter of Dermod M'Carthy of Killoween. . . . Her three brothers went in the defence of the nation against Orange. Owen was killed in the battle of Aughrim. . . . They were shortlived on both sides, but the brevity of their lives, to my great grief and sorrow, is added to the length of mine. My mother's sister was married to Dermod O'Sullivan of Dunkerron. Her son Cornelius, as I understand, was with the Pretender in Scotland in 1745.

The heir of these traditions was born in 1740. He served apprenticeship to the law, and practised it with reputation and emolument. At the outbreak of the Revolutionary war he had had no military experience, except what might be gained in defending the town where he dwelt against attacks by Indians. He shared in some of the earliest acts of resistance to the Crown, and when Boston was invested by an army under Washington he received the command of a brigade in it. He used the tongue and the pen, as well as the sword, in the cause of liberty, and if he fought as long as he spoke or wrote, he must have been a tough customer for the Royal troops. He issued an address to the inhabitants of British America warning them that supineness would render their ruin unavoidable. "A striking instance of this we have in the history of the Carthaginians." It is to be feared that the American public at the present day does not care much about the Carthaginians. It was Sullivan's lot to hold important command on several occasions when the fortune of war went against his countrymen, and he has been blamed for disasters which probably no man in his place could have prevented. When the British attacked Long Island in 1776, in order to gain possession of New York, the defence of the island was entrusted to the American General Putnam, under whom were Sullivan and Lord Stirling. It is evident that Putnam was outgeneraled as much as his forces were outnumbered, and the result was a complete defeat, and the capture, by the British, of Sullivan and Lord Stirling. It was not Sullivan's fault that he did not die heroically instead of being captured rather ludicrously. When his men dispersed he rode towards the enemy, expecting to be shot; but "as he approached, several Hessians, instructed in capturing prisoners, contrived to arrest his course, render useless his weapons, and lift him from the saddle." Sullivan and Lord Stirling were taken as prisoners on board the flagship of Lord Howe, the British admiral, who courteously received them. The conversation of the admiral with his prisoners was frank and friendly, expressing his wish that such material concessions might be made as would adjust the dispute. Sullivan went on parole to Philadelphia, bearing a message from Lord Howe to Congress, and a conference was held at Staten Island between Lord Howe and a Committee of Congress, but it came to nothing. Sullivan has been censured by American writers for the share he had in these transactions, but his biographer contends that—

> The chance of establishing independence was not so great as it had been, and if we could make peace upon the terms we had always before the war insisted on, namely, allegiance to the Crown, chartered rights inviolate, and independence of Parliament, it was worthy of consideration.

We learn from this discussion to appreciate the difficulties and discouragements under which the struggle for independence was maintained. The author represents his country's affairs as looking almost desperate after the disaster at Long Island, and he quotes John Adams as saying, a few years later, that he would gladly exchange all prospects of success in the war for the conditions existing before the commencement of hostilities. The next important operation of the war was, however, a great success for the Americans, and Sullivan had a full share of the credit of it. Washington surprised the Hessian Colonel Rahl at Trenton, on the Delaware, and took nearly the whole of his brigade prisoners. Another attempted surprise by Washington brought on a severe fight near Princeton, which terminated to the advantage of the Americans, and in which Sullivan bore an honourable part. An English historian says that Generals Howe and Cornwallis were much shaken by these dashing inroads into the middle of their troops. Some months afterwards Sullivan undertook a similar enterprise against a force of loyal militia on Staten Island, but it miscarried. Many of these nocturnal surprises were attempted during the war, and perhaps some that failed were as well planned as others that succeeded. But Sullivan was on the whole unlucky as a commander; and even if we allow that the biographer explains all his failures, it must still be said that there is a good deal to explain. Sullivan represents that the complaint which was made to Congress against his conduct at Staten Island proceeded from certain officers who were disgusted at his strict discipline. These officers had urged that they were at a distance from the enemy, and there could be no necessity for picquets or outguards, whereupon Sullivan had called to mind "the fate of Hannibal after his troops had tasted the delights of Capua," and had censured the murmurers in a divisional order. We imagine that Hanover, in New Jersey, if it offered any delights at all to soldiers, must have been a poor imitation of Capua, and perhaps Sullivan was not very like Hannibal. But it is characteristic of the man that he can never forget the Carthaginians about whom he used to read in the tranquil years before the war. It was General Howe's object to force his way through New Jersey to Philadelphia, and, as Washington always baffled his attempts, he embarked his army at New York and landed it on the bank of the Delaware. Washington took post on the Brandywine River, to cover Philadelphia, and here he was attacked by General Howe and defeated. It seems to us that if the Royal army was so superior in numbers as is represented, that ought sufficiently to explain the defeat of the Americans without laying blame on General Sullivan. But he found it necessary to address to Congress a justification of his conduct at Staten Island and on the Brandywine. As regards the former, he does not see that he has much to answer for, "unless a spirit of enterprise is deemed a fault." As regards the latter, he says pretty plainly that his troops did not support him. "No sooner did I form one party but that which I had before formed ran off, and even at times when I, though on horseback and in front of them, apprehended no danger." The truth seems to be that in this battle Howe and Cornwallis showed better generalship than Washington, and they were probably superior in numbers at the point where the fighting had to be done. The battle gave Philadelphia to the British. Soon afterwards Washington attacked Howe at Germanstown, but after much hard fighting, in which Sullivan had his full share, he was again worsted. A letter of Sullivan describes the conduct of his troops with a frankness which generals do not always imitate. "My division," says he, "retired with as much precipitation as they had advanced, against every effort of their officers to rally them." The American General Stephen, who commanded a division in both these battles, was, as the biographer mildly puts it, "either from indisposition or imprudence, not in condition to command" at Germanstown, and his troops found themselves exchanging fire with another division of their own army. We suspect that, if this had been the case of Private Stephen, it would have been broadly stated that he was drunk. At the close of the campaign of 1777 Washington went into winter quarters at Valley Forge, about sixteen miles from Philadelphia, which was occupied by the Royal army. Sullivan remained with Washington during the winter.

Next year Sullivan commanded in Rhode Island, and endeavoured to reduce Newport, which was occupied by a British garrison. But the departure of a French fleet which had promised to support him obliged him to retire, and as a British historian already quoted says, "he conducted his retreat with a skill that would have done honour to a more experienced general." There was some sharp fighting during this retreat, which the local historians, as is their wont, have magnified into a tremendous battle. "The American loss was two hundred and eleven. The British has been stated to have amounted to one thousand and twenty-three." There is no statement so absurd that some credulous writer will not adopt it, if he thinks that it tends to exalt his country's glory. But General Sullivan only says that the enemy's loss must be much greater than his own. It seems to have been his fate, whether he failed or succeeded in his enterprises, to give occasion to endless correspondence. His conduct of this expedition is discussed by his friend General Greene in a letter of prodigious length, which will convince any one who has the patience to read it that both General Sullivan and General Greene possessed good military ability. There is a passage of the letter which must have hit some of the loud talkers and ready writers of the period pretty hard. It complains that people form their estimate of irregular troops more from general orders sounding their praise than from knowledge of their conduct, and thus are led to expect more from such troops than they can perform. It is evident that General Greene thought poorly of militia, and desired to meet the British regular troops with an equally well-trained force. "I was not opposed," he says, "to a storm of Newport, providing a proper number of men, of a suitable quality, could be found for the attempt."

In the next and last year of Sullivan's military career he commanded in chief an expedition sent against the Indian tribes that dwelt between the River Hudson and the great Lakes, or in what is now called Western New York. These tribes, drawing their supplies from Canada, were under British influence, and had cruelly harassed and ravaged such parts of the revolted provinces as were exposed to them. But British influence with the Indians must have been, we should suppose, much shaken by Burgoyne's failure on the Hudson, which occurred two years before. However, the Six Nations, usually called by the French the Iroquois, had among them several English officers who had become habituated to their way of life and possessed great influence in their councils. The celebrated Sir William Johnson, whose castle still stands on the Mohawk River, was now dead, and his influence had descended to his son. Another noted leader was Joseph Brant, a half-breed, who had been at school in Connecticut, and afterwards had great power in the Confederacy. The history of Sullivan's campaign against the Six Nations may deserve attention on account of the strong resemblance it bears to some of our own operations in New Zealand. He calculates the disposable force of savages at 1,400, and he thinks that 3,000 troops ought to be employed against them. The preparations for the campaign were tediously elaborate, a strong force was prudently directed, and almost nothing was accomplished beyond destroying villages and cultivations. Dissatisfaction, which very probably was unreasonable, was strongly expressed at the result, and Sullivan retired from active service. This was in 1779, being the fifth year of the Revolutionary war, reckoning from the skirmish at Lexington in 1775, which the novelist Cooper has made familiar to all our minds. We hope that it may be satisfactory to the biographer to know that in our humble judgment Sullivan was an excellent officer, who acquitted himself wonderfully well considering that he had no military experience before he became a general, and that he commanded men who knew nothing and officers who did not even know that they knew nothing. If we say that he succeeded better under command than independently, we say no more than might have been said of Marshal Ney or of the lamented Stonewall Jackson. But perhaps the best evidence of Sullivan's ability may be found in the fact that his detractors also affirmed that Washington was not comparable as a general to Gates. At this time Gates had received the surrender of Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, while Washington, except at Trenton and Princeton, had met nothing but disaster. Yet history places Washington in a different order of generals from Gates.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE six essays contained in the volume recently published by M. Martin* treat of subjects which interest not only metaphysicians, but mathematicians and naturalists also. It has often been remarked that scientific writers are too fond of limiting the circle of their investigations, that their point of view is too exclusive, and that they seem to look down with contempt upon all questions not immediately connected with their own pursuits. This reproach is perhaps in many cases deserved; but at all events the doyen of the Rennes Academy is an honourable exception to the rule, and the variety which characterizes his new book results from the fact that in discussing metaphysical problems he has called to his assistance all the information which natural science could supply. In reading, for instance, his valuable essay entitled "L'Âme et la Vie du Corps," we soon discover that we are under the guidance of a man who, like Leibnitz and Descartes, can talk the more reasonably about the soul because he is thoroughly acquainted with the structure and functions of the body. The first essay in the volume is a development of an article on science which M. Martin contributed many years ago to M. Franck's Dictionnaire des Sciences philosophiques; it points out in the clearest manner the object and the method peculiar to every branch of knowledge, and it shows on what ground the various sciences can meet together harmoniously, and profit from each other's discoveries. This excellent disquisition may be said to contain the key-note of M. Martin's system, which may be described as an impartial but very decided attack upon the materialism of the present day.

When the Marquis de Villars, father of the Marshal who gained the victory of Denain, was sent by Louis XIV. as ambassador to France, he was accompanied by his wife, who resided at Madrid from October, 1679, to May, 1681. During that period Madame de Villars kept up with her friend, Madame de Coulanges, an extensive correspondence, of which only thirty-seven letters have been handed down to us.* The mania for printing the slightest document which has the merit of being inédit has reached such extraordinary proportions on the other side of the Channel that we wonder why no commentator before M. Alfred de Courtois had offered to publish, with the care they deserve, the letters of Madame de Villars. A critic of the last century describes them as "not only very agreeable to read, but extremely curious, both because they give us a great number of anecdotes on the subject of the marriage of Charles II. with the niece of Louis XIV., and also on account of the details they contain respecting the usages of the Spanish Court." We can endorse the opinion thus expressed by the Chevalier de Perrin, and we have to thank M. Alfred de Courtois for an excellent edition of Madame de Villars' correspondence. It is preceded by a long introduction in which the editor tells us all that he could find out about the life and the character of his heroine, as well as about the political events with which her husband's mission at the Court of Madrid was connected. M. de Courtois has been obliged to illustrate the text by an unusually large number of notes; for almost every line in the letters contains allusions to Spanish etiquette and manners which for most readers can have no meaning whatever. He has consulted with advantage the curious document entitled État de l'Espagne de 1672 à 1682, which was composed by the Marquis de Villars, and also Madame d'Aulnoy's amusing Voyage en Espagne.

We have often had occasion to notice the series of reports drawn up by order of the French Government on the various branches of science and literature. It appears that in 1866 Signor Domenico Berti, Minister of Public Instruction at Florence, had, at the suggestion of M. Duruy, given directions for the publication of a recueil of the same kind in connexion with Italy; but unfortunately the idea was never carried out, and circumstances with which we are not acquainted prevented the issuing of a work which might have proved, if well done, a valuable contribution to the intellectual history of the nineteenth century. M. Louis Ferri, however, who has obtained some reputation as lecturer on philosophy at Florence, and who had been entrusted with the sketch of the progress of metaphysical science, resolved upon publishing independently his own share in the work, and it now appears in two closely printed and very interesting octavo volumes.† We may safely say that the history of modern Italian thought is very little known in England. Beyond the names of Gioberti and of Rosmini-Serbati, with a few scraps from their writings, our ignorance on the subject is complete; and in this respect our French neighbours have decidedly the advantage over us, thanks to the talent and to the critical acumen of M. Ernest Naville and M. Marc Débrit. But these two writers have only discussed special points of doctrine, and before M. Louis Ferri took up his pen no one had attempted to give a complete view of the development of metaphysical thought in modern Italy. We do not mean to assert that there are absolutely no treatises on the history of Italian philosophy—an assertion which would be at once refuted by the mention of such names as those of MM. Martini, Bertinaria, Spaventa and Stanislas Gatti—but, as M. Ferri observes, the various works of these writers are the result of theories widely different from one another, and the exclusive study of any one of them would consequently fail to give a just idea of the movement as a whole. The essay now before us aims at being an impartial description of the different schools of philosophy—a description illustrated by quotations from the principal writings examined, by biographical summaries, and by references to the political and religious state of Italy. For the progress of metaphysical investigation has had much to do with the reorganization of the country, and there is no doubt that the Church has deeply felt the influence of a school of thinkers who, after having derived their inspirations from Kant, are now endeavouring to popularize in Italy the transcendentalism of Hegel. Our readers will have some idea of the minuteness with which M. Ferri has analysed his subject when we say that the philosophical views of Rosmini alone take up the whole of the second book; the third is devoted to Gioberti; and in the fourth we find an excellent estimate of Mamiani's views. A survey of the most recent metaphysicians, Hegelians, sceptics, and traditionalists, comes next, and the second volume ends with a chapter on the general character of modern Italian metaphysics, the relation in which they stand to the political movement of the age, and the features they have in common with the development of philosophy as taught by the Scotch school and the French idéologues. M. Ferri's book is very agreeably written, and full of information given in the neatest possible manner.

The volume which M. Botten-Hansen has published ‡ is, like that of M. Ferri, the result of the last International Exhibition, but it refers to literature and science in their widest acceptation; it is, in fact, a kind of bibliographical dictionary of the works printed in Norway during the last twenty years. M. Botten-Hansen, however, has not confined himself strictly to that limit; his catalogue includes likewise notices of older works and authors, chiefly those who have treated of history and topography. The principal object he has had in view is to furnish a guide to persons who would study the history and literature of his own country. According to this plan, the philological part comes first, then Norwegian belles-lettres, then history. The sciences occupy the next division, and the last part of the volume is devoted to moral philosophy and divinity. Special attention has been given by the author to newspaper literature, which, as M. Botten-Hansen remarks, exercises in a free country a great influence upon the political and intellectual progress of the people. The merest reference to the bibliographical treatises and the biographical lexicons most in vogue will show at once the peculiar value of this volume. Brunet's Manuel du Libraire, for instance, mentions no Norwegian poet later than the year 1814. M. Vapereau's Dictionnaire des Contemporains is equally incomplete. The list of authors and publishers appended by M. Botten-Hansen to his excellent Catalogue raisonné supplies a fund of information which will be profitably consulted when new editions of those works are sent to the press.

In discussing the state of Europe from the political and social point of view, it would be impossible to have a better guide than M. Maurice Block *, who has long since established his reputation as a writer on economics. "I am not one of those," he says, "who call upon the bene trovato to supply the deficiencies of the vero." M. Block's statements can always be trusted, and whenever he is obliged to discuss subjects on which accurate information is not obtainable, he takes care to warn his readers that they are for a time treading upon the ground of hypothesis. Every one is now talking about the supposed necessity of re-establishing the political equilibrium lately disturbed by the unity of Italy and the ambition of Prussia; and some persons maintain that, if an appeal to arms is the only way of restoring the balance of power, that appeal cannot be made too soon. M. Block has no difficulty in proving, first, that war, by exciting the ambition of the conflicting parties, would probably do more to postpone than to hasten the solution of the problem; and, next, that the power of any given nation does not necessarily increase in the same ratio as the amount of territory which it has annexed. The true and only way of restoring the balance of power is, he contends, to develop as much as possible the various elements of civilization which constitute the real strength of a community. Political, economical, intellectual, moral progress—such are the real sources of national greatness, and the same territory with a free, educated, and industrious population obtains results indefinitely greater than those of which it could boast before all these elements had been thoroughly brought into play.

M. Goblet d'Alviella has written an interesting account of the history of Portugal † since the marriage of the Queen Maria with Prince Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg. In preparing this book he enjoyed the great advantage of being able to consult the diplomatic correspondence of his father, General Count Goblet d'Alviella, who represented the Court of Brussels at Lisbon in 1837 and 1838, that correspondence, the instructions sent from time to time by King Leopold, and a number of other documents, have supplied the materials of a work which is intended both as a statement of facts and as an apology for the present condition of Portugal. M. d'Alviella begins by drawing a parallel between what he calls the large and the small nationalities; the former gradually moving on towards democracy, the latter towards liberty. Whilst those, sacrificing everything else to the passion for equality, are constantly oscillating between anarchy and despotism, these assume a democratic form through the sole power of their internal development. Hence he infers the necessity of preserving the small nationalities to counteract and keep in check the noxious elements at work amongst the larger States. If we consider the recent history of the two nations which occupy the Peninsula, we find that Spain was the first to establish a constitutional government, but that French influence during the time of the Restoration brought back the fatal rule of absolutist principles, and, by a singular change of circumstances, it was Portugal which succeeded in securing permanently the triumph of liberty, whilst the sister nation fell into that state of degradation out of which it has emerged only a year ago. Don Pedro, says M. d'Alviella, is perhaps the only prince whom we can really call the founder of a constitutional monarchy, and the introduction of the volume before us is devoted to a brief narrative of the triumphant resistance made by the Liberals against the attempt of Dom Miguel. The appendix contains a number of diplomatic letters never published before, and, amongst others, some by the late King of the Belgians.

M. Guizot has long since finished the publication of his memoirs, but it seems as if he still wished to say a few words on the various phases of his political life; and in collecting six essays ‡ which were originally issued separately as the events of the day suggested them, he is led to cast once more a retrospective glance on the Government of the Restoration and that of Louis-Philippe. What, he asks in his preface, is the cause of the political anxiety from which we are suffering, and of the attitude assumed by the country with respect to the Emperor? Evidently the firm desire of throwing off a dictatorship, and of returning into the paths of constitutional rule. This desire may be, and no doubt is, with the majority at least, quite independent of any personal feeling towards Napoleon III.; but it has expressed itself in the most decided manner, and it will not rest until the end is attained. A dictatorship, M. Guizot goes on to say, is on certain occasions a very wholesome measure, severe though it may be; and there have been circumstances in which nothing could save a country but that kind of extra-legal government which re-establishes order at the expense of liberty. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the rule of a dictator is, by the very nature of the case, provisional and temporary. The great fault of Napoleon I. consisted in endeavouring to give a character of stability, through the Empire, to the strong government which, under the name of Consulate, had as a temporary expedient done so much good to France; and the mistake committed by Charles X. in 1830 was exactly of the same kind; for he practically asserted the privilege of becoming a dictator whenever he might think proper to do so. M. Guizot then examines rapidly the principal characteristics of Louis-Philippe's rule, and he shows that although the roi-citoyen was not sufficiently cautious in his way of expressing himself, and although he was too fond of unnecessarily making his own will felt, yet the personality of his Government cannot for a moment be placed on the same line as that which marked the despotism of Napoleon I. or the designs of Charles X. The administration of a monarch may be personal, in the sense of being perfectly real, without being obtrusive. As M. Guizot remarks, the contrast between Leopold I. and Louis-Philippe is very striking in this respect. We have so far spoken of the interesting preface to the Mélanges politiques et historiques; of the essays themselves we will only say that the questions they discuss are of never-dying importance, although they were suggested in the first instance by facts the most recent of which occurred nearly fifty years ago.

M. Émile de Laveleye, whose contributions to the Revue des Deux Mondes have attracted much favourable notice, has published in a small volume* a few essays which seem to him worthy of being rescued from the obscurity which so speedily overtakes periodical literature. The first essay, on account of its general character, will perhaps chiefly attract the reader, it is devoted to an examination of the works of the late M. Bordas-Demoulin, one of the most vigorous thinkers of modern France; but the author's purpose is to discuss afresh the relative position of Roman Catholicism and of religious thought at the present time. Like many persons of enthusiastic mind who are equally attached to the truths of revealed religion and to those of metaphysical science, M. Bordas-Demoulin fancied that a reconciliation could easily be brought about between these two sources of our knowledge, and he maintained that the entente cordiale should take place on the ground of Cartesianism. M. de Laveleye is of a different opinion, and comes to the conclusion that, as the tendency of modern philosophy is to carry discussion to its utmost limits and to stop at no obstacle in the pursuit of truth, so Roman Catholicism manifests the unmistakeable symptom of going always further in a reactionary direction, and of materializing religion more and more. If neither the schism of the fifteenth century, nor the Reformation, nor the events of the French Revolution could succeed in opening the eyes of the clergy, it is hopeless to expect that any catastrophe will be attended with greater success.

Amongst all the productions which the spirit of controversy has recently brought forth, very few can be compared to the two letters addressed by M. Crétineau-Joly to Father Theiner, on the subject of Pope Clement XIV. and the Jesuits †. M. Crétineau-Joly had published a work written with a strong Ultramontanist bias, but true on the whole, in which he discussed thoroughly, and from a point of view far from flattering to Ganganelli, the affair of the suppression of the Jesuits. Father Theiner thought proper to refute M. Crétineau-Joly's assertions, but he did so without sufficiently considering what sort of adversary he was challenging. Whilst condemning the animosity and the personalities indulged in by the author of L'Église romaine en face de la Révolution, critics were unanimous in acknowledging that he had the best of the argument; and the matter would have probably been forgotten if Father Theiner had not once more called out his antagonist by endeavouring to extenuate the behaviour of Napoleon I. in the famous episode of the Concordat, and to cast doubts on the authenticity of Cardinal Consalvi's memoirs. This was too much; M. Crétineau-Joly took up his pen, and the result is the volume now before us. It contains, first, a long essay on the quarrels between the Pope and the French Government in 1801, and then the letters, already referred to, about Clement XIV. and the Jesuits. Father Theiner will perhaps now see that his best policy is to be silent. A writer whose style is as picturesque as that of M. Veuillot himself, and who has drawn of M. Armand de Pontmartin the amusing sketch contained in pages 116–118 of the present volume, must not be trifled with.

Several books of travel are before us, claiming a word of notice. Count de Beauvoir takes us as far as Australia ‡. Having joined the Duke de Penthièvre in an expedition to the East, he gives us in his amusing volume the impressions of a young sailor, and his narrative bears all the traces of that enthusiasm, as well as of that haste in drawing conclusions, which makes the charm of youth. The political constitution of the Australian colonies is discussed at some length, and the democratic society of Melbourne is criticized in the most amusing manner. How thoroughly Count de Beauvoir enjoys the dangerous sport of hunting in the jungles! How racy are his descriptions of the Siamese Amazons! We can heartily recommend his duodecimo to readers who like to have truth served up to them in so startling a shape that it looks like fiction.

The author of À travers les Espagnes * is also an enthusiast, and as her fluent pen pours forth volume after volume in quick succession, we find no sign of weariness or of decay; we have still the same abundance of metaphors and of incongruous images which distinguished the chapters of the Bande du Jura—the same style, sometimes ridiculously trivial, sometimes stilted and full of affectation. Madame de Gasparin is as fond as ever of dragging in religion, anyhow, between the description of a landscape and the catalogue of a picture-gallery; she also sometimes attempts excursions on the domain of philology, but soon feels that she is treading upon ground with which she is not very well acquainted, and beats a hasty retreat.

M. Xavier Marmier's hero, Nils †, is likewise a traveller; but, instead of starting forth in quest of the picturesque or of mere recreation, his great object is the ideal. Dissatisfied with his native place in Dalecarlia, and hearing from some of the professors of the University of Upsal wonders about the intellectual development of Germany, the business habits of England, and the civilization of France, he undertakes a journey which will, he thinks, prove to him conclusively what he had already suspected—the decided inferiority of Dalecarlia to the rest of the world. We need hardly say that Nils finds himself everywhere mistaken; and instead of being dazzled by the phantoms which he sees around him—phantoms of learning, phantoms of civilization, phantoms of pleasure—he takes the wise part of returning to Dalecarlia, where the ideal at last appears to him under the form of domestic happiness. Nils, or rather M. Marmier, takes the opportunity of examining some of the principal questions connected with the countries which he visits; for example, in England, the problem of pauperism, in Austria that of police espionnage, in Switzerland the art of fleecing unwary travellers. Nils arrives in Paris during the last days of the reign of Louis-Philippe, and witnesses the terrible scenes of that revolution which brought about once more the rule of the sword. Experience disgusts him with Radicalism, and he returns home thoroughly disabused of his political and other illusions.

THE LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

AS the Bill passed through the Committee of the Lords there was so much apparent confusion, there was such a chaos of proposals, amendments were made, remade, and withdrawn so rapidly, that it was impossible to follow in every detail the course which the Lords were taking. But, fortunately, on each of the three closing evenings of the discussion there was one main question, involving the most important issues, to which the attention of the House was directed, and on which a vote was taken. These three decisions of the Lords deserve the most careful consideration, because they have entirely altered the Bill, and raised a direct issue of the most unmistakeable kind between the Ministry and the Lords. The first decision was that the glebes and glebe-houses of the Episcopal clergy should be handed over to the Church Body, free of all charge, and without any payment, while no provision should be made for the residences of Romanist priests or Presbyterian ministers; the second decision was that the Ulster glebes, worth little short of a million of money, should be handed over as a bonus to the Ecclesiastical Body; and the third decision was that no appropriation should now be made of the surplus, but that its destination should be determined by Parliament hereafter. We think all these decisions extremely wrong if the Irish Church Bill is itself right. Either a measure of religious equality is worth passing or it is not, and it would be much simpler to leave the Irish Church as it is than to wound and offend the Catholics and the Presbyterians by pretending to disendow it and then giving back to it all its possessions. The Duke of CLEVELAND was much blamed for his softness in allowing his amendment to be broken up, and thus permitting the House to secure their glebes to the Anglican clergy, and afterwards to refuse glebes to the clergy of other denominations. But we cannot agree in this censure. If the Lords really wished to violate obvious justice in this marked way, it was much better to let them show their intentions. Not that the majority of the Lords are to be blamed for taking the view they do. It is a natural view, and in one way a defensible view. But it is totally irreconcilable with the Bill, and if the Church is a good harmless body, that ought to be enriched with bonus after bonus in order to help it in its struggle with other sects, why should it be touched at all? The whole arguments of the speakers of the majority with reference to the Ulster glebes rest on a foundation with which the Bill is at utter variance. These arguments may be classed under the two heads of the superficial and the real. The superficial arguments were, in the first place, that JAMES I. had the legal right to assign the glebes for the support of the Anglican clergy, and, in the next place, that the Protestant settlers of Ulster had been induced to settle there by the promise that a Protestant clergy should be maintained there for their benefit. As to the second of these arguments, the less said the better. The Presbyterians were induced to settle there by the promise that their ministers should be provided for, and they were deceived and disappointed in the most shameless way by the Anglican Church and the Court, who sucked the Presbyterian orange dry, and then threw away the skin. As to the legality of the grant, no one can doubt that it was legally valid; and we may even go further and say that the object of the grant, that of upholding Protestantism when Catholicism was identical with disaffection, was a legitimate one according to the ideas of the time when it was made. But the whole case on which the Irish Church Bill rests is that the object has become a most illegitimate and pernicious one, and that the grants must be resumed in order to free the Church and Ireland from the taint of Protestant ascendency. The real defence, however, of the concession of this enormous bonus to the Anglican body was that urged by the Bishop of ELY. This was, that the Anglican body, in order to flourish under the severe strain of competition, must have the money. This body, as he said, is not like a vigorous youth going out to a colony to make a fortune by energy and by suitability to the scene of labour, but more like a middle-aged, rather worn-out emigrant, who, if he wants to b[e] comfortable in a colony, ought to have a decent privat[e] fortune in hand, so that, however unfit he may be for colonia[l] life, he may always have a respectable subsistence assured him. It is difficult to see how the main view that possesses the mind[s] of the majority of the Peers could have been better or mor[e] graphically put; but no idea could be more alien to the whol[e] conception of the Bill than that of this wearied well-to-d[o] colonist leaning on Parliament for support against the rivalry of his poorer neighbours.

The case for giving glebe-houses to the Catholic and Presbyterian clergy was exceedingly well argued, and we have nothing to do but to express our entire concurrence with the reasoning of those who supported the Duke of CLEVELAND. But the proposal was defeated by a combination of the Tory followers of Lord CAIRNS and of the unflinching supporters of the Government. Both these sections of the majority—the only majority the Government has obtained in the Upper House—were in their own way right. Lord CAIRNS wished to remain true to his old Orange friends, who hate concurrent endowment, and at the same time not to dissociate himself from the more advanced and liberal section of the Conservative party; and he could not have attained both objects more ingeniously than by joining in rejecting the Duke of CLEVELAND'S amendment, while at the same time he took care to do this on the ground that, as he proposed to leave the surplus unappropriated, there might still be a possibility in another Session of carrying out the views of Lord SALISBURY and Lord CARNARVON. The Ministry took the simple line of declaring that, whatever might be the leanings of members of the Cabinet as individuals, they are carrying out the wishes of the country in refusing all proposals of concurrent endowment. This appears to be quite in harmony with the general duties of Ministers, and with the position assumed by the Ministry on taking office. They came in because, as they alleged, they were forced to take issue with Lord MAYO, who shadowed out a scheme of concurrent endowment, and they were violently accused of having done this without believing it, and in the [illegible] wantonness of party enmity. They might indeed be [illegible] if they deprecated concurrent endowment in order [illegible] office, and advocated it in order to retain office. But [illegible] said that they are released from all their pledges because [illegible] opinion of the nation is changed. Who is to judge of [illegible]? They say that the opinion of the nation has not changed, and certainly it must be allowed that the change in national opinion ought to be very plain and very unmistakeable in order to release them from their engagements and to warrant them in proposing the direct opposite of that which they came into office to propose. How is it known that the opinion of the country has changed? The Lords represent to a great degree, in this matter, the opinion of educated reasonable men not charged with the actual conduct of affairs, and this opinion has always been in favour of concurrent endowment in the abstract. We do not see any evidence that the opinion of the bulk of the Liberal constituencies has changed, and people who do not think that the opinion of the bulk of the Liberal constituencies ought to prevail, so long as they can return a majority of the House of Commons, ought to have had nothing to do with Lord DERBY'S Reform Bill. It is the business of the Ministry of the day to find out the real wishes of the people, and it would be the height of unfairness if those who a year ago were pressing this doctrine against Mr. DISRAELI were now to turn round and to say that a Liberal Ministry is to be judged differently.

At first sight it might seem as if those who wish to see glebes provided for the clergy of dissenting sects would find in Lord CAIRNS'S proposal to defer for the present the destination of the surplus the very thing they wanted. Public opinion might thus be suffered to grow, and in a year or two there might be a general concurrence of opinion in favour of the desired measure. The opinions and arguments of the independent Peers would work their way, and another Ministry, if not that of Mr. GLADSTONE, might honourably and successfully propose a measure of concurrent endowment. These considerations are enough to make us pause, but they are met by arguments which seem to us much stronger. In the first place, this postponement of the appropriation of the surplus is avowedly defended on the ground that no one, after the amendments of the Lords, can tell what the surplus will be, or whether there will be any at all. This is quite true; the Irish Church has got bonus after bonus given it, until no one can say what will be left. But it is inconceivable that the Commons should allow such a travesty of their Bill as a measure thus enriching the disendowed Church, and declaring that it will be quite time enough to say what is to be done with the surplus when it is seen what the surplus is. No doubt it would be a great triumph for Lord CAIRNS to be able to give his Orange friends to understand that he had managed to get back everything for the Church except a possible surplus which Parliament would not take the trouble to appropriate: but if the Irish Church Bill is to end in a victory for Lord CAIRNS and the Orangemen, what possible justification can there be for passing it? The agitation which would be produced in Ireland for many years by having a large sum to scramble for, and the fierce theological controversies that would rage through the kingdom, are also evils of considerable magnitude. But the main objection to the proposal of Lord CAIRNS is that there is no reason to suppose that the ultimate destination of the surplus would be to building glebe-houses or to any other form of concurrent endowment. As it is, the Lords have decided that the surplus shall be appropriated to any purposes that Parliament may think fit hereafter. There is no reason why its destination should be religious or semi-religious. It would be a great prize to be devoted to any objects which any Ministry might choose to think good for Ireland. No one would be rash enough to prophesy what its destination would ultimately be under such circumstances; but it is not going too far to say that there is a destination which would be received by the mass of the Irish with much greater enthusiasm than any proposal for glebe-houses. It is obvious that a cry might easily be raised in Ireland for employing this sum, which ignorance would imagine to be far larger than it really would be, as the basis of a scheme for dealing with the Irish land. It would seem so simple, and so peculiarly gratifying to the Irish, to apply the sum waiting and ready for use in aid of some plan like that proposed by Mr. BRIGHT, but going much further. That arrangements had been made to pay off his alien landlord out of the spoils of an heretical Church would be delightful and credible news to the Irish peasant. We have not the slightest wish to prejudge the great question of the Irish land, or to take exclusively the side of the landlords against the tenants or the labourers; but it is evident that the inevitable discussion of a question that will be most agitating might be rendered very difficult and irritating if those who advocated a social revolution had got a large fund vaguely devoted to Irish purposes as a basis for their schemes.

THE LIFE-PEERAGES BILL.

THE unexpected defeat of the Life-Peerages Bill may probably be explained by the simple theory of reaction from an artificial Liberalism. That first love or nature violently driven out will always return is a lesson taught by homely proverbs in more than one language. It was impossible that the House of Lords should really wish to renounce its distinctive character; but when Lord RUSSELL introduced his Bill, many peers were anxious both to increase the efficiency of the House, and to prove that they were themselves not disinclined to well-considered innovations. Lord SALISBURY had already proposed a scheme for increasing the control of the House of Lords over legislation by suspending over the recess Bills which might be sent up from the House of Commons too late in the Session for full consideration. His scheme, although it was supported by peers of all parties, afterwards collapsed in a joint Committee to which it was referred, through the disinclination of the House of Commons to entertain the question; but the discussion of Lord SALISBURY's plan, and of the general distribution of business between the Houses, secured Lord RUSSELL a favourable hearing. Lord DERBY himself for once laid aside his instinctive antagonism to all real or supposed improvement, to support the Bill in an elaborate speech: Lord CAIRNS acquiesced on condition of the insertion of amendments which were afterwards adopted; Lord SALISBURY devised arguments for life-peerages which had never occurred to Lord RUSSELL, and Lord MALMESBURY almost alone announced an opposition which was not at the time considered formidable. Some members of the House were reconciled to the measure by Lord RUSSELL's judicious abstinence from any revival of the obsolete WENSLEYDALE controversy. An application to Parliament admitted the principle for which Lord LYNDHURST had contended, that the power of effecting an important change in the Constitution was not within the prerogative of the Crown. At a later stage in the progress of the Bill, attentive observers, perceiving that Lord CAIRNS was disposed to withdraw his original adhesion, inferred that his party had remonstrated against the decision of their nominal leader. Lord MALMESBURY, though far inferior to his successor in dialectic faculty, judges more accurately, by the aid of habitual sympathy, of the feelings and opinions of the mass of the House of Lords. If Lord CAIRNS had in the first instance mistaken his cue, he was quick in taking a hint from Lord MALMESBURY's protest; and, according to his odd statement on Thursday last, he reserved to his party the right of opposing the measure which he had himself previously accepted. It appears that, not objecting to the principle, Lord CAIRNS had declared that the merits of the Bill depended on its details; and, in apologizing for his inconsistency, he forgets that the clauses of the Bill were framed by himself in Committee.

Lord MALMESBURY's reasons for rejecting the Bill, though neither original nor forcible, were almost typical in their commonplace shallowness and dulness. The House of Lords had flourished for several centuries, it had never, as far as Lord MALMESBURY knew, failed to discharge its duties, and its members at the present day were not inferior to its predecessors. Peers were not exclusively landowners, because some of them possessed coal-mines and iron-works, while others owned a great amount of house property in London. If military and naval matters were to be discussed, th[illegible] were always generals and admirals, Lord SALISBURY, as a railway chairman, might be supposed to abound in commercial knowledge, Lord LYTTON and Lord HOUGHTON represented the ornamental branches of literature; and, if it were possible that the House should be puzzled by historical doubts, Lord STANHOPE was there to set them right. When distinguished men refused peerages, it was not to avoid imposing a costly honour on their descendants, but because, like BURKE after the death of his son, they had no motive for family ambition. Finally, Lord MALMESBURY protested against a change in a Constitution which had lasted fo[illegible] than th[illegible]turies; and if he had consulted the oracle, Lord STANHOPE could have informed him that he might have strengthened his argument by adding three centuries more. If Lord MALMESBURY confused the times of Queen ELIZABETH and of HENRY III., his arithmetic was sound when he counted his followers and opponents. The eulogies which have lately been lavished on the House of Lords have probably induced its members to exaggerate its constitutional power and the security of its position; and it is true that, if Lord MALMESBURY talked conventional nonsense, the practical advantages of Lord RUSSELL's Bill were scarcely sufficient to outweigh the prejudice which such a proposal was certain to provoke. If life-peers had taken a leading part in the House of Lords, their efficiency would perhaps have furnished a verbal argument, though not an operati[illegible] reason, against hereditary su[illegible] In the not less probable contingency of their failure, the change would have been useless; and if the new honour had been neglected by the eminent persons for whom it was intended, the institution would have become ridiculous. Although there is some reason to regret the defeat of the Bill, it would have mattered little if it had never been introduced.

Mr. BRIGHT's description of the Life-Peerages Bill as an attempt to tinker the composition of the House of Lords was uncivil, and in a certain sense unfair; for the phrase represents an attempt to make a worn-out article last beyond its destined term by the aid of petty alterations. It is possible that the soundest institutions may admit of improvements in detail, as a successful picture is lovingly retouched by the artist in the hope of rendering it perfect; but a satirical critic naturally assumes that amendment only implies previous defects, of which, for his immediate purpose, he exaggerates the gravity. The House of Lords, far from having become obsolete, is in itself as sound and as capable as at any previous point of its history; and the relative decline of its authority is attributable to causes which have nothing to do with decay or corruption. Lord RUSSELL's Bill was only tinkering, as far as the changes which it would have effected would be comparatively small, although the opponents of the measure disliked it because they hold that it involved a dangerous admission. If an hereditary House is susceptible of improvement by an admixture of life-peers chosen by the Crown, Lord MALMESBURY and his friends fear that by a logical inference it may seem to follow that lineal succession ought to be wholly abandoned. The House of Lords may possibly be doomed to future extinction; but the revolution would not have been perceptibly accelerated by the creation of a few life-peers. Until the distribution of property in the United Kingdom is essentially altered by legislation, the great landed families will be enormously powerful. In France, and in other parts of Europe, it has been found impossible to abolish either titles or the maintenance of an exclusive social caste. If the Continental aristocracy had retained their property as well as their rank, they would still possess an influence which they have almost wholly lost. The preference which is voluntarily accorded to English peers in the choice of honorary, and even of commercial, functionaries represents the opinion of the middle classes more faithfully than any popular declamation. The guinea stamp is not the gold, but for ordinary circulation it is found highly useful. Lord RUSSELL only proposed to affix to a few coins of a different mintage the same image and superscription which give currency to hereditary peers.

The importance of the question of life-peerages has been reduced to its true proportion by the unusual attention which has lately been drawn to the House of Lords. The peerages of the bishops, although they are not hereditary, are distinguished by their official or corporate character from personal honours conferred at the pleasure of the Crown. If the Irish prelates are ultimately allowed to retain their seats in the House of Lords during life, they will furnish a precedent for a peerage which will be for the first time disconnected both from inheritance and from succession. There is no popular demand for an addition to the strength of an Assembly which has proved itself fully equal in intellectual power to the House of Commons; nor would it be easy for those who are best acquainted with public life to find half a dozen statesmen of limited means who are now languishing for an opportunity of serving the country as peers. In one of the debates on the question, Lord SALISBURY admitted that he had made a mistake in supposing that Lord RUSSELL's Bill would facilitate the elevation to the peerage of successful manufacturers and merchants. To those who can afford to travel in the most expensive manner, improvements of second-class accommodation are not personally interesting. A great lawyer or physician might perhaps be more willing than a trader to accept an honour which would imply that he had not made a large fortune, but there are not half a dozen instances in a generation of the refusal of a peerage on the ground of insufficient means. The distinctive character of the House of Lords, in modern if not in ancient times, is inseparably connected with transmitted or transmissible wealth, of which the greater part is always, through the operation of social and economic causes, invested in land. Experience shows that, as might have been anticipated, out of four hundred hereditary proprietors there is a great majority of educated men of decent reputation, including several who possess more than average ability, and a select body of orators and statesmen. The House of Commons will continue to be divided into corresponding sections, in nearly the same numerical proportions, as long as the upper and middle classes are allowed by the constituencies to compete fairly for public honours. The introduction of a few life-peers would strengthen the intellectual element in the House of Lords without largely affecting the collective weight of the entire Assembly. It is scarcely probable that Lord RUSSELL's proposal will be renewed, although more sweeping changes may be suggested from without. If in a doubtful controversy the House of Lords had been led to adopt an erroneous conclusion, maturer reflection might have exposed the fallacies which had prevailed for a time; but to elevate Lord MALMESBURY's arguments to the rank of sophisms would be an absurd and extravagant compliment. The majority of the House of Lords may have had nothing better to say; but the Bill was rejected, not because the Constitution was supposed to have begun in the sixteenth century, or because Lord LYTTON has written many clever novels, but through the natural dislike of an aristocracy to a modification of its character. Mr. BRIGHT, who, according to Lord GRANVILLE, would have helped Lord RUSSELL to tinker the constitution of the House of Lords, will not regret to find that the peers themselves deny the existence of defects.

THE FUTURE OF THE BILL.

In the numerous debates and discussions which have lately taken place in the Upper House, the Lords have shown one piece of practical wisdom. Feeling or fearing that they were thought less of than they deserved, they determined to speak up for themselves, and to sing their own praises to the public. They knew that people are generally estimated by others at the value they seem to set on themselves, and they considered that they could not help gaining credit for having the qualities they claimed, if they only claimed them boldly and loudly enough. More especially they have advanced two grounds for vindicating to themselves the maximum of popular esteem. In the first place, they are so very statesmanlike. There is about them none of the rawness and rashness, the flighty catching at novelties, the refusing to think of coming dangers, which notoriously mark the Commons. The Lords debate grave questions in a dignified, calm, and deliberate way, and arrive at conclusions which point, not to the gratification of the idle popular fancies of the moment, but to the solid and permanent happiness of all classes. In the next place, they are the true representatives of the nation. They know what the nation really thinks and wishes, not perhaps what it seems to itself to wish—for the House of Commons may perhaps know better than the Lords something so wholly immaterial—but its true best wishes, the wishes that lie at the bottom of its heart, into which the Peers have a special faculty of seeing. This faculty, as Lord MALMESBURY explained on Thursday night, is gained by the extraordinary diversity of knowledge, habits, and opinions which characterizes the House of Lords, and by the fidelity with which it represents all classes and ranks. The Peers have been quite delighted with this theory, and have pushed it so far that, to listen to any of the more enthusiastic of their theorists, it might seem as if there was no such body as the House of Commons at all, and no necessity for one, and that Ministers had no use or power, as all good government was carried on by the Lords and the nation, or rather by the Lords as representing and embodying the secret unconscious will of the nation. Animated by these rose-coloured views of their order, of its sphere and of its functions, they have naturally made very rough work of a Bill which a foolish, low-minded, ill-bred set of persons framed, and which the Commons, deluded by the mistaken notion that they were the real representatives of the nation, carried with unexampled rapidity and decision. The Lords knew better than to accept such a Bill without completely transforming it. They had to show their statesmanship in dealing with it, and they had to give expression to the unuttered feelings and the unknown opinions of the country; and they fulfilled their task in a very earnest and thorough manner. They made two radical changes in the Bill, to which a number of minor changes were ancillary. They took one half of the surplus, and, in their character of supreme representatives of the wishes and views of the whole United Kingdom, gave it back to the Anglican Church. In their character of statesmen seeing far ahead, and aiming at the real peace and happiness of the community, they refused to do anything whatever with the other half of the surplus, but left it to be scrambled for in future years by any body or persons in Ireland strong enough to get hold of it. They were not particular as to its destination; it might go for glebes for the Catholics; it might be made the foundation of a land scheme; it might be wasted in a thousand jobs. This was immaterial; what was essential was to leave it open as the prize of a good free faction fight. The Commons, naturally enough, had not seen this; but the Lords are statesmen, and saw at once how much it would lead to the repose and contentment of Ireland. It was also very gratifying to them, as they could not but confess to a hearty good will to the Irish Church, that they were able to see into the national mind so far as to discover in it a desire for giving the poor Church two or three odd millions by way of bonus or perquisite. They have thus made, they ask the public to observe, a very good Bill out of a very bad one, and trust that the public will now quite agree with Lord MALMESBURY, who, after taking time to reflect, and studying himself and other Peers at leisure, has now announced his conclusion that the House of Lords is absolutely perfect.

Next week this fine specimen of wise and far-sighted legislation will come back to the Commons, who will not be likely to regard it with as much affection and admiration as its authors. The basis on which the amended Bill is to be dealt with appears to us perfectly clear. Either a Bill worth having should be passed, or no Bill should be passed. Nothing can be so bad as to try to settle a great question by a

Bill that fails to carry out the objects for which it was introduced, or to embody the principles on which it was defended. A Bill to give half the surplus to the disendowed Church, and to throw the other half to the Irish to scramble for, is a Bill totally unlike the Bill which the Government proposed to the Commons, and carried through the House so successfully. It does not carry out the principle of religious equality; it does not dispose of the question finally. It rests on an entirely different theory from that on which the Government Bill was based. The Government and the Commons say that, considering the evils wrought at the present day by Protestant ascendency, the property of the Church representing that ascendency shall be devoted to other objects after providing for life-interests. The House of Lords in effect say, that as the property of the Irish Church is to be taken from it for no reason, and merely out of wanton love of mischief, the right thing to do is to let the Church have a good slice of this property back again, and keep the rest unappropriated to see what will turn up. There can be no advantage in having an Irish Church Bill at all, if the view of the Lords is the right one. Unless Protestant ascendency is a bad thing, tainting the Church that is mixed up with it, why should not the Irish Church keep every thing it has got? To say that because we are getting very far into July, and because some Bill must be passed before July is over, a Bill something like that sent down from the Lords should be accepted, is to make a mockery of a great political question. It is asked what is to happen if the Lords insist on their amendments, and whether it would not be better to have a Bill embodying a compromise than no Bill at all. What is to be done if the Lords insist on these amendments may be discussed if it turns out that they do insist on them. But the first thing is to decide whether the Bill shall be restored substantially to its former shape, and be dropped if the Lords will not accept it in this shape, or whether a Bill answering none or scarcely any of the purposes for which Mr. GLADSTONE introduced his measure shall be got through, in order that it may be said a Bill of some sort has been made law. There can, we think, be no hesitation whatever in the minds of those who approve the Bill as originally framed. Let the Bill be dropped altogether for this Session rather than have a Bill not worth having. If the Lords wish, when pressed, to give way, something may be done very easily to smooth the path of retreat for them. Many concessions were made by the Government through Lord GRANVILLE while the Bill was in Committee, and the amendments which the Lords would have to withdraw are not at all numerous. They might be allowed to seem to have done a few good turns for their clerical friends, provided they quietly reverse such decisions as that respecting the Ulster glebes, which in the twinkling of an eye puts a million of money into the pocket of the disendowed Church. But there are clear limits to the possibility of compromise; and if the Lords really mean to maintain their theory of the Bill against the theory which has found acceptance with the Commons, the Government, it is to be hoped, will not waver for an instant, but will face all the consequences of the Bill being dropped, rather than see their measure deprived of the greater part of its power of doing good.

There is nothing at all dreadful in these consequences. The Lords have so altered the Bill as to have submitted a rival project to the country. It is not a trifling difference, a paltry sum, a few pounds or acres more or less, as to which the Houses are now at variance. A measure to give back half the surplus to the Anglican Church, and to institute a scramble for the other half, embodies a distinct proposal, the difference between which and the proposal of the Government no one can mistake. If the Bill is dropped, Mr. GLADSTONE will be simply in the position that he will have proposed a measure to the satisfaction of the House of Commons and of the country, but that the Lords have declined to pass it, while offering to carry a rival and very different measure of their own. The Commons and the Ministry will have had their Bill, and the Lords will have had their Bill. It is no use trying to speculate what would come next, for the Constitution provides two or three courses which might be conveniently or properly taken. Mr. GLADSTONE would have to consider in the first place whether he should resign, and he might plausibly urge that this was the proper course. He has made the carrying of his Irish Church Bill the keystone of his whole policy, and he may refuse to be responsible for the government of the country if his policy is made impossible. The peers who have drawn up this rival Irish Church Bill would then have to consider whether their statesmanship and their faculty for seeing into the national mind were sufficiently appreciated in the country to give them a fair chance of passing what may be termed the bonus-and-scramble scheme through Parliament. If, on reflection, they thought that the country did not know wisdom when under their eyes, and did not understand their real wishes sufficiently to make this possible, Mr. GLADSTONE would bring in his Bill again, and we may be quite sure the Lords would pass it; for if it was conceded that Mr. GLADSTONE's Government was the only possible Government, and if he would not govern unless he had his way, he must have it. Even without resigning, Mr. GLADSTONE might think this sufficiently established by the majority he commands in the Commons, and the unabated confidence extended to his Ministry in the country. If the country and the House of Commons supported him equally next Session, after the Lords had challenged him to let the nation pronounce between the two schemes, the Upper House could do nothing but accept the decision of the country. We do not for a moment believe that the Lords would resist what they were obliged to confess was the national will. It follows, therefore, that without anything very horrible happening, Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill must become law if the constituencies support it. The only question is, whether the issue shall again be taken directly or in a special autumn Session, or early next year. This is only a matter of detail, although it would involve some difficult questions which the Ministry could only decide after ascertaining, as they best could, the temper of the country. But, at the worst, it could only involve a delay of a few months, and it would be much better to wait than to hurry through a bad measure now, in order to have the poor pleasure of saying that an Irish Church Bill was really passed before July was over.

THE THIRD PARTY AND THE EMPEROR.

THE political position in France has undergone an unexpected change. Till a week ago the one point on which speculation centred was, when and how the EMPEROR would elect to confront his adversaries. To day the problem is, what attitude he will take up towards his supporters. Before the elections the Corps Législatif was sharply divided into Ministerialists and members of the Opposition, while the Third Party—consisting of M. ÉMILE OLLIVIER—vainly endeavoured to reconcile the two, and received as its guerdon the equal hatred of both. This Session the Chamber offers a very different spectacle. The majority has suddenly come to years of discretion, and loudly proclaims its readiness to dispense with M. ROUHER's guardianship. Each day sees some official candidate blossoming with tropical haste into the independent member; and recruits have flocked in to the Third Party until the little one has become a thousand, and M. ÉMILE OLLIVIER can command a formidable following. It is important to observe that this is the indirect, and not the direct, consequence of the elections. The constituencies have not returned a majority belonging to the Third Party; they for the most part did as they were told—thanks to the admirable arrangements of the Government in rearranging circumscriptions and frightening rural electors—and sent up the men the EMPEROR wanted. It is the majority that has read the sky for itself, and has determined that, whether the EMPEROR thinks so or not, the path of concession is the path of safety. After all, no one can know better than an official candidate how little his success is any gauge of popular favour. He can estimate accurately enough the real value of the elections, and by a process of mental redistribution arrive at a result which is by no means so assuring as that given by the formal return. The question, therefore, of most immediate interest, is whether this undesigned coalition with the Third Party is of the nature of a revolt in the EMPEROR's camp, or a diversion in the EMPEROR's favour. Are the rats flying from the falling house, or are the sons putting a gentle pressure upon a father who is somewhat slow to recognise the progress they have made towards manhood? In intention at all events the movement is to all appearance of the latter character. How long it may continue so will depend in some measure upon the line the EMPEROR determines to take, but as yet there is no visible sign of any more serious defection than can be explained in this way. Indeed, on the whole, the action of the majority seems to give NAPOLEON III. an unexpected opportunity of compromise. Politicians are so apt to score more from the mistakes of their adversaries than from any skill or judgment of their own, that it is almost a surprise to find that the Empire has some chance of being saved by, instead of from, its friends. But if the EMPEROR is really meditating how to yield judiciously, the interpellation of the Third Party may relieve him of some embarrassment.

it invests his retreat with the appearance of a concession made to the remonstrances of friends, not to the threats of enemies, and it secures him against the danger of alienating his own supporters in attempting to conciliate the Opposition. This last advantage is perhaps the greater of the two. A year or two ago the EMPEROR'S every step in the direction of reform would have been hampered by a dead weight of timid and unimpressible Conservatism. Now even the Arcadians will probably profess their conviction that the Empire is too deeply rooted in the hearts of Frenchmen to run any risk from the establishment of liberty.

The interpellation which goes by the name of M. DU MIRAL may be taken as marking the outermost line the EMPEROR has thought of defending. "The necessity of strengthening the "institutions of the Empire by developing the action and "power of control of the Corps Législatif" is just one of those pseudo-constitutional platitudes in which NAPOLEON III finds pleasure. If we look at the particular methods by which M. DU MIRAL proposes to attain the developments referred to, we shall see how far they are from touching the root of the matter. It is true that six months ago the restoration of the Address, the extension of the rights of interpellation and amendment, and the permission to the Corps Législatif to elect its own officers, would have been regarded by the Left as an unlooked-for triumph. By delaying these concessions until after the elections, the EMPEROR has allowed the Opposition to feel their own strength, and he now finds them resolved to accept nothing less than the substance of Parliamentary Government. Now, this is just what M. DU MIRAL'S interpellation does not ask. It claims for the Corps Législatif additional facilities for expressing it opinion, but it gives it no more power of executing its will than it possesses already. The restoration of the Address would ensure to the Opposition at least one opportunity in every Session of discussing the whole policy of the Government; but as French ingenuity has always contrived to find the required occasion within the four corners of the Budget, the gain would be more apparent than real. A system which allows such speeches as those of M. THIERS or M. JULES FAVRE does not leave much room for improvement in the direction of freedom of debate. Its fatal weakness has been, that these speeches have led to no direct result, and no mere increase in their number would remedy this defect. The concession of M. DU MIRAL'S demand would give the Opposition another field-day or two every year, but it would leave them as powerless as now to follow up their oratorical victories. The interpellation of the Third Party, on the other hand, has a thoroughly business air about it. It says nothing about the "institutions of the Empire"—thinking probably that they have the EMPEROR to look after them—but it puts the Corps Législatif in its true place as the exponent of the wishes of the country. These wishes can only be satisfied by giving the deputies charged with the exposition of them an effectual share in the direction of public affairs; and this again can only be achieved by the concession of a responsible Ministry. Until the Executive is under the control of, and virtually nominated by, the Legislature, the power of the latter is merely nominal. This has so long been an established axiom in English politics, that it seems almost an anachronism to see it hotly debated in a neighbouring country. The arguments for and against the change have comparatively but little interest for Englishmen; the question which really concerns them is, whether the EMPEROR will resist or submit to it.

As yet it seems he has only temporized. Until the Chamber is formally constituted, the interpellation cannot be considered, and the Government has been able to gain a little breathing space by delaying the election of the Secretaries until all the elections have been verified. It is obvious, however, that mere delay can in the end do but little. Sooner or later the working session must begin, and even if the evil day is postponed by a premature adjournment to the autumn, the only consequence will be that the Government will have been beaten without a battle. To shrink from meeting such an interpellation as that of the Third Party would be to admit that the EMPEROR is afraid to face the Chamber he has himself created. The self-confidence natural to legislators who are thus flattered would hardly be diminished by the simple lapse of a summer. Nor would anything be gained by burking the interpellation through the medium of a technical objection. Such expedients are useful enough when the object is to suppress a discussion forced on by an obstinate minority. But, under present circumstances, to plead a senatus-consultum against an interpellation which asks for a responsible Ministry, would amount to a confession that a majority of the Corps Législatif is hostile to the constitution of the Empire. It seems impossible, therefore, that the EMPEROR should adopt this course unless he has made up his mind to provide the nation, by the time the autumn comes round, with something else than politics to think about. It is more likely, however, that before arriving at so tremendous a conclusion, he will make the experiment either of concession or refusal. He may have good hope that the majority, after it has once been gratified by having the reins put into its own hands, will be content to leave the real management of them to him, or that an unmistakeable announcement that he will yield nothing will force it once more to make its choice between the Empire and Revolution. At present probabilities seem rather to point towards the former solution. If M. ROUHER represents the Empire as it is, M. CLÉMENT DUVERNOIS may perhaps be taken to represent the Empire as NAPOLEON III. occasionally fancies it might be. The vague phrases of the Peuple Français last Thursday give but little positive indication of the course the EMPEROR is preparing to follow, but its courtesy towards the Third Party, and its disclaimer of "exaggerated resistance," are inconsistent with a formed resolution to meet the interpellation with a direct negative.

TRADE-UNIONS.

ALTHOUGH Mr. HUGHES'S Bill on Trade-Unions and Combinations has been allowed to pass a second reading without opposition, the institutions which the measure was intended to favour were severely criticized in the course of the debate. Mr. BRASSEY, Mr. POTTER, and Mr. PLATT denounced the economic fallacies which are dear to operative associations and their advisers; and Mr. BRUCE, on behalf of the Government, insisted on the necessity of statutory protection against tyranny and intimidation. It is absurd to pretend that the prohibition of the use of good and cheap bricks in the City of Manchester is maintained by voluntary agreement. Scores of master-brickmakers, and thousands of workmen, would be only too happy to make bricks for the town by machinery, if the selfish resolutions of the Union were not supported by force or by terror. Combinations ought as far as possible to be internally free, and, except by the exercise of moral influence, powerless without. The law, though it has nothing to do with economic blunders, must guard against social wrongs. In the opinion of Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON, who has published in the Fortnightly Review an able argument in favour of the measure, the Bill introduced by Mr. HUGHES and Mr. MUNDELLA affords, by a repeal of existing Acts, the same kind of relief from legislative interference which has by general consent been already extended to the general operations of trade. It is not a little remarkable that one of the leaders of the political school which most systematically advocates State control over social relations should in this instance rely on the sound doctrine of absolute freedom of contract. There can be no doubt of Mr. HARRISON'S good faith, but some of his most conspicuous associates have frequently contended that Trade-Unions ought to be invested with coercive powers. When it is admitted on all hands that political economy can take care of itself without the aid of law, some advance has been made towards the settlement of the dispute. Only a few fanatics unconnected with the particular trade can approve the regulations by which the Manchester masons and brickmakers restrict building operations in the city and district, nor is it possible for an impartial observer to believe that the wealth and happiness of the community are promoted by the rule which prohibits a bricklayer from using two hands on certain portions of his work; but if a hundred or a thousand men agree to submit themselves even to more vexatious restraints, it is not the business of legislators to correct their possible errors. Masons have as much right to refuse to handle stone squared in the quarry as capitalists to determine that they will not invest their money except under onerous conditions; but in practice the competition of capital is absolutely free, while strenuous efforts are made to impose on labour the control of a despotic organization. The function of the lawgiver commences when the Trade-Union attempts to usurp authority over those who are not willing to join its ranks. The question whether protective enactments are necessary, and therefore just, depends wholly on practical considerations. Distinct precautions against exceptional dangers are perfectly consistent with legal equality. If it is found that certain kinds of oppression and tyranny are beyond the reach of ordinary law, it may be proper to increase the penalties or to provide additional facilities for redress. It is true that the burden of proof lies on those who demand the establishment or maintenance of special legislation. In the ordinary course of life verbal threats may be safely disregarded, unless they lead directly to breach of the peace; but it is not obviously unreasonable that threats addressed by a large and powerful body to the members of an entire class should be subjected to penalties. An old woman in England who threatens to bewitch a neighbour scarcely comes within the cognizance of the law; but if she practised a similar art among a superstitious negro population in the West Indies, she would find that her larger powers of mischief involved a corresponding liability to punishment. An isolated insult to a non-unionist workman may be a wrong below the notice of the law; but if the affront is repeated day after day by an organized gang, as in the instance mentioned by Mr. BRUCE, intolerable suffering may be inflicted. It is a fit subject for inquiry whether the law of conspiracy is sufficient to afford protection, and it is still more necessary to take care that the ordinary remedies are not impaired by a measure promoted apparently for a different purpose.

The wording of the Trade Combination Bill is in some parts not free from an ambiguity which fully justified the guarded language of Mr. BRUCE in his answer to a recent deputation and in his speech on the second reading of the Bill. By the second clause all persons are allowed to make agreements as to wages, hours of work, persons by whom or the mode in which any work, in the odd language used by the draftsman, is to be or is not to be done, "and with "respect to any terms or conditions whatsoever under which "any work or employment shall or shall not be carried on." Nothing can be fairer than the recognition of a right to agree to work or not to work under any imaginable conditions affecting only the parties to the contract, and those who may be interested in procuring the completion of the work; but at the end of the clause it would have been necessary to confine the operation of the measure to the persons who enter into the agreement. If Manchester masons and brickmakers agree that no strangers shall work in the city, they lay a foundation for acts of injustice which might perhaps secure impunity under the words of the following clause. Clause 3 provides that no combination made "with the intent merely "of giving effect to any such agreement as in the foregoing "section is mentioned, or of obtaining the conditions "stated in any such agreement, shall subject any person who "shall have been a party thereto to any criminal prosecu-"tion." Mr. HUGHES, Mr. MUNDELLA, and Mr. HARRISON may be acquitted of any design to evade the operation of the general law which they professedly desire to restore; but an unqualified power of agreement, coupled with a co-extensive power to give effect to the agreement by combination, might be plausibly interpreted as an exception of trades-unionists from the law of conspiracy. Having agreed to prevent stranger masons from working in Manchester, the members of the Union might under clause 3 combine to intimidate, and on occasion to assault, intruders who refused obedience to their rule. The assault would still be punishable, but the conspiracy which aggravated the guilt would, according to the letter of the enactment, be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of criminal tribunals. When the principal Unionists in a menacing tone affect to have made large concessions in assenting to Mr. HUGHES's Bill, it is allowable to suspect the moderation of their demands. If the doubt is unfounded, there will be no difficulty in a future Session in modifying the terms of the proposed enactment, and Parliament will probably agree with Mr. HARRISON in repudiating the attempt to enforce sound economy by law. If working-men refuse to use machines, or even to use their own limbs, the employer can only hope that experience or reason may at some future time convince them of their mistake.

There is no difference of opinion as to the moral right of trade societies to protection for their funds; and notwithstanding the decision in HORNBY v. CLOSE, embezzlement of Union property is, and always has been, criminal. The Court of Queen's Bench has only held that societies of which the rules operated in restraint of trade could not protect themselves by the summary remedies against fraud which are provided under the Friendly Societies Acts. In the case of REGINA v. DODD the prisoner was convicted of such an offence in accordance with the ruling of Mr. Justice LUSH, who explained that the decision in HORNBY v. CLOSE applied only to the statutable proceeding before justices. It is not unimportant to observe that one of the chief objects of the Bill is to relieve Unionists charged with trade offences from the summary jurisdiction of the very tribunal from which they desire to obtain protection for their property. It is possible that sound reasons may be given for a seeming inconsistency in dealing with cases where members of Trade-Unions are respectively prosecutors or defendants. As the Unions are necessarily unable to comply with the requisitions of the Friendly Societies Act, it is for their advocates to show that the summary jurisdiction of justices is nevertheless applicable to their case. The compulsory submission of their rules to the Registrar will probably tend to restrain the multiplication of objectionable restrictions, and on the whole it seems desirable to afford, as far as possible, legal recognition to institutions which actually exist. The Registrar cannot certify, as in the case of a Friendly Society, to the ostensible solvency of a Trade-Union, for the possible expenditure caused by strikes or by other contingencies of trade cannot be calculated by any table of chances. Mr. HARRISON fairly admits that Trade-Unions, however lawful, cannot claim the special facilities allowed to Friendly Societies. All parties will consider the protective parts of a future measure with a desire to provide security for the property of the Unions, but it will be necessary to consider carefully the machinery devised for the purpose. It rarely happens that any considerable difference of opinion arises on the construction of a Bill, but in Mr. HUGHES's project of law the question of principle was complicated by uncertainty as to the consequences, if not as to the meaning, of some important provisions. In general it is expedient to avoid special legislation, but circumstances which render the general law inapplicable or inoperative may often justify exceptions to the rule. There is no clearer constitutional right than the exercise of unlimited choice of personal ornaments; yet the House of Commons has prudently refused to abolish penalties imposed a few years since on persons who choose to walk about the roads of Ulster with orange-coloured ribbons in their button-holes. If Trade-Unions think fit to interfere with the freedom or the comfort of other sections of the working-class, there is no conclusive presumption against the fairness of subjecting their members to exceptional liabilities.

THE VOTE ON CONCURRENT ENDOWMENT.

WE are not going in this place to enter into much discussion on the political importance, or on the possible or probable consequences to the Government measure, of the Duke of CLEVELAND's famous amendment. Elsewhere, and more than once, we have said what we thought of concurrent endowment as a policy in itself; and we have also said what we thought of concurrent endowment in its more immediate aspect as an afterthought and interpolation attempted to be introduced into the Irish Church Bill by the Upper House. But that Lord SALISBURY's amendment was carried by so vast a majority at the famous sitting of the Lords on July 2, and that the Duke of CLEVELAND's amendment, even after it had been placed at considerable disadvantage by, not the accidents of debate, but the exigencies of party, was voted for by 113 Peers, nine of whom were spiritual Lords, is a very remarkable and noticeable fact. This latter division, in which the Government was for once successful in the Upper House, though only by a singular combination of Romanists, extreme fanatics of the No-Popery school, and the obedient Ministerialists, is more remarkable than Lord SALISBURY's victory. The minority of 113 directly affirmed the principle of concurrent endowment, and again the success of Lord CAIRNS's amendment on Tuesday night, proposing to leave the application of the surplus funds undefined, and therefore hypothetically applicable to the objects proposed by the Duke of CLEVELAND, has been treated (perhaps on rather insufficient grounds) as an indirect reversal of the previous verdict against concurrent endowment. We may admit, as we do, that the form in which this great principle of concurrent endowment came before the Lords was not a very noble or dignified one, or one likely to present great attractions to the higher order of statesmanlike minds. Mr. PITT and CANNING and Earl GREY, and even Earl RUSSELL in his better days, would have looked upon all this petty wrangle about glebe-houses and lands as poor work. We may admit that to give a house and land, said land being ten acres of Irish land, to the parish priests and the Hiberno-Anglican disestablished incumbents, priests, or ministers (or whatever be the name in which the representatives of the Irish Church of the future are prepared to rejoice), and to the Presbyterian pastors, who may like to ask for said houses and ten acres, is but a poor, shrunken, starved, attenuated policy as compared with concurrent endowment boldly proclaimed and simply administered. It may be the only possible form which, as things are, concurrent endowment could take. And as such alone the Duke of CLEVELAND's amendment is of any importance as a policy. In theory it had a high significance; as a practical measure, we own to no very ardent sympathy with it, except as a very small specimen of a very great principle. No doubt the essential nature of a diamond exists, and can be tested and argued from, as well in a lapidary's spark as in the Koh-i-noor; but even in the scientific examination of a jewel, a large specimen is more interesting to lecture on and to manipulate than a very little one. Indeed, the feeling of those who rate highly the value of concurrent endowment was almost to resent the timid and faltering aspect under which it was presented by the Duke of CLEVELAND. It was perhaps from some such contemptuous feeling of mere tolerance of the Duke's amendment that Earl RUSSELL said so little, and Earl GREY nothing at all, in its favour. However, there it was, and as Lord KIMBERLEY himself, a not very fervid or zealous convert from the doctrine of concurrent endowment, admitted, it was because the Duke meant this, however little it was, that he must oppose him. On all sides this was admitted; and yet one hundred and thirteen Lords, including nine Bishops, voted for a perpetual endowment of what used with frantic cheers to be hailed as the cause of Antichrist.

It is very true that this triumph, for a real triumph it is, like many other apparent victories, seems to come too late. But its moral significance is none the less. In heart, if not always with voice, the sense both of Parliament and the country is, we have little doubt, with the minority of the Lords. And though it may not be strictly true that here is a substantial instance of reaction in public opinion, it may certainly be said that the House of Lords has done a public service in giving this opportunity for grave and educated opinion to express itself. It may be quite open to discussion, like the history of many other events which never happened, whether Mr. GLADSTONE could or could not have carried concurrent endowment had it been the original principle of his measure; but there can be little doubt that it will always, when his history is written, be a matter of legitimate regret and complaint, as well as a serious abatement from his claims to the highest rank in statesmanship, that he did not appropriate the honour of proposing it as First Minister of the Crown to Parliament. Had he felt it to be more his duty to live for eternity than for the fleeting exigencies of a single and temporary crisis of his own political fortunes, Mr. GLADSTONE would have done so. The balance of statesmanship as exhibited in the division on concurrent endowment is unquestionable. The names of DEVONSHIRE, SOMERSET, SALISBURY, CARNARVON, ELLENBOROUGH, GREY, RUSSELL, STANHOPE, EVERSLEY, HALIFAX, LYTTELTON, are poorly balanced by the combination of the three factions of Romanists, Protestants, and Ministerialists. And when we look at the composition of the majority, it is plain that there is little of real sympathy between the CHANCELLOR and the Duke of MARLBOROUGH, between the Duke of NORFOLK and the Bishop of TUAM, between Lord FITZWALTER and Lord DENBIGH, between Lord DERBY and Lord SHAFTESBURY, between Lord RAYLEIGH and Lord KIMBERLEY. They voted together because Mr. GLADSTONE'S Bill, and probably his Government, was at stake, or because the "No Popery" cry was at stake, or because at the last moment it was found difficult to rebel against the mot d'ordre from Dr. MANNING and Cardinal CULLEN, or even Dr. CUMMING, quales quantique viri. The Duke of ARGYLL'S vote, and that of the pure Ministerialists, Lord GRANVILLE, Lord CLARENDON, and the rest, can be accounted for; Lord CAIRNS had to settle accounts with the Ulsterites; Lords SHAFTESBURY and HARROWBY represented the platform opponents of the POPE and the Recordites generally. But this is all that can be said for the majority. The Duke of ABERCORN deserted Lord DERBY on the Duke of CLEVELAND'S amendment; Lord LYTTON and the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH not only deserted Lord DERBY, but went over to the Duke. But even this is not all. The gist of Lord GRANVILLE'S successful appeal against the CLEVELAND amendment was not that it was unjust, impolitic, or impossible, but that Mr. GLADSTONE would not let the House of Commons accept it. On the other hand, the Roman Catholic Lords opposed it, not because the gift of glebes to their own communion was wrong—indeed, Lord DENBIGH'S very curious reference to Cardinal POLE'S policy, had it any relevance at all, went the other way—but because the Irish Bishops saw that any pecuniary provision for the inferior clergy would loosen the peculiar and servile dependence in which the parish curates stand to their superiors; that is, it would be distasteful to the reigning influences of Ultramontanism and Obscurantism. The only real consistency was in the vote of the No-Popery champions. Those who have always voted against Maynooth are perfectly consistent in voting against the globe and ten-acre grant. We have no objection to the votes of the Bishop of DURHAM and Lord RAYLEIGH, who are professional preachers against the Man of Sin. But perhaps it will cost Mr. BRIGHT a pang that the only chance which his policy—that is, his last year's policy—had of becoming law, was defeated by a temporary union of his own colleagues and the prize-fighters of Protestant ascendency, between the delegates of the Court of Rome and the Liberation Society. Or, if he attempts to console himself with the belief that the country is against him on this point, he is compelled to admit that the voice of the country is proclaimed by a fraternal alliance between Mr. MURPHY, Mr. MIALL, and Dr. MANNING.

We reserve to the last one observation. The Church of England, at least in its higher minds, has not since the General Election been wanting either in patriotism or in some instincts of political wisdom as regards the Irish Church question. Whatever force the clergy brought to bear against Mr. GLADSTONE at the elections—and perhaps it was exaggerated—was open and legitimate. Since the elections they cannot, except here and there, be charged with violence or intolerance. The votes of the two English Archbishops and some of the English Bishops in favour of equal justice to Presbyterians and Papists are a fact of vast significance. Even Archbishop TRENCH could not find it within his sphere of duty to say nay to this instalment of simple justice. It would be as foolish to blame him for accepting a gift for his own communion as it would be unjust to withhold admiration for the virtue which did not refuse to do to others as he had just successfully pleaded to be done by. And hence, after a forty years' wrangle about High Church and Broad Church, it is to the combined, however opposed, influence of the principles represented by those two great schools of religious thought that at last we have nine Bishops, and such Bishops, in favour of political and ecclesiastical justice. The Bishops of OXFORD, ELY, GLOUCESTER, PETERBOROUGH, ROCHESTER, and LICHFIELD of the one school, the two Archbishops and the Bishop of ST. DAVID'S of the other—these prelates, for once combined, make the pastors of DERRY and TUAM, DURHAM, CHESTER, and LLANDAFF look very small indeed. Of course, in the presence of their votes, we are not required to be very critical as to the reasons which influenced, or which at any rate were produced by, the nine Bishops. Dr. SELWYN having, by a curious process of what we will accept for thought, persuaded himself that Irish Romanism is already established, wanted little to induce him to accept its endowment. The Bishop of OXFORD in a somewhat circuitous way, and with a pleonasm of words which somewhat obscured, perhaps not unintentionally, his real and very good meaning, said substantially that to concede the grant of glebes to the Irish Clergy was pro tanto an acceptance on the part of English Churchmen of the two facts that the Latin Church was a true Church and Ultramontanism a great practical evil; while the Archbishop of CANTERBURY displayed the statesman's mind by proclaiming himself from first to last a faithful disciple of Lord RUSSELL'S earlier and better teaching. Drs. THOMSON and MAGEE may reasonably pardon us if we prefer their votes to any vindication of them, which they and we would probably find to be equally difficult and perhaps tiresome. Still, with all possible drawbacks, it is turning over a new chapter in Anglican Church history to find that so many of our Bishops on this great occasion discarded hatred and prejudice, and perhaps still more to find that there were but five of them, indeed only three of the English Bench, who represented the old bigotry and hatred and narrowness.

LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

THE Report of the Commissioners on the Water Supply of the Metropolis, which will probably determine the future course of legislation on the subject, suggests no necessity for immediate action. The Companies, with their present legal powers, and without extraordinary increase of mechanical appliances, can supply 180,000,000 gallons a day, or 36 gallons a-head, to a population of 5,000,000; and the Commissioners have satisfied themselves that the existing sources of supply are on the whole preferable to the gathering-grounds of Wales or Cumberland. The returns of the REGISTRAR-GENERAL, which are improperly framed for the purpose of supporting a special and doubtful theory, have caused much misconception as to the fitness of the Thames, the New River, and the Lea for domestic use. It is perhaps natural that a public officer who, with unjustifiable affectation, uses foreign weights and measures in his statistical tables, should also circulate at the public expense doctrines about sewage contamination which are exclusively held by one eminent chemist. The Commissioners, although they prudently decided according to the preponderating weight of scientific evidence, seem not to have adopted the obvious course of comparing the analyses of different waters with the medical statistics of the towns to which they were supplied. It would have appeared that the death-rate is far higher at Glasgow, and even at Manchester, than in London, although the water of Loch Katrine is generally taken as the standard of purity, while the Manchester storage reservoirs occupy the second rank in the scale. Sir BENJAMIN BRODIE, himself a distinguished chemist, told the Commissioners that, in judging of the comparative salubrity of waters, it was safer in the present condition of the science to rely on statistical facts than on chemical analysis. "Statistics elicit relations of cause and effect on "which you cannot deliberately experiment." The Hertfordshire springs and streams which, by the New River and the Lea, supply the centre and the East of London are almost exactly similar in quality to the Thames; and at the point where the Western Companies draw their water from the river no organic impurities can be discovered which are known to be injurious to health. Dr. FRANKLAND indeed, whose chemical authority is entitled to respect, finds in the presence of nitrates and nitrites a proof—or, as he figuratively calls it, a skeleton—of a previous sewage contamination which he regards as dangerous or detrimental; but, when neither chemical tests nor microscopic observation disclose the presence of organic impurity, a supposed cause of imaginary effects, although it may perhaps hereafter be shown to exist, can scarcely determine practical legislation. The foulest sewage, diluted by twenty or thirty times its bulk of running water, is found, when it has passed for a few miles down the current, to have disappeared, except as far as it is transformed by oxidization or other natural agencies into innocuous substances. The dilution in the Thames is many times greater, and not a trace of the sewage of Oxford or of Reading is to be found at Hampton; yet there can be no difference of opinion on the expediency of enforcing the law which now prohibits the discharge of any kind of filth into the river and its tributaries.

The hardness of the London waters is about 15°, representing the same number of grains in a gallon; but, as it is largely due to carbonate of lime, it is reduced by boiling below 5°. For making tea, and for brewing certain kinds of beer, hard water of this kind is preferable to soft, but for all detergent purposes hardness is injurious. Many persons think that hard water is comparatively palatable, although there is no water less disagreeable to drink than the extraordinarily soft water of Malvern. The presence of mineral salts affords a security against the corrosive effect of soft water on lead, but the same result may in all cases be attained by proper precautions. The opinion of the Commissioners, which on the whole inclines in favour of hard water, would perhaps have taken the opposite bias if the hills of Berkshire and Wiltshire had been formed of Silurian slate or of millstone grit. It is certainly not a misfortune to Glasgow that the water of Loch Katrine is soft; but four hundred miles further south it may be prudent to acquiesce in the quality of water which has been filtered through the chalk. The substitution of soft water for hard, while it would have produced a large saving in soap, was only to be obtained by a large outlay of capital.

Mr. BATEMAN, universally recognised as one of the first of hydraulic engineers, proposed to the Commissioners a gigantic scheme for supplying London from the upper waters of the Severn, to be intercepted on the north-eastern slope of Plinlimmon, and from the Vernwy and Banw near Welshpool. The estimate was about 11,000,000*l.*, and the works were undoubtedly practicable. The water coming from Silurian slate would have been soft and chemically pure, with the drawback of occasional discoloration from peat. The canal or aqueduct was to pass by Bridgnorth, near Stourbridge, Bromsgrove, Warwick, Banbury, Aylesbury, and Watford, to large reservoirs at Stanmore, ten miles to the north-west of London. The upper end of the conduit in Wales was 450 feet above the sea, and the reservoirs at Stanmore 270 feet, giving a sufficient fall to supply the greater part of London by gravitation. The length of the aqueduct was 180 miles, and its capacity 230,000,000 gallons a day. Mr. BATEMAN contemplated an intermediate supply for Birmingham and other Midland towns, to be drawn from the conduit on the way. Mr. HEMANS and Mr. HASSARD proposed a similar scheme for a supply from the Cumberland lakes, where the water is of nearly the same character. The conduit would have been 90 miles longer than Mr. BATEMAN'S, but the lakes would have rendered unnecessary the construction of reservoirs, and the objections to the abstraction of water which would be raised by those who are interested in the navigation of the Severn would not have been applicable to the short and insignificant Cumberland rivers. The principal reasons for rejecting Mr. BATEMAN'S plan were the great expense, the peaty tinge of the water, and the risk of grave inconvenience if the conduit were interrupted by accident or by frost. The Lake scheme was exposed to the additional objection that the water belonged more naturally to the large towns in the North of England. The sources of the Severn and the Wye are still happily remote from population, although it is not improbable that, as coal becomes dearer, the great water power of the Welsh rivers may attract manufactures. The danger which might be supposed to ensue from the construction of enormous reservoirs would be overcome by engineering skill; and possibly water compensation might be provided for the Severn. If the winter floods of the Plinlimmon range during an averge of years could be fully stored, there would be water enough for a dozen cities as large as London; but it is only where nature has provided lakes that sufficient reservoirs for the purpose can exist. Mr. BATEMAN'S estimate of the minimum rainfall has been questioned by almost all critics of his scheme; and perhaps he may not have been aware that in years such as 1868 and 1869, when east winds prevail, the thunderstorms and occasional showers which refresh the valley of the Thames are exhausted before they reach the mountains of Wales. As Mr. BATEMAN himself has often stated, in planning waterworks it is necessary to look only to the rainfall of dry years, inasmuch as it is impossible to store the surplus of a long period.

The chief recommendation of the Thames is that it is the river of London, but there are also great advantages in the natural storage of the permeable strata which cover the greater part of the watershed. The rainfall of the valley is absorbed in the soil, to pass out purified by the best possible filtration into the river or its feeders. The inconveniences arising from high cultivation are thus largely remedied; and the chalk hills are honeycombed with subterranean reservoirs, which collect in wet weather vast quantities of water, to feed the river in drier seasons. It is a matter of common observation that chalk streams fail only after a succession of dry years, while a few months of drought reduce to their lowest point rivers depending on the rainfall which runs off a surface of clay, or of impenetrable rock. If the present supply should prove insufficient, there are abundant facilities for making storage reservoirs in different parts of the valley of the Thames; and it would be highly satisfactory to prevent in some degree the waste of the floods which occur almost every winter. The Companies at present take in summer time somewhat more than 50,000,000 gallons a day at Teddington, leaving a stream which at the lowest is not less than 350,000,000 gallons.

The produce of the New River and the Lea cannot be largely increased except by an addition of storage; but the chalk on the south and east of London, which at present discharges its surplus waters into the estuary of the Thames, has barely been tapped by the Kent Companies for the use of Greenwich and the neighbouring suburbs. The Commissioners are satisfied that, with or without the construction of storage reservoirs, a supply of 200,000,000 gallons, or 40 gallons a-head for a population of 5,000,000, may be insured from the existing sources. As the quality of the water is substantially unobjectionable, the rejection of distant and ambitious projects seems, on a balance of considerations, to be judicious. The Report is at the same time instructive and interesting, dealing not only with supply, but with distribution. It will be more convenient to discuss the administrative details on some other occasion.

THE PURCHASE OF THE TELEGRAPHS.

IF the calculations of the Post Office officials are to be relied on, the bargain with the Electric Telegraph Companies promises to turn out better than could have been expected from the extravagantly liberal character of the terms which the Government were coerced into granting. It is always satisfactory when both parties to a treaty find themselves in pocket by the result. The Companies undoubtedly did so, for the shares of all of them rose in the market, after the Act of last year was passed, something between 50 and 100 per cent. The Marquis of HARTINGTON has now had the satisfaction of informing the public that there will be a profit, though on a more modest scale, for them also out of the transaction. The total purchase-money will approach 7,000,000*l.*, but according to the estimates, which profess to be cautious, and, coming from the able officials of the Post Office, are not likely to be far from the truth, it appears that the net income of the first year will pay 3½ per cent. on the investment, and leave a balance of 77,000*l.* If these figures should be justified by the event, there will be ample grounds for satisfaction. It may be regarded as certain that the profits of the first year will be far short of those which must ultimately be realized, and it will not be unpleasant to taxpayers to contemplate the growth of a new source of revenue which, like that supplied by the Post Office, will be unalloyed by the recollection of the tax-gatherer's visits. But the mere pecuniary results form a comparatively insignificant part of the benefits to be anticipated from this thoroughly statesmanlike undertaking. The transmission of telegraphs, no less than that of letters, is a business which can be best worked as a monopoly. In common with many other large enterprises which concern every member of the public, these undertakings lose more than they gain by the combined stimulus and obstructions of competition. There is infinite waste in setting up duplicate wires and establishing duplicate offices to conduct the communications between the same centres. Competition, moreover, not only caters in wasteful excess for the wants of a few leading towns, but it leaves wholly neglected the requirements of all the rest of the country. If the letter-carrying business were in private hands, London and Liverpool might possibly enjoy facilities almost as great as they possess under a Government monopoly; but the communications with all outlying places would be almost as difficult, costly, and precarious as if one lived in the middle ages, because it would not answer to serve them efficiently. Precisely the same law holds good, and perhaps even to a greater degree, with respect to telegraphs. It would not pay rival Companies to lay down wires to insignificant villages, but the same department of Government which punctually delivers letters to the smallest hamlet may be trusted to work in the same spirit in the new duties which it is about to assume. Profit will properly be kept in view as a means of relieving the public finances and justifying the absorption of private Companies, but profit will not be, in the case of the telegraphs any more than in that of the Post Office, the sole consideration, as it necessarily is while the business is in the hands of a trading company. It is proposed at once to increase the number of places served by the telegraph from 1,882 to 3,376, with a still larger proportional increase in the number of branch stations. Altogether there will be a telegraph office for every 6,000 instead of for every 13,000 of the population, and these will besides be distributed mainly with regard to the convenience of the public, instead of being selected with a single eye to profit. The enormous value of this boon will probably be appreciated by few until it is seen in a tangible form; but a very moderate amount of reflection will convince any one who considers it that it would be worth purchasing even if it entailed a loss instead of a profit. And the increase of facilities is not the only immediate advantage which will be reaped from the Government monopoly. The cost of a telegram varies now with distance, and is often considerable enough, in spite of the intermittent competition between the Companies, to check very seriously the use of this mode of communication. There are few civilized countries which get so little out of the great invention of telegraphy as Great Britain, and this simply because we have left its development in the hands of private Companies, while elsewhere it has been assumed as a Government duty. The first step of the authorities will go far to remedy this anomaly. A uniform shilling stamp will suffice to frank a telegram of twenty words from any one station to any other, and the simplicity of this system will operate, as it did in the case of the Post Office, almost as much as its economy, in increasing the amount of business done. One drawback there is, that the charge for short distances will be increased by the adoption of a uniform rate. At present you can send a telegram for certain short distances in London for sixpence, and though it is true that these messages travel less rapidly than a hansom-cab, or even than a messenger on an omnibus, any increase in tariff has rather a retrograde appearance. The importance of these local lines is no doubt small, on account of the extremely inefficient way in which they have been worked; but we shall be greatly surprised and disappointed if, in the course of a year or two, the Post Office does not see its way to the adoption of a sixpenny tariff, not only for short distances, but for the whole country. Even without this the gain to the community, both in money and convenience, will be immense, and it will be secured, so Lord HARTINGTON tells us, not only without any public outlay, but with an absolute profit to the Exchequer.

Estimates are apt to be fallacious in other matters besides the Law Courts, and on general principles it may be thought not unreasonable to accept the official figures with a due amount of incredulity. There is, however, a large margin for possible error, and it is only fair to say that, so far as can be judged from the brief but lucid statement of the POSTMASTER-GENERAL, these estimates seem to have been prepared on a thoroughly trustworthy basis. In fact, it is very easy to calculate both the receipts and the outgoings of a telegraph business. In other countries large experiments have been made from time to time on the effect of cheapness upon the amount of telegraphic business, and the broad result seems to be, that any considerable reduction recoups itself at once by the increase of traffic. A shilling rate brings in just about as much as a two-shilling rate, and the only difference seems to be in the slight increase of working expenses, due to the larger business done at the lower tariff. All the estimates of the quantity of traffic on which Lord HARTINGTON's calculations were based were derived from the actual experience of other countries, and there is no reason to expect less elasticity here than has been experienced elsewhere. The number and position of the stations having been settled, there is little room for error in the estimate of working expenses, and it is quite impossible that the broad results can be materially affected by any small discrepancies which may occur between the actual and the calculated cost either of new works or of the staff to be employed.

In one essential respect the present Government propose to add to the project of their predecessors. They ask Parliament to give to the Executive a monopoly of telegraphs as they now have a monopoly of letter-carrying. To leave in the hands of any ingenious projectors the power of setting up rival lines between the most important towns, for the purpose of compelling the Government to buy them up on terms as favourable as those granted to the old Companies, would be simply to saddle the country with annual payments to a class of schemers who have had their day—and a very long day—and of whom society is heartily tired and a little ashamed. It is only because the work can be done better and more cheaply as a Government monopoly than in any other way that the scheme of buying up the telegraphs was ever justifiable. Once introduce Government action, and competition becomes absurd and mischievous. Instead of being a means of securing cheapness, as it is in all trades to which it is properly applicable, it becomes, in cases analogous to this of the telegraphs, a mere machinery for extorting money from the Government, or, in other words, from the taxpayer. It may be hoped that no prejudice against the term monopoly, odious as it is except when exercised by public officers for the public convenience, will prevent the Legislature from granting an exclusive authority which is absolutely necessary to the success of one of the most beneficial projects of administration which have been introduced since the great reform of the Penny Post.

GENIUS AND TEMPERAMENT.

TEMPERAMENT is one of those deceptive words which are used so often, and so easily, that professional and non-professional people alike come to regard them as clear and clearly understood, on the strength of their being accepted. Many a medical man, however, capable of scientific reflection, must laugh now and then in his sleeve as he recollects how glibly this term has rolled off his tongue. And his amusement may be doubled by recalling the air, not so much of faith as of satisfied intelligence, with which his patients received it. Yet temperament is, in reality, by no means an easy word to define, or an easy phenomenon to conceive with distinctness. For the word itself we are indebted to those physiological theories of "the humours" which prevailed so generally among early workers in the science of medicine. There is no point on which the ancient and mediæval physicians loved better to disport themselves than on this. Any reader of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy will recollect how much Galen, or Hercules de Saxoniâ, or Cardan, or Laurentius has to say on the subject. They write sometimes grotesquely and musingly, sometimes abstrusely, and often with a mixture of the two qualities. Even now, in common parlance, we perpetuate a memorial of their fourfold division of the humours and their operations, when we talk of temperament as being sanguine, choleric, lymphatic or phlegmatic, and bilious or melancholic. And a modified classification differing only slightly from this is familiar, not only to ordinary, but to scientific, phraseology.

Burton was an unsated consumer of all the transcendental physiology of the two or three centuries immediately preceding his own, and it would not be easy to mention a fuller repertory than his pages present of physical fancies concerning the nature of man. And, in turning over those pages, nothing perhaps strikes one more forcibly than the nearness to scientific truth which the old investigators often attained, while thinking and expressing themselves in an unscientific manner. On the question of temperament, as in so many other investigations, they were not entirely in the wrong, but were run away with by their own theories, and were unchecked by any adequate conception of what verification means, and of what is necessary to complete it. The theory of the four humours, as stated by them, is obviously crude and unscientific; it is unscientific, that is, to classify so briefly and so rigidly the elemental bases of composition in human nature. But this theory is, nevertheless, a nuance of what is true—namely, that there are certain permanent physiological types, in one or more of which human nature asserts itself. These types are permanent that is to say, they are neither formed by habit nor superinduced by accident. Both habit and accident may occasion a change in a man's physiological characteristics, which may become settled and make him an altered man until his death. But a physiological condition so brought on is not temperament. The types of condition to which this name is given are congenital or connate, and continue in some degree of development throughout life. Temperament is also to be distinguished from the more strongly marked types of various ethnological origin. Ethnology may clearly be considered from the physiological side; but the types we are now talking of result from differences traceable between individuals of the same type, and have nothing to do with the wider differences, partly structural and partly physiological, which separate the Caucasian from the Mongol, and both from the Negro.

Temperament, then, so far as it is at present understood, may be defined to be a certain permanent connate condition, not of the brain and nervous system only, nor of the secretions only, nor of the tissues only, but of all these—of the entire physiological nature of a man. As we have already seen, there are certain distinct types of these conditions, subject, however, by constant intermingling, to endless modifications. None of the types, regarded by itself, presents any obstacle in the way of the attainment or preservation of complete health; though they are sufficiently distinct to predispose towards certain disorders, or vice versa, and render particular habits of diet, or exercise, or sleep innocuous in one subject and injurious in another. The chief external indications of difference are observable in the complexion and colour of the hair or eyes, in the gait and utterance, and in what may be called the whole of a man's dynamical side.

An inquiry into the probability or improbability of a connexion between temperament and the phenomena of genius could hardly fail to possess some interest. Any inquiry into the material conditions of the human mind has a direct claim on the attention, and the claim becomes stronger in proportion to the exactness with which such relations can be observed. A contemporary has recently produced some specimens of forthcoming researches into the hereditary transmission of genius. And, without hair-splitting on definitions of what genius is or is not, we may readily admit that any researches on its conditions and development are likely to be valuable, and those of transmission among the number. But the phenomena of temperament are capable of observation perhaps more minute and exact than it may be easy to apply to transmission. And, though nothing like an adequate inquiry could be attempted here, we may possibly say enough to indicate that such an inquiry might aid investigations into human intellect in its highest form.

The old physiologists were by no means without a creed as to the connexion between genius and temperament. They held that the presence of one temperament in particular was an essential concomitant of genius. The dogma contained in the words Nullum magnum ingenium sine Melancholia is, in one form or another, as old as Aristotle, if not as Hippocrates, who was in full practice in Athens during the Peloponnesian War. A close connexion between melancholy and madness was believed in by a great many of the mediæval doctors, between madness, that is, and the melancholic or bilious temperament, not melancholia in its modern technical usage, denoting simply a special form of insanity. And thus the well-known couplet is in reality only an expansion of the physiological rule. Something may clearly be said in favour of the doctrine as it stands in its Latin dress. Genius, for example, very often (perhaps universally) involves an active and powerful imagination, or imaginative powers capable of being drawn out into activity; and an active imagination is often found associated with those physiological conditions which the mediæval writers understood by the word melancholia. And this brings on a distinction which will explain the position that seems to us most reasonably tenable on the question.

> Great wits to madness nearly are allied,
> And thin partitions do their bounds divide,

It is very probable that, in order to admit of the existence and exercise of the particular quality of mind which we call genius, there must exist also that power, or combination of powers, to which we give the name of imagination. But imagination is far from being always a predominant characteristic in men of genius. Sometimes the pure logical power is supreme, or the active tendencies in obedience to which a man of genius becomes a great engineer or a great explorer. Exactly the same differences, on a lower level, are observable in the lesser capacities to which the name of genius is not given. Differences of degree, temporary in their nature, and differences in kind, which are more permanent, may be traced even to the more evanescent physiological conditions due to habit or accident, and à fortiori to the more durable conditions of connate temperament. Is it, then, unreasonable to infer that, while that particular quality or degree of mental capacity or force, called genius, depends for its existence on the structure and condition of one particular organ, the brain, and not at all on temperament, yet the personal characteristics of temperament have power considerably to modify and direct the line of operation in which genius asserts itself? To take a tolerably familiar example. It would be erroneous to fix on the excessively delicate nervous organization of Shelley—a temperament which he had in common with men like Pope and Mozart—and to attribute his genius to that as its cause. But his temperament was very probably an active determining agent in directing his genius. A man with his intense and ungovernable, and at last fatal, passion for navigation, an occupation for which he was constitutionally and absolutely unfitted, would hardly have failed, had temperament rendered him more suited for such a life, to merge the poet in the traveller and the discoverer.

The doctrine that genius depends for its existence on the brain, and not on temperament, although temperament may operate to determine its direction in some degree, is confirmed by all the memorials of men of genius which, either in portraits or in biographical records, have been preserved to us. A walk through the Gallery of National Portraits recently exhibited at Kensington furnished an excellent opportunity for testing the truth of this. The wide differences in those personal characteristics which we have mentioned as indications of temperament, between men to whom all the world concurs in ascribing the renown of unquestioned genius, were very curious and remarkable to observe. The names of Pitt and Fox, Nelson and Wellington, Byron and Wordsworth, will be enough to indicate a score of similar instances.

If any further evidence were looked for in corroboration of the view which has been here stated, it might possibly be found in observations of the remarkable manner in which some men of genius have asserted themselves in sheer despite of a manifestly unfavourable temperament. This is a side of the question which deserves a fuller treatment than can be here given, but a couple of instances will explain our meaning. Dr Johnson frequently described to Boswell the overwhelming vis inertiæ under which he was constantly labouring. Any one who resembles Johnson in a distinctly developed bilious temperament will be able, whether he be a genius or not, to sympathize with him when he says that his habitual tendency, when any pressing work had to be done, was in the direction of doing nothing at all. Johnson, in living his life and doing his work, had to make his way by force of brain through this and a good deal more which he owed to temperament. The only other case which can now be mentioned is that of Cowper. The mental history of Cowper has yet to be fairly and fully written. There is no complete account of it that we are aware of, at once searching and scientific, and also free from unworthy and narrow-minded bias in estimating the influence of religion in his case. It is a subject altogether to which we should like to recur in detail. We will only say here that he presents the extraordinary spectacle of a man labouring through fifty years of life under the direct and increasing influence of a temperament which involved the utmost depression and distress; and obtaining afterwards, by the accidental inducement to exert his genuine and very remarkable power of brain, a considerable solace against the distressing influences in spite of which he exerted it.

A RUSTIC'S VOCABULARY.

IT is a curious question, and one not the less interesting that it can never be settled, with how few words a farm-labourer of the slower yet sufficiently ordinary type manages to express all he ever wants to say—all the needs, wishes, thoughts, hopes, and fears that occupy his mind; in short, what vocabulary is enough for his purposes. We specify the rustic, not because he is the dullest of men, but because, his business calling him to a solitary life, his thoughts express themselves in pictures. Town taciturnity comes either of stupidity or misanthropy, but it is otherwise with the rustic. The man who lives among horses, cows, and sheep, who gives the freshness of the day and of his powers to them, has not much need of eloquence and facility of speech; when he talks to them he need not choose his phrases. Some broad ideas must necessarily occupy him connected with the animals under his charge, their health, temper, docility, and the like; or with the furrow that his plough turns up, which must be straight; and these ideas in the mind of a good labourer are probably not so purely mechanical, so readily compatible with another train of thought—with a current of more conscious reflection—as manual occupation becomes to educated persons. He is actually thinking of straightness all the time the furrow is in making; he is observing the cattle under his charge, and probably knows all the more about them for ruminating over his observations. But he is not thinking in words. He eats his dinner under the hedge in silence; and when he returns home his wife does not expect him to be chatty. Farm-labourers are not apt to trust or confide in one another; slow jealousies, which only find expression when they have had too much beer, are the rule among them. If they are ill, the wife answers for them to the doctor and the parson. Of course there is a more loquacious type. There is the labourer who, if he takes up religion, preaches in the Methodist chapel; or, if his turn lies in politics, harangues a chosen circle at the public-house or village street-corner. But the rustic is commonly a listener, perhaps more properly a lazy recipient of sounds. When he rests, he rests altogether. He likes to have his ears tickled, feeling an inner content and superiority all the while in his own capacity for silence; his forte lies elsewhere—

> Strong of his hands, and strong on his legs, but still of his tongue.

We may understand how few words are enough for his purposes when we note what a task is often assigned to individual words by all the world about him. Every county and neighbourhood has its own modes of expressing universal ideas—such as health, disease, death, talk, comfort, food, and the like. We may observe that some accident of these leading ideas is generally preferred as their symbol rather than a word expressing the thing itself. Thus death is, in whole districts, recognised solely through the accident of burial. A man is not dead, but he is buried; he has not lost his wife, but he has buried her. This is a less complex idea than any of the other incidents of dissolution. As death in the houses of the poor demands the immediate bustling activity of all who are nearest and dearest to the deceased, this dismal necessity and imperative expense presses itself on forethought and memory beyond the many-voiced expression of feeling and bereavement. Certain it is that any one in the class of which we speak who includes "dying" and "death" in his vocabulary is exceptionally civilized. A young mother new to this form was in the habit of calling at the house of a poor neighbour. It happened between her periodical visits that she had had to put on mourning. The good woman on opening her door bestowed a moment's stare on her visitor, and then startled her with the abrupt inquiry, "Have you buried one of your children?" The same material view of death leads to a common periphrasis with the same bearing. Old people look forward to their decease solely in its funereal aspect. In their last illness, while mistrusting the parish doctor, whose duty to the guardians they believe to clash with their own private interest, they send for him because of some imagined difficulty of "getting into the ground" without his certificate. Between these two formulæ of order and respectability all the eloquence and passion of grief is left to be understood.

Another word has, from its convenience and large application, grown from slang into grave acceptance. We apologize for the word jaw, but its uses are too apt an illustration of our subject to be passed over. Representing at first excess of speech, it stands in some minds for all speech and their appreciation of what it is worth. "We have had enough of jaw," says the collier in Felix Holt of the eloquent Radical orator, whose flattering periods he had approved as far as he could approve any talk, but who found whatever required attention a bore. It stands also for every form of remonstrance and reproof; whether uttered in the thundering tones of an angry farmer, the anxious warning of the parson, the tender pleading of the fair and refined squire's daughter to her girls' class, it is all alike jaw. "He jawed me." "She jawed me." "I jawed him." All the colouring is lost; there are not words for it. A disagreeable infliction is all that finds expression. Again, with the same people any scene of festivity, whatever its nature, if eating is a part of it, is a Do; the fact that there is something to be done saves the trouble of definition. Every plant that grows in a flower-pot is with them a tree. And qualities meet with the same broad classification; whatever their shades and gradations, the word in vogue does for them all. Thus largeness is in some districts represented poetically enough by the one image of vastness, the ocean. A carpenter criticizes an unwieldy piece of work as "oceanly big enough." Whatever is more than enough is "oceans."

In some circles all that is agreeable or successful is expressed by "comfortable"; all that is moving or pathetic, by "cutting." Each man selects some one epithet in harmony with his own temperament to express approval. With one it may be "pride" and "proud" as the one quality to be admired in man or beast. Another finds "tidy" of as universal application. Animation in man, woman, or child is being "fierce"; to be engaging and affable is invariably to be "free." With one all puzzle and dilemma is being "stagnated," while "odd" includes all that many have to say on all varieties of temper, character, and circumstances. Some ideas must always go hand in hand, however incongruous the assimilation. Thus health and enjoyment; "She enjoys very bad health," "He j'ys fits." Who is not familiar with the phrase, constantly to be heard in passing any two persons of this class in earnest conversation, "So I says," or "So I says, says I," without which it is impossible for many to introduce anything peculiarly personal and their own. Not that all this rude generalization implies any approach to rashness. On the contrary, no one is more guarded than the rustic in expressing his opinion, especially on matters of which he is cognizant. "Some folks 'ud say that was a fine beast you druv in yesterday, Ben," says the host of the Rainbow, insinuating a compliment. "And they wouldn't be fur wrong, John," answers the butcher in acquiescence. A favourite plum tree is disfigured with blight; the village authority is asked if it will taint the fruit. "Well," is the careful reply, "it won't do it much good." And this from an inaptitude to express shades, chances, possibilities. Thus the rustic has no choice between excess and pure negation.

Under this system we see that a few hundred words will go far. Not that it is easy to arrive at any conclusion. One lays the [illegible]

[illegible] bulary of two hundred and sixty words or thereabouts. And there is not one word that a man of the class supposed would not be familiar with if he was able to tell a story at all, which, however, many are not. Forcible and strong-minded as the Farmer is, he never touches on the abstract or leaves the line of his own action. His view of the clerical work and office apart from tithes is comprised in his reference to the weekly sermon:—

> I never knaw'd whot a mean'd but I thowt a'ad summut to saay,
> An I thowt a said whot a owt to a said an I comed awaay.

His contempt for his parson's learning is conveyed in an indifference to new ideas which is one cause of many a limited vocabulary:—

> Larn'd a ma' bē. I reckons I 'annot sa mooch to larn.

Supply him further with the technical terms of his calling, and we see this "Stubber of Thornaby Waste" could get along pretty well with just the words he uses to tell his tale, and never stop from a conscious difficulty in expressing himself. This is a perplexity much more vexing to women, who, because they want more words, will have them. The talking of the family is done by them; they have more varied intercourse, and they have much more need of talking for talking's sake. Also they have much less shyness in making experimental essays. It is surprising to what new uses a clever woman of this class will bend some word whose sound she has accidentally caught. We know that Hindoo ladies speak a dialect differing from their lords' in its more prolonged and liquid terminations, and something of the sort is to be observed among our rustics. There are phrases borrowed from a more intellectual source in use among the women alone. Thus a mother will point out a sickly girl as the most "casalty" of her children—a term too fine and suggestive for her husband's use. "Maximum" is another bit of feminine finery for the superlative. A ploughman will rarely struggle for expression. If he has not words to say it in, it never occurs to him that he has anything to say. He speaks in enigmas which ask an interpreter; as Mr. Trollope's brickmaker with his mysterious dictum "Dogged will do't," or Mr. Dickens's carrier with his standing proposal of marriage, "Barkis is ready." But his wife will struggle for fit utterance—a struggle issuing in singular verbal contortions, out of which she often succeeds in raising a very definite image. Thus an untaught woman wishes to convey her reverent admiration of a lady of rank married to a Dean, and conforming look and manner to her husband's calling; which she does by jumbling physical and moral qualities in strange antithesis. "A beautiful plain creature, so humble and genteel! Splendidly neat. While her maid," she adds, in intuitive knowledge of the effect of contrast, "so standing out she could hardly hold her parasol." In fact, a word is never allowed to lie idle in a woman's head from the accident of her not knowing its exact meaning. A man needs precedent for its use; she is guided by sound. She feels that it is good for something, may set off a plain tale, and gain her a hearing from her betters, as it certainly gives her importance among her equals, qualifying her as an emissary on all weighty or knotty occasions. A good woman thus endowed is commissioned to report the death of a neighbour; her taste keeps her clear of the vulgar treatment of the occasion; she is select in her terms. "Paul Johnson has departed this life. He has departed this life, but we have not broached the matter yet to the old lady (his bed-ridden wife) because it would put her about."

The fact of a small vocabulary does not necessarily imply a mean understanding, but only that thought is in abeyance till the impulse comes. There may be wit in the clod's head, "but it lies as coldly in him as fire in a flint which will not show without knocking." And stirring times perform the miracle; a wonder which set Fuller marvelling in his day. "It seemeth marvellous to me," he says, "that many mechanics (few able to read, and fewer to write their names), turning soldiers and captains in our wars, should be so soon so much improved; they seem to me to have commenced per saltum in their understandings. I profess, without flouting or flattery, I have much admired with what facility and fluentness, how pertinently and properly, they have expressed themselves in language which they were never born nor bred to, but have industriously acquired by talking with their betters." From which perhaps we may learn never to despise a man for his few words, if he uses and applies what he has with [illegible]

THE FREE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE.

NO two men could well be more unlike each other in many respects than Dr. Davidson and Mr. Voysey. The former is the leading representative of the extreme, or, as most of his brethren would call it, the Rationalistic school among English Nonconformists; he is a man of high character and abilities, and one of the first Biblical scholars of the day. Probably Dr. Colenso owes to him nine-tenths of the discoveries supposed to be suggested by the comments of the intelligent Zulu, nor is there anything in his position to debar him from the fullest and freest utterance of his convictions on religious subjects. Mr. Voysey is also what is called an extreme Rationalist, probably indeed much more extreme than Dr. Davidson, who implies not obscurely that his criticisms are as shallow as they are offensive. But he is at all events very unlike Dr. Davidson in all other points. He is the beneficed minister of an Established Church, with a Liturgy and Articles which all its clergy subscribe to; and he is a man wholly unknown to fame except for his grotesque eccentricities and inordinate conceit. Little as can be the sympathy between the author of some of the most learned works on Biblical criticism [in] our language and the doughty champion, B.A. of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and Vicar of Healaugh, who slings his weekly budget of stones at the head of the orthodox Goliath—in other words, at the creeds of his Church and the belief of "the vast [m]ajority of professing Christians"—it is all the more generous [in] the great Nonconformist to come to the rescue of his (to borrow

Mr. Bright's convenient formula) "not very wise" Anglican brother. Dean Stanley's championship was intelligible enough, though neither can he feel much admiration for the spirit or the substance of the arithmetical puzzles about the Resurrection or the Pentateuch which are doled out Sunday by Sunday to the gaping rustics of Healaugh. A certain feeling of proximus ardet may make even Broad Churchmen of name and position unwilling to see Mr. Voysey put into the Courts, especially as the history of the Church Association has proved clearly enough that, as the French say, l'appétit vient en mangeant in the matter of ecclesiastical prosecutions. Dr. Davidson is, however, wholly disinterested in deprecating the prosecution of Mr. Voysey. His letter to the Daily News on the subject contains much that is sensible, if it is not very new; and in suggesting the danger of "bringing into prominence certain delicate and difficult questions about which the minds of thinking men are more or less disturbed," he will no doubt find many of his readers to agree with him. If he had merely urged, as we ourselves ventured to urge on a former occasion, that Mr. Voysey and his theories might well be left alone on the obvious principle De minimis non curat lex, we should have no particular observation to make on his advice, except that it comes too late to be acted upon. But he has in fact opened a very much wider question than this. And we must confess that, with every respect for the writer and for the chivalrous sentiment which has led him to come forward in defence of a feeble advocate of an unpopular cause, and of what he considers the true interests of a Church to which he does not himself belong, we are somewhat perplexed at the line of argument he has adopted. It divides itself into two branches, though the two get a little intermingled now and then—first, as to the proper course to be pursued in the actual Church of England, and secondly, as to what the Church ought to become in the future. We have a few words to say on both points.

Dr. Davidson expresses his regret that the Archbishop of York has allowed himself to be influenced against his own better judgment to prosecute Mr. Voysey, not because Mr. Voysey is no worth the notice he seems so ambitious of securing, but because "all such prosecutions injure a Church"—that is, we presume, all prosecutions of its ministers for heterodox teaching. Now this certainly appears to us rather a startling proposition. We will assume, for argument's sake, that Dr. Davidson's client "has contravened the teaching of the Prayer-book, and the Articles of Religion to which he has subscribed" Now, without at all pronouncing on the wisdom of this particular prosecution, or attempting to prejudge the legal merits of the case which will come for decision before the Ecclesiastical Courts, it does appear to us obvious that if you are to have an Established Church at all there must be a line drawn somewhere. This is not a question of doctrine, but of ordinary convenience and common sense. Either there are, or there are not, a certain number of religious doctrines, be they many or few, which a large number of persons are sufficiently agreed upon to form a working basis for corporate action. If there are, then these doctrines, or some of them, may form the basis for an Established Church; if not, an Established Church becomes at once an absurdity and an impertinence. And there can be no doubt that the Church of England is in fact based on the former assumption. We are not arguing now about the objective truth or falsehood of these doctrines—to use the German phrase—but simply about their subjective acceptance. The Bishop of Oxford suggested the other day that Romanism is a good enough religion to be endowed, under the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, but not good enough to be established. That is quite another matter. Romanism, or Anglicanism, or Lutheranism, if tested by their respective formularies, are quite definite enough to be established, and that is our present point. But a system of which Mr. Voysey and Dr. Pusey are equally the authorized exponents is not definite enough for the basis of an Establishment. Bishop Hinds published a pamphlet last year, in which he insisted that a clergyman who should become conscientiously convinced that there is no God would not only not be bound to give up his living, but would be bound in conscience to keep it, and preach atheism from the pulpit. It is difficult to understand how he could reconcile this conscientious obligation with his signature of the Thirty-nine Articles. But, waiving that point, it is at least as difficult to see how an Established Church could hold together on Bishop Hinds' theory, and what possible use it would be to anybody if it could. It is quite an intelligible view that nothing certain can be known in religious matters, and that such hazy and approximate views of probable truth as are attainable in this sublunary state are most likely to be attained by leaving every one to excogitate and expound to his neighbours what seems to him true, whether in accordance with the Bible, or in opposition to it. This, we presume, is the principle of the Secularist lecturers who deliver their testimony against Christianity every Sunday in many of our large towns. Only it is not, and never can become, the principle of an Established Church. What is the use or the sense of erecting and endowing a vast clerical organization in order that its individual members may propound from twenty thousand pulpits their individual opinions, ranging from Ultramontanism to atheism? They could do that just as well, if they pleased, without belonging to an organized hierarchy, and it is nobody's interest to make them do it unless they please. If the Apostles' Creed, or the Thirty-nine Articles, or the decrees of Trent, contain important truths which it is for the interest of mankind "to know and believe to their souls' health," nothing can be more natural than to make provision for the regular teaching of these salutary doctrines by a ministry endowed and commissioned for that purpose. But nothing surely can be more unnatural than to pay and commission a body of teachers to inform men that there are no doctrines to be taught, or at least to give them the practical assurance that there are so many contradictory doctrines as to make the acceptance of any a superfluity, if not a mistake. Professor Huxley may be right in saying that the most rational form of worship is "of a kind chiefly silent, at the altar of the Unknown and Unknowable." But he would, we are sure, admit that it need not be performed in Church.

We have purposely dealt rather with the abstract aspects of Dr. Davidson's theory than with its applicability to the existing condition of the Anglican Church, because we do not desire to meddle with the merits of this or that particular case of alleged heresy. At the same time it seems to us, as we have already intimated, too obvious to require a word of argument that his theory is in flat contradiction to the principle on which the Church is constituted, and upon which all its existing arrangements and machinery depend. But it is of course quite open, especially to an outsider, to suggest that a radical change in these principles would be very advantageous. And this is just what Dr. Davidson does suggest. He says that, were he a dignitary of the Church of England, he should try to get her widened and made more national. A national Church should be co-extensive with the nation, and "Anglican Archbishops and Bishops might be more usefully employed in striving to bring about such changes in the creeds and articles as would bring the Church nearer the Catholic ideal which thoughtful, learned, and scientific men approve." And he thinks that if the Church were thus "liberalized," the various Dissenting bodies would be gradually absorbed into it. Every one will of course admit that, if a national Church is a good thing, it is highly desirable that it should be co-extensive with the nation, and that an Established Church cannot be consistently upheld at all unless it is in some sense co-extensive with the nation. Even the champions of the Irish Establishment would hardly have ventured to recommend its formation if it did not exist already. But to say that it is very desirable for a national Church to be co-extensive with the nation, and to say that it must be made wide enough to include every variety of belief or disbelief which is to be found in the nation, are two very different propositions. If you can get the whole nation to accept the same creed, as in the middle ages, no doubt a number of political as well as religious perplexities are got rid of. But if you can't, and still want to have a national Church, the only alternative seems to be to take for its basis that creed which the majority of the nation hold to be the true

We have said something before of the abstract absurdity of an Established Church with no creed. But Dr. Davidson—who, although a Dissenter, avows his decided preference for a State Church "having a very short creed and a most Catholic spirit"—takes practical ground for advocating the "widening" of the English Church. It would bring her nearer to the ideal approved by thoughtful, learned, and scientific men; it would relieve bishops from the task of prosecuting reputed heretics, and it would undermine the power of Dissent by absorbing Nonconformists into the "liberalized" Church of the future. Whether or not any modification of the Anglican formularies would be desirable, we need not here discuss. There is more than one party within her pale who would like to see them modified in their own sense, which is a very different one from Dr. Davidson's. One large school, for instance, would like to see "the Catholic ideal" better realized in another sense of the word "Catholic" than his. But it is clear, at first blush, that a change in the creeds and articles which is to relieve bishops altogether from the task of prosecuting alleged heretics, by leaving no standard to discriminate heretical from orthodox doctrine, must be a very considerable change indeed. Dr. Davidson thinks it would improve the religious "ideal" of the Church of England. For argument's sake let us suppose it would. But on one point we must venture respectfully, but very decidedly, to differ from him. It would never work. It is the besetting temptation of all persons of pronounced views—and men of more than average ability are especially subject to it to imagine that everybody sees, or would soon be brought to see, what is clear to themselves. It may be quite true that a Church with "a very short creed," or with no creed at all, would come nearer to the ideal of that section of thoughtful, learned, and scientific men whom the writer is thinking of. What he forgets is that, even among educated men, they are a small minority, and among the bulk of the members of any religious communion so small a minority as hardly to count at all. There are many men, whom he would not deny to be thoughtful and learned, whose views are of a most strongly opposite kind, and who would be more surely alienated than his scientific friends would be attracted by a creedless Church. And there are an immense number who are neither very thoughtful nor very learned, both among Anglicans and Dissenters, who would recoil with devout horror from the sort of national religion he is prepared to offer them. It is not too much to say that by the time Voyseyism had become a recognised and orthodox form of opinion in the Established Church, all articles or creeds which seem to condemn it being duly expurgated or annulled, the whole High Church, and the whole Evangelical party, with the exception perhaps of a few not very creditable stragglers who could not tear themselves from the fleshpots of Egypt, would have retired, shaking off the dust of their feet, from the apostate city. And we are very much mistaken indeed if "the orthodox Dissenters," who are the overwhelming majority of Nonconformists, would come in to take their place. It may of course be replied that old dogmatic prejudices are dying out, that the world is growing wiser and more liberal in its belief, and advancing daily, to use Dr. Davidson's language, in the path of "true religion and the promotion of rational liberty." It may be so. But long before his Catholic ideal of a creedless or almost creedless faith has been reached, the day of Established Churches will have passed away. It seems doubtful in any case whether it will last much longer. Disestablishment in Ireland has given a blow to the principle, and in a somewhat different way it is weakened by the recurrence of such cases as the St. Albans or Voysey prosecution. We quite agree with Dr. Davidson that there is a great deal to be said for Established as opposed to Voluntary Churches, and that, up to a certain point, they afford a valuable guarantee for religious freedom. But there is a point beyond which freedom cannot be pushed without merging into anarchy, and disintegrating the whole system. How nearly that point has already been reached in the Church of England we will not undertake to say, but that her fabric will not bear many more such rough experiments as we have witnessed of late seems clear enough.

IDEALISTS.

We have received a little publication conducted by an association of (as we presume) very young persons who propose to put everything to rights in the world. The weakness is so common at the present moment that it amounts almost to an epidemic. Every clever young man finds some sort of philosopher's stone once in his life, though it does not appear that the genuine article has as yet turned up. No one can deny that it would be remarkably convenient at the present time; we have evils enough, in existence and in prospect, for which it would be very agreeable to find an infallible specific. A large part of our population has not enough food, or clothes, or fire; a still larger part is scandalously ignorant and stupid; there is a great deal of ill-feeling between classes and nations; many religious and political controversies are still awaiting a satisfactory conclusion; and the position of woman is far from definitely settled. If any association will apply a satisfactory remedy to these and a few other troubles, we can promise them the gratitude of the Saturday Review; and they may perhaps receive other rewards, which would help to compensate them for their trouble. Of course no one can positively say beforehand what specific is likely to be the most effective. Perhaps everything will be in the right train when we have vote by ballot, female suffrage, and Mr. Hare's scheme of representation. The latest prophets, however, look upon such mechanical measures with a certain disdain; they perceive that we require a renewed spirit, rather than a mere change of social machinery; and, soaring far above the petty views of utilitarian reformers, they are going to convert us all by what they are pleased to call Idealism. The name, it is true, is somewhat of the vaguest, but a more precise intimation of their intentions may possibly be gained from the title they have assumed. They call themselves the Carlyle and Emerson Association; and the cover of their journal is embellished with mottoes from these writers, and from Mr. Ruskin and Mrs. Browning. Further, we are informed by advertisement that admirers of "Emerson, Carlyle, Matthew Arnold, &c." are invited to join their propaganda. We confess that this connexion of names is rather puzzling. We will not doubt that each of the three gentlemen named has a certain respect for the colleagues with whom he has been arbitrarily joined. And yet we should advise our Idealist friends to inquire a little more carefully into the harmony of opinions between their three prophets. We can indeed see one point of similarity. They tell us that Mr. Carlyle is "the modern Jeremiah," and we know that Mr. Matthew Arnold, although he was unkind enough to protest against the title, was described by the Daily Telegraph as an elegant Jeremiah. We may therefore guess that the mysterious "&c." appended to the three great names is intended for persons who take the cheerful view of modern society indicated by the proverbial use of the Hebrew prophet's name, and perhaps, judging from the general spirit of their publication, we should not be far wrong in describing them as the genial Jeremiahs. Their tone is one of denunciation, tempered by that amiable and gushing condescension which youthful reformers are apt to feel for their elders. They see that everybody, except themselves, is grossly ignorant, perverse, and cynical; but we are happy to say that they love us in spite of our faults, and that their awful warnings are softened to our capacities by plentiful gushes of unctuous philanthropy. Take an ordinary tract; cut out the scriptural phraseology and quotations of texts; and substitute for them undigested masses of Carlylese, softened by an occasional infusion of Ruskin, Emerson, and Browning, and you will obtain a fair notion of the style of the genial Jeremiahs. Mr. Matthew Arnold's influence is not so perceptible, probably because Mr. Arnold writes English—a language to which they have a strong and pardonable aversion. The whole charm of their preaching would disappear if it was intelligible to the vulgar. They have indeed so far condescended to the ordinary level of mankind that their organ has hitherto contained two "serial tales." One of these, however, will in future be replaced by "analyses of the works and principles of Carlyle, Emerson," and the mysterious "&c.," for whom we might perhaps venture to substitute the great name of Tupper; whilst the other, so far as we have glanced at it, consists of tremendous conversations between two philosophers as to the moral and spiritual regeneration of the age. It is only when the necessities of space or the severe strain upon the reader's intellect render an interruption necessary that one of the interlocutors judiciously, though à propos of nothing, calls to mind a business engagement that "compels his return to the town." The main staple of the Idealist, however, consists in rhapsodies about poetry, religion, the future of women, and so on, which are quite worthy of the lofty aspirations of the contributor. We may add that the Carlyle and Emerson Association, which for some mystic reason seems also to describe itself as the "T. D. Society," is about to hold a competition for the "Laureateship." We shall look forwards with pleasure to the great work in which the coming poet will embody the deepest thoughts of the age.

What are we to say to this latest manifestation of the reforming spirit? To laugh would be wrong; and indeed we are touchingly reminded, by a quotation from Mr. Ruskin placed on a conspicuous part of the cover, that "the chief bar to the action of the imagination, and stop to all greatness in this present age of ours, is its mean and shallow love of jest and sarcasm and jeer!" It may be so; and yet we have not the slightest doubt that our young friends would be delighted if we ventured to smile at them, and would rejoice greatly in the belief that they were undergoing even a very harmless persecution. It is, indeed, a decided misfortune for reformers in this age that persecution has gone so much out of fashion. They cannot even be put in the pillory, and the feeble shafts of satire which may be aimed against them are at most sufficient to give them a pleasant tickling, and enable them to wrap themselves a little more emphatically in the sense of their own virtue and wisdom. As, however, they profess to desire it, we will endeavour to treat them seriously for a moment. We cannot, indeed, profess to argue with persons of such exalted temperament; they move in a sublime region far above the reach of our humble modes of argument; and to fight with persons who have so lofty a scorn for intelligible but vulgar details is like beating a cloud with a walking-stick. But we may ask, what is the tendency which they represent, and what principle has governed their singular selection of prophets? The answers to these questions are closely connected. People who are about to reform the world have a strong propensity to the high à priori mode of reasoning; they like to rely upon their instincts and intuitions, and not to be bothered by practical details; and they wish consequently to represent themselves as a select body with exclusive possession of a certain inward light not vouchsafed to the common herd. Mr. Matthew Arnold has done them an immense service in popularizing the name of Philistine. The use of that word is a compendious mode of expressing the opinion of the speaker that the great mass of mankind, and especially of Englishmen, are fools, and that he possesses an exceptional sensibility to the true relations of things in this world. He is, in short, one of the children of light, whilst we are all hopelessly grovelling with our limited powers of vision amongst the barren, meaningless objects of party strife. Whilst the Philistine is troubled with the Irish Church and marriage with a deceased wife's sister, he is able to preach warmly about "sweetness and light," and to indulge in a contemptuous smile at our wretched quarrelling about matters uninteresting to the higher intellect. Mr. Carlyle's preaching is attractive for a similar reason. It is his fundamental doctrine that the world is divided into two classes—a very small one with eyes, and a very large one of purblind people, who, if they were well advised, would submissively follow the teaching of the genuine seers. Mr. Carlyle is more of a poet than of a philosopher, and this view of things is favourable to his peculiar system of chiaroscuro. He is able to bring out his heroes in brilliant relief against the gloomy masses of ignorance and darkness in the background. As a rule, he instinctively avoids gross absurdities, because he possesses a sense of humour as exceptional as his powers of imagination. Unluckily most of those who attempt to follow him are totally devoid of this necessary safeguard, and the consequence is that of all the dialects known to mankind none is more utterly wearisome and ridiculous than that of his imitators. It is always rash to imitate a mannerism, which is only natural to its inventor; but Mr. Carlyle's mannerism is specially dangerous, because it can be saved from absurdity only by that inimitable humour in which his followers are so conspicuously deficient.

We rather wonder that more of our juvenile reformers do not belong to a school which gives them such a chance of using their sense of superiority. To possess a power of intuitive insight into the realities and the essences of things must be so very charming that it is singular that more people do not satisfy themselves that they possess it. And it is easy enough for a loose-minded reasoner to temper it by a little of Mr. Matthew Arnold's amiable contempt for his countrymen, or by a few outbursts of Ruskinian rhetoric. Our Idealists have the merit of seeing the chance which is thus offered to the reformers of mankind for adopting a position of inaccessible superiority. With a little Emersonian philosophy they can raise so thick a cloud about them that all ordinary persons must confess their incapacity to follow them. To be supernaturally knowing, perfectly unintelligible, and incredibly dogmatic, is to occupy one of the most eligible positions in which the prophet of a new school can place himself. Perhaps the appearance of an Idealist may be a symptom that we are about to enter upon an era of this variety of preaching in place of the rather dismal politico-economical and statistical philosophy to which we have been lately accustomed. People who are not very wise have sometimes an instinct to tell them what is likely to be fashionable for the next few years. We think, however, on the whole, that a simpler explanation is more probable, and that the Idealist is a forewarning of nothing except of the very obvious fact that wisdom is not yet, and is not within any very short time likely to be, universal.

THE GRENVILLE MURRAY SCANDAL AND RIOT.

WE shall try—whether the attempt will succeed is another matter—to pick out of the confused muddle and entanglement of the great Grenville Murray case some of the facts. Always assuming that there are any facts, for the rough-and-tumble and free fight, as they call the riot, which put the Themis of Marlborough Street—though Mr. D'Eyncourt is not exactly a goddess, except perhaps as regards what seems rather like feminine timidity—to flight, seems to run through the whole of this very queer and confused matter. First of all we have to say that it is ascertained that there is such a journal as the Queen's Messenger, and, we regret to add, that the last week's history of its concerns, internal and external, must have had a beneficial extent on the previous, and we are glad to think somewhat limited, circulation of its very foul and offensive contents. Twenty-five numbers of the Queen's Messenger are in existence. There, by the way, we are wrong; for what ought to have been the Queen's Messenger, No. 21, came out as the "Plain Speaker, No. 1, conducted by the late writers of the Queen's Messenger," and published on June 10. However, on June 17, at least with that date, appeared the Queen's Messenger, No. 22, prefaced with "an Explanatory Word" which explains something, but what that something is we have not the slightest conception. "To those familiar with the manner in which Government Departments now influence the press, we need offer no explanation of the delay which has unavoidably occurred in the publication of No. 21 of the Queen's Messenger, or of its temporary changes of name; and we beg to refer those who are not yet properly informed on this curious subject to the details of Lord Clarendon's administration of Ireland between May 26, 1847, and February 28, 1852." Having no experience of any Government interference with the press, and not having the slightest curiosity to overhaul all that Lord Clarendon did in Ireland for five years, and those five years beginning twelve years ago, we accepted this stupendous riddle propounded by the Queen's Messenger, and left it in all its superb but worthless mystery. The Queen's Messenger, No 21, or Plain Speaker, No 1, seemed much like the three or four other Queen's Messengers we had chanced to see. They were all very disgusting and disgraceful publications, especially No. 7, which contained an article entitled the "Duke of Fairbrother." This offensive libel seems to have been the first of a string of personal attacks on the private life and behaviour of a long array of noblemen, headed "Our Hereditary Legislators," of which No xvi is before us. But upon looking carefully into the contents of the Queen's Messenger, this Portrait Gallery seems to have been an afterthought—a sort of coarse pepper and titillating condiment to give flavour to what was otherwise a tissue of the dullest and stupidest attacks on the Foreign Office. The raison d'etre of the Queen's Messenger, as far as we can make it out, seems to have been to abuse Mr. Bidwell of the Foreign Office in particular, and everybody connected with the Foreign Office in general—more especially in connexion with the life and services of one Mr Grenville Murray, formerly Consul-General for the Russian ports in the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof. In 1868 this Mr Grenville Murray was dismissed from his office by Lord Stanley. Against this dismissal Mr. Grenville Murray appealed to Lord Clarendon, but on the 4th of March, after having on the 13th of January declined to interfere with Lord Stanley's decision, Lord Clarendon also declined any further correspondence with Mr. Grenville Murray. The whole story of Mr. Grenville Murray's alleged wrongs is to be found in an official blue-book lately published. Reckoning backward we find that No. 1 of the Queen's Messenger must have appeared on January 21, exactly one week after Mr. Grenville Murray's final dismissal. We are, therefore, led by this noticeable coincidence to the unavoidable conclusion that Mr. Grenville Murray, alleging that he had suffered grievous wrong from Mr. Bidwell of the Foreign Office, ending in his dismissal, must have had something to do with the establishment and working of the Queen's Messenger, which week after week contained whole columns of abuse of Mr. Bidwell, of his family and connexions, and everything about him, his friends, colleagues, income, and personal character. Some very minute philosophers of a very inquisitive turn of mind may have noticed that when the Queen's Messenger did not quite know whether it was the Queen's Messenger or the Plain Speaker, the printer, and also the publisher, of this curious journal was changed. The relevancy of this fact will be seen as the narrative goes on; especially as the names of Ranken and Hughes, the original printer and publisher, were mentioned at Marlborough Street.

Now this is all that we know about the Queen's Messenger; and this is a good deal more than we suspect our readers know. On the very first week of its renewed life—namely, on June 17, the Queen's Messenger, No. 22, Antæus like, having regained new life from its contact with the earth, which must have been very muddy—published one of its fancy portraits, "Bob Conchington, Lord Jarvey." There can be no more question that this article referred to the present Lord Carington, than that in the last century Jemmy Twitcher meant Lord Sandwich, or that the forgotten satirist or parodist who talked about Wordswords and Mouthey meant Wordsworth and Southey. We shall not say a word about the contents of this execrable article, except to say that it not only libelled the present Lord Carington, but raked up all sorts of fables about his father, and abused the Carington family up to their remotest ancestry. Whereupon the present Lord Carington, having or thinking that he had sufficient proof that Mr. Grenville Murray wrote or was privy to the writing of this article, caned him or assaulted him on his hat on the steps of the Conservative Club.

This assault, which was a very foolish proceeding even on the part of a Guardsman under thirty years of age, led at once to two things, a communication between the solicitors of Mr. Grenville Murray and Lord Carington, and a communication between the Secretary of the Conservative Club and Mr. Grenville Murray. Lord Carington declined to express any regret for the assault, because it was committed "in the full belief that Mr. Grenville Murray had made a most infamous attack on his father and family," and because Mr. Murray's "connexion with the Queen's Messenger was a matter of public notoriety, and admits of the clearest proof." Mr. Murray, writing to his solicitor, declares that he "never wrote one line concerning Lord Carington or any member of his family," and denies that he is "either editor or proprietor of any newspaper whatever." Addressing the Club Secretary, Mr. Murray repeats this denial, and refers obscurely to the authenticity of certain alleged proofs of his authorship, contained in what he calls fabricated documents, used at the instigation of a Mr. Newman, a member of the Club and legal adviser of Mr. Bidwell, Mr. Murray's inveterate foe.

On Wednesday another act of this strange drama was played at the Marlborough Street Police Court. Lord Carington was charged, first with a common assault, and next with provoking Mr. Grenville Murray to fight a duel. The two charges were muddled up, but the first ought not to have occupied five minutes. It was on the second charge that the struggle took place. As far as we can make out from the various newspaper reports—that of the Times, by the way, being the most meagre and unintelligible—there was a conflict of evidence on this last point; Mr Grenville Murray swearing that Lord Carington after the assault said, "You know where to find me," a conventional expression inviting a conference on Putney Heath, whereas the Club porter swears that Lord Carington's expression was, "If you wish to proceed against me, you will know where to find me," which only meant an invitation to the Police Court. We suppose, but we are by no means sure, that it was on this supposed contradiction as to what Lord Carington said that his lawyer at Marlborough Street pronounced summarily that Mr. Murray's "account of this transaction"—namely, the assault—was "wholly untrue," which it is very difficult to see how it could be. It was, therefore, by way of sustaining the particular allegation that Mr. Grenville Murray's account of what occurred at the Club was "wholly untrue," that his cross-examination was conducted with a view of showing his general unveracity, especially in connexion with his denial of the authorship of articles in the Queen's Messenger. The cross-examination could only have had this object, and has only this justification; for the assault, the only really important matter in hand, was not denied.

The result of the cross-examination briefly stated is this:—that Mr. Grenville Murray swears that neither directly nor indirectly was he privy to, or a party to, the writing or publication of the article on Lord Carington, nor was he aware of the intention to publish it. He does admit that he has contributed articles to the Queen's Messenger; that his son was the registered proprietor of the Queen's Messenger: that he and his son, till very recently, lived together; that, in consequence of an accident to his right forefinger, "he wrote so many different hands," that "he could not remember what he wrote." The rest of the cross-examination was directed to the alleged authorship of a vast mass of articles which had appeared in the Queen's Messenger, and which Lord Carington's advisers attempted, not very successfully, to get Mr Grenville Murray to acknowledge, but which allegation Mr. Grenville Murray met by declining to commit himself on any point not immediately before the Court; that is, he would say nothing except about the article on Lord Carington, and complaining that the "copy" or corrected proof of the said articles actually produced in Court by Mr. Newman had been stolen from the office or custody of the proprietors of the Queen's Messenger.

Now we frankly own that we have little sympathy with Mr. Grenville Murray, except to say that he ought to have the protection of the law, and undoubtedly the law was broken by Lord Carington's assault on him. Mr. Grenville Murray combines the qualifications of a random talker when he said, or allowed it to be said for him, that he wrote articles in the Times, which the Times says he did not; and of a very reckless and careless inventor of facts, as when he asserts what he did assert about the proprietorship of the Saturday Review—a matter which was very ungermane to the scene at the Club. And there can be no doubt that, as he has contributed to the Queen's Messenger, and as it would be hard to find a single creditable article in the Queen's Messenger, the inference is tolerably plain that he has written some very objectionable matter, probably about his own wrongs, and about the sins and iniquities, as he considers them, of the Foreign Office and of Mr. Bidwell, although it is quite possible that he did not write the libels on Lord Carington and the peerage.

To sum up:—Lord Carington has ample and just cause of complaint against the Queen's Messenger; but it may be that in attacking

Mr. Murray he has got hold of the wrong man. We do not say that this is so, because Mr. Murray's styles of handwriting are so peculiar that they may affect his memory as to the substance as well as form of what he writes. Again, Mr. Bidwell has ample and just cause of complaint against the Queen's Messenger; and it is scarcely possible that Mr. Murray is not responsible for the attacks on Mr. Bidwell, of which it is said that the proofs are ample and available—we presume in the tin-box. But we should much prefer to see the wrongs which Mr. Bidwell has suffered from the Queen's Messenger or from Mr. Grenville Murray, if he is the author of them, redressed in some more direct way than by ton's case against the Queen's Messenger, ought to be kept separate. While as regards the tin-box which contains, or is said to contain, the proofs against Mr. Murray, the present possessors stand accused, whether justly or not, of stealing its contents. This charge is very likely untrue, and Mr. Newman, we make no doubt, can give a good account of the means by which he obtained possession of these papers. On the other hand, nothing can justify the riotous assault by which the partisans of the Queen's Messenger tried to possess themselves of documents which were substantially in the custody of the officers of justice. There remains something untold, and it is because we have no wish that Mr. Grenville Murray, or anybody connected with the Queen's Messenger, should look, even for a moment, like a martyr, that we should like to have it all out. Public opinion will be surprised if the whole story takes off any of the obloquy with which the Queen's Messenger is covered; and we can only regret that the notoriety which must attend these discreditable transactions may, for however brief a period, arrest that certain death, but death not less dishonoured than that which awaited its predecessors in the trade of scurrility and calumny—the Age and Satirist of a past generation.

SCRAMBLERS.

THERE are people who are never what Northern housewives call "straight"—people who seem to have been born in a scramble, who live in a scramble, and who, when their time comes, will die in a scramble, just able to scrawl their signature to a will that ought to have been made years ago, and that does not embody their real intentions now. Emphatically the Unready, they are never prepared for anything, whether expected or unexpected, they make no plans more stable than good intentions, and they neither calculate nor foresee. Everything with them is hurry and confusion, not because they have more to do than other people, but because they do it more loosely and less methodically—because they have not learnt the art of dovetailing or the mystery of packing. Consequently half their pleasures and more than half their duties slip through their fingers for want of the knack of compact holding; and their lives are passed in trying to pick up what they have let drop, and in frantic endeavours to remedy their mistakes. For scramblers are always making mistakes, and going through an endless round of forgetting. For one thing, they never remember their engagements, but accept in the blandest and frankest way imaginable two or more invitations for the same day and hour, and assure you quite seriously when, taught by experience, you push them hard and probe them deep, that they have no engagement whatever on hand, and are certain not to fail you. In an evil hour you trust to them. When the day comes they suddenly wake to the fact that they had accepted Mrs. So-and-So's invitation before yours; and all you get for your empty place, and your careful arrangements ruthlessly upset, is a hurried note of apology which comes perhaps in the middle of dinner, perhaps some time next day, when too late to be of use. If they forget their own engagements they also ignore yours, no matter how distinctly you may have tabulated them; and are sure to come rattling to your house on the day when you said emphatically you were engaged and could not see them. If you keep to your programme, and refuse to admit them, more likely than not you affront them. Engagements being in their eyes moveable feasts, which it does not in the least degree signify whether they keep on the date set down or not, they cannot understand your rigidity of purpose; and were it not that as a tribe they are good-natured, and too fluid to hold even annoyance for any length of time, you would in all probability have a quarrel fastened on you because your scrambling friends chose to make a calendar for themselves, and to insist on your setting your diary by it. And as they ignore your appointed hours, so do they forget your street and number. They always stick to your first card, though you may have moved many times since it was printed, duly apprizing them of each change as it occurred. That does not help you, for they never note the changes of their friends' addresses, but keep loyally to the first. It all comes to the same in the end, they say, and the postman is cleverer than they. But they do not often trouble their friends with letters on their own account, and they have a speciality for not answering such as are written to them, and, when they do answer them, of not replying to the questions asked or giving the news demanded. They do not even reply to invitations like other people, but leave you to infer from their silence the yes or no they are meditating. When they in their turn invite you, they generally puzzle you by mismatching the day of the week with the date of the month, leaving you tormented with doubt which you are to go by; and they forget to give you the hour. Besides this, they write an illegible sprawling hand, and they are famous for the blots they make and the Queen's heads they omit.

A scrambling wife is no light cross to a man who values order and regularity as part of his home life. She may be, and probably is, the best-tempered creature in the world—a peevish scrambler would be too unendurable—but a fresh face, bright eyes, and a merry laugh do not atone for never-ending disorder and discomfort. This kind of thing does not depend on income, and is not to be remedied by riches. The households where my lady has nothing to do but let her maid keep her to the hours she herself has appointed are just as uncomfortable in their way as poorer establishments, if my lady is a scrambler, and cannot be taught method and the value of holding on by the forelock. Sometimes my lady gets herself into such an inextricable coil of promises and engagements, all crossing each other, that in despair she takes to her bed and gives herself out as ill, and so cuts what she cannot untie. People wonder at her sudden indisposition, looking as she did only yesterday in the very bloom of health; and they wonder at her radiant reappearance without a trace of even languor upon her; they do not know that her retirement was simply a version of the famous rope trick, and that, like the Brothers Davenport, she went into the dark to shake herself free of the cords with which she had suffered herself to be bound. It is a short and easy method certainly, but it has rather too much of the echo of "Wolf" in it to bear frequent repetition. In houses of a lower grade, where the lady is her own housekeeper, the habit of scrambling of course leads to far greater and more manifest confusion. The servants catch from the mistress the trick of overstaying time, and punctuality at last comes to mean an elastic margin, where fixed duties and their appointed times appear cometically at irregular intervals. The cook is late with dinner; the coachman begins to put-to a little after the hour he was ordered to be at the door; but they know that, however late they are, the chances are ten to one their mistress will not be ready for them, and that in her heart she will be grateful to them for the shelter their own unpunctuality affords her. This being so, they take their time, and dawdle at their pleasure; thus adding to the pressure which always comes at the end of the scrambler's day, when everything is thrown into a chaotic mass, and nothing comes out straight or complete. Did any one ever know a scrambling woman ready at the moment in her own house? That she should be punctual to any appointment out of her house is, of course, not to be thought of; but she makes an awkward thing of it sometimes at home. Her guests are often all assembled, and the dinner hour has struck, before she has torn off one gown and dragged on another. What she cannot tie she pins, and her pins are many and demonstrative. She wisps up her hair, not having left herself time to braid it; and the consequence is that before she has been half an hour in the room ends and tails are sure to stray playfully from their fastenings, and come tumbling about her ears. Her jewels are mismatched, her colours ill-assorted, her belt is awry, her bouquet falling to pieces. She rushes into the drawing-room in her morning slippers, smiling and good-tempered, with a patchwork look about her—something forgotten in her attire that makes her whole appearance shaky and unfinished—fastening her last button, or clasping on her first bracelet. She is full of regrets and excuses delivered in her joyous, buoyant manner, or in a voice so winning, an accent so coaxing, that you cannot be annoyed. Besides, you leave the annoyance to her husband, who is sure to have in reserve a pickle quite sufficiently strong for the inevitable rod, as the poor scrambler knows too well. All you can do is to accept her apologies with a good grace, and to carry away with you a vivid recollection of an awkward half-hour, a spoilt dinner, and a scrambling hostess all abroad and out of time, sweeping through the room very heated, very good-tempered, only half-dressed, and chronically out of breath.

Scramblers can never learn the value of money, either for themselves or for others. They are famous for borrowing small sums which they forget to return; but, to do them justice, they are just as willing to lend what they never dream of asking for again. Long ago they caught hold of the fact that money is only a circulating medium, and they have added an extra speed to the circulation at which slower folks stand aghast. To be sure, the practical results of their theory are not very satisfactory, and the confusion between the possessive pronouns which distinguishes their financial catechism is apt to lead to unpleasant issues. Scrambling women are especially notorious for the way in which they set themselves afloat without sufficient means to carry them on; finding themselves stranded in mid-career because they have made no calculations, and have forgotten the rule of subtraction. They find themselves at a small Italian town, say, where the virtues of the British banking system are unknown, and where their letters of credit and circular notes are not worth more than the value of the paper they are written on. More than one British matron of respectable condition and weak arithmetic has found herself in such a plight as this, with her black-eyed landlord perfectly civil and well-bred, but as firm as a rock in his resolution that the Signora shall not depart out of his custody till his little account is paid—a plight out of which she has to scramble the best way she can, with the loss perhaps of a little dignity and of more repute, at least in the locality where her solid scudi gave out and her precious paper could not be cashed. This is the same woman who offers an omnibus conductor a sovereign for a threepenny fare; who gives the village grocer a ten-pound note for a shilling's-worth of sugar; and who, when she comes up to London for a day's shopping, and has got her last parcel made up and ready to be put into her cab, finds she has not left herself half enough money to pay for it—with a shopman whose faith in human nature is by no means lively, and who only last week was bitten by a lady swindler of undeniable manners and appearance, and not very unlike herself. She has been known, too, to go into a confectioner's, and, after having made an excellent luncheon, find to her dismay that she has left her purse in the pocket of her other dress at home, and that she has not sixpence about her. In fact there is not an equivocal position in which forgetfulness, want of method, want of foresight, and all the other characteristics which make up scrambling in the concrete, can place her, in which she has not been at some time or other. But no experience teaches her; the scrambler she was born the scrambler she will die, and to the last will tumble through her life, all her ends flying, and deprecating excuses on her lips.

Scramblers are notoriously great in making promises, and as notorious for not performing what they promise. Kindhearted as they are in general, and willing to do their friends a service—going out of their way indeed to proffer kindnesses quite beyond your expectations and the range of their duties towards you, and always undertaking works of supererogation, which in fact lead to more than half their normal scramble—they forget the next hour the promise on which you have based your dearest hopes. Or, if they do not forget it, they find it is crowded out of time by a multitude of engagements and prior promises, of all of which they were innocently oblivious when they offered to do your business so frankly, and swore so confidently they would set about it now at once, and get it out of hand without delay. The oath and the offer which you took to be as sure as the best chain cable you will find on trial to be only a rope of sand that could not bind so much as a bunch of tow together, still less hold the anchor of a life; and many a heart sick with hope deferred, and with the disappointment which might have been so easily prevented, has been half broken before now from the anguish that has followed on the failure of the kindhearted scrambler to perform the promise voluntarily made, and the service freely offered and earnestly pressed on a reluctant acceptor. This is the tragic side of the scrambler's career, the shadow thrown by almost every one of the class. For all the minor delinquencies of hurry and unpunctuality in social affairs it is not difficult to find full and ample forgiveness; but when it comes to untrustworthiness in graver matters, then the scrambler becomes a scourge instead of only an inconvenience. The only safe way of dealing with the class is to take them when we can get hold of them, and to accept them for what they are worth; but not to rely on them, and not to attempt any mortising of one's own affairs with their promises. They are the froth and foam of society, pretty and pleasant enough in the sunlight as they splash and splutter about the rocks, but they are not the deep waters which bear the burden of our ships, and by which the life of the world is maintained.

THE WRONGS OF WALES.

WE have heard over and over again from Conservative orators the argument that if Ireland is discontented Wales ought to be discontented also, and it appears from a recent debate in the House of Commons that a large supply of Welsh grievances has been brought into the market, and they promise to become a favourite article of political investment. A most pathetic speech was made on behalf of Welsh occupiers of land by Mr Richard, who lifts up his testimony against landlords who object to Dissenters and desire that their tenants should be Churchmen. The House of Commons received with perfect gravity Mr Richard's suggestion of the Ballot as a remedy for the grievance of which he so movingly complained. It might be contended, however, that the facts stated by Mr. Richard support the opposite conclusion to that which he wishes to establish. There is, as we learn from Mr. Richard, a lady whom he calls "the well-known Miss Morris," who owns a good deal of property near Aberystwith, and who, acting notoriously under clerical control, sent notice to her tenants (a great number of whom were Dissenters) to give up their farms or go to "her church." We do not know what the speaker means by Miss Morris's church, nor do we care; for we apprehend that, if Miss Morris chose to send notice to her tenants to give up their farms or take medicine of her prescription, she would have a perfect right to do so. We should really like to understand what it is that Mr. Richard and his allies mean. Do they think that Irishmen have had the business of agitation to themselves too long, and that it is time for Welshmen to get up a demand for tenant-right? If they mean this, they had better say so. It is not pretended even in Ireland that the Ballot will give fixity of tenure, or afford compensation for unexhausted improvements, and we hope that the Welsh are not going to show themselves less rational than the Irish. But indeed Mr. Richard, or at least one of his correspondents, says plainly that a new law of landlord and tenant is as necessary in Wales as in Ireland. The general complaint seems to be, not so much that tenants have been ejected since the election, as that they have had their rents raised. It they choose to profess Liberalism and Dissent, they must be taxed for indulging in those luxuries. We regret that Mr. Richard forgot to mention how the new law which he desires is to meet the case. Instead of entering into inconvenient details, Mr Richard prefers to give us a poetical comparison of ejected Welsh farmers to the Pilgrim Fathers "compelled to seek ho[me] in a foreign country where they hoped to enjoy that religious freedom which was denied to them in their native land." We sup[pose] that the foreign country here referred to is England. It may be useful to note that Mr. Richard, when we reduce him into plain prose, complains that these farmers are ejected because they are Dissenters, and, if this be the complaint, it is evident that the Ballot cannot remedy it. But Mr. Richard proceeds to state that these farmers had been in occupation many years, and had made valuable improvements on their farms of which by ejection they lost the benefit. We can hardly help saying that, if this be true, the Welsh farmers are greater fools than we had supposed. But indeed we have great doubt whether it is true. Our old friend the improving Irish farmer has been so hunted up and down his own country that he seems to have crossed the Channel, and settled himself in Wales, in the hope of enjoying his grievances in peace. According to Mr. Richard there is no tenant-right of any kind in Wales, and the tenants enter upon farms and begin improvements without obtaining any kind of writing from their landlords. If Mr. Richard describes a general state of things, there is much need of improvement in it, but the measures required are economical, and they ought not to be represented as political. They certainly are wholly different from the Ballot. It may be that Welsh farmers are incapable of asking their landlords to grant leases, and it may be also that, although English law is administered by English judges throughout Wales, there has been no progress made in establishing those customs of compensation for improvements which exist more or less in almost every English county. If tenant-right in this sense does not exist in Wales, it ought to be introduced; but if Mr Richard asks for it in a larger sense, he will of course be prepared to compensate the landlords at whose expense it must be established, just as Mr. Bright has proposed to do in Ireland.

There is a remarkable similarity between some portions of Mr Richard's speech and the speeches which used to be delivered by Irish advocates of tenant-right. We seem to have heard before the story of the man who took a farm in bad condition without a lease, and worked on it day and night, and improved it, and then received notice to quit, and died of disappointment, and left behind him ten children. When such cases were investigated in Ireland, it used not seldom to turn out either that the man died of some complaint totally different from disappointment, or that he did not die at all. But members of Parliament who bring forward such cases speak on information which they deem credible, so we will only say that we think a man who could die of disappointment must have been a very bad tenant when he was alive. The coal and ironworks of Wales were founded by men of another stamp, and they would hardly desire to be identified with disappointed farmers. If, says Mr. Richard, notices to quit are served and evictions follow, it is to be hoped that the inhabitants of Wales will continue to show themselves the peaceable and orderly people they have always been. This, again, has rather an Irish sound, and bears too close a resemblance to exhortations which are sometimes addressed to mobs to be very particular not to throw stones at the police. There were many proceedings in Wales and elsewhere in connexion with the elections which caused sober people to declare themselves advocates of the Ballot. The opinion may be right, although the reasons given for it may be wrong. Mr. Richard appears to describe a country where the vote which every man would give would be perfectly well known, and where, therefore, it is simply ludicrous to pretend that the Ballot would protect the voter. All Dissenters in Wales, almost without exception, are Liberals, and therefore, a Conservative landlord who desires to support his party will let his farms to none but Churchmen. The Dissenting ministers of Wales have the credit of being active politicians, and they probably take effectual means of knowing how the worshippers in their chapels vote. Pretensions to exercise individual judgment are likely to be followed by evictions of a different character from those which are so much complained of. The supplies of spiritual provender would be cut off, and mutinous spirits would soon be reduced to submission to the will of the minister and the majority of the congregation. There was a story told in the debate about a landowner who would not allow water to flow from his land to the land of a neighbour unless that neighbour promised to vote for the Conservatives, and as the neighbour was a staunch Liberal, he was deprived of water-power, and reduced to churning butter by hand. We have not the smallest doubt that cases might be found where voting the wrong way has been followed by exclusion from dinners and balls. In fact, the means of influencing votes are various, and many of them will be equally available under the Ballot as they are now. We should think that a landowner's agent must be a very stupid fellow if he could not exercise nearly as much influence with the Ballot as without it. There is, indeed, one remedy for landlords' interference which is certain to be efficacious—namely, to transfer a large interest in their property to their tenants. A speaker in the debate demanded "a just and equitable land law," which should protect the interest of the tenant-farmer and grant him that security for his property which is now accorded to the landlord. This speaker, at any rate, knows what he means, and he is right in thinking that if such a remedy were provided the Ballot would be unnecessary for the protection of tenants against landlords.

More than twenty years ago a committee presided over by the late Mr. Pusey inquired into the origin and extent of customs of compensation for improvements in various parts of England, and they showed that what is called the custom of the country had in fact been created by a few influential land-agents within this century. They showed also that wherever a liberal custom exists the fertility of the land increases. Considering that the same persons often own land in England and Wales, it would be very strange if totally opposite views of landlords' interests prevailed in the two countries. However, the Welsh members ought to know Wales better than their English critics. If we suggest that the agricultural custom of North Lincolnshire should be adopted in Wales, we hope that we shall not be suspected of an invidious design to silence the Welsh language or to break the strings of the Welsh harp. We recommend the tenant-right of well-cultivated English counties to the consideration of Welsh economical reformers, but with the distinct declaration that we have no view to political results. But the proposal of a tenant-right which shall produce the same effects as are expected, rightly or wrongly, from the Ballot, opens a very wide question. Ladies who have large estates, and are under clerical guidance, are likely to continue during our time to choose tenants of their own particular persuasion, and the breast of Mr. Richard may swell with indignation, and his mouth may burn with eloquence, without producing the smallest practical effect.

PROSELYTISM AT SOUTHALL.

THE Marylebone Guardians are so very far from being children of light that it is not surprising to find them wise in their generation beyond other men. The importance of carrying on war in your enemy's country rather than in your own is an accepted principle of strategy, and under the guidance of Mr. Thomas Chambers they achieved this feat on Tuesday last. The Guardians have lately, it seems, been instrumental in promoting a very blessed work. Five Roman Catholic children educated in the workhouse school at Southall have had their understandings gradually opened to the errors of Popery, and have one and all "voluntarily made their objections to receiving Roman Catholic instruction." This miracle of grace was a little helped on, however, by the judicious policy of the Guardians. The five young were educated for two years as Protestants, and it was not, we may presume, until their controversial equipment gave evidence of being in proper condition that a Roman Catholic priest was

Protestantism, if not praise, has been perfected out of their mouths at the early age of fourteen. It was obvious that an event of this kind was very likely to be misunderstood by an encroaching priesthood and an indifferent Poor-Law Board. Names count for a good deal in such matters, and by whatever title the Guardians might choose to describe the process to which these children had been subjected, it was at least possible that it might be called proselytism by a Gallio like Mr. Goschen. It was now that the Marylebone authorities showed of what sterling stuff they were made. Instead of waiting to be attacked, they resolved to become the assailants. The Poor Law Board had sent them a letter on the 22nd of last month, "stating that it was its intention to issue orders for the removal to certified Roman Catholic schools of all children on behalf of whom application had been made." A Board of Guardians generally objects to obey orders, but in this case they grounded their refusal on the highest motives of public policy. They "believe the action proposed to be taken by the Poor-Law Board to be opposed to the intention of the Act of Parliament," and they "therefore feel it their duty to offer every legitimate opposition." In thus limiting their determination the Guardians do themselves injustice. Their opposition will not, we feel sure, be merely "legitimate." Still they were prudent as well as valiant, and they did their best to get their magnanimous declaration supplemented by a vote of the House of Commons. To this end Mr. Chambers moved that, "in any case where a Board of Guardians shall have made due provision for the instruction in their own faith of children not of the Established Church, it is inexpedient that the Poor Law Board should exercise its discretionary power to enforce the removal of such children to schools not under the control of the Guardians or of the parochial authorities." At first sight this resolution seems to contemplate the case of the Guardians having made provision for teaching "their own"—that is, the Protestant—faith to Roman Catholic children, and if all workhouse schools are like Southall there would be no reason to question the sufficiency of their arrangements for that purpose. It appears, however, from Mr. Chambers's speech that the case he has in view is that of a Board of Guardians having taken measures to secure the occasional attendance of a Roman Catholic priest, and given the children permission to attend a Roman Catholic chapel. This machinery is, he contends, in full operation at Southall, and if in spite of it all Roman Catholic children become Protestants, it can only be attributed to the native superiority of the parochial creed; or perhaps, as in the famous Cockermouth and Cock-and-bull case, to the superior attractions of Sunday clothes and the music of the parish Church. An occasional accident of this sort ought not to be made a ground for taking the children out of the care of the Guardians, who "stood to them in loco parentis," and were only anxious to do their duty by them.

Mr. Chambers's resolution attributes to the Legislature an intention which it never entertained. The Act of 1866 compelled the Guardians of every Union to make some provision for the education of pauper children in the religion of their parents. They were ordered to keep a creed register, to allow the children to be visited by a minister of the religion in which they were entered, and to permit them to attend a place of worship of their own creed in cases where no provision was made for giving them a separate service within the workhouse. Before the passing of this Act, freedom of religion was set at defiance in a majority of workhouses. The favourite doctrine of the parish authorities was that pauper children should be educated "in the religion of the State." In many cases no attempt was made to ascertain the parents' creed; in some all evidence upon the subject was rejected, and the child was brought up as a Protestant against the will of its nearest relations. The flagrant injustice of this state of things was condemned by a Select Committee of the House of Commons as far back as 1864, but it was not until four years later that it was remedied by legislation. In the meantime the evil had been partly met in another way. By an Act passed in 1866 the Poor-Law Board was empowered to transfer the pauper children of persons not members of the Established Church to schools kept by persons of their own religion, and certified by the Home Secretary. Several such schools have been founded by benevolent Roman Catholics, and it might have been thought that the Guardians would have felt relieved by the withdrawal of a charge by which they professed to be conscientiously unable to do their duty. They had always contended that to permit the attendance of a priest, and still more, to allow him to say mass on the premises, was incompatible with a due regard to workhouse discipline, and to the Protestant purity of the remaining children. In some cases they had gone still further, and pleaded their inability as Protestants to countenance Popish error by allowing it any footing inside the workhouse. Both classes of objections were met by the system of separate schools. The Guardians were spared an uncongenial task, and the workhouse was no longer invaded by Antichrist in a long coat and Roman collar. Instead, however, of welcoming the change, the Guardians have effected an entire change of front. They are now perfectly willing to bring up the Catholic children of Catholic parents, provided only that the dear innocents are not snatched from their protecting arms. Influenced by this passionate desire, they have invented a theory which treats the Act of 1866 as superseded by the Act of 1868. The former, says Mr. Boulnois, the Chairman of the Marylebone Schools Committee, "was intended to apply where Guardians failed to permit or to provide for the due instruction of children, not members of the Established Church, in their own religious creed. Under the Act of 1868 the Guardians have made the most satisfactory arrangements for the visitation and instruction of Roman Catholic children, at the parochial schools at Southall, and there is therefore no longer a sufficient reason for removal." Upon this thesis Mr. Chambers enlarged last Tuesday, and found, we are sorry to say, twenty-nine members of the House of Commons to support him. Mr. Goschen's answer was sufficiently conclusive. The supposed alternative character of the two statutes has no existence. The Act which is alleged to supersede the power of removal does in fact extend and amplify it. It meets the case of there being no certified school within reach, by providing that wherever Roman Catholic children are retained in the workhouse, either by necessity or by the choice of the Guardians, they shall be allowed the exercise of their religion to the extent mentioned above. But it does nothing to limit the power of the Poor-Law Board in the matter; indeed, so far as it touched the Act of 1866 at all, it enlarges the discretion reposed by that Act in the Commissioners.

That Parliament was wise in taking this course is indisputable. As Mr. Goschen truly said, it is not possible to carry out the principle of a Conscience Clause "where there is no home influence behind, and when you have to deal with the fact that the workhouse or district schools are the actual homes of the children." In such a home, even if there is no intentional proselytism, the chances are all against a Roman Catholic child growing up to be a Roman Catholic man or woman. The priest, it is true, comes to instruct him once or twice a week, and on Sundays, if there is a Roman Catholic church within easy distance, he goes to mass. But the whole aggregate of influences outside the class-room and the church is hostile to his religion. The authorities set over him are Protestants, his teachers are Protestants, his companions are Protestants. Simple forgetfulness will do a good deal towards his conversion, and it will be strange if the consciousness of being in a minority does not do the rest. To belong to an unpopular religion does not make the life of a pauper child more enjoyable. But to assume that there is no intentional proselytism is obviously to take an unduly favourable view of the situation. The workhouses in which the danger would be least are under the management of men who are perfectly willing that Roman Catholic children should be placed in Roman Catholic schools. Wherever there is any reluctance to accept this obvious solution of the difficulty, there must be more or less bigotry on the part of the workhouse authorities. Mr. Boulnois's letter in the Times shows justice requires the removal of Roman Catholic children from the care and control of the Guardians to schools the property of, and exclusively governed by, ministers of the Church of Rome." What would Mr. Boulnois say if a child of his were brought up in a Roman Catholic school, surrounded by Roman Catholic associations, and knowing nothing of Protestantism beyond what might be learned in an hour's visit from a clergyman one day in seven? He would hardly, we imagine, hold that "equal justice" was done to Protestant and to Roman Catholic parents if, while the latter had his children educated by persons of his own creed, and in the midst of companions of his own creed, the former was compelled to leave his child in the midst of Roman Catholics, there being all the time a Protestant school in which it would be readily received. It seems so hopeless to drive the notion of doing as they would be done by into the heads of the Marylebone Guardians, that it is satisfactory to learn from Mr. Goschen's speech that he proposes to act in the matter without paying any further attention to the opposition which Mr. Boulnois and his like may "feel it their duty" to offer.

HOME SCENERY.

IT is a remark of Mr. Wallace, in his interesting work on the Malay Archipelago, that, contrary to the ideas entertained by most people, the colouring of vegetation in the tropics is by no means equal to the colouring in more temperate regions. Of one side of the comparison we here say nothing, but with respect to the beauty of our own land it is certain that, the longer we live, the more we become aware of a variety and fulness to which custom is apt to deaden us. It is a common remark that custom renders us insensible to impressions, but it is not so often remarked that custom, when joined to reflection, has the very reverse effect, and undoes its own previous work by rendering us continually more alive to the striking things and subtle influences around us. The life of most of us includes a period of somnolence to external nature, when its first influence is worn off, and when we have not yet discovered that it will supply material for mingled passion and energy, the alternation of passive reception and active inquiry on our own part, which is at once more enduring and more strengthening than the original vague emotion. Then it is that we can gain enjoyment even in ordinary every-day scenery which no one would travel twenty miles to visit. Dr. Arnold said that there were but five English counties in which a man could not find enough material in the way of scenery to last him for a lifetime; and as Warwickshire was one of these, perhaps the number might be even further diminished. But, if we are not mistaken, the kind of scenery from which the greatest amount, as distinguished from the greatest intensity, of enjoyment can be derived, is that which lies intermediate between the unconspicuous but pleasant scenery which lies at our doors, and the grand peaks and snowfields and fiords which are most striking at first view. In the more quiet scenery, too, much depends on the activity of our own minds, we are not helped by the sense of novelty and gentle excitement. On the other hand, in the grander scenery we are somewhat too passive; any small discoveries that we could make for ourselves would seem insignificant by the side of the mysterious glaciers and the vast wastes that show themselves only to defy us. And though unquestionably no impression from scenery comes back upon us in after times with such power as the view, let us say, of the great Oberland precipice, with its unparalleled length and height of bare rock, as seen from the Faulhorn or the Schilthorn, yet, when present, the mind is somewhat overpowered before it, the inferior business of studying trees and torrents and glens sinks into nothing and is despised. And it is for this reason that such countries as that which surrounds the Rhine, or the quiet rocky valleys of England, are so supremely delightful. In such places you can be a discoverer, for there it is a discovery to find some waterfall unknown to guide-books, some picturesque dale unvisited by travellers, some distant view that ranges far over hill and plain. Or else you may turn geologist, and investigate the mountain strata, limestone or gritstone or slate, and hammer out fossils, or theorize about the formation of ravines; or you may examine the foliage and ferns and grasses, and see what is the habitat of each in the watercourses, or on the open moorland, or in the low valley. With such pursuits harmonize well the ever varied yet not too sublime landscape, and the moderate exercise which it is necessary to take in order to explore such a country thoroughly.

Few countries better correspond to the description we have been giving than what is sometimes called the Pennine range of England, which runs like a backbone down from Scotland, through Northumberland, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire. And yet we think we may have done it injustice in implying that it is without sublimity; for to our mind the interminable ranges of moors, purple in the autumn with heather that bends under the wind like a wave of the sea, with their strong winds and swift alternations of sunshine and shade, or else on stormy days with the dreariness and weirdness of their deep hollows and black rocks, have a true sublimity, being as indomitable as the snow mountains to the taming hand of man, though not so impervious to his steps. And here too there is what some people may think a hindrance, though others will certainly esteem it a gain, that the traveller rises far more frequently into the cloud region than is the case in Switzerland. The mists cling about the moors, and even when they wrap us wholly round it is in solitary places a pleasure to feel the entire withdrawal of the artificial world, and to observe the frequent change of what seem gigantic precipices, that appear and disappear in the obscurity; while the woolly clouds that hang about the edges on a sunny day are a pure additional source of picturesqueness.

The counties we have spoken of are not such regular tourist ground as the Lakes or North Wales, but yet there are many parts of them well and generally known. For artists there is not a more favourite place in England than the valley of the Tees, with its two great waterfalls, and the woods that encompass the tumbling streams and climb up the jagged rocks at Rokeby, while Dovedale and the Wharfe at Bolton Abbey are perhaps still more sought after by the unartistic lover of scenery. And some among the wilder valleys, such as those of Castleton and Malham, are sufficiently well known. But in the wide extent of these hills there are many unknown spots of equal beauty with these. How few English tourists explore the valley of the Lune! and yet there is none more noble among English valleys, and none of which the tributary streams are finer. Travelling by rail to the Lakes, you skirt it for some little distance in its lower course, and see the Castle of Lancaster, that watches over its exit into the sea; but few perhaps of those who pass by it trouble themselves so much as to ask its name, and very few indeed track its upper course. Yet at Kirby Lonsdale there is all that can make scenery delightful; a perfectly clear green stream, surrounded by great slabs of rock, above which is an undulating park-like country of splendid trees, that gradually lifts itself into the lofty moorland ridges. Among those ridges you can trace the little stream of Easegill, where the sharp gritstone rocks alternate with the smooth limestone, hollowed out into deep pots by the winter torrents, where the grass is of the greenest, and where the main stream is of a deep chocolate brown; but in a small side glen the water lies clear and uncoloured under lofty precipices. Above Kirby Lonsdale the Lune is joined by the Rothey, which takes its rise near Wildboar Fell, and by the little stream of Dentdale. Nothing can be finer than these valleys. They are open and cheerful, and yet not too broad; each of them is bounded, on the one side by high and precipitous hills, on the other by a lower range, intersected with numerous woody ravines, each commanding a full view of the Lake mountains. A waterfall near the head of Rotheydale, called Codley Spout, is said to be three hundred feet high, and the highest in England; while the village of Dent is interesting in another way, as the birthplace of one of the first of English geologists. From the top of Rotheydale a few miles' walk brings you to Kirby Stephen, in a wild and rugged country, the pass from hence to Muker, at the head of Swaledale, has a wide prospect; but more celebrated, and perhaps more striking, is what is called the Buttertubs Pass, which leads from Muker to Hawes in Wensleydale. From this point Ingleborough stands out with great grandeur. Wensleydale is one of the best known of the Yorkshire dales, from its numerous waterfalls; but Swaledale is in itself the finer valley, and there is one little piece of it above Muker which has never received the attention it deserves. The dale here becomes a deep narrow gorge considerably wooded, and in the middle of it the Swale tumbles down a precipice of some thirty feet, making a very picturesque fall. The road avoids this glen, and takes a short cut down a side valley to Muker; but the longer route is much to be preferred by all who have time, and who do not object to rather a scrambling path.

But let us come to the more southerly parts of the range. Sheffield is but twelve or fourteen miles distant from the wildest parts of North Derbyshire, and here there is much to be seen which is generally overlooked. Few of those who go to see the rocks and caverns at Castleton penetrate into the upland valleys which lie to the north. There are not in these any mountain forms so striking as those of Ingleborough and Penyghent, nor is there any great abundance of waterfalls, but the moorlands are yet wilder than those of Yorkshire, and the edges with which they overhang the valleys bolder and rockier. Foremost among these is Fairhead Naze at the head of Ashopdale, a massive promontory that stands out from the range behind, and is seen from the whole lower part of the valley, but is hidden as you approach it, and then reappears with almost startling effect a little above the Snake Inn. The valley of the Ashop is called the Woodlands, a name which must not be taken to imply any great amount of vegetation; it is merely another form of Woldlands. Yet in the lower part of Ashopdale there is no lack of trees; and even in the upper parts, wherever a mountain stream has hollowed out for itself a ravine in its descent from the hills, this is filled with birch and ash and fir. Very curious is it in many of these spots to notice the effect of the wind. The trees grow firmly and strongly as long as they are protected by the walls of the gorge on each side of them; but if ever they thrust their heads above the top of this, they are beaten down by the blasts that blow over the moorland, and made to push out their branches sideways and downwards in curious and intricate involutions. High up among the hills, again, there are great scatterings of rock and cliff here and there, such as Alport Castles, in the valley of the Alport, which joins the Ashop from the north; here there has evidently been at some remote time a slip in the mountain side, and down between the cliffs among the ruinous masses of stone may be seen the bluish-black bilberries and the red berries of the mountain ash. South of Ashopdale, and separated from it by the loftiest and wildest of these ridges, lies Edale, a valley some seven or eight miles long, quite shut in by steep hills; the head of it, near the hamlet of Upper Booth, is specially beautiful. Here two streams meet, each making frequent miniature falls along a narrow glen, and there are some fir-trees singularly fine, considering the height above the sea at which they grow. The loneliness of the spot is remarkable; the inhabitants seem to keep themselves steadily out of sight, either in their houses, or perhaps pursuing other work upon the hills. Kinderscout is the highest of the hills in these parts (1,981 feet above the sea); it touches the heads both of Ashopdale and Edale, but the valley over which it immediately overhangs is that of the Kinder, a stream which, after a picturesque course of a few miles, enters the manufacturing district, and runs purple or dirty red beneath heaps of refuse and the smoky chimneys of mills. The Goyt and the Etherow, two of the border streams of the county, have a similar origin, and, unhappily, a similar fate. Even the Derwent, the largest of the Derbyshire rivers, is not entirely free from these pollutions. It is difficult to say whether Matlock, than which there can originally have been few more striking places in England, has been more ruined by the influx of tourists, and of tourist-directing placards, or by the smoky mills, one of which, just under the High Tor, has made a circle of black and withered trees among the surrounding green.

Let us finish with another county which has not even the ghost of a reputation for pretty scenery—Staffordshire. The ideas which the name will suggest to most people's minds are those of innumerable potteries, huge swarms of mean dwellings, on a naked and treeless land. But the north of Staffordshire, where it joins on to Derbyshire, is far different. Few of those who visit Dovedale cross the border to the valley of the Manifold, which runs parallel to that of the Dove, and not more than a mile or two distant from it. Yet the Manifold is entitled to a very high rank indeed among English rivers; it flows in a tortuous course through massive limestone hills, which now rise into peaks, and now descend on it in precipices; woods and green pastures distinguish it more and more as it descends. In many places the banks are quite pathless, and it needs no small amount of climbing to get along them; then, again, the river itself disappears, and for a mile or two flows in a channel underground, from which it emerges near Ilam. The Manifold has its source near the village of Longnor, from which are seen those curious pointed and rocky hills, called Chrome and Parker, which lie on the left bank of the upper course of the Dove. But these we can do no more than mention, nor can we notice except in passing the valleys of the Hamps and Churnet, which abound in scenes pleasant enough to look upon. Suffice it to say that the whole country of which we have been writing is one over which a man may walk many months, and find no lack of novelty at the end.

THE ITALIAN OPERA.

WITH the arrival of Madlle. Christine Nilsson and Madame Adelina Patti (we place Madlle. Nilsson first because she was first to come) the "coalition" season attained its meridian; and, notwithstanding prognostications from very many quarters to the contrary, the house was crowded night after night. We have spoken of Madlle. Nilsson in Lucia, Martha, La Traviata, and Faust e Margherita; and on this head nothing remains to be added, but that she has repeatedly appeared in the same operas without seemingly tiring the public. So with Madame Patti, in La Sonnambula, Don Pasquale, and Il Barbiere. The solitary addition to this accomplished lady's repertory for a considerable period was Don Giovanni, in which her piquant and admirable impersonation of the peasant girl, Zerlina, is familiar to all opera-goers. Zerlina—sung, as well as played, by Madame Patti to perfection—is Mozart's true heroine, whatever may be thought of the high-tragedy queens, Donna Anna and Donna Elvira, about whom Hoffmann says such extraordinary things, and who at the present time find capable representatives in the stately Madlle. Tietjens and the versatile Madlle. Sinico. A worse Don Giovanni than Signor Graziani, a worse Leporello than Signor Ciampi, or a more lackadaisical Don Ottavio than Signor Naudin, could hardly be named; and this, combined with the fact that the conductor presiding in the orchestra at each occasion was Signor Li Calsi, may account for some of the most uneven performances of Mozart's familiar opera we can call to mind. True, Signor Tagliafico is pleasant and natural as Masetto, and Signor Foli—though not nearly so good as Signor Tagliafico, long the Commendatore at Covent Garden—is more or less acceptable; true, also, Signor Cotogni, who now replaces Signor Graziani as the libertine, is, if far from good, better than his predecessor; and true, Signor Tamberlik, engaged at the fag end of the season (for what reason no one can tell, seeing that Signor Mongini is announced for Jean of Leyden in the Prophète, on Tuesday next), is a marvellous improvement on Signor Naudin, as Don Ottavio—"Il mio tesoro" being sung and the part generally acted by the Roman tenor as by no other within the memory of the actual generation, Signor Mario alone excepted; yet, admitting all this, the chief, if not sole, attraction of Don Giovanni as at present given is the Zerlina of Madame Adelina Patti. What vitality must there be in a work that can firmly stand against such odds!

but old age and "unconquerable death" seem to have no power over Don Giovanni, which comes forth, season after season, fresh as the morning, and invariably welcome, no matter what singers happen to be at disposal. While referring to the departure (somewhat sudden and unexpected) of Signor Graziani, we may at once state that he has been succeeded in the part of Mephistopheles by Signor Bagagiolo, who, though happier in getting such effect as can possibly be obtained out of the music which M. Gounod has written for Goethe's "gentlemanly devil," has not the slightest but Signor Bagagiolo presents us with an eccentrically dressed lay figure, and no more. It would be hard to cite an apter illustration of "vox et præterea nihil" than this artist—if the term "artist" can be applied to one so manifestly in want of the necessary training.

The first novelty of the season was Don Bucefalo, by Signor Cagnoni, a composer who, twenty years ago, promised somewhat, if no great deal, but who, in the course of twenty years, has performed little or nothing worth recognition. Signor Cagnoni offers a sad example of the state of Italian dramatic music in the present day. Those who know no more of him than is revealed in his Don Bucefalo (an early work) may fairly shrug their shoulders; while those who know more of him have, unfortunately, little or nothing to say in his behalf. That such a production as Don Bucefalo should ever have found its way to the Covent Garden stage is a sign of the times to be regarded with dismay. We are advancing in appreciation of every other form of musical art; but our taste in the direction of opera is becoming degraded to the very lowest. The libretto of Don Bucefalo is a mere farce, as poor in manufacture as it is stale in idea. Imagine a composer of renown finding himself in a country village, and engaging a whole posse of its inhabitants, whom he chances to overhear sing, to repair to an adjacent town, for the purpose of taking part in a forthcoming work of his composition! Yet such is the main plot, whatever more or less appropriate incidents may underlie it. There are two important scenes—one in which Don Bucefalo composes his opera, the other in which he rehearses it. The former is the plea for an exhibition of burlesque pianoforte playing, the other for an exhibition of burlesque fiddling. The difficulty is to say which is the more vapid and tiresome. We have already spoken of Signor Bottero as a "buffo" without humour. His lack of the quality most essential to a "buffo" was sufficiently shown by his Don Pasquale and Don Basilio. But in the operas of Donizetti and Rossini, though obtrusive enough, he was happily not the predominating figure. We had, as compensation, to speak of nothing else, the charming acting, the exquisitely refined singing, and the genuine humour of Madame Adelina Patti—as Norina in the one and Rosina in the other; and, then, we had the music of Rossini and Donizetti. But in Don Bucefalo Signor Bottero is the be-all and end-all; and a terrible infliction he was found. Talk of "les bouffes qui ne font pas rire," Signor Bottero is a bouffe more likely to draw tears. Those unable to appreciate the humour of playing wrong notes on the pianoforte could hardly have been diverted with him while in the act of composing, and those unable to appreciate the humour of playing out of tune on the fiddle could hardly have been diverted with him in the act of rehearsing. In either case he was terribly prolix; but in the latter, if we are well informed, he spared his audience at least one half the infliction; for in Italy, at rehearsal, he is reported to play on other instruments besides the violin—and just as indifferently. The precise humour of doing a thing ill which it is a pleasure to hear done well is beyond our understanding. The other claims to consideration put forth by Signor Bottero having been discussed in a recent article, it only remains for us to add that Don Bucefalo was given once, and then laid upon the shelf; that the music of Signor Cagnoni, besides being trivial from beginning to end, contains not a single original phrase; that we pitied Madlle. Sinico, Signor Tagliafico, and other estimable artists, who had to take part in such an affair, and still more Madlle. Tietjens and Signor Mongini, compelled to appear in the first act of Norma, as lever de rideau to an opera itself unworthy to figure in that capacity. It must be owned that the first novelty produced during this exceptional season was hardly such as to encourage our operatic public in placing much reliance upon a coalition management. And of all nights in the year, the one selected for its production was the Saturday of Epsom week! The result, however, in a financial sense, was a fair measure of the judgment that could put up a strange work of questionable merit, and a strange singer of whom nobody except those who devote their almost exclusive attention to operatic affairs had ever heard, on what has long been notoriously counted on as the best night of the season.

In the course of the ensuing fortnight we had, in rapid succession, the Sonnambula, the Barbiere, Don Giovanni, Lucia, Faust e Margherita, Martha, and the Traviata—now Madame Patti, now Madlle. Nilsson; the sole object being apparently to exhibit the talents of a couple of fascinating prime donne, without taking into consideration how often the regular subscribers had seen these prime donne in the self-same parts, and how much they would have preferred seeing them in something fresh, or at any rate less hackneyed. Among frequenters of the Italian Opera the most unfairly treated are assuredly the regular subscribers—after all its main support. An outsider may go once or twice, as he chooses, to hear Madame Patti as Amina, and Madlle. Nilsson as Lucia; but a regular subscriber, unless he gives away, or otherwise disposes of, his box or stall, must perforce, like it or not, hear the same performers in the same operas half a dozen times in less than half as many months.

After this somewhat dreary interregnum came a revival welcome alike to musicians and amateurs—that of Rossini's Gazza Ladra, which had not been heard at Covent Garden since 1863, when Madame, then Madlle., Adelina Patti assumed for the first time the character of the heroine. Though more than half a century has elapsed since this very picturesque work—a model of domestic opera, fit to be placed side by side with the Sonnambula, and far above the Sonnambula in musical treatment—was produced at the Scala (Milan—1817), its freshness remains comparatively unimpaired. It is one of those masterpieces which Rossini, incredible as it may seem, wrote almost currente calamo: and yet, as in other similar instances, it contains some of his very best writing, as well as some of his most flowing and characteristic melody. The day is gone when La Gazza Ladra could be heard with the five chief parts all adequately filled—when Ninetta's lover found a representative in Rubini or Mario, Ninetta's father in Tamburini*, Ninetta's fellow-servant and friend in Brambilla or Alboni, and the wily Podestà in Lablache or Ronconi. So we are compelled to be satisfied with even two out of the five sustained by artists trained alike to the requirements of the music and of the drama. Thus, unequal as has been the performance this year, La Gazza Ladra afforded pleasure, if only because the Ninetta was Madame Patti and the Fernando Mr. Santley. No Ninetta within the memory of the oldest opera-goer can be compared with Madame Patti's. How wonderfully she preserves the natural demeanour of the peasant-girl throughout, how earnest and truthful she is in each successive scene—rising almost to tragedy in the most deeply moving situations, those who have seen her can attest. The overflowing happiness of Ninetta at the expected return of the young soldier to whom she is betrothed—so felicitously conveyed in "Di piacer mi balz' il cor" (fruitful parent of all imaginable cavatinas)—is expressed with such unstrained vivacity, such truthful eloquence, that it infects all hearers with the sentiment that underlies it. But everywhere else in the opera Madame Patti is equal to the occasion. To follow her incident by incident, even had we space at disposal, would be superfluous. Enough that her acting in the scene where the shortsighted magistrate obliges her to read for him the description of a deserter, who is no other than her own father, in doing which Ninetta artfully distorts the official account of the personal characteristics of the accused, is perfect; that the intensity of her grief when, separated from both father and lover, Ninetta is hurried to prison for a deed in which she has had no participation, her assumption of utter helplessness in the scene of the trial, where all goes against the innocent girl, and perhaps, most touching of all, her demeanour while, physically prostrate, Ninetta is carried under guard to the place of execution—the musical feature of which (the solemn and beautiful march by no means forgotten) is the prayer, "Dio possente, mercede, consiglio," never more exquisitely breathed from a singer's lips—one and all belong to the highest order of dramatic art, which still, in Madame Patti, can boast on the Italian lyric stage a thoroughly legitimate representative. In fact, her delineation of the character, from first to last, shows genius, while her execution of the music, though occasionally the "tessitura" becomes a little low for the peculiar nature of her voice, is, as nearly as possible, faultless. Side by side with the Ninetta of Madame Patti may fairly be placed the Fernando of Mr. Santley—who, English though he be, is just now one of the ornaments of the Italian lyric boards. Mr. Santley's histrionic portrayal of the deserter affords another proof of the steady and marked advance he is making in one particular department of his calling: while his delivery of the music, which by some of our contemporaries, in the way of compliment, has been pronounced inferior only to Tamburini's, is really superior to Tamburini's at Tamburini's best—inasmuch as that over-lauded singer, though by no means over-lauded actor, at no epoch of his career could boast the manly force and purity which are distinguishing traits in the vocalization of our great baritone. Mr. Santley, nevertheless, omits the florid air, "Oh colpo impensato"—why it is not easy to explain, seeing what a thorough master he is of the florid style. About the other personages of the drama—Isaac, the Pedlar, excepted, in the hands of Mr. C. Lyall, as neat a bit of character as we remember—the less said the better. The Pippo of Madlle. Grossi is extremely ineffective. Her voice, though its quality is rich, is too heavy for the music, and its want of flexibility makes this all the more apparent; while, as an actress, she is nil. As much as Madame Nantier Didiée, the last respectable Pippo, used to over-act, so much does Madlle Grossi under-act the part. In plain words, she does not act it at all. Quite as unsatisfactory is the Giannetto of Signor Achille Corsi ("the greater Corsi"), one of those new tenors the engagement of whom for duties more or less responsible shows what the public is entitled to expect from a monopoly. Signor Corsi, in former years, would hardly have been accepted, either at the Royal Italian Opera or Her Majesty's Theatre. Mr. Gye and Mr. Mapleson would alike have felt chary in presenting him conspicuously to their subscribers; but under the actual circumstances Signor Corsi has been put forward in characters no less trying and significant than Faust. Mr. George Perren, now singing tenor at the operatic representations in the little theatre of the Crystal Palace, is the nearest English parallel to Signor Corsi we can think of. Yet, admitting Mr. Perren's ability, what an outcry would be raised if he were announced as a "tenore assoluto del primo cartello" at our only Italian Opera! Being an Englishman, however, there is, happily, small chance of Mr. Perren's having to brave the ordeal. Even those who had witnessed the successive failures of Signor Bottero as Don Pasquale, Don Basilio, and (alas!) Don Bucefalo, persisted in foretelling great things of his Podestà. In what manner their preconceived opinions were justified need scarcely be related. Signor Bottero's Podestà is, in a dramatic sense, on a level with his earlier assumptions—as remarkable for the absence of that quality of humour the presence of which alone can make the character endurable; while his singing is noticeable for that union of loudness with imperfect intonation which entirely robs the music of its charm. Altogether this performance of La Gazza Ladra—the excellence of Mr. Santley's Fernando and the perfection of Madame Patti's Ninetta allowed for—was the least satisfactory ever heard at Covent Garden. Even the brilliant and picturesque overture, which, under Sir Michael Costa's bâton, used to raise enthusiasm, was played on the first night with so unwonted a lack of spirit and precision that it failed to impress the audience, and missed its customary "encore." These to some may appear comparatively small matters; but all who have the interests of the public, rather than the interests of speculators, at heart, should carefully take note of them. In discussing its proceedings, we should carefully bear in mind that, for a very long period, the Royal Italian Opera claimed to be, and with good reason, the foremost lyric establishment in Europe.

The production of Hamlet, which almost immediately succeeded that of La Gazza Ladra, the revival of Dinorah, and such general observations as we have to make on the results of this year's experiment, must form the subjects of a fourth and concluding article. Two more weeks yet remain to terminate the season, and in the course of these two weeks, if promises count on one hand and rumour may be credited on the other, subscribers are to expect La Figlia del Reggimento (already once put off) for Madame Patti, Le Prophète for Madlle. Tietjens and Signor Mongini, L'Étoile du Nord for Madame Patti, and Otello for Madlle. Nilsson and Signor Tamberlik. Even supposing all these works forthcoming, the season—as those who have followed our brief record, chapter by chapter, must acknowledge—can hardly be cited as one best worthy commemoration in the history of the Covent Garden Opera.

REVIEWS.

CURTIUS'S HISTORY OF GREECE.—VOL. II.*

SINCE we reviewed the first volume of Curtius's History † we have seen signs that the usual phenomenon is taking place. The English translation of the last German book is taking its place at Oxford as the book on its own subject. This is what happens as a matter of course. That so it should happen has nothing whatever to do with the goodness or badness of the book itself. Good or bad, it is enough that it is the last German book for the present Oxford generation to take to it. Purely and simply as the last German book, it is of necessity the right thing, and all that went before it are of necessity old fogies. We should like to know how many of the young philosophers who know everything, most likely the Insoluble itself, recognised in the wisest speaker in the late debate in the House of Lords the author of what, in the days of their fathers, was looked on as the History of Greece. The principle of adopting the last German book as the book sometimes leads to odd consequences. A great historical Professor was asked not long ago by a young genius of the bumptious order whether he had read the latest German authorities on his own subject; if not, his knowledge must be very shallow. The Professor had not the pluck to ask back again whether his monitor had read the earliest English authorities; he went humbly and got the book without which his knowledge was necessarily shallow. It proved to be a humble compilation, a useful summary of things which were doubtless new to the genius, but which had been familiar to the Professor while the genius was still in his perambulator. This is a specimen of the haphazard way in which a book gets a position simply because it is the last German book. When it is a book like that of Curtius which chance throws to the top of the tree, the chance is a lucky one, but it is chance all the same. For the generation which is accepting Curtius has also accepted Mommsen. Curtius writes clear and beautiful German; Mommsen writes a jargon like an English law-book of the seventeenth century. Curtius writes with modest good sense; Mommsen writes with dictatorial insolence. Curtius shows a distinct sense of the difference between right and wrong; Mommsen everywhere tramples such old-world distinctions underfoot. Still Mommsen and Curtius are each alike the latest German authority on his own subject; Mommsen and Curtius then are to be equally accepted by all who would not lag behind the age, but are eager to walk by the newest lights. If an Englishman were to try to show that all Mommsen's unproved assertions are not every one of them Gospel, he would of course be pooh-poohed for not knowing his place. But we can afford to rest and be aisy. Some new German will some day show that Mommsen is all wrong, and then he, as the latest German authority, will be believed in his turn.

* The History of Greece. By Professor Dr. Ernst Curtius. Translated by Adolphus William Ward, M.A. Vol. II. London: Richard Bentley. 1869.

† See Saturday Review, September 19, October 3, 1868.

Such a way as this of choosing standard books is not exactly what we can approve of; but we are not disposed to repine when a History like that of Curtius is brought into notice even by so accidental a process. We shall certainly repine if Curtius wholly displaces our own great countrymen, because we see no advantage in such a change. We cannot say that Curtius is a better book than Thirlwall or Grote. We would rather say that of three good books each has its special merits and its special use, that each in some points rises above, and in some points falls below, two thoroughly worthy competitors. But if it is in the fates that English books should always give way to German books, it is certainly better that Thirlwall and Grote should give way to a book like Curtius than that they should give way to something of an inferior kind. If so it be, we shall owe our thanks both to the merits of Curtius himself and to the discretion of his translator. But we shall owe no thanks at all to those who would just as eagerly have seized on a very inferior book, if it had only been written in the magical tongue.

Of Mr. Ward's powers as an expounder of history in his own person we have formerly spoken (May 15, 1869), and we put on record our hope that he may soon have, in some shape or other, the opportunity of displaying those powers on some wider field than he has yet had. We can therefore better afford to speak our minds freely as to his way of translating his author. In some points Mr. Ward is distinctly improved; he has clearly either given attention to some of the hints which we gave in our former review, or else his own wit, during the process of revision, has led him to the same conclusions to which we came. The two or three cases where we thought that he had really misunderstood his author's meaning he has corrected in a table of errata, and he has left off one or two oddities of spelling and expression. One or two, however, are still retained. It has the very drollest sound when Mr. Ward talks about a thing being done "on Ægina," "on Eubœa." The German is certainly auf, but the idiom is not English. We can talk of living or doing a thing on an island, if the island is very small, and if it is looked on simply in its geographical, or rather geological, aspect, as a mere point in the sea. We may say that "there is a lighthouse on the Flat-Holm," or that "seals are common on Ramsey," but we should hardly say that this or that man lived, or that this or that event happened, "on Anglesey" or "on Jersey." And on the whole we are driven to say that Mr. Ward's way of translating Curtius fully bears out the remarks which we made in our former notice. We still think that one to whom the mastery of the foreign language is a matter of some slight effort will translate better out of that language than one to whom the foreign language is, to say the least, as familiar as the English. That the fact of the work being a translation really has something to do with the peculiarities of Mr. Ward's style is shown by the different ways in which he writes in his translation and in the original lectures which we lately reviewed. With the style of those lectures we had little serious fault to find, but we are sorry to say that Mr. Ward's style in his translation of Curtius has several times reminded us of Mr Reeve's style in his famous translation of De Tocqueville. There is, to be sure, the all-important difference that Mr. Ward thoroughly understands Curtius's subject, while Mr. Reeve did not at all understand De Tocqueville's subject. Mr. Ward's readers may therefore feel sure that they are getting at the general meaning of the original work, while Mr. Reeve's readers cannot safely rest for a moment under any such comfortable assurance. And perhaps Mr. Reeve's memorable renderings of "ceci fait" by "when these preliminaries are terminated," and of "le" by "the very same individual," will for ever remain unapproached and unapproachable. Still it must be allowed that Mr. Ward treads very closely on Mr. Reeve's heels when such a plain piece of Dutch as "der Winter kam," which hardly needs any translation at all, is changed into "the winter supervened." It is really strange that Mr. Ward, whose thoughts evidently fall at least as easily into German as into English, should seem to take a pleasure in making his English wander away as far as may be from the common source of the two languages. Now whenever we can, without doing violence to our own idiom, keep the words as well as the thoughts of a writer in a kindred tongue, we surely ought to do so. But Mr. Ward, while constantly falling into idioms which are utterly un-English, seems never to try at all to reproduce the clear and pure style of Curtius's German. We open the book at a shot at vol. ii. p. 37 of our copy of the German—Mr. Ward we should say clearly uses another edition which has been a good deal altered in many places—and we read how Thorax the son of Alenas was the first of all the Greeks to become of his own free will the man of the Persian King; he was "der Erste von allen Hellenen, welcher dem Xerxes freiwillige Huldigung darbrachte; er that es," Curtius goes on, "unberufen, im Namen des thessalischen Volks." This last clause in Mr. Ward's hands reads like a piece of a newspaper:—"Thorax . . . was the first among all the Hellenes to offer voluntary homage to Xerxes, and he offered it in the name of the Thessalian people, though wholly unauthorized by the latter." We do not in the least undervalue the difficulty of translating from really good German into really good English, especially when the translator has to deal with so many technical terms of political science. In treating of Greek matters, a German writer has an especial advantage over an Englishman, because the past history of his own country has supplied him with a political vocabulary second only in fulness and clearness to that of Greece itself. Thus, for instance, it is very hard to express in English, except in some long roundabout way, such a compact German expression as "vorörtliche Stellung." Curtius says, for instance (i. 521), "Die Naxier erlangten durch die Grosse und die Hülfsquellen ihres Landes eine gewisse vorörtliche Stellung." So again in vol. ii. p. 8, "Athen . . . erkannte ohne Rückhalt die vorörtliche Stellung Spartas an." The former passage Mr. Ward renders thus:—"The Naxians . . . attained to a position resembling to a certain extent that of a federal capital." Now this is certainly not the right translation of "vorortliche Stellung," and yet it is not easy to suggest any better translation. The word Vorort at once conveys its own meaning to any one who understands Swiss politics, but it cannot be translated by any one English word, because there never was anything answering to it in English history. A federal capital need not be a Vorort, and we should say that a Vorort need not be a federal capital. Zurich, under the old system, was the Vorort of Switzerland. Zürich, Bern, and Luzern, from 1815 to 1848, held, each once in three years, a "vorörtliche Stellung." The Vorort had a certain precedence over the other cantons, and its local government might, in certain cases, act in the name of the whole confederation. So, to rise from smaller to greater States, we might say that Prussia has an emphatically "vorörtliche Stellung" in Northern Germany. But, on the other hand, Bern and Washington are undoubtedly federal capitals in Switzerland and America, seeing they are the places where the Federal Governments of the two countries are carried on. But Bern has not now any claim to a "vorörtliche Stellung" and still less has Washington. Washington, indeed, governed by a Congress to neither House of which did it send a single member, was till quite lately so far from being a Vorort that, federal capital as it undoubtedly was, it rather belonged to the class of Unterthanigen. Curtius seizes with perfect propriety this technical term of his own language, and applies it to an analogous state of things in Greece. Naxos and Sparta respectively, at the two points of time referred to, might each fairly be called a Vorort, but neither of them could, with any accuracy, be called a federal capital in the sense in which that title belongs to Ægium, Washington, and Bern. It is the more pity that in the second of the two places quoted, Mr. Ward, just after using the word "federal" to express "vorortliche," is directly after driven to translate "Bundeshulfe" by "federal aid," words which certainly do not express the real state of things between Sparta and Athens. Here, however, we are more inclined to quarrel with Curtius than with his translator, as it is certainly a fault throughout his History that he uses expressions which represent the state of things in Greece as a whole as coming much more nearly to the state of a real confederation than it ever did.

These things show the difficulty of Mr. Ward's task, and we can also sympathize with him when he has to put into English that most puzzling word "Persönlichkeit." We should often be in great straits to know how to express it, but we are at least sure that it does not do to translate it, as Mr. Ward constantly does, by "personality." "Cleomenes' personality made it easy," &c.; "he confided in the impression his personality and dignity would create." We are sure that this would not convey the real meaning to any English reader, though we should certainly find it hard to translate it better without a great waste of words. But in some cases we cannot let Mr. Ward off on the score of real difficulty of translating. Take such a sentence as this, "Fur seinen Ehrgeiz musste ein Krieg gegen die Perser unter Heerfuhrung eines spartanischen Konigs die glanzendste Aussicht sein." Mr. Ward turns this into, "For his ambition a war against the Persians, in which the Greek forces were commanded by a Spartan king, naturally opened up the most brilliant prospect." Here we begin with an order of the words which is purely German, and we end with the vulgarism of "opening up," which has nothing whatever to answer to it in the original. Presently Curtius says (vol. ii. p. 9), "Kleomenes hatte keine Macht, um durchzugreifen." This Mr. Ward translates, "Cleomenes was momentarily without the power necessary for taking summary action." Elsewhere (i. 395) Curtius calls the position of Delphi "unscheinbar und versteckt." Mr. Ward translates this "insignificant and secluded." But surely "insignificant" does not here express the sense of "unscheinbar." In page 128 of Mr. Ward's volume "massive walls" does not express "Quadermauern," which surely means walls of square stones, like Æthelstan's wall at Exeter. In page 155, "Landermasse" becomes "the complex of countries." Here the German gives us a very clear idea, and the English, if we may call it so, gives us no idea at all. What on earth is a "complex of countries"? In page 172, certain people misbehaved themselves "in trunkenem Uebermuthe," which Mr. Ward renders "in the intoxication of their arrogance," though surely the word "trunken" is here no metaphor, and, if it were, we have the example of Sir James Mackintosh's speech on behalf of Peltier for speaking of a tyrant acting "in the drunkenness of his insolence." We would refer especially to the four pages from 319 to 322 of Mr. Ward's volume as giving instances in almost every line in which good, clear, simple German is changed into a dialect on which we really cannot bestow the name of English. When "die Behaglichkeit hauslicher Einrichtung" becomes "the comforts of domesticity" we have perhaps reached the climax.

We are sorry to have to point out faults like this in any work of Mr. Ward's. They do not at all affect his undoubted position as a scholar and an historian, but they do very seriously affect his position as a translator of German books into English. In another article we hope to speak of the matter of that part of Curtius's work which is here given us by Mr. Ward.

CRABB ROBINSON.*

IN this Diary we have a nearly complete Life of its author, presented in a far more agreeable shape than a regular and formal narrative might possibly have worn. It may have been true that in the case of the Temple of the Sun materiam superabat opus, but such superiority of the work to the materials rarely applies to biographies. What would a Life of Gray or of Cowper be if their letters were not included in it? How intolerably dull would be a merely political account of Cicero or Horace Walpole! Coleridge, absolutely insufferable in the hands of the Cottles and Gilmans, rescued himself from the abysm of dulness by his own Biographia Literaria; and we might have possessed a pleasant fireside record of the witty and genial Abraham Cowley had it not been for the atrocious pedantry of Dr. Sprat, who forsooth thought it unbeseeming so great a man to appear in his slippers and dressing-gown. Well might Samuel Johnson growl at the Doctor's impertinent delicacy.

The little which is not recorded by himself in his Journals, Reminiscences and Note-books of Travels, that required to be told of Henry Crabb Robinson, is supplied in the editor's preface, and in the admirable appendix of Mr. De Morgan; and so pervading is the interest of the Journal, that it scarcely requires a commendation to readers. Yet, numerous as were the late Crabb Robinson's friends, and large and various as was the area of his acquaintances and experiences, his name, unconnected as it is with any great literary work, or with any conspicuous public career, will fall on the ears of many without conveying more than a vague reminiscence of it, if indeed it convey any impression at all. Again, a rumour of his conversational gifts, of his active benevolence, of his intimacy with the leaders in English and foreign literature, of his travels, of his brief but successful career at the Bar, of his connexion with the Times at a momentous period of the present century, may be partly known to many who never saw him, or who saw him only as a stranger; and to all such persons his Journal will require some introduction. A king is said once on a time to have offered a reward for the discovery of a new pleasure. We promise the pleasure, and do not require the reward, if the few remarks we can afford to make on them shall induce any of our readers to open the three attractive volumes now before us.

An index is usually consulted after the book to which it is affixed has been at least once read, but in this instance we recommend any person to whom the journalist was either unknown or known by name only, to consult the index before he begins reading the Diary. The first impression, unless we are greatly mistaken, will be that of surprise at the number of eminent names set down in the register of contents. "What manner of man was this," we fancy our supposed stranger exclaiming, "whose reminiscences comprise such names as those of Goethe, Schiller, Herder, Wieland, Arndt, and Tieck—as those of Madame de Staël, La Fayette, Abbé Grégoire, and Benjamin Constant—as those of Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Lamb, Rogers, Landor, Hazlitt, Arnold, Talfourd, Robertson of Brighton, Mrs. Barbauld, Gilbert Wakefield, Clarkson, &c., not to speak of many minor stars? Who can this have been, not one of whose works we have ever seen in a catalogue or received from Mudie's, who apparently sat among the doctors of Parnassus, and yet has not a sprig of laurel for his own brow? An almost ubiquitous man apparently, since, according to the index, he is at one time in Germany, at another in Sweden, then in Italy, Sicily, Spain, and perambulating so much of the Queen's dominions as lies within the four seas!"

The Diary, Reminiscences, and the very interesting Letters inserted in them, answer these and a host of other similar queries. But the most meagre epitome of them would far exceed the space we can allot, and would be as unsatisfactory as it must be brief. The great names we have already recited will attract attention, and need neither usher nor proclamation; our notice will, therefore, be confined to the diarist himself—a sufficiently remarkable man in all respects to deserve, for the immediate purpose, a central place in the circle of illustrious men among whom he moved, a respected and beloved friend, during more than sixty years of an active, useful, unblemished, and happy life.

The first paragraph of the Reminiscences is highly characteristic of the writer:—

> It is one of the evidences, or shall I say consequences, of a happy frame of mind that I am capable of deriving pleasure from things the absence or even the loss of which does not give me pain. I should have rejoiced had I been well born, could I have reckoned historical characters among my ancestors, but it has never occasioned me any serious uneasiness that my family are of as insignificant a class as can be imagined. Among the Robinsons I cannot find a single individual who appears to have acquired any distinction, and among the Crabbs only a remote probability of an affinity to a single individual of the name who has ever been heard of—and that is the poet.

It requires some knowledge, if not some recollection, of the time in which Crabb Robinson's earlier years were passed to feel in their full force the consequences of being born and bred in a Dissenting family. Theological antipathies were then vigorous. Not to be a Churchman meant exclusion from the Universities, from public offices, from corporation dignities, from nearly every local position that enabled its holder to be useful in his generation, or respected by it. And these disabilities and this exclusiveness were brought into strong relief by the panic that speedily attended on the French Revolution. The extravagances, and at length the crimes, that followed upon this violent outburst of a people's wrath, appeared to justify all the narrowness with which England fenced her political and religious institutions. The trumpet of Edmund Burke had aroused the fears and prejudices of the country clergy and the country gentlemen. Robert Hall thought it his duty to warn his friends against receiving Crabb Robinson, then at the mature age of twenty-two, into their houses, solely because he was a Godwinist; and two remarkable letters—one from Robinson, and another from Hall—are inserted in this Diary. But the great Baptist divine was an honest and high-minded adversary, and ere long took by the hand the young reformer whom he had denounced. The burning of Priestley's house in 1791, by a Church and King mob at Birmingham, showed how effectual had been the pamphlets and speeches of Tory agitators, and the force or virulence of orthodox pulpits. Robinson's own views are represented in the following words:—

> I formed [1790–1795] an acquaintance with a number of French emigrants on their escape from France during the horrors of the Revolution, and my compassion for them modified my Jacobinical feelings. I was, however, a Jacobin notwithstanding, and felt great interest in one Mr. Patmore, who was indicted for selling some of Paine's works, and ultimately escaped through a defect in the indictment. But my journal records my shock at the death of the King of France. My French attachment expired with the Brissotine party, though in my occasional pious moods I used to pray for the French.

All Gallican propensities were indeed extirpated by Robinson's five years' residence in Germany, and by subsequent visits to that country. There, whether as an honoured sojourner, or as Special Correspondent to the Times, he looked in the face the miseries of war, and the grinding oppression of Napoleon and his marshals. Except words spoken in his hearing against Goethe or Wordsworth, nothing disturbed his ordinary equanimity more than any attempt to idolize the first of the Bonapartes. He saw, long before most men perceived it, the hollowness of the imperial image that some were delighting to honour, and he found in pillaged cities, wasted lands, and conscriptions poor compensations for the solitary gain and glory of Paris.

In the year 1800, when the writer was twenty-five years old, the following entry occurs among his "Reminiscences":—

> I am now come to an incident which had a great influence on my tastes and feelings, and, therefore, I have no doubt, on my character. In the course of this year I went to Germany, where I remained more than five years, and pursued something like study, and where I was brought into contact with some of the most distinguished men of the age.

Crabb Robinson was then, in his own estimation, "passing rich" on a poor hundred a year, and on this, with the strict economy he always exercised on himself, open-handed as he ever was to others, he could manage to live with more comfort than it was possible to obtain with such an income in England at a time when corn was at famine prices. His first residence in Germany was the turning epoch in his life, as much as, a few years earlier, a clerk's desk in a counting-house at Hamburg had been to William Taylor of Norwich, who had this, although he had little else, in common with Crabb Robinson, that like him he was one of the earliest and most efficient expounders of German literature to Englishmen. Taylor, indeed, returned from Hamburg "Germanis Germanior"; whereas Robinson, drinking as deeply of the new Pierian springs of poetry and philosophy, did not cease to be soundly English in his thoughts and feelings.

A brief glance at English literature in the year 1800 may enable us to appreciate better the causes of the deep hold that the literature of Germany took upon a student of twenty-five—a student, be it remembered, who approached it with lively curiosity and without serious preoccupation of his intellectual tastes. "I recollect," he writes in his "Reminiscences," 1786, "the coming out of John Gilpin, and that 'diverting history' was published with the first edition of The Task. One year earlier than The Task appeared Crabbe's first published poem The Library, and one year later than The Task Burns issued his first volume from an obscure press at Kilmarnock." Again, in 1800, Crabb Robinson was not familiarly acquainted with Shakspeare, nor does he appear to have known much of Milton, Spenser, or Chaucer at the same period. As regards Shakspeare he writes even so late as 1851:—"[at Dresden] Schlegel's Shakspeare's Twelfth Night, called Was Ihr Wolt, was played and, greatly to our satisfaction. The only mortification was, that I had such a faint recollection of Shakspeare." And in far later years he was reading some of Shakspeare's Plays for the first time. The Lyrical Ballads, then accompanied by The Ancient Mariner and two or three more of Coleridge's poems, appear to have been almost the only English verse that at that date had deeply affected Crabb Robinson's imagination, though he seems to have read Akenside and to have admired Cowper in parts. Here then was a fairly unoccupied area for admitting the most youthful and vigorous literature of the last century—a literature also nearly connected with the revolutionary spirit of those days, in which Crabb Robinson earnestly sympathized for a time. The ground was not only clear, but also well suited to the new seed. It was not, however, the imaginative force, so much as the sententious wisdom of his verse, which attracted Robinson to Goethe. In all his literary judgments his first demand was the wise, the second the beautiful. Hence his early and his constant preference for Goethe among German, and for Wordsworth among English, poets of the time. The road to his imagination was through the understanding. During his stay at Jena, in 1829, he thus defines the relation of Goethe to Schiller:—

* Diary, Reminiscences, and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson, Barrister-at-Law, F.S.A. Selected and Edited by Thomas Sadler, Ph.D. 3 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1869.

Among the books I read with most interest was the Correspondence of Goethe and Schiller. This collection is chiefly interesting from the contrast between the two. A delightful effect is produced by the affectionate interest of Schiller towards Goethe, and infinitely below Goethe as Schiller must be deemed in intellect and poetical power, yet as a man he engrosses our affection. Goethe seems too great to be an object of love, even to one so great as Schiller. Their poetical creed, if called in question, might be thought the same, but their practice was directly opposed. Schiller was raised by Goethe, and Goethe was sustained by Schiller; without Schiller, Goethe might have mournfully quoted Pope's couplet—

> "Condemn'd in business, as in life, to trudge, > Without a second, and without a judge."

Schiller was not, indeed, a perfect judge, for that implies a superior—at least one who can overlook; but his was an inspiring mind. Goethe was able to read himself in Schiller, and understood himself from the reflection.

Goethe correctly described Crabb Robinson as a sort of missionary on behalf of English poetry. We find him within three years after their appearance reading the Lyrical Ballads to his German friends; and in his correspondence with Zelter, Goethe writes of Robinson in the following words:—

There was an Englishman with us, who had studied at Jena at the beginning of the century, and who had since that time pursued German literature in a way of which no one could form an idea. He was so truly initiated into the grounds of merit in our situation, that if I had wished to do so, and as we are accustomed to do towards foreigners, there was no casting a mist before his eyes. From his conversation it resulted that, for twenty years and more, highly cultivated Englishmen have been coming to Germany and acquiring correct information concerning the personal, æsthetical, and moral relations of those who may be called our forefathers.

In his double capacity as "a kind of missionary," Crabb Robinson read to Goethe Byron's Heaven and Earth and Milton's Samson Agonistes, and the poet appears to us to have formed a more just estimate of Byron than the reader was accustomed to pronounce. But there are reservations even among friends. "He (Goethe) was not aware that I had not the courage to name the poet to whom I was and am most attached—Wordsworth; for I know that there were too many dissonances of character between them."

"The dogmatism of theology has disgusted Lamb, and it is that alone which he opposes. He has the organ of theosophy, and is by nature pious." In this instance, as in many others that might be cited from his Diary, Crabb Robinson, writing of another, is unconsciously the chronicler of himself. Loyal to the religious community in which he was born and bred, he did not, as the manner of many is, deny that other denominations held their portion of the truth, and conferred real benefits on their members. He could not indeed regard Calvinism as Christianity, and he avowed a dread of the pretensions and the power of Rome. But even these—we can hardly call them unwholesome—antipathies, for Calvinism is incompatible with justice, and Rome with freedom, were accompanied in him by a large charity, and he heartily responded to the opinion of Coleridge, delivered in his wiser hours, that men were generally better than their creeds. At one time of his life he admits of some attraction to the Society of Friends, but in this case, as in another mentioned by him, a single attendance at a Quakers' meeting dissolved the illusion. The seeds of religion were deeply embedded in his nature. Formalists of any sect might question his piety, but it was not the less an active portion of his being. Had not the term been so frequently abused by the so-called religious world and by writers of tracts, we should have no scruple in describing him as "an anxious inquirer." He read or he listened to with a longing and a loving heart the writings and the sermons of Taylor and Barrow, of Irving and Arnold, of Sortaine, and Robertson of Brighton. We cannot discover, versed in theology as he was, that he was sealed to any system. He applauded the speculations and inquiries of Paulus in his youth, of Schleiermacher and Strauss in his maturer years, but he called himself by none of their names. On many questions he differed widely from his most honoured friends. He deplored the increasing intolerance of Coleridge; he could not follow Southey in his recantations; he silently disagreed from even Wordsworth, when the poet, although he seems to have been a rare attendant at church—owing, as he said himself, to the "foolishness of preachers"—grew more and more enamoured of the doctrines and discipline of the Anglican establishment. Like another good, and perhaps great man also, Robinson in sapientiâ retinuit modum. His letter to Mr. Benecke, too long for extraction, too good for abbreviation, contains an exposition of his religious views. It is to be found in the third volume of his Diary (pp. 38-41). But we cannot pass over the two following remarkable and characteristic entries in the Diary:—

1836.—January 3rd.—At church.—Dr. Arnold preached an impressive discourse, which excited feelings in me too serious to be more than adverted to here. The subject was a reconciling of the seeming contradictions of passages implying that God will listen, and will not listen to the prayers addressed to him. But he could not unravel the knot which no divine has ever unravelled, that without grace no one can pray, and yet grace is to be imparted to those only who duly ask for it. That is, grace is granted only to those who have it already. How I should prize the Œdipus that would solve this riddle.

I am not anxious to make converts to dogmas, but I am very anxious that serious men of other isms should be willing to receive us as members of the one Catholic Church; and I think that among the Churchmen of the Whately school this may not be hard to obtain.

The religious enthusiasts will make sacrifices, which the religious thinkers will not. It does not follow that the thinkers are not sincere in their professions; but it is, I suppose, the same turn of mind which makes them think, and produces a coolness of character. This is a sad experience; but it does not affect one's convictions.

Nothing in his life more conspicuously displayed the perfect charity of Crabb Robinson's nature than the company to be met with at his breakfast and dinner-table. There were assembled men holding and professing the most heterogeneous and irreconcilable opinions in religion, in politics, in philosophy, and in literature; men who, without this common centre of mutual respect and conciliation, might have regarded one another with distrust and perhaps dislike to their dying days. His table achieved what Evangelical Unions have hitherto failed, and to all appearance will continue to fail, in effecting. The host sat at the receipt of that most excellent gift—charity. Of Sir Joshua Reynolds's dinners it was once remarked, after an unusually stormy session, that all the world outside must have been at peace, such was the dissension within one ordinarily sized chamber for a few hours:—

It is impossible [writes Mr. De Morgan] to describe the charm of these social meetings. There was nothing like general society at his table; the guests were a cluster of persons whose minds had affinities with his own. At the house of H. C. R., each man felt the assurance that every guest would be—in the opinion of a discerning and experienced host, who cultivated acquaintance only according to liking—a man whose society would be personally agreeable to that host. Hence what may be called a prejudice in favour of the lot, which is a great step towards easy association. And so it happened that these meetings were pleasant and social, ab ovo usque ad mala; free of that annoyance which, though well accustomed to it, we could never name by an English word, but characterised as tedium, gêne, or ennui, until some master of language invented the name bore, which takes in all the others in agreements and differences both. As to H. C. R. himself at the head of his table, he managed to secure attention to his guests without the guests themselves feeling that they were on his mind. He made his meal and carried on his conversation, while, somehow or other—the most satisfactory way in which many things can happen—his guests were perfectly well served, as he knew and saw. And so these parties were too pleasant in all details to allow any remembrance of one part by its contrast with another.

We cannot more appropriately close our brief and imperfect notice of one whom to know was to revere and love, and from whom notice was distinction, than by again borrowing from the appendix:—

The elements of his power of conversation have been enumerated, but all put together will not explain the charm of his society. For this we must refer to other points of character which, unassisted, are compatible with dulness and taciturnity. A wide range of sympathies, and sympathies which were instantaneously awake when occasion arose, formed a great part of the whole. This easily excited interest led to that feeling of communion which draws out others.

Nothing can better illustrate this than reference to the old meaning of conversation. Up to the middle of the last century, or near it, the word never meant colloquy alone; it was a perfect synonym for companionship. So it was with Crabb Robinson; his conversation was companionship, and his companionship was conversation.

The editor of this Diary, Dr. Thomas Sadler, has performed a far from easy task with a delicacy, industry, and discretion that cannot be too highly applauded. In his preface he gives an account of the materials consigned to him, and he has proved himself in all respects worthy of the great trust imposed in him—the preparing for public gaze the private records of an eminently social, wise, and blameless life.

LOST AMID THE FOGS.*

It is a very proud distinction to be a British soldier. Any man of patriotic feelings may take a pardonable pride in so honourable a position; and it is to be hoped that all our soldiers do so, for it must be admitted that at times they have little other consolation. They certainly have to keep up their spirits in some of the dullest spots on the habitable globe which the researches of geographers have hitherto discovered. Such at least appear to have been the reflections of Colonel M'Crea when, at the close of 1861, just as he had comfortably settled himself in a new house, he was ordered to betake himself to Newfoundland in consequence of the Trent affair. As the order came on a Wednesday night, and he was to start on the ensuing Saturday, he had little time for geographical researches. A lady who had been there as the wife of an officer gave him the most exhaustive account of the charms of the island. There were no amusements, she said, except the arrival of the post once in a month or six weeks; no roads, not much food, but "plenty of salt fish and pork and snow and wild ducks and Irish Papists," besides such an abundance of gales that they often had to walk out tied two and two together. Colonel M'Crea declares in his preface that he found the country very pleasant, in spite of this discouraging report, and that he never spent three happier years abroad than those which he passed in Newfoundland. We must admit that the spirit in which the book is written fully confirms this report; Colonel M'Crea obviously enjoyed himself very heartily, and does what he can to make us share his enjoyment. Yet, after reading it, the fact chiefly impressed upon us is that his lady informant gave a singularly accurate summary of the charms of the country. Fish, snow, fogs, and Irish Papists are the staple of the book; and without saying that all these things are bad, or indeed that some of them may not be very good in their way, we confess that they do not to our mind go far towards constituting an earthly paradise.

Colonel M'Crea indeed admits that his first introduction to the country was rather depressing. He was landed in mid-winter at Halifax, and accidentally missing the steamboat which was to carry him thence to Sydney, Cape Breton, had to make the journey overland. The principal incidents in his trip were that at one point the sleigh in which he was travelling was tipped over a precipice, and only saved from instant annihilation by a lucky tree-trunk in its way; that one of his fellow-passengers drank himself into a series of epileptic fits, and took the opportunity of going into one of extreme violence just as they were in danger of being lost by night in a snowdrift, with a thermometer many degrees below zero, and no assistance at hand; and that he had to cross the river into Cape Breton through floating masses of ice, which came very near crushing him and his fellow-passengers together. When he at length reached St. John's, he found miserably uncomfortable quarters, and something like an arctic winter. These and other miseries attending his arrival are described with much spirit, and we imagined, in reading them, that they were intended by way of an artistic contrast to set off the substantial charms of the island. We are indeed still inclined to believe that this was Colonel M'Crea's purpose in writing his opening chapters, but it is rather difficult for the uninitiated to discover precisely what those charms are. We confess that the main action of the drama seems to us rather to harmonize with the prologue than to be profoundly contrasted with it.

It is true that it is not always winter in Newfoundland; there is a season which corresponds more or less roughly to summer; or, to speak more accurately, there is a warmish period in autumn, though of the spring and summer proper the less said the better. Colonel M'Crea gives us an account of one season during his sojourn. The early promise of peas, beans, and other vegetables was nipped by a short frost in the beginning of May. Things were beginning to get round a little, when one morning it was observed that the entrance to the harbour was closed by a huge white iceberg. The harbour, he tells us, was full of ice on July 3 Matters, however, improved once more, and Colonel M'Crea was beginning to hope for some returns from his garden, when on September 2 another frost set in and the garden looked "as if the breath of a furnace had passed over it, and blasted the beauty of earth for ever." One unlucky result of the peculiarity of the seasons is that the lobsters come in first, then the salmon, then the salad, and last of all the cucumbers, but that neither love nor money can persuade these delicacies to come together Colonel M'Crea, however, consoles himself for the hardships of the climate by the reflection that this is a providential arrangement for the good of the fishermen. We do not, to say the truth, quite follow his line of argument, but he seems to think that it would have been impossible to get cold water enough for the fish without spoiling the climate of Newfoundland for the purposes of gardeners

We cannot pursue this difficult inquiry; but it must be admitted that even fish are a questionable benefit to the Newfoundlanders. Colonel M'Crea points out very forcibly the demoralizing nature of the trade It is of course very much in the nature of a lottery, with a few great prizes and a very large number of blanks. The Newfoundland merchants advance stores of various kinds to the fishermen at enormous prices; if there is a bad fish harvest, the men cannot pay; it there is a good one, they are in the habit of surreptitiously parting with the fish to Yankee traders and other persons of diabolical acuteness. The consequence of this unbusinesslike way of carrying on the one great trade of the place is that most people are in debt, that the merchants are constantly suffering from ruinous bankruptcies, and the fishermen being reduced to pauperism. During Colonel M'Crea's stay the fishing was uniformly bad, and a great deal of misery prevailed in consequence. Colonel M'Crea, with his happy turn for seeing the best side of things, points out that this is a blessing in disguise, principally because the merchants will be taught to be more economical in their ways, and the fishermen encouraged to rely less upon the sea and more upon agriculture. Everything, of course, may be shown to be for the best in this best of all possible worlds; but we must say that this particular blessing seems to be very much disguised indeed.

The fishery is, of course, the main interest of Newfoundland; but the inhabitants have some of the pleasures characteristic of the British colonist all over the world. They have got their mimic Houses of Parliament, and have debates of singular vigour. It is true, as Colonel M'Crea remarks, that a population of about a hundred thousand people, three-quarters of whom are ignorant fishermen, can hardly be said to afford a very favourable field for the working of a constitutional Government. A scene, however, which he witnessed illustrates the spirit with which their legislators throw themselves into the task. A proposal had been made by Government that a reward should no longer be paid for wolf-skins, and this on the very sensible ground that the skins were supposed to be generally imported instead of being taken in the colony. The debate began about four in the afternoon, and at eleven Colonel M'Crea heard an orator—we need scarcely say of Irish extraction—endeavouring to talk the House out, in order to get rid of the obnoxious proposal. After he had spoken for several hours, the leading members of Government sent for mattresses and made themselves comfortable on the floor of the House. The orator continued talking about wolf-skins the whole of that night, and until the afternoon of next day, when he dropped from sheer fatigue, after an oration of twenty-four hours—a performance unparalleled, so far as we know, except by Prince Giglio in the Rose and the Ring. The motion was passed, and this brilliant Parliamentary manœuvre defeated. It must be added, however, that the great wolf-skin controversy appears to have been merely a pretext for a far more serious warfare. The Irish Papists of whom Colonel M'Crea's informant spoke form nearly half the population of Newfoundland. They have a conspicuous cathedral on the highest point of St. John's, and a bishop with a taste for interfering in politics. Given a population of this delightful composition, half English Protestants and half Irish Catholics, and it must be admitted that, whatever the dulness of the country in other respects, it will never be in want of the materials for a row. At the same time it is not surprising that a refined gentleman like Colonel M'Crea finds the sort of squabbling which results from such politics to be rather undignified, and in the long run not very interesting.

It is perhaps time to say what were the charms which Colonel M'Crea discovered in this desolate place. They appear to have been twofold. In the apology for summer he succeeded in shooting a certain number of grouse, snipe, and other game; and though the sport was hardly of the highest order, it was pleasant enough. In the winter he belonged to a whist-club, which spent every Monday evening from seven to eleven in absolute silence and devotion to the game. At the end of that time they had a supper which was certainly substantial, and of which the special pride and ornament was a peculiarly delicious variety of wild goose. Also he assures us, and we can fully believe, that the inhabitants were singularly friendly, hearty, and free from the conventionalisms of England. His practical moral, which we must leave to stand on its own merits, is, that the true interests of Newfoundland and England are linked together, that we ought carefully to cultivate the rather torpid loyalty of the country, which has been chilled by our discreditable ignorance of its peculiarities, and that the "snug little harbour of St. John's" might be made to bristle with batteries and torpedoes, "sufficient to uphold our flag if driven there, like Moore to Corunna, in defence against all attack." It is wrong to look upon such declarations in a cold utilitarian spirit, only we could wish that, if our flag is to be kept waving there by large expenditure of men and money, it might wave over a larger population and a better climate.

TISSOT ON THE IMAGINATION.*

IMAGINATION, says M. Tissot, is the root of all good. Various indeed, and valuable as various, are the services which it renders to the world. Without imagination, the human race could be incapable of thought, of speech, of perfectibility; it would be incapable of forming a society, of possessing traditions or an ideal, for without its aid neither industry, arts, sciences, laws, nor manners would be possible. To imagination therefore we owe all that we are and have. Nevertheless, although we are under such countless obligations to it, there are circumstances under which its influence is far from being favourable to the cause of humanity; and it is these circumstances which we are now recommended to take as the subject of our investigations, since our best preservative against those intellectual aberrations of which it is the fatal cause is a clear perception of that in which they consist.

M Tissot touches briefly on the action of the imagination in the passions, in suicide, and in madness, but devotes special attention to its activity during sleep and dreams, and to its influence in that curious form of disease known as somnambulism. Here we find the real point of the book, which is to set forth—first, that all phenomena are capable of explanation by natural causes; and secondly, that those special phenomena which characterize the development of mysticism—whether Oriental or European, as well as those which have been supposed to justify a belief in magic, sorcery, witchcraft, and generally in demoniacal agency—can be completely accounted for by the same laws which govern the production of the distinctive features of the different known species of somnambulism; somnambulism being itself one of the large family of nervous complaints, and closely connected with hysteria, mania, delirium, epilepsy, catalepsy, and ecstasy. The basis on which M. Tissot reasons concerning the class of facts which he lays before us is the theory "de l'âme et du moi," which he considers himself to have established in two previous works—La Vie dans l'Homme, published in 1861, and L'Animisme, which we believe preceded it. "L'âme" is the principle of organic life, but it exercises these functions without intelligence, that is to say, without consciousness, and without will. This principle continues to act when the "moi" or intellect is inactive, as in sleep; when, the imagination acting as intermediary, it raises dreams. Its degrees of activity in this state vary with different persons, some—as, for instance, Lessing—not dreaming at all, or at least not having any recollection of their dreams. This is the only fact put forward in support of their theory by those who assert that the living principle is not in continual activity during sleep; and M. Tissot considers it to prove nothing, since there is a total absence of recollection, in the case of somnambulists, of their movements and even actions whilst in a state of somnambulism. There are, indeed, considerable differences between dreams and somnambulism. In dreams, the perception is wholly interior, imaginative; the recollection is defective, the association of ideas extremely irregular, and not in accordance with the external world; the touch is dull, the organs sluggish, the members not under the control of the will; "la vie de relation" (between life and intellect) hardly exists, and the understanding and reason are enfeebled. In somnambulism, on the contrary, one finds the memory lucid and exact; thought is orderly, more in harmony with the external world; the organs are sensible, and moral sentiment is more marked. There is yet another singular difference between these two states, and one that appears to rest on well-authenticated facts; and this is, that whereas in dreams the eyes are shut, in somnambulism they are more frequently open, notwithstanding which the subject sees in the latter case exactly as in the former; whether the eyes are open or shut, the vision is the same, and differs just as much from ordinary sight. In illustration, M. Tissot gives numerous instances extracted from different medical journals, chiefly French and German, and on these he speculates with great ingenuity and acuteness. Some of them are, however, of so very extraordinary a character that he is obliged to say that, though he does not deny, he does not affirm them. We extract one which appears to us of a typical character, which is given as an instance of a person accomplishing in a state of somnambulism acts of which he or she would be incapable when in a normal condition. A young girl was attacked by the disease which the English (?) call "louping." The attack comes on in the night, and causes the sick person to leap, and run, as if possessed. The paroxysm took place every day in the morning, a few hours after getting up. She then fell into a sort of sleep, with her eyes shut. In this state she leapt with marvellous agility; she ran with greater swiftness than she could have done in health. In running, she always went towards a given spot in the neighbourhood, never changing her course. She often said, when she felt the paroxysm approach, that she wished to go there, and as soon as she had reached the place she would return, sometimes without taking the same road, and although the path was very bad she never stumbled. When she said, as the paroxysm approached, that she wished to run to such or such a place, she was accustomed to add that during the night she had dreamed that she should do so. In vain was the attempt made to stop her, on account of the danger; she persisted in running to this given place, and nowhere else. On awaking she was extremely feeble, but gradually her strength returned, and she suffered most when prevented from running. When she came to herself she had no recollection of what had passed in her sleep. Some time before her illness she said she had dreamed that the water of a neighbouring spring, called Dropburn, would effect her cure. She drank it during her paroxysms, and at other times. If given any other water, she rejected it impatiently, but always drank willingly, with closed eyelids, water from the spring. Before the last paroxysm she remarked—"Now I have only three leaps to take, after which I shall neither leap nor run any more." Accordingly, having fallen into her usual sleep, she jumped upon a mantelpiece, and then down again; having repeated this performance three times, she stopped, and never afterwards either ran or leapt.

For this remarkable story, as well as for others equally astounding, which are selected by M. Tissot as the basis of his pyscho-physiological speculations, we are referred to Moritz, Magazin zur Erfahrung. It must, however, be borne in mind by sober readers that the scene of this charmingly fantastic episode is laid in England, a name which is possibly used in M. Tissot's study as a synonym for fairyland.

In classifying the different forms of this disease M. Tissot follows pretty closely the arrangement of Dr. Bertrand, who, in his work entitled Du Somnambulisme, distinguishes four species—first, simple somnambulism; secondly, symptomatic somnambulism, which is known to us in certain complaints, such as catalepsy, hysteria, epilepsy, and hypochondria; thirdly, magnetic somnambulism, or somnambulism due to the influence exercised by other persons; and fourthly, ecstatic somnambulism. Each of these four states undergoes a careful analysis at the hands of our author, and receives copious illustration, sometimes from facts which he says have come within the field of his own experience—as at p. 117, where he gives a very curious account of some experiments made by himself at Dijon, in 1852, in artificial or magnetic somnambulism, with a woman named Michaud. The result of several sittings was simply doubt; each séance was distinguished by a few successes, and plenty of mistakes, as far as anything like predictions were concerned, though the facts of enforced sleep, and of the subjection of the will of the sleeper to that of the magnetizer, remained apparently untouched. Taken altogether, M. Tissot thinks the results sufficiently curious to be worth further investigation and inquiry. The artificial sleep of the Indian fakir, which is said to have been tested with care by actual burial for periods extending from ten days to ten months, vouched by credible European witnesses, may, it is suggested, belong to one of the unexplained phenomena known under the names of hypnotism or braydism, which come under the head of consecutive or magnetic somnambulism; but by far the greater number of those phenomena to which the popular—and, M. Tissot adds, the theological—mind has given in ages past, and still desires to give, the name of supernatural, fall under the head of somnambulism ecstatic.

This is supposed to be marked, amongst others, by the following remarkable features:—1. Knowledge of the thoughts, actions, and names of persons who have never been seen or heard by the subject; 2. Knowledge of languages never learnt; 3. Partial and relative want of external and internal sensibility; 4. Perversion of physical sensibility, so that pleasure is occasioned by that which would ordinarily cause extreme suffering; and, 5. Visions of various character, beatific or otherwise. It seems hardly necessary to say that the first two points do not appear to be as yet authenticated. In considering this class of nervous diseases it is impossible not to perceive a curious relation between the symptoms which characterise it and those which were formerly supposed to indicate supernatural agency, in the cases of so-called possessed persons, and others which appear at first sight still more inexplicable. We refer to the reception of the stigmata. The author of the book before us points out that this may be accounted for without having recourse to the accusation of fraud, or to supernatural causes. The action of the moral upon the physical frame can be brought to bear indifferently upon all the systems of tissues, upon all the organs, upon all the functions; the sympathies between the different organs are numerous, and the phenomena in respect to them depend apparently upon the constitution of the subject, and in some measure on the state of health. It should be recollected that the stigmatici are nearly always ecstatics, and that in such cases the action of the imagination is extremely powerful, and capable of producing, in the course of

she was from her childhood a nervous subject, and very devout. After the death of her father she was nearly always ailing, slept little, had no appetite, was subject to nervous attacks, to hallucinations, and meditated constantly on the passion of Our Lord. She was a long while at a time without food, became ecstatic, and, little by little, the stigmata were formed. An analogous, but still more extraordinary, circumstance was a sweat of blood and water after a nightmare (see Moniteur Universel, December 13, 1862). But, after all, what is there, except a difference in kind, to distinguish such a case as this from sicknesses, and even mortal sicknesses, occasioned by fear or by imagination—such, for instance, as the appearance of all the symptoms of cholera at the mere thought of having slept in the bed of a cholera patient? The case of Marie de Moerll is almost equally well attested, and equally susceptible of explanation by analogy. The modifications introduced into the practice of mysticism by the Christian idea only rendered its doctrine more easy of comprehension and more popular. Even France, which has rarely taken the initiative in this matter, professes a moderate form of mysticism, as indeed do all Catholic countries. There is a science of developing, directing, stimulating, and restraining the faithful in this perilous road. This art, the rules of which may be found at length in the Praxis Confessarii of Liguori, deserves to be more fully known than it is. In that work is developed a complete theory of ecstatic contemplation, passing through several degrees, till we reach the beatific vision and union with God, which is described as consisting of three kinds—first, the simple, or that of espousals; then the ecstatic; and finally, the consummated or spiritual marriage. We leave, says M. Tissot, educated men to decide how far the education which girls receive in conventual houses where this spirit reigns is likely to turn them out reasonable wives and mothers.

The mystic devotees of the Abbé Paris were distinguished by complete perversion of physical sensibility, which made the most horrible tortures a source of life and health, and which characterizes the cases of so-called possession which have become known to us at the present day in Savoy. Let the cemetery of Saint-Médard be closed by order of the King—

De par le roi, défense à Dieu
De faire miracle dans ce lieu—then the miracle takes place elsewhere. The object of faith is nothing, faith itself is everything, and, the cemetery closed, neuvaines and relics of the "bienheureux diacre" do just as well. The sick see into the interior of their bodies, they have a knowledge of things passing at a distance, they hear internal voices, all of which symptoms are asserted to be those of ecstatic somnambulism, and are reproduced in the terrible mental malady which has existed for several years, and is perhaps still existing, in the unhappy village of Morzine, in the Haute-Savoie. It should be recollected that the different classes of somnambulism run very much into one another, and, although Dr. Bertrand's division given above appears reasonable, yet it may be said that somnambulism in general is an exceptional state, and therefore a disease; that ecstatic somnambulism has also an organic cause, and that whilst you acknowledge in it the influence of the moral on the physical, the counter-influence of the physical on the moral should not be left out of sight. In the terrible outbreaks at Morzine there appears to be quite as much of symptomatic as of ecstatic somnambulism. Dr. Constans, in his pamphlet on this strange epidemic—with the study of which he was, we believe, officially entrusted—names it hystéro-démonopathie, and shows in his preliminary sketch of the locality and the inhabitants that it was not difficult for a malady of this nature to develop itself spontaneously in such a region, amongst a people whose habits of life and thought were so far from fulfilling the simplest sanitary conditions. The grossest superstitions have there a natural home, and the credulity of the priests is not behind that of the people. It was easy for those who were accustomed to practise exorcism, instead of veterinary art, to ascribe a simple nervous affection to the possession of its victim by the devil; this belief, in spite of the wise advice and prohibitions of Mgr. Rendu, was encouraged by the curé, and some if not all of his vicaires; everything was done by them which could excite the already enfeebled and agitated minds of their people. The evil had a moral cause—extreme credulity; and it is by natural remedies that it may be met and conquered. Nearly all the sufferers were women, between fifteen and forty years of age, and women are particularly subject to all nervous affections—somnambulism, catalepsy, hysteria, and it is, we conceive, to the victims of this class of complaints, complicated in their case by the influence of an imagination filled with superstitious fancies and fixed ideas, that the possédées of Morzine must be added. Finding himself at Evian in 1862, shortly before the second alarming outbreak took place, M. Tissot went over to the unfortunate village, and obtained permission to visit some of the persons under the influence of the malady. He saw two cases, a woman and her daughter, and witnessed a seizure in the mother of a violent character. The delirium was furious; she declaimed with extreme volubility, the devil appearing to speak by her mouth in his own person and in that of la fille, out of whom he would not go. This tirade was accompanied by violent blows upon the oak table at which they sat—blows which seemed to M. Tissot strong enough to split it in two; yet, on taking her hands to ascertain whether they were not affected in any way by the fury of her exertions, he found them no warmer than usual, and the pulse neither strong nor rapid. And here we have again that extraordinary insensibility to pain which in the middle ages was considered by sober jurists a convincing proof of communication with the powers of evil. M. Tissot gives an account, with copious extracts, of a book—originally published at Frankfort in 1632, in Latin, but now rare even in the French translation—by a German Jesuit, P. Spé, who had the courage and humanity to expose in it the horrors then perpetrated, under the pretence of justice, against sorcerers. He tells us that "they say that there are places on the bodies of sorcerers which have neither sense nor blood, so that if a needle be deeply stabbed in, it will neither cause pain nor will any blood issue from the place." Here it was that the devil had sealed his chosen, and it was on the strength of such a proof as this, or of confessions extracted by repeated applications of the torture, that many thousands perished at the stake in Franche-Comté during the Spanish rule, when, under Philip II., and, above all, under the Archduchess Isabella Clara Eugenia, the fires in many places were never extinguished, and a dream was death.

As to the polite superstitions of the present day—the superstitions, for instance, of table-turning and spirit-rapping—M. Tissot remarks that should any facts be substantially attested they must be capable of explanation by des raisons toutes subjectives, by states analogous to those of dreams, of sleep, of somnambulism, of madness. Hypnotism, or artificial somnambulism, appears to him to offer a possible, and certainly plausible, explanation. In this state physical sensibility partly disappears; the perceptions and the intellect are, on the contrary, more developed; and the will of the person is subject to that of whoever may have induced the state. Life then exerts a more powerful influence upon the body than when it is in a normal condition, and it would seem impossible to assign limits to this action, either as to its nature, or as to the degrees of modification which it may undergo. Again M. Tissot employs his theory of life and intellect; he cannot of course accept the claims and assertions of the spiritualists, but neither will he adhere to simple hypnotism as set forth by M. Figuier and others, since, he says, hypnotism itself is only to be explained by "l'animisme." We cannot help suspecting of our author "qu'il donne un peu trop dans le magnétisme," although he endeavours to fortify himself against such an accusation by protesting that it will not do to believe all the marvels told on that head: but if, for the purposes of argument, we once assume, as he does, the facts alleged, it would be impossible to treat them in a more scientific manner. If one reflects on the deep roots which a superstition of the most trifling character acquires in the course of time, and the deadly and mischievous effects it may have on the interests of practical life, it is impossible not to sympathize with any honest attempt to combat the popular tendency to substitute supernatural for natural causes regarding any unexplained phenomena, more especially when the author's claims are so considerable as those of M. Tissot, who has passed almost sixty years in psychological and physiological studies. We take leave of his work with a quotation from p. 233:—

> The best remedy against superstition is to prevent its birth; once let it get ahead of us, all attempts to check its course will incur the suspicion of impiety. It is satisfied in itself. It is an evil never less felt than when at its highest pitch. What do I say? It is an evil which, as it grows, takes the deceitful form of a good—the garb of holiness. Like madness, superstition is never more wise in its own conceit than when it is most irretrievably degraded in the judgment of all sane men.

LIFE OF MOTHER MARGARET HALLAHAN.*

NO doubt there are convents and convents. If we have lately had startling evidence that some of them are very like a nursery full of ill-conditioned children under the management of a cross-grained and incompetent nursery-maid, the Life of Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan goes far to prove that women of ardent temperament and great force of character have found scope in others for the exercise of the noblest qualities of active self-devotion and benevolence. It is a far better answer than a foolish volume on Sisterhoods and Convents which we had occasion to notice not long ago, to any sweeping inference of universal condemnation that might be drawn from the Saurin case. Of course it may be said, and said with truth, that if Mrs. Starr is to be dismissed as an exceptionally unfavourable type of a "Reverend Mother," there is much in her character and the circumstances of her life to make Mother Margaret quite as much an exception the other way. She was a woman of sufficient originality and moral energy to be remarkable in any position, and it is worth noticing that, like most other members of religious orders, male or female, who have attained a reputation beyond the cloister walls, a great part of her life had been spent, and her character had been formed and matured, before she "left the world." She was more than forty when she became a nun. And it is rather amusing, after the constant tirades of Roman Catholic writers, and especially of those just referred to, about the superiors of Anglican Sisterhoods entering on their office without any previous training of obedience, to find that Mother Margaret, "foundress of the English Congregation of St. Catherine of Sienna," did exactly the same. Her biographer tells us that she was born to command, and she was accordingly judged "quite capable of filling the office of superioress" from the first, and never passed through any noviciate. She said of herself that she "had never known real subjection." Yet she was a woman of humble origin and no education, and had up to the time of her entering on conventual life been a domestic servant. Her mind, as we have said, was singularly active, and she had a fund of strong common sense, but her opinions on general subjects were almost inevitably of the narrowest, and not unfrequently both bigoted and foolish. It would have been kinder in her biographer to have been more sparing in the repetition of sayings which are not much to her credit, and can have no intrinsic value. Her feeling about Protestants was very like what a large number of uneducated Protestants entertain towards Roman Catholics, and a wider experience never seems to have corrected it. "They may say what they choose, but they would like to hang us all," was even in later life the expression of her deliberate belief; and, accordingly, on her return from Belgium to England she declared to her confessor that "returning to this Protestant country was like going to hell." She says of an English village in Somersetshire, that the people "had never seen a crucifix," which is likely enough, and "as to any truth of religion, they did not know its name." She wished for means "to moralize a people with scarce an instinct of God." To a Protestant clergyman who, on taking his leave of her, expressed his hope that, in spite of their differences, they would both one day see the Lord, she replied, "No, Sir, you'll never see Him unless you are a Catholic, for there is no salvation out of the Catholic Church"; and she added that she could not argue, but "that is the truth." We had imagined that even the strictest of Ultramontanes allowed some margin for what an Irish child is said to have called, in addressing a Protestant bishop, "your lordship's inconsavable ignorance." Mother Margaret seems from this story, which her biographer relates with great unction, to have allowed none. Yet in spite of her theological rigidity she had a warm and capacious heart, and was always intent on doing good both to the bodies and souls of her fellow-creatures. And she exerted the influence which only a genuine sympathy of nature can command, as the following anecdote will show:—

> An artisan from Birmingham once came to Stone to finish some work in the church, and Mother Margaret, after settling what was to be done, fixed eye on him, and asked him if he were a Catholic. The man answered he not "What do you do for your soul—I suppose you know you have got one?" "Well, ma'am, I suppose I have." "Do you ever go to church?" "I can't say I do." When they had got thus far, the Sister who was present, seeing the turn the conversation was taking, thought it best to retire, and went to dinner, leaving Mother Margaret and her catechumen together. Presently she entered the refectory with a glowing countenance, and whispered to the Sister, "Go and take that man a techism and a 'Garden of the Soul,' and give him the address of a priest Birmingham." The Sister obeyed, and found the poor fellow kneeling before one of the altars, weeping like a child. All his John Bull reserve had vanished. "No one," he said, "ever seemed before to care whether I had got a soul."

It was not only, indeed, in her notions about Protestants, but in her religious belief, that her ignorant fanaticism betrayed itself. It is related of her, apparently as an edifying incident of her early years, that she was much shocked by a fellow-servant who was accustomed to indulge in blasphemous denials of the existence of God, but when he once spoke disrespectfully of the Blessed Virgin," "this was touching her in her tenderest point," and she flew into a passion. In later life it was her special aim to introduce into England the worship of the Virgin and of "St. Philomena"; the latter being, as our readers are perhaps aware, a fancy name invented some years ago for certain relics discovered in the Catacombs, which nobody knew anything about, and which are just as likely to have belonged to a heathen as to a Christian. On one occasion, going with some friends into St. Michael's Church at Coventry during service time, she took them into the Lady Chapel, and there "recited with them aloud the Litany of Our Lady," which her biographer thinks a touching evidence of her mastery of all "human respect"—we [illegible] mother, and Mother Margaret's way of referring to her is often of a kind which to the more reverential or more squeamish tastes of Protestant readers will appear truly amazing. Thus in one place she writes word that she is "going to make a great fuss with her," in order to get funds for an orphanage and hospital; and again, when she had said that she was going to ask Our Lady for a particular favour, and was asked what would happen if she did not grant it, "Oh," she replied, "I shall tease her till she does." Most of this must be set down to her want of early training; to the last she never learnt how to spell properly. With all her horror of Protestant England she had an enthusiastic feeling of loyalty for the Queen, and was very severe upon converts who spoke disrespectfully of her. She would gravely read aloud that the Queen had walked in the Slopes at Windsor, as though it was the most interesting piece of intelligence in the newspaper. On other points she showed a good taste which could hardly have been expected from her antecedents. She was thoroughly fond of Gothic architecture, which was adopted in all the convents and churches she built, and she hated anything tawdry or unreal in decorations; fancy bazaars, raffles, and the like, she could not endure. When she had to go on business to Rome, even St. Peter's did not greatly fascinate her; she declared herself disappointed, and said she liked Belgium much better, adding that "cleanliness and holiness do not go together here," and that she should like to found "a confraternity of scavengers" for the Romans. She "shocked the feelings of her companion a little rudely by singing In exitu Israel as their carriage passed out of the city gates."

With all her eccentricities, the Life of Mother Margaret is the record, not only of a very good, but a very remarkable, woman. Great as is the contrast between them in many respects, one cannot help often being reminded of the Life of Arnold. They resemble each other in their downright simplicity, their energy and their warmth of character. Her biographer is fond of comparing her to St. Theresa, and there is certainly much about her that reminds one of the strong practical common sense, united to an enthusiastic piety, by which so many of the Spanish mystics were distinguished. Her special fondness for children, especially boys, had been early conspicuous, and seems to have grown with her growth, and was reciprocated by their warmest affection and gratitude. There is a touching story of the way in which her orphan boys at Stone evinced this feeling after her funeral:—

> They contrived to purchase some choice flowers, and requested to be allowed to lay them, with their own hands, upon her grave. When the flowers were afterwards removed by the sacristan, a letter was found concealed among them, which, as the genuine expression of children's love to a good Mother, shall be here transcribed:—
> "DEAREST AND REVERED MOTHER,—It is almost impossible to express our gratitude to you, but will you accept the flowers we lay upon your grave? though we well know the far better flowers that now form your heavenly wreath. Dear Mother, to the honour of God we will also beg Father A. to offer the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass for you.—Your grateful and loving children, "THE ORPHAN BOYS."

The Life is written by the authoress of Christian Schools and Scholars, and is well written, though it might with advantage have been curtailed in parts; and several merely official letters, which take up a good deal of space, and are of no particular interest, had better have been omitted. One most troublesome defect, which is very common with lady-writers, we trust the authoress will supply if her book should reach a second edition. There is nothing in the shape of an index, nor even any heading to the chapters beyond occasionally a date. The consequence is that you do not know where anything occurs which you want to look for, and after reading the book through you have to read it over again for any particular passage you are in search of. We close with a short extract from Bishop Ullathorne's preface, giving some examples of what he calls Mother Margaret's "spiritual proverbs," as they seem to us to illustrate very fairly the union of mysticism and good sense which were ruling elements of her character:—

> "Penance," she said, "ought not to sadden or depress. If it does, it is a sign of something wrong in the soul, for the function of penance is to unlock the soul and set it free." "There are no penances that search the soul like those that God sends." "When God sends you a trial, no one but God can relieve it. You must be directed, but only God can enable you to go through with it, and the more you keep it between God and yourself, the better it will be for you." "If you rid yourself of human respect, it will not only free your mind, but will improve your health by removing the strain upon you." "There is no deep love of God without a childlike, reverential fear." "Nothing makes a soul clear-sighted like humility." "You can only love God so far as you are humble." "So long as I keep my eye on God all is well, but if I lose sight of Him, I am troubled indeed." "Contemplation does not consist in saying many prayers, but in setting your heart on God."

THE FRENCH BAR.*

A TRUSTWORTHY account of the past history and present state of the French Bar would just now be very acceptable. Among the numerous questions which have been debated of late years among ourselves not the least important has reference to the position of the Bar. Great difference of opinion prevails as to the true relations of the Bar to the Bench on the one hand, and to the attorneys on the other, as to the qualifications which ought to be exacted on admission to the order of barristers, and even as to the expediency of the existence of any such order. All these questions, which no one till lately thought of raising, are seen, now that they are raised, to present considerable difficulty, and they cannot be satisfactorily answered without a comparative study of the legal institutions of other countries. We took up Mr. Young's "Historical Sketch" with a reasonable hope of finding in it some clear and accurate information as to the organization of the profession in France, and especially as to the many important particulars in which the French Bar differs from the English. This hope has been disappointed. Mr. Young has formed a poor conception of his very interesting subject, and, with ample material ready to his hand, has produced little more than a collection of notes on legal biography.

We think that these remarks are not uncalled for, a[s] the book claims to have been composed with a didactic purpose. We are reminded in the opening paragraph of the defective condition of legal training in England, and this too well-founded charge is oddly enough supported by the assertion that few members of the profession here are "well acquainted with the history and constitution of the Bar, even in countries with which our intercourse is most constant and friendly." The author thinks this is the more to be regretted, because "the members of that profession have not only inaugurated and carried out the chief improvements in the principles and practice of law, but have likewise exercised an important influence on their general character and history." We are of opinion that English lawyers have yet to learn many things which much more concern them than the history and constitution of their profession abroad; but, letting this pass, the obvious conclusion deducible from the author's premises would be that some authentic account of the history and constitution of the French Bar would be a contribution to literature which he might usefully attempt. He has, however, deliberately chosen to write a different sort of book; hoping, he says, to be able to show "that no Bar has been more fertile in men distinguished as jurists, orators, judges, and statesmen; that none has taken a more prominent part in legislation; that none has had greater influence on the chief political movements that have modified or revolutionized the state of parties or the face of society," and so forth; and we dare say that all these propositions are borne out by the historical and biographical sketches which follow. Mr. Young has chosen to give us, not a storehouse of carefully arranged information, but a collection of that sort of half-knowledge which is of all things the most burdensome to the memory and the most impalpable to the understanding; not a skilfully devised book, but a readable volume of sketchy pages. Through the first half of his volume he gossips pleasantly, though disconnectedly, upon the history of the French Bar down to the time of the First Empire. The remaining half contains short biographies of the leading advocates who have flourished since that epoch. The history of the French Bar is indeed well worthy of being written. From the time when, as Juvenal tells us, to the age of Berryer and Ledru-Rollin, France has boasted of an unbroken succession of great orators and acute logicians; while the names of Dumoulin, Cujacius, Domat, Pothier, and Portalis are sufficient to remind us of the success with which she has cultivated scientific jurisprudence. The order of advocates has always been far more compactly organized than the English Bar, and has in consequence more of a corporate history; while individual advocates have had a far greater influence in public affairs than is usual on this side of the Channel. Numbers of Ministers, ex-Ministers, and leading members of the Chamber of Deputies [are] to be found among them, but the culminating point of their political importance was probably the Revolution of 1830, which has well been called "une révolution d'avocats," and the rising generation of lawyers is said to be more exclusively professional than those which preceded it.

> Gallia causidicos docuit facunda Britannos,

Mr. Young has collected a number of notices of the early history of the legal profession in France. Charlemagne's Capitularies direct that none should be admitted into that profession except mild and peaceful men, fearing God, and loving justice. In the days of judicial combats an unskilful pleader ran a risk from which he is luckily now exempt. A certain advocate named Fabrefort, while stating the case for one Armand de Montaign, affirmed that he was ready to make good his averments with his body in the field, and, not having made it quite clear that he said this on behalf of his client, was very near being obliged to do combat in person. The Establishments of St. Louis contain some provisions on the subject of advocacy, and it was in the reign of this King that Guy Foucault, the famous advocate, was raised to the Papacy. The importance of the Parisian Bar was, however, placed upon [a] firm basis by Philip the Fair when he fixed the Parliament [a]t Paris, and henceforth many ordinances were passed with reference to the privileges and duties of advocates. The Bar was divided, as early as the fourteenth century, into three grades—the consulting advocates, who wore a robe of black silk covered with a mantle of scarlet and ermine; the pleaders, who wore a violet gown; and the listeners, who wore a white one. By an ordinance of 1490 no one might be admitted to the profession of an advocate who had not studied for five years at a University. In the reign of Henry IV. a curious incident occurred. The Parliament having attempted to enforce against the advocates an ordinance which obliged them, contrary to custom, to give a written acknowledgment of the amount of fees they received, they one and all resigned their functions, and after a stoppage of legal business for two months, the Government had to give way, and the advocates resumed their duties. Mr. Young cites a parallel case which occurred in Scotland. In 1595 the Parisian Bar and Parliament displayed a courage of a different kind by remaining in the city while it was ravaged by pestilence.

The earliest known roll of the Bar of Paris is dated in 1687, but it has been kept regularly only since 1696. From very early times the body has been divided into "benches," otherwise called "columns," each of which elects deputies to the [Coun]cil, at the head of which are the doyen and the order. The first bâtonnier whose name is preserved is Denis Doujat, elected in 1617. The existing Palais de Justice was built after the destruction of the former one by fire in 1618. The Library of the old Paris Bar was founded by the bequest of Étienne Gabriac de Riparfonds, and opened in 1710. It was refounded, after the Revolution, by Fery. The history of the Bar in the eighteenth century is bound up with that of the Parliament. When the latter was broken up by Maupeou, the Bar too became so disorganized that from 1770 to 1779 no bâtonnier was elected and the constituent National Assembly soon afterwards suppressed the Parliament of Louis XVI., and proceeded to abolish the Bar also, in spite of the protest of Robespierre, who said, "You close that school of civic virtues where talent and merit learned, while pleading the cause of citizens before the judge, to defend thereafter that of the people in the legislative assemblies." The Assembly imagined that the administration of justice could be rendered so simple that no real courts of appeal and no professional advocates would be any longer necessary. naturally turned out to be a mistake, and members of the old Bar and others gradually began to practise again under the style of hommes de la loi. The order was finally restored by Napoleon, by a decree of December 14, 1810, but with reservations dictated by his hatred and fear of advocates, of whom he once said, "they are framers of crimes and treasons." Napoleon placed the table, or roll, of the Bar, and the appointment of bâtonnier, practically under the control of the Government, but the order step by step recovered its privileges, and under a decree of 1830 has now full powers of regulating admission to its table, and of electing its officers and council.

Mr. Young dismisses in half a page the topics of legal education and qualification for admission to the Bar. Upon these especially interesting subjects full information may be gained from a history of the French Bar by Mr. Robert Jones, published about ten years ago. Amongst ourselves the study of law, both academical and professional, is in a thoroughly unsatisfactory state. The training given by the Law Faculties in the older Universities has become merely nominal, and the Inns of Court, at any rate till quite recently, seem to have aimed at nothing more than securing as well as they could that the Bar should consist of gentlemen animated by an esprit de corps fostered by frequent social intercourse, and amenable to rules of professional etiquette, enforced, for the most part, only by regard for the good opinion of the profession. Barristers who mean to work of course take care to qualify themselves as well as they can by the rough and ready process of going into the chambers of their seniors, and seeing how the work is done. The system has certainly produced far better results than might have been expected, but it ought to be generally known that in France anyone who wishes to become a barrister must first of all take a degree testifying to his having received a liberal education; he must then attend lectures and pass examinations in the Faculty of Law, where he may take the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Law, and must attain the rank of Licentiate before admission will only inscribe his name upon the roll, thus admitting him to the full status of barrister, if satisfied upon inquiry of his diligence and honourable conduct. This preliminary scrutiny is carried indeed to startling lengths. The candidate for the honours of advocacy has, for instance, to show that he has furniture of his own, and is not established in ready-furnished lodgings. A great deal of miscellaneous information is scattered up and down Mr. Young's work, but he is silent upon many minor points which we should expect to be mentioned, such, for instance, as the dress of the advocates, which has a history of its own; and he says nothing upon the weightier matters of provincial bars, intervention of attorneys, and the judicial order. His short biographies of eminent modern advocates, from Hennequin to Émile Ollivier, are a useful contribution to our knowledge of the leading French politicians of the present century.

IN Mr. Charles C. Coffin we have a traveller after the latest and best Transatlantic pattern. He has thrown himself thoroughly into the spirit of his age and race; yet, while loyal to the backbone, and endorsing to the full his country's claims to present grandeur and future pre-eminence, he has a corner in his soul for the merits of other lands, and is open to the lessons of Old-World wisdom. There is everything to hope from an enterprising and intelligent citizen of the New World who, after an absence of two years and a half, during which he has made the circuit of the globe, can return to his home with the impression that "America does not possess all the virtues in the world. We have something yet to learn." He and his party have "lost some prejudices, and gained new views." From the outset he appears to have conceived the true idea of travel, and the success which crowned his efforts is the deserved result and confirmation of the foresight and resolve with which he laid down his plan from the first. He is true to the proverbial maxim of his country, and has verified it over the length and breadth of the earth. "Be sure you are right, and then go ahead." "The secret of travelling with ease is to know where to go, and how to get there, making all necessary preparations, and never to worry." It is care and fuss, as he says, which kills us, or, at all events, takes all the life out of our travel. The tourist who cannot proceed leisurely had better stay at home, or submit to chalk out for himself a more limited field of exploration. "To be benefited by travel, time must be taken for study and reflection. No man can eat all the time; if he attempts it, digestion ceases." A man may get round the world in ninety days, but he must be a fool or a slave to undertake it. A year Mr. Coffin thinks little time enough. To see all that he saw, and to read, mark, learn, and digest it thoroughly as he did, cannot easily be brought within less compass than it was in his case, though he lays down a programme by which it can be compressed within eighteen months. To attempt the feat with the same headlong unreflecting speed with which one might despatch a bale of goods will only result in weariness of body and dizziness of brain:—

> Japanese, Chinese, Hindoos, and Arabs will be so completely mixed—there will be such indistinct recollections of joss-houses, pagodas, mosques, temples—of junks, sampans, proas, and other queer craft—such a snarl of streets, lanes, and alleys, filled with myriads of people, carrying baskets, bundles, chests of tea, and dressed in blue blouses, baggy trousers, flowing robes, long gowns, turbans, broad-brimmed or steeple-shaped hats—or wearing nothing at all, except a narrow strip of cloth about the loins—with pigtails, cues, or shaven crowns, plucked brows, painted faces, tattooed skins—riding in sedans, palankeens, or on donkeys, elephants, and camels—that the brain, instead of retaining distinct pictures, will be in the condition of a sportsman whose horse turns a somersault in a steeple-chase, and the unfortunate rider beholds only a whirling landscape of fields, trees, hounds, hedges, and blinking stars!

The tour adopted by Mr. Coffin's party was that from west to east. But the true course for the circuit of the world, experience has now taught him, is with the sun. By starting at the right time, and by travelling westward, every country will be seen at its best season. The tourist will be pretty sure of calm seas and pleasant weather all the way from San Francisco to Japan, thence by way of China and India to Suez, and so on to Europe. It was doubtless the natural hankering after the sights and ways of Europe that turned our traveller's steps in this direction, before exhausting the marvels and novelties of his own land. Rapid as was his flight, and superficial as was his purview of the multitudinous objects that daily crowded his path, his powers of observation are, we are bound to say, keen and vigorous, and his judgments upon men and things both shrewd and impartial. Be it the aspects of nature, the historical monuments, the national traits or the social idiosyncrasies that come before him, we find him invariably alive to what is most beautiful or august or original or piquant, as the case may be. He is at all times happy in hitting off the salient features, or picking out the weak spots, in local life and manners. While full of aspirations for the future, he is far from ignoring the glories or the legacies of the past. He is not the man to have to fall back, like a certain traditional fellow-countryman of his, for his recollections of Rome upon the entry in his diary of "the place where the buildings were so much in want of repair." Rome, indeed, we regret to say, lay out of his adopted route, but Greece was happily so nearly in the direct line from Marseilles to the East as to render possible a bird's-eye view of classic sites and cities, and to call up a swiftly-passing panorama of Attic grandeur and decay. Skirting the Dorian peninsula, the grey ribs of limestone broken into rugged caves tell him of "the puny Spartan children dropped into these dark chasms, to be devoured by wolves." Earlier echoes still of siren voices float upon the ear, and fancy might people these quiet nooks with graceful forms of nymphs and water-goddesses, only that it is "sheer nonsense to undertake to go into ecstacies about them with a steam-engine beneath our feet, and the screw of the steamer churning the ocean to a foam." The mutations of history flit rapidly past the eyes of our New-world philosopher. From the Phœnician rovers, or robbers, bringing west the "seed corn of civilization," through the glorious harvest of Western prowess and intellect and art, the eye travels swiftly down to the poor gleanings of to-day. On Sunium's lofty steep, may be, a hermit builds his nest, "a philosopher in a hair shirt digs and delves for potatoes in a garden spot as large as a common dining-table." A railway car whirls us up from the Piræus to the Acropolis. Polyglot commissionaires strive noisily for the honour of showing us the lions of the Parthenon. At a restaurant hard by, "thirty or forty descendants of noble Greeks—a great way descended—are singing the songs of Bacchus, guzzling wine, smoking abominable tobacco in Turkish pipes, shuffling dominoes and cards." "Call with tenderest voice for the Mighty Past, amid such associations, and it will not come. It is far better to get into a carriage and ride to a good hotel in Athens, five miles distant, than to endeavour to work ourselves into a fine frenzy by thinking of Demosthenes, Socrates, and Plato."

In the same practical and cosmopolitan spirit our traveller takes in with equal eye the wonders of Pharaonic rule and the no less striking marvels of modern Egyptian progress. It is hard to say whether more strict, albeit summary, justice is done to the Pyramids or to the Suez Canal, to the solemn associations of the Exodus or to the smartness of the Pasha's railway management. In one respect, he is disposed to yield to young Egypt the palm, not only above all early types of the proverbial wisdom of the Egyptians, but over what we had blindly thought to be the 'cutest of all existing races. The Arabs turned out "sharper than any Yankee at a bargain. The keenest Vermonter would be outwitted and fleeced by them. It is easier for them to lie than to tell the truth." They have also a keen eye for marks of nationality. The naked rascals who swarm in the human ant-hill at the base of the Great Pyramid met our party with sardonic grins, and with offers of service in tortured English—"Me help you, master; me good for Yankee Doodle." The great highway of nations opened up by the Overland route furnishes an unparalleled field for the study of diversities of national type. Whilst others, however, rub off their angles in the great attrition of humanity, the Briton shows his angularity even enhanced. His very pronunciation of English, his "extra h or o" jars upon the sensitive ears of an American. The polish and courtesy of the P. and O. officers, and the equipment, speed, and comfort of their vessels are notwithstanding beyond all praise. The history of British rule in India, and the tokens of material and social advancement everywhere beside his path, are themes after the American's own heart. We have never seen a more graphic or telling sketch of Anglo-Indian life and characteristics within anything like the compass of Mr. Coffin's flying experiences. Landing at Bombay, his route lay across the Ghâts by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway to Nagpore, and thence to Jubbulpore by the Deccan horse dak, of which novel yet primitive mode of locomotion he retains lively reminiscences. The mercury at 130° by day and 100° by night enables the chances of dissolution or sunstroke in the "Orient" to be weighed against those of the most fiery of Western prairies. From Allahabad the railway whirled our party down the valley of the Ganges to the capital, leaving leisure, however, by the way for a summary of Indian mythology, history, and economics, from the dawn of time to the present day, for the edification of the American public. From the literary annals of the Veda or the origin of caste his lively pen runs on to the American mission, its fruits, and expected harvest, though the utmost to be boasted of as regards its effect upon the native mind is but what is termed a "state of betweenity." The Hindoo has given up his idols, eats beef, and drinks champagne or Bass, but has made no further progress towards Christianity. One institution or "notion" is of universal adoption, and grateful to thirsty souls of all races and creeds. From the verandah of his heated bungalow the traveller's weary eye rested upon the sign next door—"American Ice." The Indian Ice Company has been fifteen years in operation in Allahabad. Machine-made ice is discarded by the natives as containing something possibly unclean. The Wenham is absolutely pure. Three years ago the ice in our author's tumbler crystallized thousands of miles away towards the setting sun. The thought furnishes occasion for one of the few passages in the gushing or "high faluting" vein in which his muse permits him to indulge:—

> The most extravagant tale of the Orient is not more romantic than the story of this solidified water from Wenham Lake. It is a piece of imprisoned cold, a fragment of a bygone winter transported by sea and land to this city of Central India, to minister to our health and comfort.
> How romantic to think of it!—of boyhood's rosy cheeks and girlhood's laughing eyes, the joining of hands, the swiftly flying feet sweeping the gleaming field, the linking of hearts for a wider curve across the stream of life;—a picture of happiness without a counterpart in the world, and as much in advance of life in this tropical land as the Sistine Madonna of Raphael is superior to the figures on a Chinese tea-chest!
>
> Call it rhapsody, sentiment, what you will; how can one help this outburst of enthusiasm with a piece of ice from Wenham Lake clinking in his tumbler, melting in his mouth, cooling his parched tongue, and bringing to his soul a breeze of old associations?
> Blessed be the ice, and prosperity to the Tudor Company!

Mr. Coffin's studies of life in China are eminently piquant and original. Nothing is too old or too new to escape his notice. His vista of Chinese history opens with the Deluge and comes down to the latest iniquity of the British Government in pushing the opium trade. The laws of Confucius, the Hia, Shang, Chun, and Tsin dynasties, the contact with Greek and Roman civilization, and the later annals that tell of the still-growing intrusion of "foreign devils," are reeled off in a few lines apiece. Never perhaps has the history of the staple manufacture of China been put before Western readers so fully and clearly within so brief a compass, though ardent tea-drinkers are hardly to be congratulated upon the ample light here thrown upon many of the mysteries of the craft. The chapter upon the future of China embodies, and goes far to justify, the most sanguine dreams of the political and commercial destiny of the flowery land that Mr. Burlinghame and other prophets of the new dispensation have made us familiar with. Still more golden and blissful are the visions opened by the immense success of the great line of steam communication between China, Japan, and California. Here is one of the most novel and piquant themes that the new circuit of the globe suggests for contemplation. The details of this extraordinary traffic may well fill European readers with surprise. Every month a steamer, second only to the Great Eastern in tonnage and power, leaves Hong Kong for San Francisco, touching at Yokohama. Each carries from a thousand to twelve hundred Chinese emigrants at forty dollars a-head, generally carrying back on the return voyage more than half that number, who have made their little fortunes. The Colorado, the pioneer ship of this line, which started January 1, 1867, netted, we are told, some 60,000 dollars over all expenses. Who can predict the effect, not only upon American, but even European civilization, as the mighty tide of emigration swells in range and volume, bearing, by the new highway just opened across the Western continent, the growing overplus of a nation at once the most populous, the most prolific, and the most restless upon earth? Mr. Coffin's narrative comes down as late as the laying of the last rail between the Atlantic and the Pacific. To his patriotic eye America looms greater and greater in the distance as the centre and heart of the human system, the teacher of the nations, the world following in its path. "The people of Europe are keeping step to the march of the great Republic." With his foot, so to say, once more on his native heath, we should have been surprised if Mr. Coffin had turned aside from exploring the great social and religious portent of the New World. The story of his visit to the Salt Lake City will be found not only one of the shrewdest and most impartial accounts that we have seen of the "new institution," but a corrective of much of the sensational clap-trap that recent travellers have been wont to indulge in. Upon the author of New America he is successful in turning the tables. Instead of polygamy being peculiarly an outgrowth of American institutions, the great body of Mormon recruits are from the old country. Neither is there anything in democracy more than in autocracy to give growth to such an excrescence as that of Utah. And as slavery has disappeared from the land, so is the time not far distant when the country will be purged of polygamy—"by peaceful means if possible, by forcible if there is no other way."

Of the physical marvels encountered by our traveller in his way round the world, none could exceed that which bursts upon his view when the new way round the world brings him once more home to the continent of his birth. He would be cold indeed to the glories of his native land who touched the shore of San Francisco and did not make the slight detour of 150 miles to the south-east which brings him to the "big trees" and the Yosemite valley. Of the former of these wonders of the world, Londoners have of late lost the opportunity of judging which they had prior to the lamentable fire at the Crystal Palace. Of the latter they still possess the means of forming somewhat of an estimate in the large and expressive picture of Mr. Bierstadt now on view at South Kensington. Mr. Coffin's powers of description are exhausted upon these truly sublime monuments of nature's grandeur. The vast cones of granite that border the valley have taken their names from a fancied resemblance to the Domes of a cathedral or mosque. But what is the architecture of Damascus or Stamboul to this handiwork of the Almighty?—

> The domes of St Sophia and Suliman, so beautiful from the Bosphorus, so mean when we approach them, bear no more comparison to those of the Sierras than the card-houses reared by children bear to the city of London. The gray granite fashions itself into mansions, palaces, and cathedrals. Imagination pictures a celestial city above the clouds. The setting sun, falling on fields of gleaming snow, illumines its jasper walls and pearly gates with heavenly light.
> Suddenly we find ourselves on the brink of an awful chasm. One mad leap of our horse, and we should fall three-fourths of a mile! The heart ceases for a moment to beat. We hold our breath. The brain reels. No word of exclamation. Every voice is hushed. The soul stands in awe before this revelation of Omnipotence. This is God's work. Eternal might alone cleft the chasm, rived the rock, and reared the lofty domes. So vast, grand, majestic, so filled with God's presence, is this cathedral of his, that we dare not speak. Hang over the chasm, if your nerves are steady enough, and look into its depths. Those little green points, like plants just springing from a garden bed, are gigantic forest-trees. That foliage of brighter hue, no larger than a tuft of grass, is an oak, which has withstood the storms of centuries. That thread of silver winding through the valley is a river, which has poured its flood down a precipice twenty-seven hundred feet. The opposite wall of the chasm rises three-fourths of a mile. It is a perpendicular rock, without seam or scar to mar its beauty.
>
> Overwhelmed by the scene, we can only gaze as one who has suddenly passed into a higher existence and beholds things "not lawful for a man to utter." We think of that holy city which Bunyan's Pilgrim saw beyond the river, from the Delectable Mountains. The sublimest imagery of the Revelation of St. John, portraying the transcendent glory of the New Jerusalem, alone is adequate to describe it. White clouds rest above it as the angelic host hovered over the hills of Bethlehem, and sung the sweetest music ever heard on earth. The Merced, like the river of life proceeding from the throne of God, winds down from the celestial city, making glad the peaceful vale.
>
> Like the song of the redeemed is the music of the many-voiced waters, swelling upward through the evening air. We behold beauty, grandeur, majesty, immensity, and omnipotence, and hear the Te Deum Laudamus ever ascending.
> There are eight persons in our company, and we join in singing Old Hundred; but how insignificant! The only fitting choir would be the whole church militant singing the Hallelujah Chorus of the Messiah!

The falls of the Yosemite have a descent of nearly 2,700 feet, broken at one point by a cascade. From the summit of the granite cliff of Tu-toch-ar-nu-lah—the "Great Chief" or El Capitan—the Po-ho-no, or "wind spirit," otherwise christened the "bridal veil," falls in silver spray 900 feet. From the lake to the summit of the South Dome is not far from 6,000 feet. This dome has been riven perpendicularly "as by the sword stroke of the Almighty." And what a chasm is the result! "Bring New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Washington, Chicago—all the churches, warehouses, shops, stores, dwellings—tumble them all in, and it will not be full."

We are constantly reminded how much purer English is spoken and written by Americans than by ourselves. It behoves us, therefore, to take heed of such casual lessons as may enable us to bring up our notions of what is correct or chaste in style to the level of the latest and best Transatlantic standard. We are grateful for any hints which a visitor so recent and so vivacious as our author has to bring to bear upon our old-fashioned diction. The novelty of certain idioms to our ears involves, we have sometimes to complain, somewhat of obscurity, as when we are told at a Chinese dinner "there is no letting up of etiquette." We are not so familiar as our teachers and models in precision with walking "on the streets," nor do we find fault with our ships for omitting to arrive "on time." We hardly know whether to credit the printers or the scientific men of America with the discovery of the rotation of the earth "on its axes," or with so much tampering with the transmutation of metals as is implied in the "wealth of the plains being transmitted into golden grain." Haste, or want of familiarity with local names or events, may excuse such minor slips as making Sir H. Laurence telegraph "from Calcutta" during the mutiny. Mr. Coffin's style is in general correct and clear, and his information not less sound than varied. The woodcuts interspersed among his pages deserve a word of commendation. They are drawn with vigour and truth, often showing touches of quaint and quiet humour. The group of perspiring wretches melting away in the state-room of the Baroda down the Red Sea, and the imperious Briton (uncovenanted, we will suppose) with his full-blown vulgar wife and limp washed-out children "going home," are remarkable for compressed fun. Altogether, if there is nothing new under the sun, Our New Way round the World shows there may be much novelty and freshness in the mode of telling even a thrice-told tale.

THE PARKS, PROMENADES, AND GARDENS OF PARIS.*

IF ever we are to have a State-appointed ædile, with unclipped pinions and plenary purse-power, we trust that he may call Mr. Robinson to his counsels. For what his last year's Gleanings from French Gardens partially indicated is now set beyond doubt by his maturer and larger work on the Parks and Gardens of Paris, namely, that he has taste, discrimination, and experience in all that appertains to horticultural reform, and that under his advice, the ornamentation of our urban open spaces would be conducted on the principle of economic adaptation of the right tree or shrub to the right place, and no longer provoke the clamour—

Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis.

In the lucidly written and thoroughly illustrated book before us the horticulturist and landscape-gardener, whether professional or amateur, will find an invaluable guide to those features of the French capital which are likely to form their chief inducement to a trip to Paris, and even the lounger may do worse than avail himself of it as a manual for help in pleasing his eye, expanding his sense of enjoyment, and luxuriating in the charms of fruit, flowers, and foliage. But it has a higher scope than to satisfy the curiosity of a class, or to minister to the pastime of John Bull abroad, for, while in its six hundred pages there is no lack of hints as to park and pleasaunce, fruit-garden and kitchen-garden, for the gardeners of our rich men to profit by, its primary object throughout is the health, comfort, and rational enjoyment of the masses; and a vast proportion of the improvements which the author would have us borrow from across the Channel is designed for their advancement in taste, their larger means of recreation, and their cheaper supply of fruit and vegetables.

To speak generally, the work divides itself pretty equally between ornamental and useful gardening, and while in each division the writer claims for his own country equal merit with the French, or even superior merit as to some points, his statements upon the whole must, we fear, satisfy the unprejudiced reader that in our ideas, processes, and progress as to horticulture we are about two centuries behind our Parisian rivals. Not, indeed, that all the blame lies at the English gardener's door. What shall we say of the "Woods and Forests," or the "Department of Public Works"? The cardinal point of public gardening in Paris is its accessibility to the poorest inhabitant of the most wretched quarter. Leafage, verdure, and the fresh scent of flowers spring up, as by magic (the magic of "Haussmannization"), in the midst of densely packed streets and suburbs. The lanes and rookeries have not to pour out their denizens once a week to the distant park, as with us; but find squares, "places," and public gardens brought near to them. The credit of the first idea of a square belongs to us; but we have allowed the Emperor Napoleon to appropriate it to a use undreamed of in our philosophy—the enjoyment and civilization of the poorer classes. To quote Mr. Robinson's eloquent words, "Public gardening in Paris follows the street builders with trees, turns the little squares into gardens unsurpassed for good taste and beauty, drops down graceful fountains here and there, and margins them with flowers; it presents to the eye of the poorest workman every charm of vegetation; it brings him pure air, and aims directly and effectively at the recreation and benefit of the people." Such are the results which he would have our metropolitan Boards seek in exchange for isolated parks, for the square-gardens which by their rails say "Stand by" and "Enter not" to all except the "golden-key" holders, and for the dreary attempts at making green our public places, of which the tubbed bay-trees in Trafalgar Square are a significant type. The more so, because this throwing open of public places abroad has been attended by neither damage nor detriment—a fact which sets thinking English folks longing for the day when the exchange of blank dusty pavement for unlimited greensward may effect at least the partial civilization of the irrepressible street Arab.

To teach his readers how they do these things in Paris, Mr. Robinson accompanies them from the Place de la Concorde, up the avenue of the Champs-Elysées, and into the Gardens of the Louvre and the Tuileries to the Bois de Boulogne and the Bois de Vincennes, the Parcs Monceau and Des Buttes Chaumont, the Jardin des Plantes and the Gardens of the Luxembourg, detailing the characteristics of each, and dilating upon every point that is worth imitating. As he pauses—e.g., beside the lakes in the Bois de Boulogne—he discusses the superiority of permanent embellishment to fleeting annual display, and the wisdom of attending most to those choice hardy trees and shrubs which, if costly to plant, involve no after cost or care. He notes, too, a variety, in which we fail, in the French adaptation of special classes of plants to special localities. The sheltered nook receives the choicer trees and shrubs; the open knoll its double-cherries, almonds, plums, pears, double peaches, and a whole group of rosaceous trees; the alluvial flat the herbaceous families of Northern Asia, America, and Europe; and the rocky mound free-growing hardy Alpines. In short, he is bent upon hewing down the old dumb idol—uniformity—where he finds its worship in existence, in emulation of the beautiful varieties which a Parisian park discloses. But of the larger parks, gardens, and boulevards, with their perfect roadways, well-watered swards, and distinguishing specialities—flowers in one, subtropicals in another, hardy trees and shrubs in a third, and elsewhere a judicious blending of all three—as well as of the vast municipal and imperial depôts for the production of trees and shrubs and fruits and flowers for the use of the Court and the city, our readers have heard in the "Gleanings." A fresher interest will attach to the descriptions of the squares, places, and church-gardens, which give us a wrinkle, if we would but take it, as to what to do with precious open spaces in London. Of these squares, the first mentioned is that around the Tour de St.-Jacques, upraised on the site of old buildings and narrow streets, and in no such aristocratic quarters as Belgravia or Brompton. By its treasures of light and shade, of grouped and isolated trees, its belts of grass with beds and masses here and there, now of the dwarf fan-palm, now of edible Caladiums rising out of a ground of fragrant Mignonette with an edging of Gnaphalium, its subtropical shrubs, and its grand old tower dating back as far as 1508, this square attracts hundreds upon hundreds of the lower classes to a treat as rare and as rich as any that could be set before princes. Another, the Square des Batignolles, has for its main feature a meandering stream, whose margins are embellished with plants, and the sloping grass sides bordered with densely-planted and well-watered shrubs. Another square—less in size than our Leicester Square—struck Mr. Robinson, in the "days of drought" last August, as the ne plus ultra of glistening verdure, and divided his admiration with a species of Cinna that was handsomer than Pampas grass, and a handsome specimen of Bambusa aurea. Among the other squares and 'places' dwelt upon in this chapter is one which affords a good hint for utilizing old ruins. It is the Garden of the "Palais des Thermes," which includes ancient ruins and a museum of antiquities in its green and shady precincts. The author remarks that, "as in most cities there are old ruins bearing some resemblance to those in this garden, it may not be amiss to say that they are always enhanced by being surrounded with the simplest kind of garden. Ivy, grass, a few hardy trees and shrubs, are sufficient to change their aspect from grimness, hardness, and decay, to living interest. A few shillings' worth of the seeds of Alpine plants shaken in the tufts of moss or cracks of mortar would give rise to a dwarf vegetation interesting in itself, but doubly so as markedly illustrating the ceaseless flow of life even in the most unlikely places." He cites, in proof of his remarks, the grounds of the Museum at York, and perhaps we might add, as a case in point, the Bishop's Garden at Wells. The best-known and most striking instance of a church-garden in Paris is that of the Trinité—a blending, it would seem, of horticultural with architectural embellishment, but perhaps more purely gardenesque are the grounds of the Church of St.-Clothilde, where it can be no effort of imagination to realize the psalmist's similitude of the soul to "a well-watered garden." Alas for the obvious contrast of these green spots to our London graveyards, which, though their original occupation is gone, still wear an aspect of dreary repulsiveness. Mr. Robinson does good service in warning those who would relieve this against the error "of planting evergreens for London smut to encrust and blacken." Here, as in the Boulevards which he sanguinely hopes to see along the now "shanty"-covered space of Tottenham Court Road, or, in any case, in the openings to which "the Thames Embankment must be the backbone," he would plant such hardy and deciduous trees as the Occidental Plane, the Horse Chestnut, the Robinia, and those less common contemners of drought and dust, the Paulownia and the Ailanthus. The Elm depends upon selection; its effect is wretched in the Mall in St. James's Park, better in Rotten Row, and excellent in the Boulevard St.-Michel, where it is the large-leafed Elm that is planted. Mr. Robinson condemns the Lime in London Parks, as becoming "prematurely sore and yellow"; in streets and boulevards, because it has a diseased appearance half the time it should be green, and in the front of town gardens, because of its exuberant growth, to clip which, however, is not only bad taste, but a work of labour and expense. For its glossy health and vigour he recommends the Lombardy Poplar, its compressed growth being another recommendation. We are not sure that we should care to see city avenues of it, though it would be very striking in a town churchyard. Amongst weeping trees he commends the "weeping large-leafed Elm" as well suited to a London atmosphere, and for town gardens of reasonable size; and also the "Sophora Japonica pendula," which is always densely green, and indifferent to dryness of soil. The former of these may be seen in perfection on the lawn of the Botanic Gardens, Regent's Park; and for proof that

* The Parks, Promenades, and Gardens of Paris, considered in relation to the Wants of our own Cities, and of Public and Private Gardens. By W. Robinson, F.L.S., Correspondent of the Times for the Horticultural Department of the Great Paris Exhibition. London: John Murray. 1869.

Plane trees will flourish in London we are referred to Berkel Square, and the still less likely locale of Stationers' Hall Cour Paternoster Row. All the free-growing trees of the Rose orde or of tribes associated with it, will do well for town growth, an are preferable to "the soot-covered objects called evergreens b courtesy"; from the number of which, however, our autho excepts the Japan Privet, a sweet ornamental shrub with leav "as large as a goodly orange," and flowers the size of those c the white lilac. Of other evergreen shrubs that seem to disregard smoke, the Aucubas, Hollies, Box, Berberis, Rhododendrons and Caucasian Laurels, are the best and hardiest.

To judge by his chapter on Versailles, and the gardens o Fontainebleau, St. Cloud, and Meudon, Mr. Robinson is no frien to the traditions of Le Notre, and regards the triumphs of marbl or plaster, and the fountains which, like those of the Bassin de Neptune, cost 10,000 francs each time they play, as quite alien tc real horticulture. And though he considers himself bound tc of Fontainebleau into the adjacent grounds where the famou M. Souchet cultivates the gladiolus so successfully. This is th best proof we can give that, in the crusade he preaches against our neglect of public gardening, and our unwillingness to borrow really useful hints thereupon from the French, Mr. Robinson is not bitten by any Gallic mania, but retains the keen love of nature which is the safest and truest instinct of the horticulturist.

It is for this reason that we should like to see him associated with the idile our fancy pictured at the outset. But the latter hall of his book points to such reforms and improvements in our growth and supply of fruit and vegetables that we doubt whether he ought not rather to be attached to the Commissariat. His thorough and broad grasp of the whole subject of fruit and kitchen gardens qualifies him herein to be the accredited Mentor of country gentlemen and of market-gardeners. Whether the majority of ou paid gardeners will at once accept him as such is another question their conversion to his views will probably be a work of time, shorter or longer according as they read, or refuse to read, his book. For ourselves, we are so strongly persuaded by its perusal that we can think of no more practical exercise of benevolence and utility, at the same time, than for those who can afford it to send a dozen or two of gardeners' sons to France, to acquire and bring home the secrets of improved budding and grafting, pruning and training. To glance at this half of the volume, and to take first apple-culture, Mr. Robinson maintains that, while for the average fruit of our markets well-managed standards and naturally developed apple-trees will suffice, choice dessert fruits can be grown not only to satisfy home consumption, but also for export, by the more general adoption of the Cordon. The principle of this form of growth is, to bring one good branch near the ground, where it gets more heat, inflicts less shade, and may be most easily protected; and to limit the tree to that one branch. Running horizontally at a foot from the ground, it is trained against garden-walls; finds room, as seen in p. 337, in bilateral development along the low wall of a plant-house; or serves as the very best edging of the quarters of a fruit or vegetable garden. Of this form, limiting a tree to a single branch, bearing fruit-spurs only, and never suffered to ramify, Mr. Robinson is, in England at least, the apostle, although there are those who object to his plan the late frosts of this country, and the tendency of our climate to encourage a growth of gross wood. This objection he would meet by insisting on the use of the French Paradise stock upon which to graft cordon apples. This stock needs not, as the Doucin (a vigorous and deep rooting variety of it), root-pruning or mutilation to repress its vigour, but suits well the stiff loamy and wet soils which have been commonly with us so hostile to fruit culture. The cordon principle, in its simpler development, is so neat and economical, and, properly carried out, so ornamental, that we cannot doubt its eventual adoption for choicer apples. The case is not the same with pears or peaches. For the former the cordon is less adapted, because, if trained along the low front of a glass-house, or as a border-edging, it pushes too vigorously, and, from its pendulous habit, is apt to get its fruit soiled and splashed. The peach suits the cordon better, yet it may be doubted, and so thinks our author, whether, with improved pruning and more thorough protection, and the substitution of neat, thin wire, tightened by a little instrument called a "raidisseur," for nails and shreds, aught better than our own wall-training is to be desired for this fruit. The presence of the pear as a dessert fruit amongst us during eight months of the year may, Mr. Robinson asserts, be ensured, (1) by an improved system of orcharding, (2) by grafting in deep rich soils, on a quince-stock, and (3) by growing the choice sorts against a wall where they have warmth and protection. But the mainstay of the pear is the French "espalier," which, exploding the old wooden supports, uses instead neat uprights of T-iron, connected with slender galvanized wire, strained by the "raidisseur" above mentioned. In the Versailles fruit-gardens these skirt the garden-walks, occasionally with a low line of cordon apples betwixt them and the pathway. A modification of this plan is the double trellis, which economizes space and saves one set of wires. We can conceive that the tedious process of forming the Palmette Verrier might daunt the average English gardener, but there is nothing that he might not thankfully copy in the French espalier. Indeed, if he wishes for French success in fruit culture, he must take one or two hints beside this. If he will condescend to protect the blossom of his espalier fruit trees by a canvas awning, as at Versailles, or a thatch such as is described elsewhere, and of his wall-fruit by a permanent coping, to which he can attach temporary mats, protecting the stem meanwhile by bark or boards; if, too, he can be induced to believe what universal French usage and Mr. Robinson's common sense arguments avouch, that white walls are best for all wall-fruit, as "not only reflecting heat on the trees trained against them, but also on others in their neighbourhood," we see not why he may not in time rival the out-door culture of the vine at Thomery, the pear at Versailles, and the peach at Montreuil.

Were there space, we might introduce our readers to the Parisian market-gardens, never before so vividly and instructively described, with their eightfold rotation of crops, and the unfailing salad stuffs, which are due in great part to the "cloche" or "bell-glass," which, as a gleaning from a French garden, Mr. Robinson has persuaded a London firm to manufacture for English use. In like manner he has prevailed on another London house to keep in stock the various iron implements in use in horticulture, which his observation abroad has led him to think would prove godsends at home in our gardens; and indeed such is his energy, enthusiasm, and persuasiveness, that we quite expect to hear of his chapter on Parisian underground mushroom-culture (to which we must be content to refer our readers for a novel and genuine sensation) stimulating British enterprise to turn to account our used-up mines and caverns, and to make subterranean paths "bud all over with rows of mushrooms." The illustrations of this curious chapter are particularly good, and indeed those which are scattered over the whole volume assist in making doubly clear the lessons of a clearly and cleverly written work.

HOME FROM INDIA.*

HAD Home from India been anonymous, and were literary partnerships as common here as in France, we should have pronounced it the joint production of Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Malaprop. Mr. Pomeroy has modelled his style on these great mistresses of our language with a success which places him at the head of the living representatives of the school. To our mind, however, it is a style whose peculiar beauties pall in the course of prolonged narration, although they are eminently adapted to dialogue; and in the writer's own interest it seems shortsighted to impose a sustained intellectual strain on the reader who counted on floating down the stream of a story in dreamy repose. In application of epithet and adjustment of words to shades of meaning, Mr. Pomeroy reminds one of gentlemen unaccustomed to public speaking, who nervously tumble over their lips anything that happens to come dancing across their troubled brains. His successive pages recall those exercises in books on English composition which are designedly overcharged with blunders to test the critical sagacity of the student. Yet on second thoughts we must own this latter simile to be hardly a happy one, for some of even the shortest sentences in this book are so involved that it would puzzle a professed decypherer of hieroglyphics, or a constant student of prophecy, to guess at their meaning. Were it not for the freedom with which he indulges in elision, Mr. Pomeroy would deserve even more credit than we can give him for the rare ingenuity with which he fastens a dozen words in a knot that no intellect can untie. But to stimulate interest by arbitrarily dropping words must be placed among the rudest forms or tricks of art, for it is necessarily within the compass of the meanest powers. Habitual readers of novels of sentiment and sensation get used of course to a dearth of verbs and a plethora of hyphens, until at last they come to follow their favourite authors with the comparative facility of a reporter going over his own shorthand notes. But Mr. Pomeroy, we predict, will stagger even experts like these, for he generally selects for rejection those very words that must have contained the key to his meaning, had he had one. There can be no question that his book creates that sort of interest, painful almost to weariness, which is the lot of the man who has to fall back on a volume of far-fetched conundrums without the answers attached, or who sets himself late in the season to break a dish of filberts, and in all the nuts can scarcely find a kernel.

After our discriminating praise we feel bound to cull a few of Mr. Pomeroy's simple beauties, and we shall take them at random from the first dozen pages of his book. Thus he presents his own handiwork in a wealth of metaphor, whose gravest fault seems to us its utter inappropriateness:—

> If the structures are irregular, grant the fact that such are more picturesque, as old houses are that have had additions at different periods, as feudal mansions are held together with ivy, as old balconies half-covered with luxuriant vines which link the framework with strength and beauty. I should like to write of "wisdom, strength, and beauty," the masonic emblem, but, from mere similitude, I must slip into my allotted groove.

Thus he introduces his first group of heroines, three elderly graces:—

> It was sometimes questioned by people's own minds why they had never married, since they had still beauty, and were known to possess the highest form of virtues; in fact, had marriage been their lot, the utter self-abnegation would probably have rendered their characters all in favour of their husbands, and themselves would have claimed love and protection.

* Home from India. A Novel. By John Pomeroy, Author of "Until the End, &c." 2 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1869.

Then he presents a couple of doctors :—

Dr. More, his father, and also John Barclay I could defend if need be—the latter having been educated and brought up for a profession, may well be counted aristocratic, but both will be found worthy of a good word.

And the chapter closes with this beautiful moral and poetical conception :—

The Miss Seytons . . . well trained, and handsome in mind and body bestowed pleasure and comfort. Life's evening with them took its characte from the consistent evenness of earlier years ; an appendix to their hearts it is well to pause and rest over such life—" that makes old age look lovely."

Mr. Pomeroy, with the boldness of a man conscious of genius, does not shrink from bringing the tender, the sublime, and the ridiculous into hazardous contact. One of the passages that seem to us the most touching is where Dr. More, whose feelings have got the better of him during dinner, let fall a tear on "the débris on his plate." In reading novels by a man of thought, you may often enjoy the advantage of seeing matured reflections on great national questions unpretendingly conveyed. Mr. Pomeroy's views on our Volunteer and Militia forces will have unusual interest at the present time :—

Captain Cowper took interest in the Volunteers and Militia of Canalton shire, some of whose officers—fine country gentlemen—were generally with him. One need not enter into a dissertation on the Volunteer movement in England and its good effects, which are accepted, and the Militia has too well understood advantages besides its band and its uniform, which are too often put forth as principal, for us to take into consideration. To withhold or deny is not our affair.

So far as we can express an opinion on the plot, we cannot say that it errs on the side of narrowness of conception. We confess frankly, however, that we only speak from occasional glances caught through the mist that exhales from the author's peculiar style. We seem to see three parallel currents that refuse to mingle, and are only forced to blend at last by the violent application of machinery. Beside them are rivulets innumerable, each running its little independent course, rising from the ground and sinking into it again, utterly refusing to be absorbed in the main stream. No one can complain of want of variety of characters, if not of character, for the chapters are crowded with them until they have scarcely elbow room. Whenever any one comes on the stage incidentally, if only to give a message or cook a dinner, immediately Mr. Pomeroy seizes on him, names him, indicates some little trait in his idiosyncrasy, and then, when he has fixed our attention on him, dismisses him summarily to the limbo whence he was evoked. We admit willingly that there is much to be learned from the story. Jeames de la Pluche read Pelham many times over when studying to be a gentleman, and people who fancy they have a fair general knowledge of society will be surprised to find how many hints on life Mr. Pomeroy can give them. For, although the scene is laid in the country, most of the personages are of good standing, and many of them must necessarily have moved in the best society. One of the most marked, Mrs. More of Thorby, is graven in on the reader, as she sports time after time the same fine-lady airs, and repeats the cuckoo complaint of her husband being dragged out at all hours to visit patients. The Mores are altogether a mysterious family. The husband is represented as a man of eminent common sense—a reproduction of Dr Thorne, in fact. His son by the first marriage, although of quiet and very simple tastes, has gone into the 1st Life Guards. The father practises actively, although they live in great luxury. Mrs. More has her carriage, and everything an indulgent husband can give her, but no maid—a shortcoming which, strange to say, is forced on her for the first time when she learns in the course of conversation the extraordinary circumstance that the lady she is talking to has got one. She takes the style of Mrs More "of Thorby"—Thorby being the town they live in—and her husband suffers it, and her step-son, the Life-guardsman, lets his friend so address her invariably to her face, without pulling him up for his impertinence. This step-son, Cecilton, represented as an exceedingly rational, self-possessed young man, falls madly in love with an enormous pair of eyes that flash past him in a lane in a pony chaise. Their owner is heroine of the most tragic of the three tales. He discovers where she lives, wanders off to gaze on the place from a distance, sees a gentleman walking across the fields, and feels "an agony seize him." Even in that extremity, however, his presence of mind does not utterly fail him. Instead of dropping where he stood, he rushed into the cover of a shrubbery, and there "actually rolled in his agony, and did shed tears—drops of human agony." His roll over, he sits up, his coat covered with dead grass and fir-needles, as the author realistically remarks, feels his pulse, and to his great astonishment finds it "not so calm as it usually beats." He "tries to look facts in the face," in which he is more successful than might have been anticipated, for he brands himself as an ass and a fool and a confounded idiot. The companion sketch to Cecilton More—that of John Barclay, his fidus Achates, and the surgeon of his distinguished corps—is scarcely inferior in vigour. Barclay retains all the happy freshness of his boyhood, and goes time after time to revel in the jokes and horsemanship of a country circus. He falls deeply in love with a pair of sisters, and seriously discusses with the sensible Mrs. More and her family circle, over the dinner-table, which of the two he ought to marry. His intended and her family are singularly unliterary in their tastes and matter-of-fact in their talk, so he entertains them with such light, playful, unaffected badinage as this :—

"Oh that I were by the Golden River, the Dardax of Xenophon ! now as Sir Francis Baurie would tell us the Nahr-el-Dhahab. I wish I had the Sabakheh Lake beside me."

"Do, Marian, hand him the salt," said Amy much amused, for she saw what he wanted.

Extraordinary instance of the fond intuition of affection ! The daughter of this Sir Francis Baurie is a gem in her way. She studies practically the beauties of the poets, ancient and modern, in a series of visits to the scenes that live in their rhymes. The story of her wanderings reads like a stave from the Groves of Blarney. "She had visited every classic spot of which Homer sung or Latin poets over-rated." Pretty well for a young lady in the early flush of youth and beauty ; but not only had she followed Byron from Spezzia to Missolonghi—perhaps she killed several birds with one stone there, and did her Byron while working off the Odyssey and the overrated Romans—but she actually made her way to Abbotsford. Her travels, which extended to Jeddo, made her, as we can believe, "the sensation of the night" when she appeared ; but nothing gained her more attention than the discovery Colonel Fitzallan made, that she had passed the last winter in Rome. This literal woman of the world, a Christianized wandering Jewess in seven-leagued boots, bestows her hand and wealth on the curate, Mr. Burnaby, who has a mysterious attraction for every one he meets of either sex. So shy and awkward is he that, when he first comes into a room with these old ladies, he has to seat himself in a chair while they kindly give him time to recover himself. Yet ere this he has conquered the hand of the brilliant Miss Baurie, and we wonder at it the less when we find men of the world falling in love with him when he has scarcely opened his lips, and, like Mr. Toots with Captain Cuttle, begging formally for the pleasure of his friendship.

For all that we have noted, we have dipped almost at random ; and we can safely say that the marvels of the remaining characters are no whit inferior, and that the whole of the book is on the same level of merit. In each page you light unexpectedly on some fresh fact, on some happily turned and novel phrase, on some evidence of the all-pervading Arcadian simplicity of the place where the scenes are laid, whose atmosphere makes the men and women who come there out of the world, talk, think, and act like the natives. We have balls attended by the officers of "the Army, Navy, and Volunteers," where "the nobility and gentry of the county" are reported among the tagrag and bobtail. We have officers walking miles out to dinner in the country in goloshes, where, had the state of the roads suggested these feminine appendages, they had it in their power to have driven. We have a haunted house where the ghosts are left in possession. We have the meeting of two old friends who had separated but a few years before, and who talk together as they drive in the same car to the house of the father of one of them, without recognising each other, until something happens to be said that leads to an explanation. We learn that the privilege of franking letters used to be strictly limited to the peerage. A gentleman goes to Scotland "for some grouse"—not to buy a brace or two, but to shoot them, as it turns out. The French is admirable, and the geography worthy of one who gives reverent admiration to the adventurous traveller who has passed a winter in Rome. A party coming from Genoa "take berths in a steamer for England via Marseilles." How far the steamer made its way up the Rhone we are not informed. But the tourists managed to take Orange and Avignon, Bruges and Orleans, on their way to Paris ; so, even independently of the feat of getting the Flemish city into their boat, they must have been excellent customers to the French system of railways; and while we cannot imagine why they should have picked out Orleans as being worth while to cross France for, to the neglect of Tours, Poitiers, Chartres, &c., we only wonder that they did not manage to find Strasburg in their way. If we cannot heartily recommend Home from India for the interest of its style or the merits of its plot, we say unhesitatingly that at this moment we recollect no novel surpassing it in originality of style, freshness of character, and fertility of incident.

We have received a communication on the part of Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR, with reference to an article that appeared in the Saturday Review of June 19, on the subject of that gentleman's candidateship for Nottingham. The article was not meant to impute, and we think does not impute, that the language of the Law Magazine, reproduced by us from Mr. IRVING'S "Annals of Our Time," had been justifiable as applied to Mr. SEYMOUR. On the contrary, we stated that such language was "very improper," an expression which was not used by us ironically ; but, to avoid all misconception, we repeat that the language in question is not our language, and that its terms as applied to Mr DIGBY SEYMOUR appear to us wholly unwarrantable. With respect to Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR'S complaint that we insinuated that he had "obtained a judicial office by a corrupt bargain with the Government of Lord ABERDEEN," we beg leave to say that we do not desire to make any such insinuation ; but as we are not certain that some of the words employed by us may not be deemed capable of that interpretation, we have no objection to say that we regret that any expressions that can be so construed should have been used. As regards the judgment passed on Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR by the Benchers of his Inn, its effect was, we believe, fairly stated by us; but if there be any doubt on the point, we are ready either, if Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR wishes it, to publish the judgment in extenso, or else to substitute for our epitomized version of its effect, which Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR thinks "distorted," the bare statement, which we hope is not distorted, that the censure was one passed on Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR by the Benchers of his Inn in solemn form.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

GREAT as was the interest attaching to the explanation which Mr. GLADSTONE was to make on Thursday as to the intentions of the Government, this interest was lessened by the knowledge beforehand of the general tenor of what would be proposed. Mr. GLADSTONE has already announced that he should insist on his original Bill as it left the Commons, and the great Liberal constituencies had shown beyond mistake, not only that they would support him in this, but that they would be grievously disappointed if he took any other course. There can be no sort of doubt that a commanding majority of the electoral body of the United Kingdom has come to two conclusions, against which it is perfectly useless for the Lords or any one else to strive. The first of these conclusions is that, whereas Mr. GLADSTONE proposed one scheme and the Lords a second and totally different scheme, the former shall be accepted, and the latter rejected. The second of these conclusions is that there shall be no concurrent endowment. The arguments in favour of giving glebes and houses to the Catholics retain all their force, but the country is not prepared for the scheme. As Mr. BRIGHT said, the power of Mr. GLADSTONE, the most powerful Prime Minister of recent years, would shiver like glass if he proposed anything of the sort. Consequently the Ministry had nothing to do but to restore the Bill, with the most trivial alterations, to its old shape. All the amendments of the Lords are swept away that altered the Bill so as to give it the new character which the Lords managed to impart to it. They wished to give back to the disendowed Church almost all its endowments, and Mr. GLADSTONE calculated that the proposals of the Lords would result in restoring to the Anglican Church in Ireland fourteen-fifteenths of its property. This proposed bonus is all, or almost all, cut away. The Bishop of PETERBOROUGH's quarter of a million, the Archbishop of CANTERBURY's half million, Lord CARNARVON's million and a quarter, are all to be knocked off, although a curious scheme for rewarding rapid commutation may perhaps give a portion of what Lord CARNARVON proposed. And here we may pause to say that, on looking back, it is obvious that it was the Archbishop of CANTERBURY's most unwise proposal that the Church should keep the Ulster Glebes that first launched the Lords into the dangerous course of sketching out a Bill totally at variance with the Government Bill. In the next place, the Lords voted in a very hesitating way, and after many changes of opinion, for concurrent endowment, and the whole scheme of concurrent endowment was rejected by the Government. Nor did the whole triumph of Mr. GLADSTONE lie in the largeness of the majority by which his decision on this head was supported. He gained an almost equal victory in the line of argument which his most eminent opponents were driven to use against him. Both Mr. DISRAELI and Sir ROUNDELL PALMER urged that the Bill as it left the Commons was, on Mr. GLADSTONE's principle, too favourable and too generous to the Church, and that some compensation was due to other sects to repair the injustice. It must have been refreshing to the Cabinet to have had this acknowledgement made, after they had been obliged for weeks to listen to the bursts of derision with which any remarks to the effect that the Bill was a generous Bill to the Church were received in the Lords. Lastly, the Lords wished to defer the destination of the surplus, although this was not a very material part of their scheme, as there could not have been any surplus left after the provisions of their Bill had been parcelled out. Mr. GLADSTONE has restored the application of the surplus to his favourite works of mercy, although he has engrafted on his proposal a scheme for lending out the capital of the surplus to needy Irishmen, which, he says, was part of the original scheme, but which he omitted to notice while the Bill was passing through the Commons, and which certainly escaped general attention.

If the Bill, as re-altered by Mr. GLADSTONE, becomes law, the Lords will, with all their efforts and eloquence and endeavours to be calm and statesmanlike, have succeeded in gaining for the disestablished Church the three following advantages. Where an incumbent has not deducted the stipend of a permanent curate from his returns for income-tax, neither shall the amount of this stipend be deducted from the value of his life-interest; and clergymen who have gone on paying a hundred a year for a curate, and have also paid income-tax on this very hundred a year, are excellent citizens and very fond of paying taxes, and ought perhaps to be rewarded. In the next place, the Church body is to get half a million in lieu of private endowments, and this will be a bonus of a quarter of a million, as Mr. GLADSTONE reckons, beyond the value of the endowments, if his date of 1660 had been taken. Lastly, in dioceses where a very large portion of the annuitants agree to commute, an addition of seven per cent. on the life-interests shall be allowed. Both the latter of these advantages were offered voluntarily by the Government to the Lords, and so the only amendment which the Lords have in any way forced on the Government is that the salary of a curate shall not be deducted from the value of the life-interest of an incumbent who has voluntarily paid income-tax on that salary. Probably in all English history this is the smallest mouse that ever came out of so big a mountain. The proposal to give a bonus of seven per cent. where commutation is widely accepted, will, we presume, be accepted, as the House of Commons would accept any proposal Mr. GLADSTONE might choose to make. But it is difficult to see on what theoretical grounds it rests. Mr. GLADSTONE says that the lives of clergymen are worth seven per cent. more than the lives of laymen. If so, the life-interest of a clergyman is more valuable by seven per cent. than that of a layman. Whether a clergyman's neighbours commute or not, he ought to have the full value of his life-interest allowed him. If the tables framed for laymen are wrong for clergymen, the clergy ought to have their life-interests calculated according to proper tables adapted to their superior clerical constitutions. But then Mr. GLADSTONE goes off to quite another ground, and says that it is for the advantage of the State that there should be a wide and rapid commutation, and he proposes to reward the clergy of districts where such a commutation is effected, not by giving them an extra bonus or payment on behalf of the State for saving it trouble, which would be quite legitimate, but by calculating the lives of those commuting according to their true value. If two out of every three clergymen commute, their life-interests are to be treated as if clergymen were clergymen. If only one out of two commutes the life-interests of the commuting clergy are to be treated as if clergymen were laymen. We are at a loss to understand how this proposal would bear argument, if argument had anything to do with Mr. GLADSTONE's proposals. It is sufficient for the House of Commons that the proposal is Mr. GLADSTONE's proposal. And if it cannot be said that Mr. GLADSTONE showed much deference or consideration for the Lords and their amendments, his supporters went to the verge of indecorum in their desire to show their contempt for the Peers. Mr. GLADSTONE did not do much more than compare them to people in a balloon, who see the world from a great eminence, but are totally separated from the practical interests and occupations of the black specks they see moving along roads or over fields. His party appear to have grown frantic if any delay was interposed between them and their dear delight of rejecting another amendment of the Peers. It needed all Mr. DISRAELI's tact and imperturbable temper to preserve something like order in the Opposition under such a severe trial, and great credit is for the solicitude with which he avoided giving sion for offence, and the discretion with which he avoided useless divisions, and helped the business of the evening to go on.

It was in the proposal of the Government as to the surplus that the chief novelty of Mr. GLADSTONE's explanation was to be found. The income of the surplus is to be appropriated to works of mercy, but the capital is to be lent out in loans for the general benefit of Ireland. Considering the history of Irish loans generally, there need not be much more discussion as to whether the lunatics will or will not get too much. In answer to an Irish member, Mr. GLADSTONE said that loans to assist the deep-sea fishery of Ireland would quite come within the scope of what the Government contemplates, and a lunatic who managed to live on the yearly income derived from a loan given to an Irish deep-sea fishery would be so much cleverer than most sane men that no lodgings or living could be too handsome for him. Mr. GLADSTONE says that there was nothing in the Bill as it left the Commons inconsistent with the system of what are humorously termed reproductive loans, and possibly there was not. But no one will believe that this scheme had occurred to any one until, in a moment of extreme shortsightedness, the Lords had decided to defer the destination of the surplus. It was a great temptation to those who, like Mr. BRIGHT, were anxious to promote a land scheme, to find large sums of money thus thrown in their way. But the Lords were mainly induced to defer the destination of the surplus by a desire to give an opening hereafter for concurrent endowment. It was necessary to prevent this, and to make future concurrent endowment impossible, and yet it seemed very desirable to adopt the hint given by the Lords, and make the money available for a land scheme. To reconcile the two was, no doubt, difficult; but it must be owned that the difficulty has been solved in the most ingenious way. The destination of the surplus is fixed; the income is to be appropriated to a superior class of lunatics and other unfortunate people, but the capital may be lent out. There will be no large sums in hand with which glebes could be bought and houses built, and loans could not be made applicable for the purpose, because, if these loans were repaid—which they probably would be, as there would be a tangible security, and religious rivalry would keep watch over the borrowers—little advantage would be gained, because the Catholics would not like to bargain with the State, and because the words of the Act would probably be construed as making such loans illegal. The surplus is therefore, under Mr. GLADSTONE's scheme, so appropriated as to shut out concurrent endowment, but it is so applied as to give Mr. BRIGHT exactly what he wants. Mr. BRIGHT himself expressly advocated this, and stated it to be one of the greatest attractions of the Government proposal in his eyes, that it would enormously facilitate the operation of some such land scheme as that which he had shadowed out. If the Irish Church Bill is carried this year we shall have an Irish Land Bill next year, and whatever else it may contain it will, we may be now almost sure, contain a proposal to use the surplus of the Irish Church as a fund from which tenants may borrow to buy out landowners. Thus the Irish Church Bill has been made by the Lords to predetermine the character of the Irish Land Bill, and, so far as the interests of great proprietors go, this has been a serious blunder. But it is too late to repair the blunder now, and the best use the Lords can make of it is to read in it a warning not to legislate as if they were up in a balloon, but to consider what will practically happen according as they take one course or the other when an important alternative is submitted to their decision.

CENTRAL ASIA.

FEW things are more puzzling than the direct antagonism of English and of Indian opinion on questions connected with the affairs of Afghanistan and of Central Asia. The writer of a well-known pamphlet on The Central-Asian Question from an Eastern Standpoint, and Major EVANS BELL in a short work called The Oxus and the Indus, represent the all but unanimous condemnation by Indian writers of the administration and policy of Lord LAWRENCE. It is a painful duty to study the literature of political despair which has long been current in India. The habitual reader of pamphlets and newspaper articles has some difficulty in avoiding the conclusion that, while each successive Viceroy exceeds his predecessor in imbecility and turpitude, it matters little after all whether the inevitable collapse of a moribund Empire is accelerated by the addition of one or two blunders to the accumulated folly of generations. The able author of The Central-Asian Question explains the inefficiency of the native army, the numerical weakness of the English garrison, and the universal disaffection of princes and people, with so much clearness and force as to weaken his denunciation of Sir JOHN LAWRENCE's neutrality between SHERE ALI and his rivals. It rarely happens that an Indian writer suggests any policy for the future, although he may prove that the course which has been hitherto adopted was the most perverse which could be devised by official stupidity. The alarmists seem to gloat over the inextricable difficulties which they describe, as in their highly probable anticipation that the subsidies which have been at last granted to the ruler of Afghanistan will fail to secure his gratitude or fidelity. It is perhaps not for ignorant Europeans to doubt whether earlier and more seasonable favours might not have been equally unproductive of substantial return. If the Russian Government thinks it worth while to bid against the VICEROY, the AMEER is not likely to refuse any advantageous offer; but the inutility of Sir JOHN LAWRENCE's gift, and of the meeting at Umballa, would be more conclusively proved if it were explained what more Lord MAYO or his predecessor could have done to ensure the Afghan alliance, when it was found that SHERE ALI had established himself at Cabul. It is indisputable that Sir JOHN LAWRENCE miscalculated the result of the civil war which followed the death of DOST MAHOMMED; and he was probably too hasty in recognising a pretender whose tenure of power was, as the result showed, insecure. After a race it becomes evident that it would have been advantageous to back the winning horse; yet, if AFZUL or AZIM had finally prevailed in the struggle, the VICEROY would have been severely blamed by his present accusers for any leaning which he might have shown to SHERE ALI. All parties agree in thinking that English interests require the maintenance of an undisputed and steady Government in Afghanistan, and to ordinary understandings the recent grants of money and arms seem to be measures conducive to the desired object. SHERE ALI is not likely to suppose that the friendship of the Indian Government is due to any sentimental preference for his person. If he is satisfied that he will be exempt from encroachment, and that he has a fair chance of receiving occasional assistance, he may perhaps prefer a powerful patron whom he knows to a new and doubtful protector from the North.

It may be doubted whether the ready approval of his countrymen at home consoles Lord LAWRENCE for the sweeping vituperation which he receives from Indian civilians and soldiers; but Mr. EASTWICK and Sir C. WINGFIELD speak from local knowledge and experience; and Mr. GRANT DUFF, while he represents the India Office in the House of Commons, brings to the aid of his official position an unusual amount of political and historical knowledge. Foreign politics are not Mr. GLADSTONE's strong point, and his statement of the satisfactory relations between England and Russia may be regarded as conventional; but the rest of the recent debate was interesting and instructive. Mr. EASTWICK expressed an opinion, not generally entertained, that Persia rather than Afghanistan is the natural bulwark of India against Russian aggression. He even seemed to regret that the SHAH had not been allowed to establish himself at Herat, although it is notorious that the Persian troops, in some of the sieges of the town, have been directed by Russian officers. It is constantly alleged, by persons who are supposed to understand Eastern politics, that the influence of Russia at the Persian Court is paramount; and of two allies a preference ought to be given to a neighbour who is more open than a distant potentate to influence and coercion. For obvious reasons Russia must be more formidable than England at Teheran, while Cabul is both accessible to an Indian force and for the present exempt from Russian attack. It is one of the most plausible charges against Lord LAWRENCE that he was willing to recognise Herat as a separate principality, although its ruler must necessarily have relied on Persian protection against his hostile kinsmen of Cabul. Mr. EASTWICK differs widely from the Indian pessimists, passing even into the opposite extreme of disputing the probability of a conflict with Russia. There is no doubt that Asia is large enough for both Powers; but it is highly probable that a civilized possessor of Central Asia will sooner or later be affected by the same motives which induced former conquerors to covet the acquisition of the fertile plains of India. The pamphleteer prophets of evil are careful to enumerate the forces which a Russian invader might collect in Central Asia and Afghanistan. As they characteristically observe, the supposed auxiliaries and subject tribes would be more numerous than the native army in India, and far superior in warlike quality. The philippics which are addressed to Lord LAW-

DENCE and the Indian Government in general are probably read with avidity at St. Petersburg, nor will the impression of English weakness be effaced by the astuteness of ingenious journalists who ostentatiously affect to regard with satisfaction the extension of Russian civilization into Bokhara and Khiva. As long as Russian and English policy are directly opposed to one another in South-Eastern Europe, it is absurd to dissemble the uneasiness which is caused by the possible intervention of Russia in Indian affairs. If another war were to break out in Turkey or the neighbouring regions, there would undoubtedly be attempts to create a diversion by intrigues with Afghanistan, with Persia, and with malcontents in India. It is as idle to profess absolute security as it is undignified and imprudent to invite attention to all the vulnerable points of the Indian Empire. Although Russians are not addicted to depreciating their own resources, it is well known that their Government is neither infallible in its policy nor omnipotent to accomplish its designs.

Mr. GRANT DUFF's elaborate and accurate exposition of the progress and limits of Russian conquest only proved the undoubted fact that there is at present no risk of invasion or even of molestation. Thirty thousand men scattered over a vast and barren region occupied by unfriendly tribes are not likely to advance through the passes of Afghanistan to attack an army, of three times their force, to the south of the mountains. ALEXANDER the GREAT, indeed, led his victorious troops by Balkh and Khiva and Bokhara into the Punjab; but the race of demigods is extinct, and the Russians are not Macedonians and Greeks attacking undisciplined barbarians. The danger of invasion is still remote, but it will almost certainly approach nearer as the Russians consolidate and extend their conquests. It may be confidently assumed that they will never attempt an entrance into India until they can reckon on the alliance of Afghanistan, and on the complicity of some portion of the Hindoo or Mussulman population. If there should be again wars of succession among the descendants of DOST MOHAMMED, some pretenders will undoubtedly obtain the countenance of the Russian authorities, even if substantial aid is not furnished. The chance of such a contingency affords a justification for the recent negotiations with SHERE ALI, who may perhaps not share the satisfaction of the House of Commons with the assurances of the Government that it is not intended to continue his pension. In the absence of accurate knowledge of all the circumstances of the case it would be rash to determine the exact line of policy which ought to be adopted by the Indian Government, but it may be confidently asserted that there is no presumption in such cases against the use of subsidies. The motives which ought to induce the Afghan AMEER to keep the Russians at a distance are likely to be perceptibly strengthened by an occasional exercise of judicious liberality. The assailants of the Indian Government remark with perfect truth that SHERE ALI may perhaps put himself up to auction, if at any time it suits the purpose of Russia to purchase his support; but a smaller bribe from a patron whose interests coincide with his own may not improbably be preferred. Any sagacious Afghan ruler will understand that England pays him to be independent, and that Russia could only employ his services if he were content to act as a subordinate ally. No invasion of India by the Bolam or Khyber Passes could be prudently undertaken until the fidelity of the AMEER or of his successors was secured beyond all risk of uncertainty or caprice. If the enterprise were accomplished it would be necessary to hold Afghanistan in force for the purpose of protecting the communications of the army, and consequently SHERE ALI would become a subject or dependent of Russia. On the other hand, he is well assured that no English army will desire to traverse his country for the purpose of attacking the Russian possessions in Central Asia. It is often found that in corrupt boroughs voters will take a lower price from their own party than from opponents who wish to purchase their principles as well as their suffrages. An Asiatic prince may be similarly moderate in his demands when he profits by the consideration on both sides of the bargain. Although inactivity seldom deserves to be called masterly, there is probably no immediate necessity for anything beyond vigilance on the part of the Indian Government. As long as Cabul, Candahar, and Herat are united under the same sovereign, there will be little reason to fear molestation on the North-west frontier.

THE BILL AS IT PASSED THE LORDS.

LORD KIMBERLEY was quite justified in saying on Monday night, in answer to the Duke of SOMERSET's strictures on the Bill, that the Bill as amended by the Peers was not at all like Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill, and that the Ministry were not at all concerned in defending it. Without any set purpose of altering the measure so as to transform it into a rival scheme, the Peers simply adopted any amendment that happened to catch their fancy, until they had really constructed a totally new measure. The apprehensions of those who, when amendments were talked of, pointed out that these amendments must be very slight unless a rival scheme were to be started, have been amply realized. All that was left of Mr. GLADSTONE's scheme was that part which provided for disestablishment. Everything else was changed. Mr. GLADSTONE undertook three things—that disendowment should be so complete as to produce religious equality, that there should be no concurrent endowment, and that the measure should be final. The Lords have gone entirely against him on all these points. They have given what the Archbishop of CANTERBURY reckons as three millions sterling, as a bonus to the Anglican Church; they have provided glebe-houses for Catholics and Presbyterians; and they have left the disposal of the surplus, if there is any, entirely unsettled. Even this scheme is not worked out by the Bill as it stands. The Anglican Church is to be first ensured that it will get its bonus, and the Catholics and Presbyterians are only to get their glebes if there is enough left for the purpose, which is by no means certain. Nor is it clear that the Presbyterians would get anything, as the wording of the clause assigning these glebe-houses is said not to be in harmony with the peculiar nature of their institutions. But no great stress need be laid on objections of this kind, as there can be little doubt that the Lords would be very happy to sanction any verbal changes that would make the assignment of glebes and houses to the Presbyterians certain, and would prevent any doubt existing as to the sufficiency of the fund to provide glebes and houses for them and for the Catholics. Perhaps, too, in fairness it ought to be admitted that the Lords would not insist on the surplus being left undisposed of, if their scheme of concurrent endowment were accepted. No one can be sure of this, and it is undoubtedly a great blot on the Bill as it is presented to the Commons that it adds the element of final uncertainty to all the other complications it has introduced. But it is so very uncertain that there would be anything left after the provisions of the Bill were carried out that the Lords would, it may be supposed, not seriously object to saying that if there was a final surplus it should be applied in relief of the county cess. If this is the proper way to regard the Lords' amendments—and it is the way much the most favourable to the Lords—then the scheme of the Lords, as opposed to that of Mr. GLADSTONE, is not to have disendowment at all, but simply to take away from the possessions of the Anglican Church enough to pay off the capitalized value of the Maynooth Grant and of the Regium Donum, and to give glebes and houses to the Catholics and the Presbyterians. This is precisely the scheme which Lord WESTBURY has advocated throughout, and, if it is to be defended at all, it must be defended on Lord WESTBURY's grounds—namely, that it is the best and justest and most honourable scheme in itself, and that it makes no difference whether public opinion is in favour of it or not. It is certainly entirely opposed to all that we know of the decision of public opinion, as that decision was to be gathered either from the elections of last November, or from the votes of the House of Commons this Session. It does not in the least strike at Protestant ascendency. On the contrary, it preserves and encourages Protestant ascendency, and perpetuates it on payment of a fine. The Irish Church is excellent in every way, but, being the Church of a minority, it has got a little too much money, and must part with some of its wealth in favour of other sects. This is a radically different basis from that on which Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill was framed, and at any rate the Lords must be owned to have contributed one great element to the settlement of the question. They have invited the nation to choose between two totally distinct schemes. They have not slightly spoilt or improved Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill. They have not offered a compromise which, for the sake of swiftness and peace, the Ministry might have been inclined to accept rather than lose the Bill. They have proposed a thoroughly new way of approaching the settlement of the question—a way new in its principles, new in its operation, and new in its results. There is the Bill of the Lords, and there is the Bill of the Commons, and one or the other must be rejected.

The Lords have passed their scheme because they believe it to be the best scheme, although it is by a kind of accident that they have arrived at a result which pleases them. They saved themselves by a slight majority, and with no set purpose, from grave difficulty when, on the very evening on which their

Bill was sent down to the Commons, they rescinded their previous vote giving life seats in the Lords to the present Irish Bishops. They thus cleared away the whole subject of disestablishment from further discussion, and they have confined themselves to rejecting the Government proposal to disendow the Irish Church. The mode in which they arrived at the concluding stage of their legislative efforts illustrates in the most striking manner the peculiar circumstances under which they have to treat such a question. In the first place, they legislate by haphazard, and in the next place, they legislate without responsibility. No peer, and no body of peers, framed their scheme, and led on others to adopt it. It is certainly the scheme of Lord WESTBURY, but no one adopted it because it was Lord WESTBURY's scheme, or knew that by voting this or voting that, and by altering and rescinding votes already given, the House was bringing itself to embody Lord WESTBURY's views. It suited one set of peers to grasp at every conceivable money advantage for the Irish Church, and it suited another set of peers to carry out abstract justice and snub rampant Protestantism by adopting a measure of concurrent endowment; it suited another set of peers to embarrass the present Cabinet, and give a good opening for the action of future Governments by keeping the surplus unappropriated. These different currents of desire and opinion flowed at last into the same channel, and produced the present Bill. No result could be more natural in a legislative assembly which is under no efficient guidance when the Government is in a hopeless minority, while the Opposition is seriously divided. If the present Bill had been the work of Lord CAIRNS, there would have been some degree of responsibility attaching to passing it. The Conservative party would have had its scheme just as the Liberal party has got its scheme, and which scheme should prevail would have been decided by the ordinary operations of party warfare. But the Bill has been framed by no particular person or set of persons, and with a complete absence of responsibility. The majority of the Lords has not got to govern the country, or to think about governing it. Each peer that recorded his vote with the majority was entirely independent of those who accompanied him, and he voted without being under any obligation to see what was the general tendency of the Bill to which he was adding a clause. He had only to consider what theoretically he himself considered best. The Duke of WELLINGTON long ago foresaw how easily the House of Lords might become an assembly acting and voting in this desultory and irresponsible manner. When once the consideration of how the Government is to be carried on passes out of the mind of an assembly, there is no saying what the assembly will do or will not do. The whole system of governing by responsible Ministers would die out if the measures of these Ministers were to be submitted to the veto of an assembly under no guidance and no responsibility. In the United States there is no Ministerial responsibility. Each portion of the legislative body legislates as it pleases, and each has a veto on the legislation of the other. But then each is an elective body, and the will of the people prevails in each, although in a much more tardy and cumbrous way than in countries where Ministerial responsibility is the rule. But in England the House of Lords is not elective, and is independent of the will of the people, and if it proceeded ordinarily as it has proceeded in this matter of the Irish Church, there would be exhibited the curious spectacle of a permanent irresponsible body having control over the whole legislation of the country. Lord WESTBURY, who at least had the merit of thinking out what he meant, boldly asserted that this is the proper position of the House of Lords. The business of the people is simply to ask Parliament to attend to a question, but when once Parliament complies, the nation has nothing whatever to do with the particular solution of the question at which Parliament arrives. The nation has invited Lord WESTBURY to think about the Irish Church. With his usual affability he has assented, and has thought about it; and it is entirely immaterial to him whether the nation likes his thoughts or not. Few peers probably have consciously got so far as Lord WESTBURY, but most of them have acted as if the spirit of Lord WESTBURY possessed them. They have hatched a bran new Bill regarding the Irish Church, without any care as to who will like it or dislike it; and they now look on with some interest and amusement to see how the Commons will treat the product of their wayward efforts.

If the debate of last Monday is read in its proper light, and if it is examined how people who were talking of a great political subject without thought of difficulties or consequences handled the interesting question of giving glebes and houses to the Catholics and the Presbyterians, there was much to be admired and applauded in what was said. There were no abstract arguments against the theoretical advantages of carrying out this just and salutary measure which seemed of much weight. Lord KIMBERLEY plainly stated that Mr. GLADSTONE held himself to be precluded from adopting any scheme of concurrent endowment; and although from the practical point of view this simple statement made an overwhelming difference, yet it had no bearing whatever on the question occupying the attention of an irresponsible assembly whether, if such a measure could be carried—if there were a Minister to propose it, and a House of Commons to support it, and constituencies to ratify it—the proposal to give glebes and houses to the Catholics and the Presbyterians was not an excellent proposal. The main objections urged by the Ministerial speakers were to the details of the proposal rather than to the proposal itself. The Presbyterians, they urged, would get nothing, because the arrangements contemplated by Lord STANHOPE were territorial, and the arrangements of the Presbyterians are congregational; and the great practical difficulty in the way of giving glebes and houses to the Catholics—the difficulty of deciding whether these gifts should be entirely under the control of the bishops or not—was not solved, but timidly evaded by referring it to the consideration of the LORD-LIEUTENANT in council. But these objections were of a sort that might easily have been overcome subsequently if an opportunity ever offered itself of giving practical effect to the amendment. In a very short time a Government that meant to give these glebes and houses, and were able to do so, would find out the proper wording to benefit the Presbyterians, and would discover how Catholic trustees should be appointed. Nor was there much force in Lord GRANVILLE's appeal to the Peers to remember that clauses drawn in this slipshod imperfect way were not much to the credit of the House, and would have a damaging effect when submitted to the criticism of the Commons. How can it be expected that amendments proposed by any chance member, and altered and slashed by other chance members, of an irresponsible assembly should be drafted as if they were framed by a professional draftsman under the directions of a Minister bound to know that what he meant to say was said, and that what was said would work practically? To make a good startling proposal, giving or taking away a million or two, is entertaining, pleasant, stimulating work, and quite in the line of any ambitious, able, or crotchety peer. To put this proposal into clear, satisfactory, technical language is one of the most troublesome, repulsive, and exhausting tasks that can be undertaken; and why should a peer go through the extreme nuisance of shaping his proposal with so much superfluous accuracy, when all the fun lies in making the proposal generally, and in sticking up for it, and getting it passed by a majority that makes Lord GRANVILLE give a courteous smile of pain? Lord STANHOPE elicited the views of the House by his proposal quite as well as if it had been framed by a judge, and among the speeches in which the views of the House were embodied were some of considerable force and merit. More especially, we think, there was great truth in what Lord HOUGHTON said, that by erecting houses and portioning off glebes for the Catholic priests we should make the results of what is intended to be a great measure of justice visible, as they could not be made visible in any other way, to the meanest Irish peasant. It is difficult for most people to understand what disestablishment and disendowment mean; but every one understands what brick walls and slate roofs, and cabbages, and grass enough for a cow, mean. For this, quite as much as for other and higher reasons—for the reason that in every petty remote Irish village there would have been a material symbol of English justice—we regret that untoward circumstances, and the faults of statesmen of all parties, have placed, as we fear, the proposal to give the priests decent houses, and a bit of land with them, far out of the region of what is practically possible.

THE EMPEROR'S MESSAGE.

SHORT of a complete surrender of the prerogatives which distinguish him from a Constitutional Sovereign, the Emperor of the FRENCH could hardly have made more considerable concessions than those contained in the Message communicated to the Corps Législatif on Monday. The Constitution of 1852 is to undergo further modification in six important respects. The Corps Législatif is to have the right of framing its own standing orders, and electing its own officers. The President will in future represent the majority in the Chamber, and though M. SCHNEIDER will probably reappear in his old place, there will no longer be an unexpressed feeling of antagonism between his responsibility to the EMPEROR and his duty to the Assembly. In critical debates it may sometimes be a matter of considerable moment whether the technical procedure of the Chamber is to be regulated by the Government or by the members. Upon the second and sixth points indicated in the Message, it is impossible to pronounce an opinion until the changes sanctioned by the Senate are actually before us. The "simplification of the "mode of presenting and considering amendments," and the extension of the right of interpellation," may mean little or much, according to the form in which the alterations are framed. Under no circumstances can an interpellation lead directly to anything more than a debate, but the simplification of the mode of proposing amendments may stand either for such an enlargement of the right as will leave the Ministry for the time being no choice between resignation and a Parliamentary deadlock, or for a mere verbal distinction which will leave the relations between the Legislature and the Executive substantially what they are now. The provision that "all modifications of the tariff in international treaties" shall hereafter be submitted to the Corps Législatif will render it impossible for the EMPEROR again to decree free trade by a stroke of the pen, and will therefore be popular with the Protectionist as well as with the Constitutional parties in France. Englishmen may feel a pardonable satisfaction that in the case of the Commercial Treaty with this country the door has been shut after the horse has been stolen. The voting of the Budget by chapters will for the first time put it in the power of the Chamber to exercise some degree of control over the expenditure of the country. A reduction of the Estimates in the teeth of Ministerial resistance is in all cases difficult enough, but the obstacles are nothing less than insuperable when necessary and unnecessary items have to be voted on together, and the Budget can only be improved by the somewhat too trenchant process of rejecting it en bloc. The "suppression of the incompatibility hitherto "existing between the position of Deputy" and that of Minister is another concession the value of which can only be appreciated when the action of the Senate with regard to it is precisely known. In another part of the Message the EMPEROR promises to deliberate upon the presence of all the Ministers in the Chamber, but he does not say that they are all to be there as Deputies. If a Minister who has failed to carry his election can appear in the Chamber the next day in the character of an ex-officio member, we do not see that this "suppression of the incompatibility" amounts to much. At all events, while the system of official candidateships subsists in full vigour, the Government can have no difficulty in securing seats for as many Ministers as it may find convenient.

When the substance of the Imperial Message is surrounded with so much uncertainty it is natural to examine the reasons which its author gives for sending such a communication at all. The first feature that calls for notice is the scrupulous care with which the EMPEROR claims the entire initiative in the promised reforms. The Message is represented merely as a fulfilment, somewhat earlier than was at first intended, of the assurance given on the 28th of last month. On that day, says the EMPEROR, "I announced that I should "submit at the ordinary Session of the Chamber the resolu- "tions and plans which seemed most fitting to realize the "wishes of the country." If any one thinks that there is a connexion between the interpellation of the Third Party and the constitutional changes now announced, he is altogether wrong. The desire of the Corps Législatif "to "learn immediately what reforms have been decided on" has had no effect upon the EMPEROR's deliberations; it has merely determined him to make public the results of them a little sooner. He treats the Third Party as if it were a child which wants to see its birthday presents before the day arrives. It is a foolish wish, but it is not worth a serious resistance. After administering this implied rebuke to the impatient deputies, the EMPEROR goes on to describe the general character which will pervade his reforms. In England too little weight has, we think, been given to the pregnant sentences in which this is done. "It is my firm intention to give to the "powers of the Corps Législatif that extension which is com- "patible with the fundamental bases of the Constitution. . . . "I have already shown several times how much I am disposed "to relinquish in the public interest certain of my preroga- "tives. The modifications which I have decided to propose "constitute the natural development of those which have "been successively made in the institutions of the Empire. "They must at the same time leave intact the prerogatives "which the people have most implicitly confided to me, "which are the essential conditions of power, and of the "preservation of order and society." It may be contended of course that this is merely so much self-assertion, designed only to conceal the fact that his authority is passing away from him. But this interpretation does not seem to be consistent with what is known of the EMPEROR's character. It is more reasonable to take his words in their natural meaning, and to suppose that while he is willing to grant all that is compatible with the maintenance of personal government, he will yield nothing which affects the essence of the Imperial system. He will divest himself of certain prerogatives, but he will not submit to be stripped of any. He will allow the Corps Législatif to enjoy every sort of privilege which does not contradict the main principle on which the Empire rests—the principle that the EMPEROR both reigns and governs. He will go on in the course on which he entered years ago, but he will strike out no new path. The ornamental accessories of his position he sets little store by, but now and hereafter every modification which may be incorporated into the Constitution must recognise that, in the Imperial system, power rests with the sovereign and with him alone, and that to threaten any of those prerogatives which are the essential condition of power is to attack order and society—in other words, to espouse the cause of revolution. In all probability, the EMPEROR really believes that he can make over much of his authority to the Corps Législatif without in the least diminishing his real hold on the country. If by so doing he can conciliate a wavering majority, and throw a suspicion of unreasoning obstinacy over a resolute Opposition, the trial is worth making. At all events, it may postpone, if not avert, the moment at which it will be necessary to come to some more decided resolution.

We are inclined to think, therefore, that the immediate importance of the EMPEROR's Message may have been exaggerated. That the Third Party, however, acted wisely in withdrawing their interpellation hardly admits of question. The object of their demand was a large measure of constitutional reform, to be obtained with the Imperial consent and enjoyed under the Imperial dynasty. It is only fitting that when this desire of theirs is met half way, they should examine the true extent of the concessions before pronouncing them insufficient. What they asked indeed has not been granted them, but in its stead comes something which, in the judgment of many well-informed persons, differs from it only in name. Under these circumstances they had no choice but to wait until the correctness of this view can be tested. Before the Corps Législatif meets again there will have been time to marshal the various meanings which the Message can be made to bear, and to map out the course which the Government may be expected to take according as one or other of these meanings has been present to the EMPEROR's mind. The acts of the Government will be the best interpreter of its words. The Third Party might have been less disposed to assume this waiting attitude if the carrying out of the new reforms had been entrusted to their old enemy M. ROUHER. But the EMPEROR or the MINISTER of STATE himself had too much good sense not to perceive that to do this would have been to discredit them beforehand, and M. ROUHER has, for the time, retired into private life. If the more cautious estimate of the promised reforms turns out to be correct, his absence from politics will be of short duration. He will probably present himself as an official candidate on the first opportunity, and, having been thus whitewashed by contact with a constituency, he will be qualified to appear as Minister under the new régime. In the members of the Third Party who are most often mentioned as about to take office he is not likely to encounter any dangerous rival.

MR. LOCKE KING'S BILL.

THE debate of Wednesday last on the Real Property Intestacy Bill resembled an action of ejectment for a plot of land brought to try the title to a great estate. The speakers on both sides showed that they were supporting or opposing changes in legislation far beyond the scope of the Bill; and the SOLICITOR-GENERAL candidly owned that he regarded the measure only as a small step in what he considered the right direction. The hardships which were shown to be likely to arise either from the maintenance or from the abolition of the present law are for the most part exceptional, and in every instance avoidable at the choice of the present owner. A freeholder who objects to primogeniture can now leave his property among his children; nor does Mr. LOCKE KING propose to deprive him of the power of giving his land exclusively to his eldest son. Mr. BERESFORD

HOPE showed that small properties divided among the members of a family will tend to pass into the hands of the neighbouring landowner; but a process which is every day becoming more general would be but imperceptibly accelerated by equal partition. The negligence of petty freeholders in the matter of wills is probably exaggerated by those who attach importance to a law of intestacy. The possessor of two or of twenty acres thinks of nothing else, and he often creates subsequent inconvenience by his elaborate dispositions for the benefit of his survivors. The most obvious and the most equitable arrangement compatible with the retention of the land itself is the creation of money charges for the widow and younger children, while the eldest son succeeds his father. Unluckily, it too often happens that the ownership is too burdensome to be kept, so that a sale affords the only means of paying off the portions. Nothing is rarer than the scandalous case of a family thrown on the parish while the eldest son enjoys an unencumbered estate; yet, as such anomalies undoubtedly occur from time to time, Mr. LOCKE KING's proposal would tend to prevent the possibility of great injustice. It is better that a freehold should be sold to the squire of the parish than that the widow and children should starve. The alternative of partition would in almost all cases be impracticable, because the house and buildings which would not be susceptible of division are essential to the enjoyment of agricultural land. The more numerous freeholds created by building societies would be still worse adapted to partition, for even a Frenchman who owns half a dozen separate strips of land scattered over half a square mile would recognise the impossibility of cutting a cottage into four parts. The owner of a house in which he lives would perhaps not be greatly shocked by the apprehension that it might be sold at his death. Hereditary associations can scarcely attach themselves to a square brick tenement in a row, nor are members of building societies for the most part proud, like typical yeomen, of ancient local pedigrees. The tendency to accumulation is also less in towns or suburban villages than in the country, for a prudent man prefers, if possible, to live in a house of his own, although he might consider the possession of land too costly a luxury.

One of the later speakers in the debate justly described the discussion as consisting of a series of economical essays. Every member approved or disapproved of the present distribution of land in England, although the existence of large or small estates would not be perceptibly affected by any change in the law of intestacy. Mr. BUXTON deprecated with reasonable earnestness the insane passion for accumulation which induces great proprietors to leave half a dozen separate estates to an eldest son, instead of dividing their possessions among their children; but it would be difficult to make laws which should only apply to the owners of extraordinary wealth. A gentleman of three or four thousand a year cannot divide his estate among his children and at the same time provide for their permanent connexion with the land. If resident proprietors are as valuable members of society as they appear to Mr. BUXTON, the custom of primogeniture ought to be maintained, although it may be abused by the vanity of colossal landowners. No instance was quoted in the discussion, of the devolution of a moderate estate by intestacy to an eldest son where the father would have preferred a different arrangement. Whatever may be the weaknesses of yeomen, landed gentlemen are not in the habit first of marrying without settlements, and then of dying without wills. It will be well if dukes and earls with estates in three or four counties, and with as many halls and castles, would listen to Mr. BUXTON's sound and forcible sermon, or even if their estates could be distributed by operation of law, although the effect would be to increase the aristocratic grandeur of their families; but the repetition of the process for two or three successive descents would destroy, not enormous monopolies, but estates adapted to the condition of a moderate landed gentry. The greatest estates are for the most part well managed; but they involve the social disadvantage of creating a level mediocrity of condition which is perhaps not conducive to the general advantage. There are many large districts entirely inhabited by tenant farmers and their labourers, except that there is a clergyman in every parish. A moderate country gentleman who finds himself by accident isolated in the midst of the estates of great non-resident peers has the strongest reason for sharing Mr. BUXTON's dislike to overgrown estates.

The small minority of members who would approve of the compulsory subdivision of land prudently abstained from exhibiting the solid mass which lies behind the thin edge of the wedge. The only serious alternative is perhaps between accumulation and the French law of succession, although a limitation of the present excessive license of settlement and entail would probably facilitate the investment in land of professional and commercial savings. A man who has earned more than enough for his urgent wants may reasonably wish to indulge himself in the luxury of a house and farm of his own, and the admixture of such a class with the monotonous tenantry of a great estate would be in the highest degree beneficial to a district; but a law of inheritance which would necessarily admit the middle class of the great towns to the possession of land would ultimately split up their properties into cottage freeholds. As long as the interests of buyers and sellers are allowed to operate freely, the land will pass more and more exclusively into the hands of those who can afford to take the lowest rate of interest on their capital, or even to dispense with income in consideration of the pleasure of ownership. The large landowners will buy up the little freeholds, as they come into the market, unless they are outbid by lawyers and traders from the great towns. As Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, England is becoming, like Holland, a centre of capital, with a comparatively limited landed area. The Code Napoléon might, at a great economical sacrifice, and with a complete social revolution, enable every rood of ground to afford a scanty maintenance to a man; but as long as legislation is passive or neutral, the man will take the first opportunity of selling his rood of ground, and of seeking a better livelihood elsewhere.

Those advocates of Mr. LOCKE KING's Bill who, like Mr. LEVESON GOWER and Mr. W. FOWLER, insisted on absolute freedom of disposition by will, were really defending the present state of the law. There is no reason to suppose that an extension to land of the statute of distributions would produce the smallest effect on public opinion or on the purpose of testators. Although the English law prevails in many of the North-American States, its operation is altered by an entirely different state of circumstances. It is idle to accumulate land when it is impossible to let it to a tenant; and consequently the practice of primogeniture is unknown, although it is not legally prohibited. The heavy taxes which are imposed by the different States on unoccupied land afford an additional impediment to the creation of large estates. In England there is little danger that a landlord will be unable to find a tenant, and it is found by experience that cultivation is most profitable when it is conducted on a large scale. The tenant-farmers stand directly between the great proprietors of the present and the cottage freeholders of the possible future. Other investments beside land might be found for capital, but to a farmer by profession a landlord is almost as necessary as a staff of workmen. An active man of moderate means, possessing skill in his own department of industry, cannot afford to leave the best part of his fortune idle at three per cent. in land. On the other hand, the compulsory subdivision of an estate, although it might at first admit of integral farms in each portion, would, on a second or third succession, involve the partition of the several holdings, and probably the abandonment of the farmhouse and buildings, which would become too large for a diminished occupation. There is no doubt, since the alteration of the electoral law, that the question of the compulsory division of land will in a few years be discussed in Parliament, and that it will give rise to popular agitation. It is difficult to determine whether serious changes would be retarded or facilitated by the adoption of Mr. LOCKE KING's comparatively trivial measure. On the whole, it seems prudent to put an end to a theoretical injustice which is certain to be exaggerated by the popular imagination.

SPAIN.

THE Spanish Cortes have lately been better employed than in the organic discussions which, unavoidable as they are, only tend to confirm and to widen irreconcilable differences of opinion. The embarrassed state of the finances, and the difficulty which has already arisen in collecting direct taxes, have forcibly called attention to the vast resources which might be derived from a more rational arrangement of import duties. Bad commercial legislation has the redeeming quality of creating a hoard or reserve fund from which a supply of wealth may be ultimately drawn. A country which has perversely impoverished itself by artificial dearth can at will become richer through the simple process of acquiescing in the natural laws which regulate buying and selling. The Spanish tariff imposing duties varying from 100 to 200 per cent. on imported commodities has been constructed for the exclusive benefit of manufacturers who have contrived, as in other countries, to persuade the consuming majority that protection is a form of patriotism. A few years ago a belief prevailed in Spain that the aid of England had been afforded in the Peninsular War for the purpose of destroying two or three factories which were supposed to have previously existed in Madrid. A competition between home-made British wines and the produce of the vineyards of Xeres would have been equally practical and formidable. The legend has perhaps become obsolete, and at least it failed to influence the majority of the Cortes during the recent debates. Mr. FIGUEROLA, the late Minister of Finance, proposed a moderate and comprehensive change in the tariff, by which protective duties ranging from 20 to 50 per cent. were to be imposed for six years, and to be gradually reduced during the next five years to an average rate of 15 per cent. Almost the sole opposition to the measure was offered by the Catalonian manufacturers, and their representatives only ventured to propose that the reduction during the second period should be subject to the will of the Cortes. As it is evident that the Legislature will have full power to retrace or to suspend its progress towards the liberation of trade, it might have been supposed that the modest amendment would be quietly accepted or negatived; but it appeared that the Cabinet was not agreed as to commercial policy, and that the PRIME MINISTER himself had held communications on the subject with the Protectionists in his own province of Catalonia, and with their representatives in the Cortes. One Barcelona manufacturer had, in a telegraphic despatch, warned PRIM against the deceitful suggestions of his colleague of the Finance Department; and FIGUEROLA, with unaccountable violence, denounced his accuser as a miserable villain. In reply, Marshal PRIM, after defending his correspondent, professed his sympathy with the Catalonians, and his desire that the colourless amendment should be carried; but the Cortes by an overwhelming majority adopted the Bill as introduced by FIGUEROLA. It is satisfactory to observe that the Republicans as well as the Progressists are divided on the question of the tariff, and that they have not yielded to the temptation of allying themselves as a party with the enemies of improvement. The declarations of PRIM, who probably regards with indifference all economic theories, are fully explained by his interest in maintaining his popularity in his native province. His assumption of superiority irritates his colleagues, who may perhaps also suspect him of irregular designs. Notwithstanding his control of the army, his ambition will scarcely be formidable as long as the Republicans regard him with dislike. At one time it seemed probable that he would ally himself with the minority, especially as he opposed the immediate election of a king; but hitherto it appears that he is more obnoxious to the Republicans than either SERRANO or TOPETE. Although PRIM has always been considered the ablest and most resolute of the leaders of the revolution, it now seems that his position is becoming untenable, unless the REGENT may think that he will be less dangerous as a colleague than as a possible conspirator. In some respects the Government is stronger than in former times, although it possesses little arbitrary power. No military chief would venture to rise against the Cortes, unless he had secured the support of the Republicans. During the reign of the QUEEN it was generally felt that the Court and the Ministry were alone concerned in the repression of insurrection. A rebellion, unless it was founded on widespread popular discontent, would now be considered an insult to the nation.

The resentment caused by the excesses of the late Government found expression in a debate on the arrest of PEZUELA, Count of CHESTE, who lately ventured to return from France to his native country. OCHOA, a Carlist deputy, who professed to be a political opponent of PEZUELA, attacked the Government for arresting under military law an ex-officer who had previously been dismissed from the army. In his answer PRIM accused PEZUELA of having conspired in France against the present Government, and of having refused obedience to an order to report himself at the Canaries. The technical merits of the case are uninteresting, and it was on entirely different grounds that the Cortes approved the action of the Government. More than one deputy described the indignities which he had suffered when PEZUELA was Captain-General of Madrid, and the conclusion that his present sufferings were deserved, though scarcely logical or legal, was sufficient for the Cortes. Some of the speakers hinted that OCHOA, although he belonged to another dynastic section, was an accomplice in the treasonable projects attributed to PEZUELA. It is difficult to understand how Queen ISABELLA could coalesce with the heir of the male line who has always denounced her as a usurper; and the combined efforts of both branches would be too feeble to disturb the present Government as long as it is supported by the Cortes. The clergy, who are almost unanimously hostile to the revolution, would probably witness with complacency the success of either pretender; but their failure to control the elections shows that even in the rural districts their hold on the population is feeble. The Duke of MADRID, otherwise known as CHARLES VII., or as Prince CHARLES of BOURBON and ESTE, has lately thought fit to issue a proclamation, in the form of a letter to his brother, who enjoys the significant "happiness of serving in the army of "our glorious PONTIFF." It is highly probable that the glorious PONTIFF, although he recognised the saintly virtue of ISABELLA by the gift of the golden rose, would be glad to see on the Spanish throne the representative of orthodox legitimacy. Except for the notoriety of the fact that there is in some districts a Carlist party, it might be doubted whether any lay Spaniard of mature age is capable of being cajoled by the pompous commonplaces which have been put together in the name of CHARLES VII. As far as the phrases of the Circular have any meaning, they are equivalent to intolerance supported by despotism, or, in more circuitous language, to the preservation of Catholic unity and to the enthronement of "a "real king, and not the shadow of one," to be surrounded by a Cortes "which shall be a regular and peaceful assemblage of "independent and incorruptible representatives, and no longer "a mob of tumultuous and useless men, either placemen or "ambitious aspirants, forming servile majorities and factious "minorities." The definition of a Parliament too pure to desire or exercise power is not unfamiliar to more serious potentates than CHARLES VII. The Emperor of the FRENCH has hitherto taken care that his deputies shall not be ambitious aspirants; but unfortunately he has found himself compelled to announce that he will henceforth govern with the aid of majorities and minorities. Prince CHARLES wishes to give to Spain "that liberty of which she only knows the name, "liberty the child of the Gospel, and not liberalism the off-"spring of the Reformation." The draftsman of the letter deserves credit for an antithesis which may be called original in its impudence. The liberty which was enjoyed by the subjects of PHILIP II., whatever may have been its relation to the Gospel, was certainly not the offspring of the Reformation.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Prince is in favour of protection to domestic industry, as well as of more antiquated abuses; but his professions have little importance, as he is not in a position to originate a civil war. Among many things which the Spaniards have learned by the experience of a generation is the folly of fighting for rival claimants of the throne. The extraordinary material advance which has been effected in the course of the last five-and-twenty years is mainly due to the continuance of internal peace. The most vicious of Governments at Madrid could not prevent the crops from growing or the flocks from multiplying. Although grumblers in the Basque provinces or in Catalonia may sometimes talk of armed resistance, it would be impossible to renew the contests of Carlists and Christinos. Even the Republicans would forfeit any popularity which they may possess by open rebellion. The vote for royalty, which may or may not bear fruit in the nomination of a king, implied, above all things, a condemnation of anarchy and violence. The disinclination to accept the Duke of MONTPENSIER because he belongs to a branch of the old Royal Family of France is not encouraging to a candidate who has no other pretension than that he is the head of the Spanish BOURBONS. Since the days of PHILIP II., who gratified the national pride by the prominence which he assumed in Europe, there has never been a King of Spain of respectable ability or character, unless an exception may be made in favour of CHARLES III. during the earlier half of his reign. The rejection of the Republic is due to the apprehension of unknown evils, and not to any abstract enthusiasm for royalty. Of all possible devices, the restoration of absolute monarchy, and the perpetuation of religious intolerance and commercial monopoly, would be the most extravagantly absurd. The present Government, although it proceeds slowly, has the merit of commencing the redress of the most flagrant abuses. A Ministerial Bill has been introduced for the revision of the Concordat with the consent of the POPE, and it is easy to foresee that the next step will be to dispense with his approval. The reform of the tariff is a still more practical proof that the revolution has not been unproductive of good.

THE END OF THE FRANCO-BELGIAN DISPUTE.

A NATURAL and useful arrangement is about to be concluded between three Continental railways. From a date not yet decided on, the Eastern of France will run through trains between Antwerp and Basle, either by way of Brussels and Namur, or of Malines and Liége; the conduct of the trains between Antwerp and the Belgian frontier being undertaken by the Companies over whose lines they pass in consideration of a fixed payment. In order to facilitate the through traffic the Eastern of France will station an agent of its own at Antwerp, and the Belgian State Railway will station one at Basle. A similar arrangement will be entered into with the Netherlands Company, and as soon as the completion of the line will allow the Eastern of France will run through trains between Basle and Rotterdam. Beween Rotterdam and Ans the conduct of the train will be undertaken by the Netherlands Company, between Ans and Pepinster by the Belgian State Railway. The Eastern of France undertakes not to favour the Dutch ports at the expense of the Belgian ports, and not to carry passengers or goods from Rotterdam to any French station at a lower fare than is charged from Antwerp to the same station.

Nothing can be more innocent and commendable than the arrangement here described, and yet it is all that remains of a question which, less than three months ago, seemed to be big with the most serious danger. The dispute between France and Belgium has had no worse result than this. Diplomacy has been kept hard at work, a semi official press has been inspired to breathe flame and fury in successive articles, the patriotic susceptibilities of Frenchmen have been abundantly appealed to—as a prelude to a settlement which will save passengers the trouble of changing carriages between Brussels and Switzerland. We are far from saying that the result is not worth the labour that has been bestowed on it. The inconvenience of passing from one carriage to another, particularly at night, is at times by no means to be made light of, and Englishmen are too much given to foreign travel not to feel grateful for the consideration which the French Government has shown for their especial requirements. Still, even in the midst of our thankfulness, we cannot help remembering that all that the French Government has obtained as the result of months of negotiation it might at any moment have had for the asking. There was never any indisposition on the part of Belgium to sanction any reasonable arrangements for accommodating the trains of the Eastern of France. The foundation and extension of a through traffic between Antwerp and other countries must enure to the benefit of the Belgian Company as much as to the benefit of any other by which it may be carried, and so long as the independence of the Belgian lines is preserved—as it is by the present contract—the more intimate the connexion can be made between the two systems, the better for both parties. Instead, however, of acknowledging these facts to itself, the French Government began by sanctioning, if not suggesting the actual purchase, by the Eastern of France, of the Great Luxemburg Railway. The Belgian Government, wi[illegible]onable suspi[illegible] of [illegible] arrangement which would ha[illegible] important m[illegible] of the railway system of Belgium at the mercy of the French War Office, prohibited the execution of the contract, and when this prohibition was disregarded it met the case by an Act of Parliament. For weeks together the semi-official press of Paris teemed with declarations that French honour had been assailed, and that, unless the ratification of this particular contract was permitted, there must be an end of friendly relations between the two countries. The Belgian Government did all it could to appease the storm it had innocently aroused. It sent M. Frère Orban to Paris, and tried its utmost to reduce the difference within strictly commercial limits. At first the French Government was immovable. M. Rouher would have the contract, the whole contract, and nothing but the contract. When this had been sanctioned by the Belgian authorities, everything would go smooth; but the alternative project suggested by M. Frère Orban could not be accepted even as a basis of discussion. This inflexible attitude was not long maintained. The Minister of State gave place to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and M. Rouher's Non possumus tailed off into M. de Lavalette's obliging willingness to examine whether a system of through trains might not provide for that "legitimate expansion of economic interests" which had by this time become the sole object which the French Government professed to have in view. In criticizing the protocol in which this compromise was recorded, we pointed out that the labours of the Commission would probably be successful or the reverse according as the idea of its appointment was due to the Emperor or M. Rouher. On the former hypothesis, the active intervention of the Emperor had probably been the result of his conviction that his Minister had mismanaged the whole business, and that the course which, under his guidance, the Government had at first taken, must be definitively abandoned. On the latter hypothesis, the sudden prominence given to commercial interests might be only a mask, assumed to conceal the determination to get the Belgian railway into French hands at a later stage of the negotiation. The final protocol, which embodies the conclusions at which the Commissioners have arrived, entirely bears out the more satisfactory of these alternatives. The end they describe themselves as having kept in view throughout is the substitution for the proposed contract between the Eastern of France, the Great Luxemburg, and the Netherlands Companies, of "new "combinations," which shall facilitate the development of commercial relations between the three countries; and the particular "combination" they have agreed on is, a system of through trains.

At length, therefore, we may congratulate ourselves at having heard the last of the "Belgian question." What elements of danger it contained, and how nearly at one time they had come to a head, may not be fully known for many years to come. But the aspect of the affair was menacing in the extreme, and the events which seemed likely to take place in France, and which as a matter of fact have taken place, were precisely those which threatened to aggravate the mischief. A few months before the elections, and when the prospects of the Opposition were improving every day, a cloud appeared in a clear sky, and the journals through which the French Government usually makes its intentions known began an unprovoked attack upon Belgium. It was sustained for a considerable period, and renewed more than once, and the only meaning which it seemed possible to attach to it—the only meaning which was attached to it by unbiassed observers—was that the French Government was desirous either of getting up a quarrel for future use, or of making some solid gains by creating that belief in Belgium. All fears of this kind are now at end. The pretensions of the French Cabinet have all been withdrawn. Its organs no longer insist upon concessions nor prate about distrust. The honour of France turns out to be in no need of soothing, and the rest of Europe feels all the pleasure of an unexpected relief. It is for the admirers of the Napoleonic policy, whether in this country or elsewhere, to explain how this result has been brought about, and to prove that in each of the contradictory stages through which the negotiation has passed, the attitude of their Imperial idol has been exactly that which his own dignity and the good of his subjects imposed on him at that particular moment. For ourselves, we prefer the pleasanter labour of pointing out how admirably the Belgian Go[illegible] has behaved under circumstances of unusual difficult[illegible] By [illegible] happy combination of flexibility and firmness, it has adhered immovably to the ground originally taken up—its absolute right to have its own railways under its own control, while at the same time it has given France every facility for withdrawing impossible demands, by showing the utmost readiness to come to terms upon any number of points, provided only they were unimportant. It has consulted the interests of European commerce without sacrificing the more momentous interests of its own independence and neutrality. When M. Frère Orban went to Paris the friends of Belgium began to despair. To hesitate was to yield, and to discuss seemed a symptom of hesitation. We gladly recognise the erroneousness of this argument. The Belgian Government may claim the credit of showing that even in dealing with an overbearing neighbour conciliation and self-respect are not necessarily incompatible.

MORE DEMONSTRATIONS.

We have never been persuaded that on such a question as that of the Irish Church public meetings on one side or the other tell for much. There are, of course, great crises in which popular enthusiasm is a fair expression of something, and has some meaning. In the Reform Bill crisis the meetings were all on one side; it was the same before the repeal of the Corn Laws. But if we are to attach any weight to Mr. Morley and his friends at St. James's Hall, we must put Lord Harrowby and his friends at Willis's Rooms into the balance against them. Mr. Gladstone and the Government are now going to take their innings, but it is at the same game in which the Ulster scores and the Manchester scores and the Liverpool scores were gained. Man for man, we do not see that the fervid Johnston, M.P. of Ballykilbeg, is so much more contemptible politically than Mr. Samuel Morley, and of the two he is the more amusing. The revival of the rumps of the old Leaguers and Unionists, the POTTERS and MASON JONESES, is not exhilarating. Orangeism and Protestant ascendency is not a thing to be encouraged, still less to be fought for; neither, on the other hand, is a mere indiscriminate howl against the principle of establishments and endowments generally, which is already heard at some of the meetings intended "to strengthen the hands of the "Government." Of "great meetings in the provinces" we have already heard enough, and more than enough, on one side, and they meant very little; and now we shall have quite sufficient of counter-demonstrations of about the same significance. The stars in their courses fight for Mr. GLADSTONE, for an out-of-door meeting in such weather as this has its recommendations quite apart from politics. And the Liberal gatherings have something else in their favour. Mr. GLADSTONE having exacted silence from his obedient followers, and having openly declared that he wants their votes, but must decline their voices in the House of Commons, human nature must, under these circumstances, rebel, and the Liberal members would suffer so severely from suppressed eloquence that, in a sanitary point of view, these meetings will have their value. Alderman CARTER, M.P., at Leeds, must have been vastly relieved when he observed to his admiring constituency that the Liberal party would resolutely set their foot on the Lords' amendments, a promise which was very amply redeemed on Thursday; and as Mr. BAINES and Mr. MORLEY have had, and are likely to have, very little of the ear of the House, who shall grudge them the compensation of tickling irritating the ear of Leeds or Bristol?

There is indeed much of a common nature in all the demonstrations for and against the Bill. They only register foregone conclusions on either side. We never believed in reaction against the Government, and now all that can be shown is that they who approved before approve still, while on the other hand they who from the first disliked the Bill have persistently and consistently manifested their dislike. Nor is this the only aspect of the popular meetings in which one side is as good and as bad as the other. Serious bystanders have much to object to in the popular talk on either side; and both the pro-Gladstonian and anti-Gladstonian orators labour under the disadvantage of insisting on those very arguments which are most distasteful to the statesman's mind. The Lords certainly must bear the responsibility, and will now have to incur the humiliation, of having done too much. They have contrived so skilfully to shuffle the cards that disendowment has come out, for all practical purposes, much in the form of re-endowment. The vote for deferring the application of the surplus is only a cloak for the object of taking every possible precaution that there should be no surplus at all, and is objectionable on the further ground that it holds out an encouragement to chronic agitation and to hopes which never ought to be realized. But it is not on these solid grounds that the verdict of the Lords is contested. Mr. MORLEY, at St. James's Hall on Wednesday night, could only see in the events of the last month the tergiversation and disingenuousness of his natural enemies, the Bishops. It must be conceded that, on the whole, the Bishops do not deserve this taunt. That they fought for the best bargain they could get was not only natural, but was their duty, when the generous character of the Bill was announced; but that they surrendered in debate the principle of an Establishment, their great fault in Mr. MORLEY's estimate, redounds as much to their patriotic instincts as to their personal good sense. It might or it might not be politic to engraft on the Bill in the Lords a totally new principle, that of concurrent endowment, which in however attenuated a shape undoubtedly has been brought into it, but it is the worst of all possible arguments to meet this mistake by the howl of No Popery. Characteristically enough, Mr. DISRAELI has on this question surrendered himself to his worse genius and the less creditable agitators of his party. We are told by the popular orators—and Mr. DISRAELI cannot differ from them—that the nine Bishops who supported what undoubtedly was an attempt, perhaps an ill-timed and unwise one, to secure equal justice to the three religious communities of Ireland, have sacrificed their duty to their own communion by consenting to subsidize a creed which they are bound in consistency to regard only as a mass of deadly error. We have certainly but little faith in that narrow-minded public opinion which can see nothing but what to disapprove of in the votes of the Archbishops of CANTERBURY and YORK, and of the Bishops of ST. DAVID'S and OXFORD.

These demonstrations, like all other expressions of public opinion, have their value only in connexion with the principles which they embody and the arguments which they advance. In so far as they express the common sentiment which the general election expressed in favour of disestablishment and disendowment, their importance and value is great. Merely to reaffirm that great and simple issue is to do much; though it may be doubted whether any noisy proof was wanted that on the cardinal question the general sentiment has undergone no change. Reaction is a perfect myth. But it is not to be denied, on the other hand, that in the debates in the Lords much of that statesmanship, and much of thought and foresight, was displayed which for some reason or other was not forthcoming in the Commons. It is of no good omen to the country that the expression of educated intelligence should be set aside by a coarse and dictatorial Non possumus, or merely hooted down by big meetings. The silence which Mr. GLADSTONE extorted from his supporters, and imposed on his opponents, might as a matter of party exigency be prudent, but it was not pleasant for constitutional politicians to witness; and though we are unable to follow the majority of the Lords in their votes, their late debates are certainly more creditable, and more fully carry out what we understand by the functions of a deliberative assembly, than those which we have had, or those which we are likely to have, in the Commons. To the Lords' amendments the well-worn description of epigrams too closely applies; most of them may be bad, and some may be only tolerable, but it is not true that there is no good one among them. It may or may not be capable of proof that some hazy and faltering reference to concurrent endowment was made in the debates in the Lower House, but it is undeniable that the principle itself came out prominently in the House of Lords alone. The miscarriage and failure of that principle is a national misfortune, which, while we regret, we must acquiesce in. No doubt it came under the disadvantage of an afterthought. It may be, and in one sense we suppose it ought to be, a point of honour with a Prime Minister with a majority of 118 to decline to vouchsafe even a look at a principle interpolated in a Government measure. Mr. GLADSTONE may justify himself by treating everything suggested by the Lords with the contumelious argument once urged by, or on behalf of, the master of seven legions. Defendit numerus, but there can be no question that the educated intelligence of the country is in favour of Lord STANHOPE's amendments, or, rather, would have rejoiced had it been lucky enough to have suggested itself to Mr. GLADSTONE. Mr. GLADSTONE, at any rate, would have been more fortunate had he been able to reject it on some more creditable and argumentative ground than on the indisputable fact that he did not propose it. Again, it might have been better, when he quotes the verdict of the country as shown at the General Election, to be able to prove that the particular scheme of giving the glebe-houses and ten acres to the three denominations had been suggested last year and rejected at the hustings. And lastly, as to the Demonstrative Meetings generally, if they are, as they are certain to be, all pitched to the Leeds key, the result will be something of a tacit pledge that Mr. GLADSTONE, by way of punishing the Bishops and the Lords, is preparing himself to adopt that Cromwellian policy which was invoked at Sheffield, and which, as regards the Episcopal Bench and the Upper House, is recommended by Professor ROGERS and Mr. EDWARD MIALL. An indiscriminate and contemptuous and unarguing rejection of all that the Lords have done will argue high temper and spirit; but to decline to distinguish between such a suggestion as Lord STANHOPE's and the wild, we had almost said insolent, amendment which Lord CAIRNS carried about the Ulster glebes, will hardly redound to the credit of Mr. GLADSTONE's statesmanship; and it is because of the emptiness of the vehement language and coarse appeals to numbers and passion which always must form the staple of platform talk and open-air vociferation, that we are unable to augur much good from them.

SENSIBILITY

WE have been made familiar, by Archbishop Trench's manuals and by other useful compilations, with the death of words in one meaning and their resurrection in another. Words like "feature," "favour," "indifferent," "resentment," will readily occur as examples. It is not less interesting to notice a word which, though not yet defunct in an older sense, is on the wane, and is leading a sort of double life between two meanings. Such is perhaps the condition at present of the word "sensibility." No really well-educated person would be at a loss on meeting with this word in precisely the connexion in which Addison or Milton, or even Shakspeare, would have placed it. But a great number of people who have some claim to pass for well-educated would experience a slight check if they so encountered it. There are a good many daily papers, we should suppose, addressed chiefly to that large section of society, which would never employ the word sensibility when it might be necessary to express susceptibility of nerve, of intellect, or of emotion. They would instinctively avoid it. They would substitute for it perhaps the term susceptibility itself, or else feeling, or delicacy, or impressibility, or even sensitiveness, none of which would do the work so directly or so completely as the older term.

It is quite easy, without the aid of dictionaries or glossaries, to trace in the most familiar sources the full meaning of this word. When Claudio speaks of what he shudders to imagine,

> This sensible warm being to become > A kneaded clod . . .

he is talking of physical impressions, of the countless influences received through the senses—that is, through the actual nerves. When Mammon, in Paradise Lost, thinks that an atmosphere of torment may grow familiar, and that the "piercing fires" may become

> As soft as now severe, our temper changed
> Into their temper, which must needs remove > The sensible of pain, he is speaking of exactly the same thing. When Delilah, giving specious advice to Samson, says

> Only what remains past cure
> Bear not too sensibly, nor still insist
> To afflict thyself in vain, the word is, by the easiest metaphorical adaptation, removed scarcely a step from the same signification. It has hardly done with pain of body while it touches on the agonies of mind. Pope's well-known portrait of the "Lady at Court," who presented carries the word a little further on in the same metaphorical line of meaning. But by and by a change comes. And, though we ought to apologize for introducing this quotation in company with those before, there is really no place where the transition is more concisely marked than when, in one of Marryat's novels, Captain Kearney says to a subordinate, "Make me sensible, Sir," and is told in reply, "Maybe that's more than I or anybody else could do." We are here getting away from the region of the senses and of their metaphorical suggestions, and getting into the region of common, shrewd sense, and the associations thence developed. And so the process goes on. We have been confining ourselves to the adjective "sensible," as the instances are so completely familiar. This word, in the earlier meaning, is dead; "insensibility" survives in the physical connexion, occasionally doing duty for "torpor" in the metaphorical uses; and "sensibility" is altogether on the wane. We must guard against being supposed to convey that the later signification of the word "sensible" is never to be found in writers of the eighteenth, seventeenth, or even of the sixteenth century. Benedick, if we remember rightly, was a "sensible" man very much in the meaning which that word would now convey, and other similar passages of Shakspeare might be adduced. But this does not affect the general proposition that, whereas two hundred years ago the first meaning naturally understood from the word was allied to the impressions of sense, intellect, and emotion, the present meaning is something altogether different, and touches rather on caution, shrewdness, and, by implication, on self-regard.

> An equal mixture of good humour

It is almost always unscientific to fix upon any single cause in accounting for verbal changes, more especially when one has to speak of any cause so indefinite as a presumed social tendency. But, if we can be sure of any social phenomenon whatever, if our eyes and ears deserve to be trusted at all in the observation of contemporary humanity, the present generation is not behindhand in setting a value on the practical and the material, and is specially open to the operation of those instincts which are usually known as self-regarding. And it is at any rate a curious phenomenon that precisely among our own generation the change of this word from a more analytical to a harder and more practical meaning should have taken place. Several indications concur in suggesting that a decay in the power of sensibility has gone pari passu with a disuse of the older signification of the term. The rise of the words "sensation" and "sensational" in their recent uses denoted that a more than ordinary stimulus was required to rouse a more than ordinary dulness in the faculty of receiving impressions from without. Sensational novels, and dances, and pianoforte music, all show that this dulness has been remarked in the field of amusement, and has been treated, not from within, but from without; the external applications have been made as far as possible more pungent.

For anything we can see to the contrary, the decay of conversation that has so often been remarked as a feature of the present generation, is another symptom of want of sensibility, in the region of the finer social instincts. The French have a higher degree of sensibility, at any rate in matters that lie on the surface of life, than ourselves, and they beat us out of the field in conversation. There is a story told of Madame de Staël, that on one occasion she was engaged out to dinner in company with a young and beautiful girl, who was not, however, otherwise remarkable. On their entrance, the hostess observed that she was charmed to welcome wit and beauty in each other's company. "Well," replied Madame de Staël, "do you know I never was praised for my beauty before." The fine sensibility which provoked this answer, perfect as coming from a plain and elderly woman of genius, is always more common with the French than with ourselves; but it was formerly more common in English society than it is now. Setting aside certain very small and privileged and exceptional portions of the social whole, it is fair and true to say that the external and superficial in life has been during this generation so actively and zealously cultivated that the finer and more permanent parts of our nature have suffered in proportion. Conversation would naturally be à priori a faithful criterion in changes of this kind. For though the material of all conversation deserving the name is the commerce of thoughts, yet the atmosphere of conversation is generated from sensibility, and will be bracing or depressing exactly as sensibility is developed or repressed. The aspect, the simple outside appearance, of London is powerfully suggestive of the conditions of intellectual life in which, speaking generally and allowing a wide latitude of variety, its inhabitants are placed, and which, in still more various degrees, gradually beset provincial life as well. There is no other capital city in Europe which presents to the eye, as London does, the spectacle of the intense pursuit of intensely material objects, with very little apparent tantum quid (we are speaking only of what meets the eye) between what is rigidly and unswervingly practical and reliefs of the lower and grosser sort. This external barrenness has its counterpart in the region of intellect and emotion. Nor is barrenness all; there is bewilderment also; and beneath the double pressure sensibility decays. As was said before, the word is waning, and the quality represented by the word has not the life and freedom that once it had:—

If there were no other symptoms that this is the real condition of things, there are at least these two—the rise of clamorous efforts at artificial sensation, and the enfeebled state of the power of conversation.

No one has perceived all this more clearly than Mr. Matthew Arnold. But in some of his essays, following what seems with him to be an essential instinct of style, he has introduced certain well-known and characteristic terms which have probably done more than he meant them to do, by way of diverting attention from the primary facts. Philistinism is not far from being synonymous with the absence of sensibility under differing conditions, and culture is little more than development and direction given to sensibility. The want of this quality underlies many, if not all, of the weaknesses which were visited by the tranquil criticisms that have rendered those words stock terms. And not social weaknesses alone; but intellectual weaknesses quite as much. For an age like our own, which has and boasts to have an unusual number of intellectual irons in the fire, becomes victimized by hurry and bewilderment in this department, just as similar causes conspire to produce the same kind of result elsewhere. Everything being taken into account that may fairly influence the question, it is hardly too much to say that ours is an age, considering its attainments, of very considerable intellectual rudeness. We do not, it is true, use exactly the language which Luther would have employed against an antagonist in theology, and Bentley in scholarship. That has gone out of fashion. But we have very little real care for other people's feelings; not much taste nor power of reticence; for sensibility is at a low ebb. Under no other conditions would a book like Bishop Colenso's have been prematurely hurried off to the printer's hands; under no other conditions should we find politics and the intellectual aspects of religion handled as they are by writers, of whom perhaps Mr. Bradlaugh may be taken as the extreme type. As regards politics, it is but a short time ago that a Cabinet Minister showed the world what force of argument and what graces of style might be attained by a complete freedom from the trammels of sensibility. And lessons of the kind are not thrown away upon the newspapers. In the true spirit of appreciating imitation a journal of congenial sentiments remarked lately in these wise and conciliatory terms on the relations between the Lords and the Commons:—"The Lords will have no more chance than a common fishing-smack against a Cunard liner. The smack knows this, and will get out of the way." Nothing is gained by this kind of writing. Nothing, as far as we can see, is even hoped to be gained, except the transient pleasure of annoying those with whom you happen to disagree, or with whose social position you happen to be in antagonism. It is the manner of America, without the extenuation which America might claim on the score of being a young country, and of being peculiarly destitute of influences which operate, as old institutions and time-honoured associations do in some degree, to keep sensibility alive in public speaking and writing.

In general literature, translation presents the best possible scope for the exercise of sensibility in many kinds. So much has been written and said on this branch of literary work that it is no part of our present intention to add to what has already been uttered. On the whole, however, looking at the large number of translations which have been lately made, and are still making, from ancient and modern literatures into English, it may be said without prejudice that the quality is not on a par with the quantity. The rare and felicitous union of qualities, of receptive and responsive power, of elasticity and native vigour, which combine to make up true intellectual sensibility, is seldom found in a translator. The degree to which the practice of translation draws out and cultivates these powers, is the strongest recommendation which it can have as an element in mental discipline. On the same ground we base a confidence—which it now requires some courage to avow—in the practice of verse composition in the dead languages. The best apology for verse composition that we ever remember to have heard came not from a classical scholar or student, but from an eminent and successful teacher of English history and modern languages. To him the intelligent rendering of the best models of English, whether of lyrical or dramatic poetry or of prose, into languages of which we possess perfect models, had been demonstrated by examples among his own pupils to be one of the completest and most efficient lessons in English. Be this as it may, the topic is a somewhat outworn one, and we will pursue it no further. We will content ourselves with repeating what has been the substance of the foregoing remarks, that coincident with the wane of the word we have been discussing, there seems to be observable, in literary as well as in ordinary social life, a decay of the valuable quality, or union of qualities, which it denotes. And if this decay could be arrested, and the processes reversed that cause it, there would be reason to hope for a very advantageous change in the styles of composition, in the atmosphere of discussion, and in the life and interest of conversation.

A THEOLOGICAL HYBRID.

THE significance of prophecy is so often ignored or misunderstood by the generation contemporary with its fulfilment, that we are anxious to give what publicity we can to an attempt which is now being made to render the long-talked-of Church of the Future an actual Church of the Present. We have before us the "Proceedings of the first Anniversary of the Free Christian Union, with the Report of the Committee and Constitution of the Union." The anniversary was celebrated on the 1st and 2nd of June, and the Report professes to give an account of the work of eleven months. The new Communion has consequently been in existence for rather more than a year, and it can hardly be too soon to give some account of the ends for which this youngest-born of Christian Churches has been founded, and of the machinery by which it proposes to attain them. In this respect the Free Christian Union is fortunate, in comparison with many of its predecessors, in possessing a written constitution. The controversies which have so often arisen out of the early history of ecclesiastical bodies can have no place here. The new organization is founded, in the first instance, upon the rejection of a past error. "Whereas," the preamble begins, "for ages past Christians have been taught that correct conceptions of Divine things are necessary to acceptance with God, and to religious relations with one another." The second corner-stone of the edifice is the recognition of a present impossibility:—"Whereas with the progressive changes of thought and feeling uniformity in doctrinal opinion becomes ever more precarious." The object of the Union is to found "a spiritual fellowship" consistent with these two principles; and with this view it "invites to common action all who deem men responsible, not for the attainment of Divine truth, but for the serious search of it, and who rely for the religious improvement of human life on filial piety and brotherly charity with or without"—most often, we should think, without—"more particular agreement in matters of doctrinal theology." This common action is to be carried on by methods partly of external appeal, partly of internal help and mutual support. In its missionary character the Union will issue publications illustrating "from history and life the opposite working of the dogmatic and the catholic Christian spirit," and serving as "manuals of impartial religious instruction, in which the essential and permanent in religion shall appear in its true relation to accidental and temporary opinion." Upon this latter point we have only to remark that, if the Association grows, these manuals will need continual revision. No one is to be refused admission for the time being. Among the most notable of the methods of internal help and mutual support are the "friendly association" of Free Christian Congregations, a "similar friendly affiliation of local societies other than congregations," and "the union in counsel and effort of Individual Persons seeking some religious of membership that the thorough adaptation of the Free Christian Union to modern ideas is most apparent. In laying down the terms of communion the constitution frankly acknowledges the empire of the almighty dollar. The bond which unites Free Christians, whether congregations or individuals, is neither dogmatic nor sacramental, but financial. The place which baptism occupies in the New Testament is here held by the "payment of an annual registration fee of half a crown." The estimated duration of life in the new Communion must be unusually prolonged, as for life-membership a donation of "not less than ten guineas"—equivalent to eighty-four annual payments—is required. An annual subscription of two guineas enables a "congregation or society" to be "registered as an ordinary annual member," with the power of sending one representative to all general meetings. We have in vain searched the constitution for some definition of the relation which the individual members of these affiliated congregations will hold to the Union. Lastly, honorary membership "may be conferred on either foreign correspondents or any other persons who may render good service to the object of the Union, or confer distinction on it by their approval." Here we may note the humility of the Free Christian Union as compared with the original Christian Church. When Agrippa said to St. Paul, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian," St. Paul answered with a reprehensible assumption of superiority, "I would that thou were not almost but altogether such as I am." How much better would it have been to make Agrippa an honorary Christian, as having conferred distinction on the Church by his approval! The affairs of the Union are to be managed by a president, treasurer, secretary, and committee, all of whom, together with two auditors, are to be chosen at an annual general meeting. Before this meeting there is to be a religious service, and the constitution contemplates the ultimate erection in London of a cathedral or "central church, for the maintenance of Christian wor-tion, are drawn to the communion of a common piety and charity. The absence of any undue pretension on the part of the new organization is nowhere shown more clearly than in the provision included in the constitution for "winding up the affairs if necessary." Here, for the first time in ecclesiastical history, we have a Church which distinctly contemplates the possibility that the gates of hell may ultimately prevail against it. "In case," we read, "the object of this Union should ever, in the opinion of its members, be . . . . hopelessly disappointed," it may be dissolved by the votes of three-fourths of the members present at a special general meeting convened for that purpose. In another respect also, its emphatic rejection of development, the Union offers a striking contrast to the Church of Rome:—"Any alteration of the preamble, or addition to it," shall ipso facto dissolve the association. What it holds about dogma now, that it must hold for evermore. In the "opinion" that uniformity is impossible, uniformity is absolutely essential.

From the Report of the Committee we learn what has actually been done towards the planting of this new Church in the midst of a dogmatic or irreligious world. As yet the converts seem to be chiefly of the Nicodemus type. They come to the Committee, so to speak, by night. With "increasing evidence of extensive concurrence in the principles" of the Union, there is not as yet any "corresponding accession of open adhesion." Still the Committee do not despond. On the contrary, they are well assured that "the design of the Union is rendered hopeful by a large amount of latent approval and support," while they lament that "the extent to which in England almost all Christians are entangled by their position in dogmatic engagements" should delay "their inevitable escape into a freer and more natural religious life." As far as words go, the letters they receive seem to leave nothing to be desired. A correspondent "eminent in literature" writes:—"I hasten to tell you that yours is the one movement of the time in which I can take interest, or from which I can expect any real good." A "distinguished member of the Anglican Church" says of the principle of the Union that he agrees with it "toto corde." It is to be regretted that the "struggle between outward hesitancy and real sympathy" should generally express itself in this form—"We shall certainly join you when we see what you can do." For, as the Committee pertinently remark, "the very condition of doing anything by associated effort is that associates do not hang back and thus keep upon the watch." Still something has been done during the past year. The Committee have expressed their respect for certain "energetic efforts to establish a centre of catholic religious activity in a neighbourhood where it is much needed," by "voting a grant of 5*l.* to the Free Christian Church at Lynn." It certainly ought to be an encouragement to congregational adhesion that this fortunate society should have thus promptly realized nearly 150*l.* per cent. on its annual subscription. A sub-committee has also "commenced arrangements" for publishing a volume of essays "proceeding from writers occupying different points of view, and speaking each on his own responsibility," and intended to clear "the permanent essence of a spiritual inheritance from its traditional accessories of belief and usage." When we remember what very short work a volume of Essays and Reviews, introduced with a very similar preface, made of sundry traditional accessories of belief and usage, we can easily believe that the forthcoming work will so far quite answer the anticipations of its authors. How much of the "permanent essence of our spiritual inheritance" will survive the operation is not so certain. Lord Ebury and his friends may be glad to know that the Free Christian Union is not indifferent to the cause of liturgical revision. The Committee are distressed that in the present state of religious thought Anglican laymen "should be content week after week to re-affirm before God and the congregation their belief in a series of propositions every phrase of which, unless used without meaning, is charged with endless controversy," and they feel sure that "in proportion to their thoughtfulness and sincerity religious Churchmen would be thankful for relief from the obligation to this recital." The Creeds, it seems, "drive away innumerable persons of scrupulous veracity from the daily liturgies." We recommend this statement—introduced, it should be said, with the words "it is well known"—to the attention of those clergymen who complain of the small attendance at daily services. Perhaps, after the Ritual Commission has made provision for persons of scrupulous propriety by the revision of the Lectionary, it will do a similar office for persons of scrupulous veracity by the exclusion of the Creeds.

We forget who it was that described the Church of the Future in the words, "concerning which nothing is certainly known save that it will bear no resemblance to the Church of the Past." As regards the Free Christian Union the accuracy of this picture is unquestionable. For some of its founders we have very great respect, but of the organization itself we can only say that it strikes us as a very one-horse sort of Christianity. The dogmatic spirit has faults enough to answer for, but we shall be surprised if there is not more life in it yet than in this colourless counterfeit. Unless human nature has recently undergone some strange transformation, it will hardly bear to remain in the state of placid uncertainty to which the Free Christian Union seems to aspire as the highest conceivable development of "moral and spiritual affinities." It was said of the Jews, by one whom the Union still accepts as its teacher, that they were better off than the Samaritans in that they knew what they worshipped. It is intelligible that men should deny that this knowledge is attainable, and should refuse in consequence to render the worship any longer. The feature that puzzles us in the Free Christian Union is that it makes the confession of ignorance a condition of devotion, [illegible]

...ity in doctrinal opinion" is constantly becoming "more precarious," are men to be held "responsible for the serious search of Divine truth"? To insist on looking for that which the searcher proclaims can never be found is a mark of folly, not of piety. The correspondent "eminent in literature," who neither takes interest in, nor expects good from, any movement but this, is good enough to say that God is "a Moral Being who is at the centre of all things, and on the recognition of whose law the well-being of mankind has been made dependent." In point of form this is as dogmatic a statement as can well be. Does it belong to "the essential and permanent in religion," or to the "accidental and temporary"? If this "Moral Being" has never revealed himself to mankind, how does the correspondent "eminent in literature" know that He is at the centre of all things, or that the recognition of His law has been made a condition of human welfare? If He has so revealed himself, why may not the attainment of Divine truth be possible equally with the search for it? Christianity we know, and Rationalism we know, but this strange theory of a worship which has its root in scepticism seems only valuable as an addition to a theological museum.

LIFE PEERS.

WE are not going to discuss again now the merits, as a political measure, of Lord Russell's scheme, or of any other scheme for infusing an element of Life Peers into the House of Lords. We are not even going minutely to discuss the vast mass of precedents on one side and another on which the question of the power of the Crown to create Life Peers must turn as a matter of pure law. We do not presume to anticipate what the judgment of a really unprejudiced court of law on the matter might be. We will only say that we do not look on the matter as in the least degree settled by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Lord Wensleydale. This is the sort of subject which even a court of law can hardly ever be got to look at purely as a question of law. There are questions in which, even in passing a judicial sentence, notions of political expediency will creep in. Let us take what would be at once the most extreme and the most unlikely case. Let us suppose that some one should assert for himself, gravely and soberly, as Richard Duke of York did assert for himself in the fifteenth century, a right to the Crown better than that of the reigning sovereign. In the present state of our law, such a claim, in order to have the faintest title to be heard, must be a claim under the letter of the terms of the Act of Settlement. But let us suppose such a claim to be made under the terms of the Act of Settlement. Can we conceive any tribunal, parliamentary or other, giving such a claimant as fair a hearing as if he were merely claiming a private estate? Duke Richard doubtless got a fair hearing and a little more; but that was mainly because he was the most powerful and the most popular man in the kingdom, quite as powerful and much more popular than the reigning King. We suspect that in no age would a man get a fair hearing in such a cause, unless he were in something like Duke Richard's position, and in our age no man can be in anything like Duke Richard's position. In no time, before no tribunal, could political feelings and considerations of political expediency be wholly shut out in such a case. And the same rule applies in its degree to every constitutional question of any kind. There are very few men indeed who can be trusted to give a judgment strictly according to the letter of the law and nothing else, in questions touching such high matters as the prerogative of the Crown, the privilege of Parliament, and the liberty of the subject. Discreet lawyers have before now pronounced all three to be alike boundless, and it certainly has not been by simple processes of law that bounds have ever been set to any of them. And of all assemblies the House of Lords is about the last that one could trust to judge of itself and its own constitution. That House has, as far as the reputation of its individual members goes, distinctly raised itself in public opinion. A Synod of Irish Bishops might very likely have done the same. But there is the same fatal sign in the debates of the House of Lords which would be seen in a Synod of Irish Bishops, and which is seen in the Convocation of our own clergy. The House of Lords is beginning to do what no assembly does but assemblies which are not sure of their own position, to talk about itself, to show satisfaction in its successful display, to show the consciousness that it is watched, that it has to keep up its character, to defend ground which is not openly assailed, but which some day may be. If the debates in the Lords surpass those in the Commons, it is because the Commons can afford to be surpassed in mere debate. The Peers have a necessity laid upon them; they must show merit of some kind to justify their existence at all. In a young and weak assembly, struggling after greater strength, the French Legislative Assembly for instance, this sort of self-consciousness is a hopeful sign. But in an ancient assembly, in what once was a powerful assembly, this very same state of feeling is not a little ominous.

Ancient and once powerful, of a truth. For what is the House of Lords? What is a Peer? To define a Peer is no easy task. It is easy to say what particular persons are Peers at any given moment; it is easy to say what their peculiar privileges are by law or custom; but to say how the Peerage in its present shape came into being is a very much harder matter. Every one who has studied constitutional history, every one who has so much as read through his Hallam, must know that there is no greater puzzle than to say how, why, and when our present hereditary peerage grew up. As ever in English constitutional and social inquiries, we must go back to the very earliest times to find out the real cause. What is the House of Lords? It is simply the old Assembly of the people of England, the ancient Meeting of the Wise. There is no better instance of the way in which, in England above all countries, institutions change their forms, and spring to new life again in new shapes but with the old spirit. For all practical purposes the House of Commons is the true modern representative of the ancient Witenagemót; but the House of Lords is the Witenagemót itself by actual personal succession. There is absolutely no break; the thing always went on, feebly enough no doubt in the days of foreign rule, but even under Normans and Angevins some sort of national Council never failed us. King William assembled his Witan no less than King Eadward, and both Henries did the same. No line can be drawn between the Gemót of the eleventh century and the Parliament of the thirteenth. And of course it is the House of Lords which bridges over the dark days between the two.

But the House of Lords is, and has been for six hundred years, an aristocratic body. The old Assembly, in theory at least, was essentially democratic. In this apparent contradiction lies the key to the whole matter. Our great Councils became aristocratic in practice because they were so highly democratic in theory. What is a Peer? He is in truth simply an Englishman who has not lost, or who has regained, the ancient right of every free Englishman to attend the Council of the nation in person. It has been often shown how such a right as this, except in a State of the very smallest size, a single town or a very small district, gradually destroys itself. The mass of those who have the right to attend cannot and do not attend; their right dies out by non-user, and the constitution gradually becomes an oligarchy, simply because it is in theory so pure a democracy. But in such a case as this the greatest irregularity in the numbers and qualifications of those who do attend follows as a matter of course. Every attempt to define the constitution of our National Councils, either before or for a good while after the Norman Conquest, has always broken down. Ingenious men have puzzled themselves to find out what the qualification was, the real ground of their difficulty being that there was no qualification at all. The natural results followed; a few marked and powerful classes of men, the Earls for instance and the Bishops, always came as a matter of course. They were not likely to let their right drop, and the King could not well have got on without them. But beyond these few distinctly marked orders all is confusion; if there is any sort of principle, it is that the right of attendance depends on the King's summons. No principle was more natural to grow up. Where the mass of those who had a theoretical right to attend never came, nothing was more obvious than to summon those whose presence was wished for, nothing was more natural than that the right should gradually be held to be attached to the summons; that it should be held that no one had a right to come who was not summoned, that the King could summon whom he would, but that some particular classes of men had a right to be summoned. Such a theory as this seems to explain the utter irregularity of the constitution of the House of Lords even for some time after the House of Commons had grown up by its side. About the Earls and the Bishops there seems to be no doubt at any time; besides them the King summons Abbots, but he does not always summon the same Abbots; he summons temporal men, but he does not always summon the same temporal men. The son may be summoned though the father was not, or the son may not be summoned, though the father was. Nay, the man who is summoned to one Parliament is not always summoned to another. All this of course shows great irregularity—an irregularity which could only have existed in a transitional period. One theory in short had been given up, and no other theory was as yet fully established. The purely hereditary doctrine grew up in this matter step by step, just as it grew up step by step with regard to kingship. But it would be hard to show that there was any moment when the Crown lost the right of creating a peerage which need not be hereditary—that is, the right of summoning a man to Parliament without of necessity binding itself to summon his heirs for ever.

Looked at in a purely historical way, it is hard to understand any doubt as to the right of the Crown to create life peerages. It is plain that the Crown once had the right; it is by no means plain that the Crown ever gave up that right. The only doctrine on which the right can be attacked is the extreme democratic one. It might be said that the whole system of personal summons was a usurpation, and that every freeman had a right to come, summoned or not summoned. The only ground on which it can be held that the Crown is bound to summon the son because it has once summoned the father, is the ground that the Crown is bound to summon everybody, or rather that everybody has a right to come without being summoned at all. Of course the answer will be that such doctrines are inconsistent with the hereditary character of the House. But the rejoinder is obvious; the hereditary character of the House is something which has grown up by degrees and which is not fully established even now. It is something more modern than life-peerages, and it never has wholly extinguished life-peerages. An English Bishop is a life-peer; an Irish Representative Peer is, as far as the House of Lords is concerned, a life-peer. An Irish Bishop or a Scotch Representative Peer, sitting by rotation or by election in each Parliament, is something less than a life-peer. Any purely honorary privileges enjoyed by Scotch or Irish Peers who do not sit in the House of Lords are off the question. The Scotch and Irish peers who do sit are, just as much as the Bishops, cases of men who have seats in the House of Lords but whose seats do not necessarily pass to their sons.

Now we do not profess to say that what seems to us a sound historical argument is a necessarily sound legal argument. Lawyers constantly find out that this precedent is a good one and the other a bad one, while, in an historical point of view, one seems as good as the other. And, as we said before, human nature itself seems to forbid us ever to get a judgment of pure law on a constitutional point. But we do not see how the historical argument can be evaded, except on grounds which the opponents of life-peerages in the House of Lords would be the very last to take up. But the question, both as an historical and as a legal one, has now become a matter of curiosity. To bring in a Bill to enable the Crown to do this or that implies that the Crown cannot legally do it at present. And the expediency is of course another question, into which we do not mean to enter. The hereditary character of the House of Lords is one of the things which have come about by accident, and, like other things which have come about by accident, it has a good and a bad side. It is a constitutional anomaly, but it is an anomaly which has some incidental advantages. But it must be, and it may be, defended by somewhat stronger arguments than those brought forward in the House of Lords itself by the opponents of life-peerages. One is surprised to find Lord Derby, who might take up even personally a higher position, taking up the ground of the mere pride of wealth. Lord Malmesbury's great object seemed to be to show that, if he were plain Mr. Harris, no one would think of making him a life-peer. Nothing can be more ridiculous than to say that a life-peer will occupy a lower position than an hereditary peer. He will surely occupy a much higher one. It is to be supposed that he will be appointed for merit of some kind or other; that he is himself the sort of man of whom the hereditary peer's highest boast is to be a distant descendant. In the debates in the House of Lords, those who come nearest to the nature of life-peers do not seem to lag behind the others. Lord Derby and Lord Malmesbury will not deny that the display made by Bishops, by law-lords, and by other peers who are the first of their titles, has not been wholly contemptible. Lord Derby to be sure did what he could to crowd the House of Lords with the obscurest peers that he could create—with men who were unknown beyond their own counties before and who are unknown beyond their own counties still. But these are just the men whom no one would make life-peers; indeed if they are to be made peers at all, they had better be hereditary peers, as there is at least the chance of their sons improving. Still, after all, the peers of Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli's creation have shown one merit. It is hard to remember the somewhat grotesque titles for which they have exchanged their hereditary or assumed surnames. And they have not, as hereditary legislators, done much to make us remember them. Let no one think we are blaming them. No; we give them every credit. We might indeed have liked to hear from them some rational explanation of their own position. But they have had the good sense to hold their tongues; Lord Malmesbury has not had the good sense to hold his.

MOONSHINE AT ST. CLOUD.

If you are not the rose, what a delightful thing it must be to find yourself even a thistle, and live next to the rose! You imbibe something of roseate odour, perhaps of hue, from the sweet proximity, and you may really persuade yourself that you are of the rose rosy. Next to being at the St. Cloud Fête given by the Emperor in honour of the Viceroy of Egypt—and that must have been better than to disport in the Elysian fields—earth cannot confer a more beatific vision than to read all about this gorgeous entertainment as described by the Daily Telegraph's "Own Correspondent." It is all to be found in Tuesday's paper. The Daily Telegraph gives us something more than the skeleton and dry bones of history; and as it is not given to everybody to appreciate the real state of things in this poor world, so the Daily Telegraph has a special mission for revealing the inner life of history, and what makes the living actors of events to do what they do. Read the Times or any dull Correspondent who only concerns himself with politics, and such a trifle as the peaceful revolution which has just passed over or through the Empire, and all that you would find in the shape of Paris news is that on Friday last the Emperor held a most important Council at St. Cloud; then came M. Rouher's great announcement, followed by the resignation of Ministers, and France enters upon a new stage of political life. No small event in history this; but this is the dull, phlegmatic, puny way in which books and annalists and chroniclers write history. You are not behind the scenes. The Daily Telegraph is, and shows us all the secret springs of the political machine. You don't know what the Emperor said, or how the Empress was dressed, or what they all had to eat and drink on the eve of a great historical event. The Daily Telegraph does, and tells us, and we are all the wiser for the revelation. Here the laquais and the valet have their place in the great economy of things; and, if we can believe the contemporary historian, they certainly do manage politics in a very curious way in Paris. We have all been speculating on what Mr. Gladstone was going to do about the Irish Church Bill, and our speculations did not come to much. Mr. Gladstone has gone, we dare say, during the last few days, to dinners and soirées as usual; but if he talked about what was to happen in the House of Commons on Thursday, we have in London no literary flunkies and newspaper correspondents eavesdropping and listening at the keyhole and telling us next morning what the great man said between the soup and fish. They manage things differently in Paris, and the Imperial parties are always attended by a gentleman who uses his ears as well as his pen. He listens at St. Cloud and writes to the Telegraph. And as yet we have not heard that his ears have been boxed for their faithful or inventive qualities. On Friday last week, as we have said, the Ministerial Council met; but on the Thursday evening, before taking M. Rouher and his colleagues into his confidence, the Emperor at the fête given to the Viceroy told everybody what was going to happen. So at least says Our Own Correspondent. The Emperor "was in the highest possible spirits, never looked so little pre-occupied," and challenged everybody to talk. What he said to one Deputy we have, thanks to our Daily Telegraph, in ipsissimis verbis; how he "agreed with the liberal views of the nation," and how he was anxious to declare this agreement to "a mob of twenty or thirty people at a time"; we are assured, moreover, that "His Majesty spoke evidently 'avec intention,'" and we are by no means sure that he did not get on a chair and harangue his guests on what was to come off on the morrow.

Now if all this is true—and it is written in the Daily Telegraph, and therefore must be true, though these pictorial details of coming events labour under the disadvantage of being printed three days after the formal and official announcement of the Imperial policy—what a new view of the Napoleonic character it gives! A dark and impenetrable man, keeping his own secret till the last moment; silent and mysterious, and repelling in speech and manner; cold and reluctant even when he declares his mind—such, we have been assured by ordinary observers, is the present Emperor. It's all a mistake. The Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph presents quite another picture of the true and genial Napoleon. He is simply the jolliest of good fellows, ready to jabber and gabble on the most important questions of State policy with twenty or thirty anybodies or nobodies; a mere political sieve or colander, spurting out his views about the most serious State and Cabinet secrets like a drysalter in the Peckham omnibus. As we have said, history, especially the personal history of kings and statesmen, wants rewriting, and for this purpose the Daily Telegraph's Correspondent is an historian who at any rate tells us what nobody else knows, or could have dreamed of.

But to judge of the value of history you should know something of the personnel of the historian. Everybody has a great respect for Grote and Thirlwall and Milman, not only on account of their works, but by reason of their lives. We trust their books much for their own merits, but something because of the credit of the writers. It may or may not be an advantage to the contemporary history of the Daily Telegraph that the historian of the Daily Telegraph takes so much pains to let us know what manner of man he is. The man illustrates the history and the history illustrates the man. He is himself, and his history is like himself; unique, unapproachable. We can quite understand that he sees things not given to lesser intelligences even to appreciate. We can believe that to him is reserved a familiarity with Imperial words and an intimate insight into the depths of the Napoleonic counsels which are not given to mortal men. We do not criticize such a superb personage; we accept him as a Presence, an Institution, a Revelation. One who lives as he does, and lives on such terms with all Cabinets, all Ministers, all Embassies and Councils, is not to be judged by us. The high intelligence to whom wit, beauty, and wisdom all address their choicest things, and to whom is revealed what nobody else knows from Downing Street to Hong Kong, from the Golden Horn to the Winter Palace, is not to be criticized by us. We adore and bow, accept and are silent. We take the good things that the God provides us and are thankful. But hitherto the Daily Telegraph's Own Correspondent has only revealed to us the hidden mysteries of this mortal world. He tells us—and how sublime is the condescension to tell us—all about 'poor Count Odescalchi," and he even gives us a radiant glimpse of Madame De G—— ever charming, ever gay. He takes us into the Emperor's billiard-room, and gives us the small talk of it very small, to be sure, and something like the Duke's colloquy with Jernigan about his garters; but as we were never in the St. Cloud billiard-room, we are grateful—oh, how grateful. And then again, as it was never given to us "to roll along the hard road at ten miles an hour," an invited guest to an Emperor's party, "scattering scandal, taking away several characters, marrying a priest and divorcing a duchess"; as we are but poor simple folks to whom the envious fates have never given the sublime ecstacy of saying, "alter our fifth cigarette," "Ah, mon cher, behold ourselves here"—the here being a palace; and as we never "squared the chamberlain with a little anecdote," although we can quite appreciate, though we do not exactly comprehend, that august performance, we accept the genial historian's account of all the best-dressed and best-looking women in Paris surveying the stately saloons and mysterious glades of St. Cloud, "once called Novigentum;" and as we are introduced to a blazing circle of Empress, and princesses, and ambassadresses and the close column of Court beauties, we acknowledge our master. To use his own phrase, we are in a "profuse perspiration" of awe, amazement, and reflected glory. We see "Prince Napoleon sitting on a table," and almost envy that honoured piece of furniture for its proximity to any portion of that sacred and ponderous person, and almost persuade ourselves that to sit upon a table is a special grace of manner awarded to the Imperial cream's cream. We begin to think that to exchange high politeness with an Empress—and, as we are reminded by one who has lived every day of his life in Courts, "there is not such a hostess in Europe"—or even to read about these glorious beings, is really and only to live. We quite agree with our kind informant how "nice it is to see the Princess Clothilde," and when we hear of our communicative friend hinting how he "paid his homage to a Spanish princess, who really has no right to be going about looking so pretty," our too susceptible feelings begin to take a dark shade of envy that there can be on this earth a man so blessed, and who has such a delicate, well-bred, heroic way of telling us of his beatified and more than heavenly life. No doubt we should have felt in much the same way had we ever had the honour to meet that glorious fairy queen who, whenever she opened her mouth, dropped diamonds and pearls, as we feel when in the magic presence of this enchanting writer when he gives us these glimpses of the gardens of bliss—or Armida, which is much the same thing.

Cynics perhaps will say, that for the world at large and those who move on its level ground, it is no great matter how these gorgeous Olympians disport themselves. They and their annalist live in another world than ours; theirs it is to see the purple lights which never gleamed on our land or sea; theirs it is to bathe in the splendours and the opalescent hazes and the golden flashes of princely avenues and terraces, lit up by electric lights and the radiance of all the realms of fairy land to which we have no access. This finery and splendour cannot affect the working world. But we beg leave to say that it does, or rather did; not only the earth, but the heaven of heavens, on this great occasion, did its best to glorify the great Emperor's festivity. The laws of nature were reversed by Imperial command. It is solemnly recorded by the Daily Telegraph that at St. Cloud on Thursday in last week they had a new heaven all to themselves, as well as an earth which was of heaven, at least the heaven of the ballet and the pantomime. Though we can be surprised at no unearthly interference on behalf of the Napoleonic dynasty, it is, we must admit, new to us to find that the Emperor when he feasts Viceroys can change the order of the universe, reverse the sidereal system, and order not only his ices and bands and electric lights, but even a moon for his own particular delight. On Thursday, July 8, this grand entertainment was given at St. Cloud to the Viceroy of Egypt; and on Friday, July 9, the almanac tells us that there was a new moon. As far as our own experience goes the night was dark as Erebus, as it might well be; and as moonless as the calendar said it was to be. As yet no account has reached us of any serious perturbation in the Cosmos, but at St. Cloud, if we are to believe the Own Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, Joshua's miracle was far outdone by the Emperor, and the Sun of Austerlitz, which has done the family good service, is now superseded by the Moon of St. Cloud. It is a fact that the great Emperor ordered and got a full moon last Thursday week for his own special behoof and the glory of his imperial party. Our Own Correspondent saw it. "Figure to yourself a garden still charming and abounding, &c., fine shrubs and flowers, &c., quiet rivulets, &c. Above was a large and calm-looking moon." And then, again, we hear of the combined effects of "electric light and moonshine on the Empress's dress and drawing-room." We always took the Emperor to be a very great man, but his command over the moon shows the real master of nature. If the earth is to have a new satellite, our Cæsar is just the man to give us another ruler of the night. To order up a full moon for an evening party is what no host ever yet ventured upon. We want to know more about it. Will Our Own Correspondent tell us more about this moon of his which shone last Thursday week? Was it a special moon—it seems so, for it is especially mentioned as a "large moon"—ordered by the Emperor for the St. Cloud avenues; or did it shine over all France at least? Or was he the only privileged lunatic in the universe to see what was hidden from all other sorts of men? A new earth, political, moral, and social, in France is no great phenomenon; but a new heaven and a moon all for the Empire and the Emperor's friends, this is Imperial grandeur and no mistake, as they say. We always had a great respect—we mean sublime admiration—for the Paris Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, but this "large and calm-looking moon" of his on July 8, 1869, is certainly his greatest achievement. Of course there may be coarse, vulgar, superficial minds who argue the unknown from the known, and who believe in the almanac and the present planetary laws, and who will perversely begin to say that all our excellent Own Correspondent's Princesses and Marquises and Cabinet secrets and Imperial conversations are just as imaginary, in fact just as much moonshine, as what he saw in the heavens at St. Cloud on July 8. But this is poor cavil. Our friend saw the moon, and if there was no moon to see, so much the worse for the moon, for he writes very nicely about it. And as it is quite certain that the Emperor's talk is quite as likely to have been talked as the Daily Telegraph's moon to have shone, we have for ourselves no more objection to the talk which is imported from St. Cloud than to the moon which was seen there. No doubt there will be scoffers. The profane will begin to laugh at Our Own Correspondent. They will pronounce him and his Moon and his Napoleonic speeches to be all mythical alike; nay there are those who may be tempted to ask whether there is any Special Correspondent at all; whether these glorious letters are not written by some Grub Street hack who forgot to check his scenic powers by the Calendar, and who was never nearer St. Cloud than Fleet Street. But to talk in this way is to shake the pillars of faith and of historic credibility. We still believe in the Daily Telegraph, and the largest circulation in the world justifies the largest powers of invention, and it will be some time before his very popular and ingenious writer invents anything bigger than the Moon of St. Cloud.

ROUND THE WORLD BY EXPRESS.

IN a utilitarian age like ours one watches jealously the encroachments which practical men are making on the poetry of nature. Electricity flashes the prices of grey shirtings through the caverns beneath the ocean, and in its profoundest depths Schiller's diver as likely as not would find his hands on the inevitable gutta-percha while groping for the jewelled cup. Slightly to adapt the words of the graceful lyric that has charmed the Imperial salons and the cafés chantants, rien n'est sacré pour un savant retained by joint-stock enterprise. Having submerged time under the billows of the Atlantic, the science men went on to demolish space, and the leagues of prairie, snow, and waste that lie between the Missouri and the Pacific. The screech of the steam-whistle seemed likely to scare romance from its last and safest refuge. Rival railway companies concerted an invasion of the happy home of hyperbole, where the unsophisticated children of nature revelled in fancies as free as their institutions and manners, imagination limitless as their plains, talk tall as their mountains, imagery copious as their rivers, and humour stimulating as their salt-licks. It might well be that the day would come when Western journalists would stick to facts and yet find subscribers. We are but too glad, then, to welcome any sign that seems to show that our fears were groundless; that there is a something in the Western air acting even on those who whirl through it in rapid transit. We hail a happy augury in a letter that appeared in the Times of the other day, from the pen of a Mr. Magee. Although that gentleman favours us with no morsel of autobiography, beyond that which is confessed incidentally in a few days of Transatlantic travel, we infer that he is no denizen of those favoured regions. Business or pleasure took him from New York to San Francisco, and in his letter he imparts the experiences of an unprejudiced traveller, interspersed with the comments of a philosopher as dispassionate and cool as might reasonably be expected after nearly a week of the rail in weather drawing on to the dog-days. We do not do Mr. Magee the injustice to surmise that he has been speculating for the rise in the shares of the Pacific Railway Companies, or [illegible]ting for the fall in those of the Aspinwall and Panama. We are more inclined to recognise in him a man who may develop into the Cook of Transatlantic travel—a man gifted with the constitution of a Queen's Messenger; irrepressible spirits and imperturbable good humour; vivid powers of description, and the winning eloquence that lures the masses away to trust themselves in unknown lands. Mr. Magee bears a Hybernian patronymic, nor has he been denied, we should say, the impassioned, impressible, impulsive feelings of his country. Arrived at San Francisco, we picture him precipitating himself on pen and paper while yet intoxicated with the Western air; while the scenes he has passed by are still glowing to his mental eye in all the blazing tints of a Western sunset, and while the warmth of Western sunbeams yet heats his fancy and fires his tongue.

Mr. Magee's seems to have been impelled to write by seeing some objections to the new route indicated by tarry-at-home scribes in the English press, and notably by the Economist. Our contemporary, arguing modestly from admitted European experiences, had said that "the time of the continuous journey, [illegible] days 17½ hours, is probably a longer strain than the human constitution can stand." This is the position Mr. Magee undertakes to refute. The gentleman who asserted it, although he may never have travelled at a burst from the rising to the setting sun, had probably performed the journey to town in the Brighton express, or in the Edinburgh or Holyhead limited mails. Judging by his personal feelings after some journey in which modern science had combined the present maxima of rapidity and smoothness, he may have argued that had it been prolonged for seven days, his fatigue must have grown into prostration. Reflecting, moreover, that the American railways had necessarily employed a good deal of unpractised labour; that they were racing from opposite points against time and each other, for a moveable goal to be determined by their respective swiftness of execution; that they had tumbled down the rails as they went much faster than rails and sleepers could be supplied from the rear; it is clear that the writer in the Economist might plead strong primâ facie grounds for assuming that the mere time of the American journey would be but an inadequate measure of its misery. He may have written too sweepingly when he surmised the strain to be heavier than any human constitution could bear, although his words were evidently intended to bear a freer construction than Mr. Magee has put upon them. Rules are proved by their exceptions, and this one must give way to frames of iron, and be modified by exceptional conditions of training. If Mr. Magee, descending at his hotel in San Francisco, had written to present himself as a living witness that the thing was to be done, and that even a journey so formidable might leave a man all the better for it, nothing could be more natural. Had he explained that the hardships had been much exaggerated, he might have done the Railway Companies a good turn, and an act of simple justice. As it is, perhaps his letter proves a little too much, and while the most credulous must be quite unable to receive it all, it gives sceptics a pretext for rejecting it with an absolute incredulity.

If we wished to be hypercritical, we might object that Mr. Magee lets his logic run riot, and that instead of addressing himself to the specific charge, which is the tax that the length of the route imposes on the traveller, he expatiates on its interest, which is what few people will care to dispute. It would be odd indeed if, in over 3,000 miles, both man and nature had not provided a good deal to admire and wonder at. He sketches a rapid itinerary through the settled States, containing little that is either new or relevant. It is perhaps hardly worth while to go so far for a "glimpse at Pittsburg, the Manchester of America in soot, dirt, and immense shops sacred to Vulcan." We fail to trace Vulcan's connexion with Manchester and the cotton-trade; but much the same sort of thing that Mr. Magee describes may be seen in a good many towns of England, and looking down, for example, from the Tyne Viaduct at Newcastle, you may behold soot and dirt and smoke lend themselves for once to the most Turneresque and picturesque effects. The beauties of Ohio, as Mr. Magee tells us, "make a picture which England's pastoral poets would delight to render in immortal verse." But we question whether they would accept the bewitching beauty of the scenery as an argument for being whirled past it on a through ticket, and compelled to shoot their fancies flying from the windows of an express-train. A rapid contemplation of Chicago, as you hurry by it, is quite in keeping with its bustle and "the marvellous rapidity of the city's growth," but it is only when you have cleared the broad corn plains of Illinois and Iowa, plains as tame as they are rich, that the real journey begins. "Delightful" Mr. Magee pronounces it, "even for ladies. The weakest invalid would be strengthened by it." It is true there is a sameness about it, as he is forced to confess, but then that is compensated by "the exhilarating qualities of the air, and the beauty and variety of the cloud effects." Even the most enchanting terrestrial beauties are apt to pall after a time, and we know the eye of sense seeks the earth rather than the heavens. We doubt if the most brilliant effects in the sky would relieve the monotony of those flat dreary wastes, brown, grey, or green, according to the season. It is fortunate indeed that the air is so exhilarating, and "exercises so marked an influence on the animal spirits," especially in the cases of ladies and invalids; for "the stations along the line, with their sunken and loopholed round-houses for protection against former Indian attacks, are most interesting and novel." This season the Indians are out everywhere on the war-path, and we suspect the tribes have not given the railways a material guarantee for the scalps of their passengers. Those loopholed block-houses might perhaps have a more depressing effect on a nervous invalid than the most exhilarating air could counteract. Such appurtenances to stations are unquestionably novelties, but scarcely of the sort that would be likely to prove attractive in a Company's advertisements. There "the Westerner is to be seen in all the glory of abundant elbow-room"; but the worst of that is, if you care for the sight at all, it is one you enjoy so very seldom. We confess to a gross ignorance of details, but we should imagine there can be so little local traffic to develop, and such slight necessity for the precaution of examining tickets, that the station-masters might dispense altogether with subordinates. When the lone official on duty at the Platte Forks siding has melted out of your range of vision, you have nothing in the way of excitement of that sort to hope for for some fifty or a hundred miles, till a point of life detaching itself on the platform at Chimney Rock grows into the hermit who turns the switches there. We must repeat that we are far from strong in the geography of the line, and pitch on representative names almost at random. Arrived at the Rocky Mountains, you mount them by a route naturally selected as offering the easiest gradients; and Mr. Magee fears the tourist may be disappointed at finding in Colorado no such mountains as the Alps. We are inclined to believe that, however bored you might have been in the plains below, they must at least have reduced you to a frame of mind in which you would learn with deep gratitude that the barriers nature had interposed between you and your destination were less formidable than you had feared. The expanse of valleys between the ranges "give you "an idea of boundless distance and a boundless land," but we should presume, by the time you got there, the idea of immensity had been thoroughly worked in upon you. The description of the Weber and Echo passes appeals strongly to your love of the sublime, but then the sublime rubs shoulders with the terrible. We have heard of suspended communications on the Cenis and Sömmering; we have heard of them on this very line, and in winter and the wet season we should be slow to advise the weaker invalids to trust themselves where "towering cliffs and roaring torrents and wonders of nature in her wildest moods" are likely to lead to isolation in the mountains on half rations, dwindling down to none at all. Then we come to Utah and Salt Lake City, where "nature blossoms like the rose and only man is vile." Vile as he may be, and revolting as his creed is to women, we suspect the vision of bricks and mortar and the idea of an inn would make the city show like the Promised Land to ladies who had taken Mr. Magee's hints on health, and had come that way to recruit it. At Promontory Mountain Junction you change trains and lines, but although you regretfully feel "your trip is drawing to a close," yet you may take comfort in knowing that "its greatest difficulties are before you." Among the wilder Nevada range you may renew what may have been your disastrous experiences of the Rocky Mountains. In 112 miles of locomotive climbing you cross them at an elevation of over 7,000 feet, and if your good angel stand by you to the end, and your breaks hold, you run down to the Pacific seaboard on an incline of 116 feet to the mile.

"How about the longer strain than the human constitution can stand," proceeds Mr. Magee, for his letter, long as a lady's, carries, like hers, its pith at the end. The fallacy of his argument lies in this, that generalizing from himself as an individual instance, he assumes that all minds may be stimulated continuously so as to carry through the frail clay that clogs them. "There is not a spot in the whole trip where there is not something new to be seen"—which is undeniable; and this "keeps the mind engaged"—which is beside the point, if it were true; for it infers the application of fictitious stimulants to the body, which is really what is in question. But in our experience, when the body takes to complaining, the mind pays it the most unremitting attention, and becomes more or less indifferent to all external objects. We grant that an ambuscade of Indians, a difficulty with Danites, a breakdown in the mountains, burying in an avalanche, running over a precipice—any of these might operate as a temporary distraction, but then at best that gives you but a choice of evils. In testifying that "the soundest sleep may be enjoyed in the sleeping cars," the language is unfortunately chosen, for it implies an effort that with most people would defeat itself. Coupled with the appetizing air, the eating arrangements make one's mouth water; but, indeed, so perfect are the arrangements in general on this particular railway, that one of the dining-cars, precipitated down a forty-feet embankment, escaped uninjured, except for a few broken panes of glass and some trifling scratches and bruises to its inmates. This story, it is fair to observe, is told on the authority of the Evening Bulletin. Mr. Magee concludes by expressing his opinion that "the trip will be found a great help to a liberal education; it expands the mind and ideas and all connected with the mental faculty, and gives a thorough insight into the great country of the United States." If you take the last sentence in its most literal sense, doubtless Mr. Magee is right, and after reading his letter we have no reason to doubt that it helps to brighten the fancy. But the medical faculty is slow to move, and we doubt whether as yet doctors will very generally prescribe a happy despatch by the line to their more delicate patients. Of this, however, we may be quite sure, that notwithstanding the rude and hasty construction of the line, the engineers must have succeeded in making the shaking on it almost inappreciable, for Mr. Magee, we think, makes no allusion to that initial objection.

HOW TO BREAK A BANK.

WE thought that English experience had sufficiently taught the lesson how the most flourishing banking concerns may be brought to ruin, but the Report on the failure of the Bombay Bank discloses some new curiosities in this much-practised art. The Bank of Bombay was no common Corporation. It held the same position in the Presidency which the Bank of England fills in this country. It was the banker of the Government, and enjoyed all the profit and prestige which that influential status implies. A few years ago it had a moderate capital, an ample circulation, and a highly profitable business. In 1863 its constitution was remodelled by a public Act, passed after what was conceived to be the most careful revision by the local Government, and with the deliberate approval of the Secretary of State. All sorts of officials helped to frame it, and at last it became law, with every à priori reason for supposing that it was a model charter. The fostering care of the Government did not end with the concoction of the Statute. In order to afford a continuing guarantee for careful management, three or four Government Directors were placed upon the Board, one of whom occupied the chair. Probably the Government were aware of the impossibility of insuring prudent and successful banking by any restrictions that might be imposed by the constituent charter of the institution, and relied mainly on the supervision of the Chairman and his official colleagues to exclude the possibility of irregular transactions. The Commissioners who have reported after the failure seem to have been seized with the idea that all the mishaps might have been prevented by more stringent provisions in the Act which determined the powers of the Bank. This instrument was certainly loose enough, including as it did an indefinite power of advancing money on the security of shares, but this had very little to do with the ultimate catastrophe. Every Bank has, and must have, large powers of conducting its business, which admit of being used with or without discretion and honesty, and if honesty and discretion are wanting in the managers, no statutory restrictions and limitations can save a Bank from ruin. Most of the business of the very safest Bank, not excepting the Bank of England, consists of advances on more personal security, which may be the soundest or the most fallacious basis according to the judgment with which the names are selected. Safe banking cannot be insured by any rules, and if the Bank of Bombay failed in consequence of advances on bills and promissory notes with the further security of what proved to be greatly overrated shares, it would not the less have been ruined if the loans had been made on the bills and notes alone without the shares to back them.

The real cause of the disaster was one to which Banking Companies are always liable. The Secretary was reckless in his views of banking, and he was in intimate relations with speculators who gained an absolute control over the moneys of the Bank, and used it to further their own wild projects, until at last the speculators, the projects, and the Bank came down together in one great crash. The Board did nothing to check the mischief, for its most influential member was the great merchant prince of Bombay, Premchund Roychund, and Premchund himself was the speculator who assisted himself and his friends at will out of the coffers of the Government Bank. The other commercial Directors bowed down before the mighty Premchund with that amazing deference which the mercantile mind always pays to the reputation of wealth. As for the Government Directors, they were only a respectable delusion. Even the Chairman would seem to have known nothing of what was going on, and was content to accept with gratitude the profitable allotments of shares which Premchund's influence cast into his lap. In short, there was a manager who either did not know how to manage, or was content to abdicate his functions for the sake of keeping on good terms with Premchund, and there was a Board of Directors which did not make the slightest pretence of directing anything, and left the whole concern at the absolute mercy of the Company-King, and his obsequious friend, the Secretary. Having got into this groove, the Bank became a mere sleeping partner of Premchund's, supplying unlimited capital, sharing every risk, and leaving the substantial profit, when profit was made, to the great Bombay speculator. And this was the course of business throughout a period of perhaps wilder inflation than ever was seen out of Bombay. In 1864 and 1865 Companies were created for every imaginable purpose, and apparently with uniform success. Land Companies, Cotton Companies, Ship Companies, Coffee Companies, besides financial and manufacturing Companies of every kind, were brought out in rapid succession, and all their shares went at once to a premium. The Back Bay Company had shares which, when 5,000 rupees were paid up, sold in the market for 35,000 rupees, and on these the Board, at the instance of Premchund and the Secretary, resolved to make advances up to four times the amount paid upon them. Other Companies were dealt with on equally liberal terms, and Premchund, who ruled the market, and whose name sufficed to ensure a premium for the shares of any Company which he patronized, was at the same time the dictator of the Government Bank. If Premchund wanted to oblige a friend, he would either secure him allotments or tell him to buy largely, undertaking himself to finance the operations through the Bombay Bank. Among the friends whom he was most ready to favour with allotments was Mr. Blair, the Secretary and Manager; and either from the same or some other influence, the Chairman, Mr. Birch, the chief of the Government Directors, was able in the course of a few months to realize a profit of [illegible]7,000*l.* out of allotments of shares in the great Back Bay Company, and other flourishing ventures of the day. While all this was going on, the Bombay Government was repeatedly warned, both by the Governor-General and by Sir Charles Wood, to keep a sharp eye upon the proceedings of the Bank, and occasionally some little stir was made, which sufficed only to elicit a few illusory reports, and then everything went on as before, Premchund rushing deeper and deeper into great share operations, and disposing at will of the treasure of the Bank, the Secretary aiding him in every transaction, the rest of the Directors doing whatever Premchund and his friend the Secretary suggested, and the Government looking on with tranquil indifference at the impending ruin of its own Bank. From the highest official of the Presidency down to the secretary of the Bank, there was not one man who did his duty. Those who were in league with the great speculator squandered the Bank funds, while those who were not actively participating in the game made no effort to avert the fast-approaching crash. It must have been obvious to every one that, if Premchund fell, the Bank must go with him, and the fall of a prince among speculators is never a very remote contingency. The inevitable crisis followed the year of inflation, and in April, 1866, Premchund informed the Bank that he required 250,000*l.* to prevent his stopping payment. He was already indebted to the Bank to the extent of 235,000*l.*, but the Directors, either from the consciousness that they could not stand if Premchund went to the wall, or in ignorance of the state of his account, which they took no trouble to ascertain, joined with the Asiatic and two or three other Banks in making the desired advance on securities which ultimately proved utterly insufficient. Soon afterwards, in pursuance of the same policy, a credit of 200,000*l.* was given to the Asiatic Bank. The Governor-General urgently called for information as to the position of the Bombay Bank, but the Presidency Government supported the Bank in its refusal to give details, and transmitted to Calcutta a statement as fallacious as was ever issued by a Board of Directors. By these tactics the Bank, though hopelessly insolvent, was kept open for another year, and in January, 1868, it went into liquidation, having lost in five years the whole of its paid-up capital of nearly 2,000,000*l.*

The story of its failure is the old story of Company management. A few reckless men engrossed the whole authority, and used it for their own purposes, while their colleagues on the Board, and the Government by whom nearly half of them were nominated, wholly neglected their duty of supervision and control. Disasters which are caused by personal derelictions are not to be prevented even by better organization than that of the Bombay Bank, and the disgraceful history which has now been made public only adds one more illustration of the obvious truth that Company management is certain to break down so long as the managers of Companies are incompetent and self-seeking.

BABY-SHOWS.

MOST shows, such as those of horses, dogs, and pigs, are a weariness to the flesh, though they may be of some practical good, as a means of comparing the different degrees of progress, according to varieties of method; but of baby-shows not a favourable word can be said. Not only is there no good whatever in them, no use or value, so far as the ordinary purposes of exhibition go, but they are positively harmful in some senses and disgusting in all. Imagine a number of babies of the poorer classes, which means doubtful cleanliness and exceedingly doubtful decency — small creatures having large lungs, varying from three weeks to two years of age, cooped up together on a broiling day, in a stuffy tent with an African temperature and defective ventilation, with a crowd of people passing and repassing before them, their mothers (nursing-mothers chiefly) hot, excited, weary, set out like docile animals behind a single fence, and then say what kind of good there can be in it all. Not the most enthusiastic lover of babies can find any beauty or grace in such a show, and assuredly no physician would approve it; while as to the comparative anatomist and physiologist, if any one wishes to see how easy it is to degrade man to the level of the lower animals, and how very slight is the barrier of artificial dignity and individuality which separates him from his four-footed relatives, he has only to go to such an exhibition as that got up at North Woolwich this last week. He will then be brought to a proper state of anthropological humility, and be disposed to accept the theory of our poor relations and progressive development, and to shake hands with his cousin the gorilla without more ado. For a baby-show is simply an exhibition of animals of a certain kind; neither more nor less; and the truth had better be said of it at once.

Save that they are handled a little more tenderly, the babies are treated by the visitors for all the world like the beasts in a cattle-show. They are poked at and felt, and their points remarked and their flesh assailed, much as if they were cows and horses, but of an exceptionally fragile kind. Their mothers share in the ruling spirit, and turn up grimy layers of small petticoats to show the shape or fineness of the limbs beneath. The breadth of a back and the dimensions of a thigh are points of which they boast with a quite unctuous complacency; and when a knot of coarse men and gross women stand before one of the chairs—we ought to say pens—and discuss the look of the flesh and general development for the age, the clearness of the eyes, the strength of the limbs, &c., of the small occupant, the mother takes it all in as good part as a hearth-rug cat when you stroke her kittens, and apparently with much the same sensations. All the mysteries of the nursery, generally held sacred from the prying gaze of the profane world, here go on in primitive simplicity; and any wavering young bachelor may realize to the life the after-effects of his marriage with a beloved object on small means, and put it to himself whether this is the kind of thing he likes or not. To be sure, paternity may make some difference, but the facts of baby nature are the same in both cases, and we are bound to say that baby nature and nursery mysteries are not particularly appetizing to the great majority of men. Whatever poetry or beauty lies round the cradle of the first-born—and poets and artists make out that a great deal does lie round it—is here vulgarized out of existence; and, if anything could make a man a sworn celibate for life, it would be a careful scrutiny of a baby-show, such as we saw at Woolwich. As one passed chair after chair of actively-nursing mother and placidly-feeding child, the finer shades of distinction got lost, and one came at last to regard the babies as so many animals, to be cared for by the inscrutable instinct of maternity truly, but having no claim to poetic sentiment, and very little more individuality than so many sparrows or sheep, save to their respective mothers. When not asleep or sucking, they all kicked, and screamed, and fought wildly with space, with more or less passion and vigour; they all clutched vaguely at somebody's beard, or tried to put out their own eyes, or to choke themselves with their fists; some laughed if they were tickled, and some broke out into a howl; all stared; and all were very wet about the mouth and chin; and the great mass of them seemed to sleep away the hours when they were not feeding, and when asleep they were at least quiet, though they looked hot and very uncomfortable. The atmosphere of the tent was very close and unpleasant, and as positive in its own way, if not quite so nasty, as the atmosphere of a cow-house or a kennel. But the women seemed to like it; and perhaps nature, which tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, blunts their senses to things which sicken strong men. In this show prizes were offered for the biggest and finest babies of various ages, classified according to certain conditions. And among these prizes was one offered for "triplets." Accordingly the demand, though a queer one, found a corresponding supply; and one poor wretched creature, only three weeks confined, came to the show to be stared at and commiserated for the three miserable abortions she held in her arms. This seemed to us the most disgusting part of the exhibition. That a woman so awfully chastised by fate and unfriendly nature should be helped out of compassion is one thing, but that a prize should be offered for a monstrosity is another. We do not want a race of triplets. Certainly not, if they were to be like those at North Woolwich, which had a humiliating likeness to small monkeys, and for which the best thing one could wish was a speedy release from a cruel world where whole men and women find it hard to fight their way, but where a man or woman divided by three would be nowhere in the struggle. They were fearful things to regard as potential fathers and mothers—scarcely human, they were so small and dark and dwindled; weighing only three pounds each when they were born, and apparently no anything more now. Yet these miserable little abortions, with their weak and haggard mother, were set up in a stifling tent for all the days this precious show lasted, for the chance of a prize as a reward for a monstrosity.

But indeed what was to be gained by offering prizes at all? What can they do? They encourage no better breed of babies, however well deserved they may be. Given the best producer and nourisher of the human animal to be found, and how will a prize either encourage or enable others to compete with her? Besides, what are the grounds to go upon? The judges do not write up the place of living, age, race, condition, and food of the father and mother; and if they did, how would that affect others? The whole thing is too absurd to be argued about. Teach women a few elementary physiological truths about themselves and their children, and some good might be done; but a prize for what is a mere matter of blind chance—for certain chemical proportions unknown, and therefore not to be attained by others—is the most foolish of the many foolish acts of pseudo-philanthropy that we know of. And though it is a matter of fact that certain women produce fine children, and certain others poor and wretched little creatures, how is a baby-show to mend matters if they are bad, or to carry them further if they are favourable? We presume no one would go so far as to advocate means like those adopted by pigeon-fanciers and stock-raisers. Is there any power or law to deny the right of men and women produce stunted, scrofulous, rickety offspring, year after year, for as long as nature allows? We know what we should do with animals in such cases, but we cannot do the same with men and women; and baby-shows do not help us. In that North Woolwich show there were babies of all sorts; from the monkey-like triplets weighing three pounds each up to a young giantess of nine months old, with a thigh as large as the largest part of a stout man's arm; from bullet-headed creatures, as bald as so many coots, to a curious Aztec-looking little thing with a mat of black hair as thick and strong as a full-grown person's; from one cleanly-made, lively youngster of nine months, with the intelligent eyes of a two-year-old, to masses of lumpy jelly with no more intellect than so many grunting little pigs. But no one could propagate or abolish any of these varieties. The thick-thighed monster must remain sui generis, unless the mother produces its like; so of the hairy type; so of the lively kind, and of all others. In fact, the question of ultimate use met one at every turn; for here was a show, with prizes to be given to so many chances, not one element of the whole concern being under human control as we exercise control, or to be manipulated by science or the will.

If the prizes had been given, as we said before, to cleanliness and intelligence of management, and had been preceded by instruction, there might be some good in these shows; but as things are, they are not only nonsense in themselves, but a very pernicious and disgusting form of nonsense, doing infinitely more harm than good, on what side soever we regard the whole affair. A large number of women and young children are congregated together in bad air, and under unfavourable conditions for health, cleanliness, and decency; there is the chance of infectious disease, always latent somewhere among the poor even when not openly displayed, breaking out when too late to be isolated, and the consequent chance of a fearful disaster; there is the sure disturbance to the habits and temper of the mother, and the consequent disturbance to the health of the child; and all for the sake of a prize, which is barren of result—a mere sum of money, which it were better to give in charity without the pretence of a claim of earning at all. It is to be feared that children are but doubtful goods to the poor at the best of times, and a quiver-full is by no means the prayer of an East-end artisan troubled to find bread for the hungry mouths about him; and if people with much money have pleasure in giving to those with little, there are only too many to receive, and occasions never wanting. But let the thing be done honestly, and with some judgment, and let charity and almsgiving be called by their right names, and not glossed over with this quasi-philanthropic, quasi-scientific varnish. A baby-show is a mischievous sham and a degrading exhibition, and the sooner we have seen the last of the kind the better for all concerned.

unnecessary difficulties which are thrown in the way of the administration of justice in England, that it ought not to be passed over in silence. An action was brought by one Susan Varley against the publisher of the Daily Telegraph for penalties. The plaintiff's case was that the Telegraph had inserted certain advertisements by which inquiry was made for goods which had been stolen, and in which the owners undertook that if the goods were returned no proceedings should be taken against the thieves; such advertisements being illegal, as tending to the compounding of felonies. The jury was sworn, the judge was all attention, and the plaintiff's counsel told his story with all due elaboration. Witnesses were called from Government offices and from coffee-houses where newspapers are filed, to prove that the copies of the Daily Telegraph produced in Court were really copies of the periodical which emanates from 135 Fleet Street, and that the proper persons had been sued for the delinquencies of that journal. The witnesses were duly cross-examined, the regulation jokes were bandied about, and "a laugh" was of course raised when inquiries were made as to the real existence and the habits of the plaintiff, "did she," for instance, "live up two pair of stairs"? The case looked very black for our lively contemporary, when the counsel for the defendant rose and made an objection to the evidence. The judge did not think much of this. The learned counsel had, however, a further objection, which certainly seems to go to the root of the matter. He submitted "that the statute upon which the action was founded had been repealed by the 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 27. The first section of this last Act recited that it was expedient to repeal various statutes, and it repealed so much of the Act in question 'as relates to advertisements therein prohibited.'"

The report of the case in the Telegraph reads on smoothly enough, but here must doubtless have occurred an awkward pause, which might well have been represented by a couple of lines of asterisks. Everybody seems to have been taken aback. The counsel for the plaintiff, who had so far steered their case so triumphantly, must have been especially nonplussed. The leader must have turned sharply round on his junior, and some elementary work on criminal law must have been in instant demand. The briefless barristers in the second row must have put their heads together, and tittered and buzzed learnedly. Even Mr. Justice Keating on the Bench must have wished that he had even as much as Archbold's Practice near to hand. All this must have happened, and might have been represented in the report by two lines of asterisks. One and all, however, of the parties concerned, when they recovered from the shock, seem to have put the best face upon their own ignorance, and to have looked kindly on the ignorance of their neighbours. The plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Serjeant Robinson, said that "his attention had not been before drawn to the 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 27, and he had not been aware of its contents." The Judge observed that "this was no discredit to the learned Serjeant, for Lord Coke himself had said that he did not know all the statute law, though he added that he should be ashamed to say that he did not know all the common law. He (Mr. Justice Keating) must say he did not know the statute of George IV." And even the defendant's counsel, Mr. Giffard, the lucky discoverer of the awkward fact, was kind enough to say that "he would not say how long he had known it." Then Mr. Serjeant Robinson added that he "was informed that this matter had been thoroughly investigated, and that the provision upon which the action was founded had not been repealed." Mr. Justice Keating remarked that "the statute of George IV. stated in the preamble that it was expedient that certain Acts, and parts of Acts, enumerating among others the one sued on, should be repealed, in order that the provisions contained in them might be amended and consolidated into one Act. Now the question was, had they been consolidated into one Act? It certainly looked like a provisional repeal. He thought that the case was clear enough upon the facts, and that the question of law should be further looked into." After some more discussion the Judge was inclined to direct a formal verdict for the plaintiff, but the defendant's counsel pointed out that, "even if his lordship's impression were well founded, that the enactment still existed in another statute, that would not entitle the plaintiff to recover, for he expressly founded his action upon the statute named in the declaration; and no judge, he apprehended, would amend in such a case." Eventually a formal verdict was entered for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiff's counsel to move the full Court to vary the verdict in accordance with what might be held to be the true state of the law. Some time in November next we may therefore expect a solemn argument before the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster upon the question, amongst others, whether the statutable prohibition of such advertisements as those complained of has been removed or not.

This question ought clearly never to have arisen. We have not a word of blame for the Judge or the plaintiff's counsel in the case. As things now are, press of business must sometimes oblige eminent counsel to open a case without having devoted sufficient time to it to enable them to ascertain that the statutes upon which it is founded have not been affected by subsequent legislation; and the Judges have frequently disclaimed that thorough knowledge of the statute law off-hand which, by a pleasing fiction, is supposed to be imprinted on the minds, not only of judges or barristers, but of all the Queen's subjects. What we do complain of is the confused state of the law which is disclosed in the story which we have culled from the reports of the Guildhall sittings. Many legal principles must necessarily remain involved in much obscurity. The common law is a wide and ill-surveyed field; but the question whether or not there exists any statutable prohibition of a particular act is, in its nature, of the simplest possible kind, and ought to be capable of instant solution. How very far this is from being the case will sufficiently appear from a statement of the course of legislation with reference to such advertisements as were alleged to have been inserted in the Daily Telegraph. They were made penal by a temporary Act, 25 Geo. II c. 36, s. 1, which was made perpetual by 28 Geo. II. c. 19. These Acts, so far as they related to the advertisements in question, were repealed by 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 27; but new provisions, similar to those which had been repealed, were contained in c. 29, s. 59, of an Act passed in the same year. The last-mentioned Act was wholly repealed by 24 and 25 Vict. c. 95, but new prohibitions of the obnoxious advertisements were enacted in s. 102 of c. 96 of the same year, commonly called the "Larceny Act, 1861." Finally, sects. 1, 9, 11, 12, and 15 of 25 Geo. II. c. 36, and the whole of 28 Geo. II. c. 19, were repealed by 30 and 31 Vict. c. 59. This is obviously a labyrinth through which no judge can be expected to thread his way at a minute's notice, and with no law library at hand, in the course of a trial at nisi prius. If he calls for the statutes of George II., they confront him with no indication that they have ever been interfered with by subsequent legislation; nor is there any authoritative index by which he could discover the actual state of the statute law upon any given point.

The results of this state of things are ludicrous as well as vexatious. It is unseemly as well as inconvenient that the Legislature and the highest Courts of justice should be employed in repealing what has been repealed long ago, or in discussing what has been settled beyond dispute. But these things not unfrequently happen. Three statutes which had been repealed by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 48, were solemnly repealed again by 21 and 22 Vict. c. 26. In 1842 the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Reg. v. Great Western Railway Company, listened to much argument, and delivered an elaborate judgment upon 2 and 3 Ed. VI. c. 24, little suspecting that it had been repealed by 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 32. Such absurdities cannot be avoided as matters stand, but they might be rendered impossible with the greatest ease. We have on previous occasions mentioned the steps which have been taken by the Government towards remedying the evil, by placing in the hands of the profession and the public, in a manageable compass, the statute law which is actually in force. But the work has taken more years tha[illegible] taken months, and it seems to be the business of no one in particular to see that it is accomplished. The latest information upon the subject is contained in a speech made by Mr. Gladstone, in reply to Mr. Hadfield, on the 4th of last month. We thence gather that in July, 1868, Lord Cairns, who was then Chancellor, requested Sir J. S. Lefevre, Sir T. E. May, Mr. Rickards, Mr. Thring, and Mr. Reilly to act as a Committee to superintend the publication of a new edition of the statutes, the editor of which is to be Mr. A. J. Wood. We also gather that the first volume of the work will be published as soon as the Committee has come to terms with the Treasury, whenever that may be, and that a chronological table of all statutes, and also an alphabetical index of those now in force, will shortly be produced. These measures are something to be thankful for, as far as they go; though, for reasons which we have explained in former articles, we are of opinion that the principles upon which the new edition is being constructed are by no means satisfactory, while the annual issue of the statutes continues to exhibit almost every fault which can attach to a collection of laws. The fact is that the subject is only taken up by the Government of the day at odd moments when it has nothing else to do, or when inconvenient questions are put by inquisitive private members. It used to be said that Nelson's column in Trafalgar Square was being leisurely completed by the occasional exertions of a man and a boy; and the reconstruction of the Statute Book seems to be carried on in an analogous manner. Several Acts have been passed of late years, expressly repealing obsolete statutes enacted from the earliest period down to the year 1861. Some of this work has to be done over again upon a more thorough system, and a Bill is to be introduced for the purpose. A Bill is also to be introduced in order to get rid of obsolete Acts passed between 1861 and the present day, but Mr. Gladstone was obliged to tell Mr. Hadfield that this latter Bill cannot be proceeded with at present, "because exertions were directed to the earlier period of the statutes before 1861"; as if, by employing a sufficient number of hands, the two Bills could not be proceeded with simultaneously. The tone of Mr. Ayrton's speech upon the same occasion, on behalf of the Treasury, gives us little hope of any rapid progress being made, or of any determination having been arrived at to give the profession and the country what really is needed. After stating that it was proposed to publish a collection of such statutes as have not been repealed, he proceeded to say that, "if the House wished for a digested edition of the statutes, that would be more difficult, and would require more time. Some gentlemen even required to have the statutes codified, but that would take years." The Government are quite right in their method. First, we must know what is the extent of the statute law now in force, then we want the statutes digested under proper heads, and, lastly, those digested statutes should be consolidated. But what the Government fails to comprehend is that these operations ought to be determined upon and commenced, and that it is quite possible to accomplish them speedily. It is with the hope of preventing this important and simple measure of reform from going quietly to sleep again for two or three years more that we have thought it right to call attention to the case of Varley v. Ellis as exe[illegible]ing the way in which delay and expense are every day caused by the impossibility of readily and surely ascertaining what is the statute law upon any given topic.

THE BERMUDA FLOATING-DOCK.

IT used to be a favourite joke in the navy that gun-brigs were built by the mile, and that when a vessel was wanted for service a proper length of junk was sawn off, a head and stern affixed, a name borrowed from the First Lord of the Admiralty's pack of hounds, and there you had a ship which in fine weather and the absence of an enemy might do duty as a cruising man-of-war. It was deemed at the beginning of the century an audacious fiction that a ship's sides could be built first and her ends be added afterwards, but in the case of the floating-dock Bermuda we have a vessel which has not only been built, but sent to sea, with sides only and no ends. The sides have been despatched in tow of powerful steamers, while the ends have been sent out separately, and it is intended to put the vessel together at the island of Bermuda, which gives both a name and a station to this remarkable specimen of naval architecture. We take for granted that the Bermuda is a man-of-war, although we cannot say to what class she belongs; and if she requires a class to herself she is as well entitled to it as some ships of the ironclad fleet, which are as much like one another as a decanter is like a wine-glass or a dessert-plate. We should suppose, however, that the Bermuda is a sloop, as that is, or was, the usual designation for naval nondescripts, and even the Diamond Rock off the island of Martinique, when it was occupied by British sailors in order more effectually to blockade the French, was registered in the Navy List as a sloop of war. Indeed we are not sure that the Admiralty, which now occupies Ascension, does not consider that island as a sloop which happens to be fitted with particularly holding anchors.

The Bermuda Dock bears nearly the same relation to a ship as a hat-box without a cover does to a hat. It is not encouraging to lovers of reduced naval estimates to hear that similar docks are likely to be required in several other stations besides Bermuda. There is not the smallest doubt that such a dock would be convenient at Vancouver's Island, but the difficulty of navigating it round Cape Horn would probably be [illegible]surmountable, and the most enterprising Yankee would hardly contract to carry it overland by railway to the Pacific. It is to be hoped that "the still vexed Bermoothes" will be more still than vexed when the dock approaches its destination, and supposing that this first experiment is successful, others are certain to be made at no distant date. The convenience of such a dock on any station where large ironclad men-of-war are likely to be employed is obvious, and at Bermuda it has been proved to be impossible to construct a dock in the ordinary manner. The shape of the dock as it went to sea was, as we have said, that of a ship without head or stern. Her sides are formed of iron boxes, into which water can be pumped to sink the dock low enough for a ship to be placed in it. There the caissons which form the head and stern of the dock are fitted on to it. The water is pumped out of the boxes, and the dock with the ship in it rises, until by opening sluices in the caissons the water in the dock may be discharged, and the ship is left dry down to her keel. The length of the dock is 384 feet, its breadth is 124 feet, and its height is 75 feet. The sides of the dock are exactly parallel, except at the extreme ends, which taper a little to admit of the structure being towed. The hull is formed of two complete wrought-iron skins twenty feet apart. The space between the two skins is divided into water-tight compartments. The dock was built in the Thames near the places where the Great Eastern and the Minotaur were built, and like these ships she hung in launching; but the difficulty which arose in the case of the dock was happily surmounted in a single day. It happens that the dock and the Great Eastern have both been voyaging across the Atlantic at the same time, and both enterprises possess considerable scientific interest, and are deemed worthy to be accompanied by that curious product of modern civilization, the Special Correspondent of a newspaper. We are indebted to the Morning Post for a journal of the voyage of the dock as far as the island of Porto Santo, which may be considered almost as remarkable in literature as the dock is in naval architecture. There is undeniable novelty in sending a captain and crew to sea in a ship which has neither head nor stern, but the writer seems more particularly struck with the fact that a dog should be placed in such a peculiar position. We are tempted to take a liberty with a familiar proverb, and say that every day has its dog, for it is becoming a regular practice with those who undertake to describe great solemnities or interesting proceedings for the information of the public, to observe and record canine conduct under unusual and trying circumstances. We think, however, that the voyage of the dock would have been interesting even if she had not had a dog on board. She was launched in September last, and has been lying all the winter and spring at Sheerness. Her draught of water when light is 11 feet 2 inches, and as the space between her inner and outer skin is 20 feet, it follows that in calm weather she would float with her upper floor about 9 feet above the water. The hawser by which she was towed was 26 inches in circumference. The Northumberland was immediately ahead of the dock, and the Agincourt ahead of the Northumberland, so that the towing was done tandem fashion. The Terrible was astern of the dock, with a smaller hawser carried on board of her, so that she might help to steer the unwieldy monster. The crew of the dock were accommodated in some of the upper compartments, and a cabin for the captain had been built upon the upper deck. This deck would have a breadth of 20 feet on either side, with an intervening space of 84 feet, over which two temporary bridges had been built. The descent of 56 feet from the upper deck to the floor was by a ladder. If readers have obtained a correct idea of the appearance of the dock, they will be able to imagine the astonishment with which the procession of which she formed part must have been witnessed by foreign ships which encountered it at sea. At the outset the two ironclads towed tandem fashion, as has been stated, but afterwards they appear to have been harnessed abreast. A steam frigate was being towed astern, and one or two smaller vessels, like outsiders to a royal carriage, entreated all passing or crossing ships to keep out of the way. The weather during the first part of the voyage had been as fine as could be wished. We forbear to speculate as to what would happen to this enormous structure in a gale of wind. Perhaps her manners might turn out to be better than her appearance. But it is evident that if such craft are to cross the sea, there will be as much need as ever for seamanship in the Royal Navy. The oddity of the figure of the dock, considered as a cruiser, was heightened by the circumstance that with the wind well astern she was able to carry a sail, although she had neither mast nor yard. The sail is irreverently compared by the Correspondent to a curtain drawn from side to side across the vacant middle of the vessel. On the whole, it may be questioned whether an American Monitor, when one first went to sea, occasioned so much surprise to strangers as did this remarkable example of British naval architecture.

The dock was at anchor on the 4th instant at Porto Santo, about forty miles north-east of Madeira. More than half her voyage still remained to be accomplished, and the Warrior and Black Prince were ready at Porto Santo to relieve the ships that had towed her to that place. The voyage from Porto Santo across the Atlantic to Bermuda would occupy at least eighteen days, so that she cannot yet have reached her destination, and some time may be occupied in contending with the difficulties which impede access to the dockyard at Ireland Island. These difficulties are probably considerable, for we find that the site of the dockyard was chosen in the hope that the intricacies of the channel of approach might baffle an assailing force. Other and more artificial defences have been provided at heavy cost, and as Bermuda is only 580 miles from the American coast, there is no doubt that if it is worth keeping, it is worth fortifying. Americans are well aware of the value of these islands in time of war, and Washington would have been well pleased to have contrived their capture at the time when his allies the French were temporarily superior to the English fleet in the West Indies. But the opportunity was not improved, and "the remote Bermudas" are still numbered among the jewels of the British crown. A Republican who was inclined to be offensive might show from history that these islands have been overrun at one time by aristocrats, and at another time by rats, and he might apply to the costly operations of which the sending out of this floating dock forms part, the taunting line, sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves. But if we are to keep an ironclad squadron in the West Indies, a dock for cleaning the bottom of the ships is necessary, and there are good reasons for placing it at Bermuda.

THE ETON AND HARROW MATCH.

THE one fatal mistake that Nature made when she created boys is partly atoned for by the Eton and Harrow match. Boys, as a general rule, are in private life just not tolerable. That we cannot do without them, and that men never could be men at all without having once gone through that degraded stage of life which carves its name on the legs of the drawing-room table and explodes gunpowder in the nursery, is no reason for pretending that things are better than they are, or that the rational enjoyment of life is at all the less spoilt by their existence. It is strange that it should be so, considering that their sisters, if they have a fault, err in being, if anything, over-angelic. Of course the work of Nature cannot be undone; but its evil effects can be partly neutralized by sending the boys to school, and enduring the holidays with that manly fortitude with which all hopeless human ills should be borne. However, it may be freely granted that the "Lord's" match is a success. There is not a prettier sight to be seen in the whole world than the view from the Grand Stand on the top of the Pavilion about five o'clock in the afternoon of the annual second Friday in July. There are stern moralists who sometimes wonder whether it is a good thing for the boys. They ask whether it is a salutary exercise for the mind of a boy of seventeen to have a ball coming towards him in the air, and to know that from twelve to fourteen thousand people are speculating with wild eagerness whether he will catch it or not. We will not attempt to answer the question beyond merely hoping that his companions may somehow make it a very bad thing for him if he misses it; but it is to be remembered that it is this very ball coming towards him in this very way that he has been expecting and preparing for during several months of practice, and that if he has not diligently found out his weak points, marked how the rise and fall of the ground affect the judgment of the fieldsman, studied how best to circumvent and elude the sunshine when the ball rises in the sun, brought good-natured companions to send him catches in the morning or evening from in front of the perplexing light and shade of trees, meditated how to stand towards a ball when its twist is to be from left to right or from right to left, forced himself to use both hands for the catch, instead of actually or virtually only one—then he has not worked as a member of his school Eleven should, and if he fails he will fail deservedly. There is, on the whole, much less luck in cricket than there seems to be. Only one element of success is altogether beyond providing for—the weather, that is, as affecting the state of the ground; in almost every other respect things happen as they ought, and the better the training has been, the better the play will succeed. Not that there is any truth in the amusing affectation which the newspaper articles occasionally make, that the players are a set of martyrs, who have sacrificed their time and private tastes to the glory and gain of their side. As a general rule, if anything has been sacrificed, it is their construing lessons; and if there is a moral training in the work of an Eleven, it comes with the organization and drill of the games, not from any self-sacrifice that the players make in forcing themselves to play. Indeed it must be very creditable to all parties concerned if membership of a school Eleven is found to be compatible with other concerns than cricket. It is related of a player in a victorious Eleven of a very recent year—a youth otherwise excellent, but not exceptionally advanced in his classical studies—that being in school one fine afternoon during the progress of a lesson in Horace, he was unfortunate enough to let his thoughts wander from the printed page before him to the dominant topic of cricket. "Linked to the Nymphs," so ran the words of the ode, "the comely Graces dance along the ground." The teacher improved the occasion. "Give the names of the Graces?" he asked of our cricketer, just then speculating on an off-drive. Roused from his reverie, the young athlete was equal to the occasion. Looking up with an air of pleased surprise, and the confidence of one who feels that now at last there was something to be answered that he really did know—"Names of the Graces," he promptly replied, "E. M., W. G., and H.!" It is to be feared that the young gentleman's score at Lord's the next week was hardly the result of any very painful abandonment of pleasure to public duty.

Eton has won at last. The critics who have in late years so perseveringly proved that Eton must always, from the nature of the case, be beaten, will no doubt exercise their faculties to the full in explaining why fortune made an exception of the present year. Without venturing for a moment to impugn the justice of any one of the explanations current upon the subject, we may merely say that in our opinion there is one reason which appears quite sufficient to account for the result, which is, that the Eton Eleven was decidedly the best. It is curious how mistaken the public expectation has been both last year and this. Probably both Elevens of 1868 were rather below the average, but Eton was to win if there was any confidence to be placed in the prophets. The match was played, and Harrow proved, not only the winner, but clearly the best Eleven. This year, in May, Harrow was pronounced to be safe; and not improbably, if the match had been played in May, it would have won. But as the summer went on the improvement in the Eton batting was marked, while at Harrow no new and original genius appeared, as has so often been the case, about a fortnight before the match, and the old players rather fell off than otherwise. As it turned out, the match was won by batting. In respect of bowling there can be no doubt whatever that Harrow was the strongest. The Eton bowling of the second innings was creditable, but not surpassingly good, and there was very little of it; whereas Harrow had at least four bowlers, if not five, who were very straight, various in pace and pitch, and easy to play only because on Friday morning hardly any bowling in the world would have been difficult. In fielding there was not much to choose between the schools; both were fairly up to the mark, that of the defeated school being perhaps rather the best, if the average of the ?ld be struck. Their cover-point was excellent, and at least three or four others were neat and quick in return, though many of the runs made in the slips might have been saved by bringing the field nearer in. But in batting the spectators could hardly persuade themselves that light and dark blue had not changed places. Eton played exactly the innings which for so many years Harrow had played to their discomfiture. It was patient, straight, carefully correct, and admirable in judgment; the forward play was remarkably finished, but never dashing; indeed, the hitting was so economized that Harrow bowled slows for the last half of the innings with but one man deep in the field. These characteristics were especially remarkable in the one long innings of the match—a performance which was really first-rate, and included nothing which deserves to be called a chance. Any one who watched the play while the Eton score was rising from 80 to 100 on the first day, when the bowling and fielding were at their best, and the batsmen fighting their way by inches as it were towards the "three figures," saw as good cricket as has been shown in any school match within our memory. The Harrow batting was weaker, on the other hand, than it has shown itself for seven years at least. The best part was the last half-hour on Friday—on which occasion, by the way, it may be mentioned to the credit of Harrow that they made no attempt to waste time by delaying to send their batsmen in—but no first-class innings was played on either day. All that Harrow could do was to play the easy balls well. There was not much that was faulty, but it was all weak. It seemed as if they had not had enough practice to good bowling. Anything that came more difficult than usual either "morally" bowled them or actually took the wicket.

We have said that the Eton was the best of the two Elevens, and it would certainly win the match if it were played again. But it was not the best by any means in the proportion of two to one, in spite of the marked superiority of batting. Several causes con- [illegible] though well dried up by the time that the match began, had l[illegible] the ground in a state simply perfect. It was just hard enough to make the balls roll, and not hard enough to make them bump. Late in the afternoon, and still more on the next day, the soil was again dry and lively, and the fast bowling of the Etonians rose with fatal quickness from the pitch. Another cause of defeat to Harrow was the perverseness, whether of weather or of judgment, which sent their four bowlers in every single case to the end for which they were least suited. It is perhaps open to doubt whether with a wind blowing fitfully, though not hard, from the Pavilion end, it would have been wise to start a slow bowler in the first instance against it; but certainly after fifty or sixty runs had been scored, and it was evident that with the wind the ball came easily to the bat—still more when it was evident that, as it was, Eton would not be induced to take liberties with it—all the four bowlers should have been changed to the reverse ends. The experiment of the next day, in the match against the Marylebone Eleven, showed which was the end really fitted for the slow bowling. Lastly, there was luck, which on the whole went in favour of the winning side, and though it did not give them the victory, materially added to its completeness. It is not to luck, however, that must be attributed the wild attempts of the Harrow Eleven to judge a run. Independently of the occasions when a wicket was lost by it, on one of which indeed fortune certainly was rather hard on the batsman, there were scores of times when an easy run was lost, or a desperately rash run tried. Harrow partisans declared by way of apology that boys will be boys. That is the very thing we began by complaining of; but the species after all has got a kind of rudimentary brains, and the running of some of the team was nothing less than insane. There are one or two golden rules of running which ought to be hung up over the cradles of English youth, and committed to memory simultaneously with the catechism. One is, that a run must be judged at once. It takes no appreciable time to see whether a ball is going fast or slow, whether it is going towards the right or left hand of the field, which wicket it is which will be in danger; and the limits of possible runs are extended almost indefinitely if the striker will but call at once, and start as he calls. A moment's hesitation ought to be equivalent to a judgment against the run, in any case of doubt. Secondly, the partner must trust the caller. This is the only way by which responsibility can be thrown on the right shoulders, and without responsibility things are sure to go wrong. It is quite understood among cricketers what are the occasions on which each player has the duty of calling; and the only case in which the player who is called should refuse is when it is certain beyond a doubt that, if he refuses, his partner will be able to get back to his wicket in time. This is a subject upon which the professionals are constantly giving wrong advice. Their theory often is that the run is a matter of consultation, whether tacit or express, between the two players, and that they run only if both agree to it. This seems to us a pernicious heresy, and in practice it costs wickets; without having any statistics to appeal to, we shall yet be much mistaken if it does not turn out to be the case that professionals are oftener run out by mere misunderstanding than amateurs. And thirdly, the batsman who wants to make his fair share of runs must run the first run quick; and, if it is a long hit, he must turn and even start for the second before judging whether it can be made or not. Meanwhile his partner waits his opinion with his bat inside the crease.

The match was fairly played out, as it may be in a couple of days nineteen times out of twenty, if neither side endeavour to protract it; it was played with good-humour and friendliness on both sides; and the scene of long-delayed Eton triumph at the end was one to which the darkest of blues must have found it difficult to refuse his sympathy. Some doubt was expressed as to one or two decisions with regard to "leg before" in the second innings; but the duty of an umpire is hard enough already without the prospect of criticism in the public journals to look forward to. As regards the public journals themselves, it is really time for criticism. The old-fashioned sporting papers relate cricket-matches with a severity of style which reminds one of an old chronicler. "At 10.51, when the score had reached 20, Jones took Brown's end, and the third ball of his fourth over bowled a wicket at seven minutes past eleven. Smith succeeded, and at twenty minutes to twelve gave a catch to Brown, who had resumed the bowling"—and so on. This suffers only from being dull; but it is infinitely preferable to the penny-a-lining of the daily papers, which is for the most part full of mistakes, and always childish. Mr. A., says the Times' report—it was in reality Mr. B.—was "appointed custodian of the wicket." A man being out, Mr. O. "filled the vacancy caused thereby." "Mr. L., like his predecessor, bowed to the direct assailings of Mr. G." Such is the style in which the story of the first innings is told. If it were only pigeon-matches, it would matter less, but surely cricket is an amusement manly enough to allow of a more sensible style of writing than that which has now lasted for some three or four years in the columns of the leading journal. Happily for the readers, the score is a thing that cannot be tampered with, and on this occasion it sufficiently speaks for itself.

THE WIMBLEDON MEETING.

THERE is something very striking about the monotony with which the Wimbledon fortnight repeats itself year after year. The merest glance at the business-like scene tells you that it is no spasmodic product of Volunteer energy, but a thoroughly settled institution which is quite safe against disestablishment, and not much subject to be affected by the varying moods of the public mind as it may shift from extravagant adulation to ill-natured criticism. Perhaps the most obvious remark which occurs to any visitor to the camp is the really extraordinary spirit of obedience and discipline which keeps a mixed mass of men from all corners of the kingdom—with, for the most part, no regimental ties to restrain them—as completely amenable to control, even to the merest trifles, as if they were privates in a Line regiment with the fear of extra drills and all sorts of weightier punishments to restrain them. At an entertainment given towards the close of the meeting to Colonel Colville, the Camp-Commandant, the Volunteers had the satisfaction of hearing from their temporary chief how easy his task of superintendence had become, and with what pleasure he looked back upon his Wimbledon experience. This is nothing more than might have been expected from the good sense of men who have voluntarily undertaken the duties of military service, but it supplies a singular commentary on the carping criticisms which not long since misrepresented the force as utterly destitute of the spirit of military subordination. Not a single instance has been reported in the papers of any wilful breach of discipline, and we have no doubt that the same steadiness which has distinguished the Volunteers in camp will be equally noticeable in the review of to-day, when they are to take their place by the side of a choice body of troops from Aldershot. The weather, upon the whole, has been unfavourable for shooting, and the gusty winds have palpably reduced the average scores, but in some respects the remarkable skill which has been attained has displayed itself more conspicuously than ever. The feat of Corporal Cameron in winning the Queen's Prize a second time with a score which has never been equalled, and never very closely approached except by himself, altogether puzzled the calculators of chances. The conditions of the contest seemed almost to exclude the possibility of such an event. Some two thousand picked competitors, chosen by long preliminary trials in every regiment, have first to shoot for the privilege of entering as competitors for the grand prize. Of these sixty only are admitted, and it almost follows of necessity that no man can find a place among the sixty unless he shoots with something more than his average success. So many men out of an army of 2,000 must be lucky enough to surpass themselves on the occasion that the probability of any man appearing in several successive years in the list is in itself very small, as the comparative rarity of the achievement shows. Even when this is accomplished, the closeness with which the best shots rival each other's performances and the large possibilities of mischance in rifle shooting leave heavy odds against the very best of the competitors. In such a contest there are no favourites at two to one, and that the same man should twice have passed through such an ordeal into the first place is an astonishing feat even for so steady and skilful a shot as the Temperance champion of Inverness. It did not need the clannish feeling of his countrymen to excite a fervour of admiration and delight at this unexpected result, and Scottish and English regiments vied with each other in the warmth of their congratulations.

Many of the other contests, too, raised more than the usual measure of enthusiasm. The Commons had a comparatively easy victory over the Lords, who were decidedly weaker than usual; whether, as their Captain suggested, in consequence of the late hours they have been keeping, or from a disposition to yield to the superior force of the Lower House, we do not profess to decide. A more startling result attended the competition between the picked teams of the three kingdoms, armed with the choicest rifles that modern skill has produced. England was beaten by Ireland, and thoroughly distanced by the Scottish eight. Last year Ireland occupied the same place, triumphing on that occasion over Scotland, but being conquered by the English team. The great disadvantages under which the Irishmen labour from the absence of any extensive body from which to select their champions, was thought at first to exclude them from any chance. In truth, for this small-bore contest Ireland means little more than a single Dublin Club, from which, with a solitary exception, their team was exclusively chosen. Nevertheless the Club has proved itself good enough to beat Scotland last year, and England this year, and there is no good reason that we know of to prevent the Irish eight on a future occasion from conquering both England and Scotland at once. In the Enfield contest with the Volunteers' weapon, the disparity of numbers told much more heavily against Ireland. A few men scattered among the English corps had to produce twenty representatives against the like number chosen from the thousands of good shots of English and Scottish descent. Even here the Irish, though beaten, maintained their credit, but England retained the trophy which it held last year, after alternate victories in five successive years had carried it backwards and forwards across the Tweed. The Public Schools match and the Oxford and Cambridge contest are always interesting as affording some indication of the hold which rifle-shooting has taken as a pastime of those who will influence the future. The Universities have not kept up to the mark, and Cambridge owed her victory rather to the weakness of Oxford than to her own prowess. But the Schools shot well for boys, Harrow leading, and Rugby just beating Eton for the second place. Cheltenham has almost as much to boast of as the winners, for no one approached the excellent shooting with which Ensign Sim won the Spencer Cup. We have never been fully persuaded that the Volunteer organization is altogether suitable for schoolboys, creditable as the efficiency of some of the school corps undoubtedly is; but, apart from drill, there can be no better or manlier amusement for them than rifle practice, and it is satisfactory to see that it is not losing any of its attractions. The business of the meeting has closed, and left behind it triumph for a few, discomfiture for many, but, as far as can be judged, health and good-humour for all.

REVIEWS.

JUVENTUS MUNDI.*

(First Notice.)

THOSE of us who remember the first appearance of the "Homeric Studies" eleven years ago, and the interest and criticism they excited, will be curious to learn what modifications of his views or what confirmations of them have occurred to their distinguished author during an interval in which he has avowedly both learnt and unlearnt many other things. Mr. Gladstone's is a mind that cannot rest in any hypothesis, whether it be political or critical. It is not, apparently, in his nature to draw any final conclusions; and, often as he thinks he has arrived at a fixed terminus, it seems to vanish before him, or he is carried beyond it, like the railway train—to use a simile of his own—that is worked along by an endless cable:—

> In this work [he says in his preface], which is mainly the produce of the two Recesses of 1867, 1868, I have endeavoured to embody the greater part of the results at which I arrived in the Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age, 1858. Those results, however, are considerably modified in the ethnological and in the mythological portions of the inquiry. The chief source of modification in the former has been, that a further prosecution of the subject with respect to the Phœnicians has brought out much more clearly and fully what I had only ventured to suspect or hint at, and gives them, if I am right, a highly influential function in forming the Greek nation. A fuller view of this element in its composition naturally acts in an important manner upon any estimate of Pelasgians and Hellenes respectively.
> The Phœnician influence reaches far into the sphere of the mythology, and tends, as I think, greatly to clear the views we may reasonably take of that curious and interesting subject. . . . But, further, I have endeavoured to avoid a certain crudity of expression in some sections of the "Olympos," which led to misconceptions of my meaning with respect to the action of tradition (especially of sacred or Hebrew tradition) and invention respectively, in the genesis of the Greek mythological system.
> In dealing with the third portion of the "Studies," called "Aoidos," I have contracted a great deal, but added or altered little.

The original work has been, we believe, long out of print, and we may suppose that the author decreed a suspension of the issue during the time that he was meditating the alterations and recasting to which he has now submitted it. It is probable that it is not much known among our young students at the present day, and we would wish emphatically to impress upon them that the new work will by no means supply to them the place of the old. The original book was indeed full in every page of debateable or questionable conclusions. That, by the common consent of the innumerable critics who fastened impetuously upon it, its most important and most salient theories were crude or fanciful, is now matter of literary history. Yet the author himself, though he may have been disappointed at the general chorus of disapproval of most of his peculiar views, must have been gratified by the uniform testimony of his assailants to the minute and multifarious learning, the subtlety of analysis, the wealth of language, and, above all, the high and generous tone with which the whole work was pervaded. The book excited a deep interest quite independent of its merits as a piece of antiquarian criticism; and its writer may well have exulted in the stimulus it gave to the study of his illustrious author, much more talked of, we believe, than read, by the generality of our gentlemen and scholars, till quite recently. It is the simplest truth to say that Mr. Gladstone has done more to popularize Homer among us than any one since Pope, and he has done more to make him understood even by scholars and critics than perhaps any other writer that could be named.

But it is not in the results of Mr. Gladstone's inquiries, be they right or wrong, but in the fulness and ingenuity with which they are worked out, that the use and the fascination of the book must mainly consist. The study of the original work is an exercise of the mind. It is calculated to bring into play all the powers of reflection and imagination that the reader may possess, to test his judgment, or to tap his vein of poetry if he has such a thing at all, to vivify before him the ages of the past, and enlarge his knowledge both of individual and national characters. It is at the same time an exercise of a man's moral nature; filling his mind with a sense of beauty, and elevating it to the appreciation of the purest and noblest sentiments. Fanciful, sometimes perversely fanciful, as we have judged the original "Studies" in many respects to be, this at least is the residue of gain which we feel we have derived from them ourselves, and we sincerely wish that every young student of Homer might have the opportunity of reading those three goodly volumes from beginning to end.

But it is not, we fear, to be so. Mr. Gladstone issues a single volume of Results, much less in bulk and contents than any of the original three, in which he gives us no doubt considerable modifications and improvements of his views, but conceals from us almost wholly the processes by which he arrives at them. We shall not attempt, in our limited space, to enter into any regular discussion of them. As regards the introduction, or rather the expansion, of the Phœnician element—for Mr. Gladstone had already made some use of it—in the ethnological section of the work, there can be no doubt that we are great gainers. It may be remembered that early in the last year an article appeared in the Quarterly Review on the subject of "Phœnicia," and this Mr. Gladstone may be considered now to claim as his own writing. He adopts the argument of that paper, and asserts from it the blending of a large Phœnician element with the Pelasgian and the Hellenic with which we are familiar in the composition of Greek race. That the Phœnician traders must have had very constant and lasting communication with the Pelasgians or the Hellenes on the shores and in the islands of the Mediterranean, there can be no doubt. That they may have imparted to them many ideas religious, social, and political, imbued them with some special tastes and dispositions, left among them numerous words and names, together with the memory of many men and events, we cannot for a moment question. It may be the fact, and we think Mr. Gladstone has very fairly established it as a fact, that the Poseidon of the Greek Olympus, the God of the Sea, as he eventually became among the Greeks, to the exclusion and deposition of their own original Nereus, the "Water" God, is a deity imported from the mythology of the Phœnicians. Nevertheless, sorely exercised as Mr. Gladstone confesses himself to have been by the difficulty of explaining why the horse was sacrificed to this marine divinity, we cannot acquiesce in the solution he proposes—namely, that the Phœnicians were the inventors of the games, and among the games the most prominent was the horse or chariot race; for in the games of the Phæacians, or Phœnicians, as we are to interpret them, at Scheria, the chariot race is just the one Grecian game which does not occur; nor, as far as we have learnt, is there, in fact, any foundation for the assertion that the games generally are of Phœnician extraction at all. It may be that we are to account for the feeding upon mutton in the wanderings of Ulysses, while throughout the Iliad the food of heroes is beef, by the outer circle of the voyages of Ulysses being all within the sphere of Phœnician traditions while to the Phœnicians the bull was a sacred animal, and his flesh rejected from the table. But all we know ourselves is that with the Hindoos the bovine race is reputed sacred; the Semitic race, on the contrary, as represented at least by the Jews, sacrificed the bull, which is some primâ facie indication that they did not scruple to partake of beef, and the flesh of the calf was undoubtedly a common article of food with them. If, however, it be true that the Phœnicians ate mutton, lamb and kid, which are tenderer and more juicy viands, while the Pelasgians and Hellenes satisfied the divine rage of hunger on the drier and tougher substance of lean beef, the reason may be that the one people were more advanced in civilization and refinement, the others were barbarian and heroic. These are points which, if they are brought into argument at all, require a fuller handling, and possibly they might repay it. We should also expect that our author, while giving us over again the lists of Greek and Latin equivalent words, from which he determines, according to Niebuhr's process, the distinctive characters of the Pelasgians and the Oscans, the one as the more primitive and peaceful population, the other as the intruding race of warriors, should in the same way indicate to us the elements of the Greek language which bespeak its presumed connexion with the Phœnician or Semitic. If already before the Homeric age the Phœnicians had exercised an important influence on ideas and manners without and within the circle of the Greek population, this influence ought to be traceable in their language also, and it is essential to Mr. Gladstone's argument that it should be traced, not in the slight conjectural way in which such matters were formerly treated, but according to the rules of modern linguistic science. This, we would add, is a branch of his inquiry on which Mr. Gladstone shows, as we think, less appreciation of the requirements of his undertaking than might have been expected of him. The reproduction of Niebuhr's hasty view, so slightly supported by himself, of the peaceful character of the Pelasgians and the martial propensities of the Oscans, from a meagre list of words common to the Greek and the Latin, is hardly worthy of the power of subtile analysis with which he is so eminently endowed. We think we could ourselves point out the genuine Greek connexion of many of the martial words in Latin which Mr. Gladstone fails to trace to the sister-language, and accordingly ascribes to the barbarian element, and we could show many other connexions which he has overlooked altogether. For instance, we should identify acies with αἰχμή, arma with ἄρω, ensis with ἔγχος, hasta with ἵστημι, galea with γαλή, tuba with τύπανον, lancea with λογχή, pugna and pugio with πύξ, prœlium with πρύλεις, gladius with κλάδος, scutum with σάκος or κῦτος, tabernaculum with τάφος and τύμβος, jaculus (jacio) with ἰός (ἰάπτω); all which analogies, and no doubt others, Mr. Gladstone overlooks. On the other hand, to take his list of similar words in Greek and Latin for parts of the human body, while we admit the identity in all perhaps but one of the score of examples he produces, we should not the less be at a loss to find any Greek words to correspond etymologically with the Latin collum, cervix, tempora, mala (maxilla), mentum, nasus, gremium, manus, pollex, tibia, crus, lumbus, renes, latus, nates, anus, costa, dorsum, ilia, viscera, spina, lacertus, talus, latus, tergum, pellis, &c. &c., and finally, corpus itself.

We have allowed ourselves to run on at some length on matters trifling perhaps in themselves, and but slightly connected with the subject of the work before us, but calculated, as we think, to show that there is great inequality in Mr. Gladstone's execution of his undertaking. On some parts of it he has bestowed the greatest pains, and his views are undoubtedly worthy of the deepest consideration, while on others he has apparently taken up the slight conjectures of others, and applied to them too small a share of the extraordinary powers of his own mind. In bringing to a close the remarks we make at present upon a portion of his work, we would repeat that the expansion of his views on the subject of the Phœnician element in early Grecian history gives great additional value to the "Homeric Studies" in the new form in which he has now presented them. His developments, we still think, are imperfect, and we are willing to believe that he will not himself long rest satisfied with them, but will be eager to carry them further at some future period. His mind is always a growing one, and a single long vacation out of office, if Providence should ever indulge with another, may be both seed time and harvest with him. We are convinced that he will not be content to rest at the point of discovery he has now attained in primitive archæology. The Semitic province of the world of antiquity he has but half conquered as yet, and by the time he has made it all his own there will be, perhaps, a new sphere thrown open for his occupation in the promised revelations from Babylon and Assyria.

"THAT Englishmen are incorrigible," says Mr. Newman in the 23rd page of his pamphlet, "is surely a pestilential axiom." But we believe that every one who has made the same attempt which Mr. Newman is making—and a good many have made it at one time or another—has always found Englishmen incorrigible. One class, a most important class for Mr. Newman's purpose, he has himself found incorrigible. He cannot get his printers to print as he wishes. Here, however, he only makes the same moan as most other people who write at all and who think about what they write. Everybody who either is not up to the last fashion or who happens to think the last fashion very silly must be ready to fight the same battle which Mr. Newman has had to fight. To be sure Mr. Newman, for some unexplained reason, went to a printer at Bristol, and it is just possible that a printer in London, Oxford, or Cambridge might have better understood what he wanted. But even with the Bristol printer we feel some sympathy. We have our own wrongs; it is, for instance, rather hard to be forbidden to distinguish between "guarantee (a person)" and "guaranty (a thing)," or, if we venture to use the legal phrase "art and part," to find our despot sternly correcting the former word into "heart." But we do sympathize—if we may be allowed the use of the z, for we cannot undertake to sympathise, according to the last fashion—with the printer whom Mr. Newman, if we rightly understand the story, called on to print "this" and "that," as "this" and "that"; and we cannot but admire him when he kicked at the order and printed "ðis" and "ðat" instead. His name, it seems, is Arrowsmith, a Norman-sounding sort of trade, but the name is Teutonic enough, and we feel sure that its owners must come of the best blood of the "wigsmiðas" in the Song of Brunanburh. Mr. Newman, driven out of "this" and "that," seems to have made a second fight for "Δis" and Δat"; but the Teutonic letter was too mighty for its Hellenic rival, and "ðis" and "ðat" carried the day. In short, Mr. Newman has fallen among thorns, and, like most people who do so, he has not failed ‹ fingers.

Mr. Newman begins by a "Notice," in which he tells of his little thorny adventure and of one or two others of the like sort; how, for instance, instead of some plan of dots which were to distinguish s when sounded like z, the printer gave him a figure of 5 turned bottom-upwards, after this fashion, "cave5," which in ordinary writing is "caves." Then he goes on with Tables for use in an Infant School, Tables of a short, a long, and the rest of it. There are long lists of rhyming—might we write riming?—words, some of which are simple enough and meaningless enough, while in others we are inclined to discern mysteries. "Pap cap tap lap rap map nap hap chap gap" seem to have no special significance, but there is a certain jovial air about the group "merry berry ferry cherry perry sherry." "Carry marry parry tarry Harry" might be taken as setting forth the ups and downs of a courtship between Carry and Harry; in "fizz whizz dizzy" we are tempted to see an allusion to home politics, and some years back we should certainly have seen an allusion to foreign affairs in "Us fuss ðus truss Russ." After all this, at p. 16, we come to a "Commentary on the Tables," which begins to explain things. Mr. Newman's object is to teach both foreigners and English children how to read and pronounce English. "The difference," he tells us, "between the written and spoken language is greater with English than with any other well-known language." "It is," he adds, "the only weakness which unfits English for imperial and wide-reaching use." He also tells us that

> When the Macedonians conquered Asia, accents were added to Greek in order to aid foreigners to pronounce. This is the obvious policy for a nation which aspires to spread the use of its language.
> But the same method is not less important at home to a nation which desires to obliterate vulgar provincial pronunciation, to educate and refine its people, to get rid of plebeianism and fuse the orders of society into harmony.

These are high-sounding objects, though they may perhaps here and there savour a little of the Insoluble. Perhaps we may not have the same horror as Mr. Newman of "vulgar provincial pronunciation," or rather perhaps a certain antiquarian leaning may make us less ready to take for granted that every "provincial" pronunciation must needs be "vulgar." As for "getting rid of plebeianism," we have very vague notions what the process may be, and it is hardly a phrase that we should have looked for from Mr Newman. To "fuse the orders of society into harmony" is indeed a noble object, but whether it could be gained by accentuating our letters, and sticking dots or even zeros above or below them, we are not so sure. But after being told the difficulties of English, let us hear what Mr. Newman has to say about French:—

> French is bad enough. To write French from the sound is impossible; but to read it by sight is not so desperate a problem as to read English. Nevertheless, it would be as hard as English, were not French vowels marked with accents.

We believe that some very captious people profess not to be able to see any use in the French accents at all, save, of course, the historical circumflex, which tells us when an s or another letter has been left out. But without going this length, we really do not see how the French accent can throw any light upon what is surely the great difficulty of the French language—namely, whether this or that consonant is to be sounded or not. We do not see how the marking of vowels with accents can teach us how to distinguish between Sens, the city, cent, a hundred, sans, without, and sent, from the verb sentir. But, leaving this little French question, we will turn to "our English problem," of which Mr. Newman assures us that "the difficulty is not small, yet neither is it insuperable." Mr. Newman adds, "That the method here adopted will not in every matter meet approval, I am prepared to expect;" but the reason which he gives is rather an odd one, "because I have so often changed my own opinions as to details." Now surely, long before we come to any question of details, comes the greater question whether the English public will ever be persuaded to make any change at all in the look of the words to which it is used. For we understand Mr. Newman really to wish to introduce his system as the usual way of writing and printing books, and not simply to use it in the mere process of teaching either foreigners or children. We infer this from the contemptuous way in which he throws aside the long and short marks of quantity. "Those marks, being puerile, would not easily establish themselves in a national literature." Mr. Newman therefore clearly hopes that some other marks may be found which will establish themselves in a national literature. That is to say, Mr. Newman really has some hopes of getting people to print books after his fashion. As for the poor long and short marks, after first of all so summarily plucking them, he relents a little, and says, "I have therefore placed them where they are of no paramount importance; but will be superseded by grammatical rules when a pupil is somewhat advanced.' It is by no means clear—perhaps because the epoch of grammatical rules has not yet come—what is here the nominative case to "will be superseded." The sentence reminds us of another, in which an old traveller makes a statement—remarkable in every way—about "tortoises," by which he means turtles; "sailors affect to eat them, but are better meat for hogs, in my opinion." According to any kind of grammatical rules, it was not the tortoises, but the sailors, which the traveller looked on as "better meat for hogs." And, according to any kind of grammatical rules, it is not the long and short marks, but Mr. Newman himself, which will at some, we hope, * Orthoëpy; or, a Simple Mode of Accenting English, for the Advantage of Foreigners, and of all Learners. By Francis W. Newman. London: Trübner & Co. 1869.

distant day be superseded by grammatical rules." We have a kindly feeling towards Mr. Newman on many grounds; we should be sorry if, when the grammatical rules come to supersede him, he should be dissolved into Nirvana; we wish him rather the expected promotion of Demos, and trust ὡς ἐν νεφελαῖσιν αἰετὸς γενήσεται.

Mr. Newman is much more hopeful than we can be. There is nothing against which the English public seems to set its face more steadily than against any changes affecting the look of words in a book. We remember the sort of consternation with which the "general reader" received the attempts of Mr. Grote, Mr. Kemble, and their followers to reform the spelling of Greek and of Old-English names, and that on no sort of ground except that the change gave the words a look to which they were not used. The Fonetic Nuz—we are not sure whether we ought not to put some accents or dots somewhere—was laughed out of court, not because the proposed changes would have utterly rooted up the history of the language, but simply because they looked so queer. And though Mr. Newman proposes no changes in spelling strictly so called, yet a sentence printed after his fashion looks very nearly as queer as a sentence in the Fonetic Nuz. Here are specimens of the text, as Mr. Newman "proposes to set it before beginners, and as he thinks it might profitably be marked for general literature":—

> Having ðus said, he mounted his mule in haste, and, taking wið him a small supply of food, departed from ðe city turning his face towards ðe open country: ðe hour of noon overtook him not, until he enter'd ðe city of Bilheya, where he alighted to repose himself and rest his mule, and ate; after which he took from ðis place what he requir'd for himself and some provender for his mule, and, having plac'd ðese provisions upon her, went forth again into ðe plain, and before noon on ðe second following day he enter'd Jerusalem.

This we take to be the beginner's way; the following seems to be the way for general literature:—

> It was after one of those heavy convulsions which have divided era from era, and left mankind to start again from the beginning, that a number of brave men gaðer'd togeðer to raise anew from the ground a fresh green home for themselves

On this last Mr. Newman remarks: "the blunt th, when initial and therefore pronominal, is not marked." "Pronominal" is here to be taken in a wide sense, so as to take in thus and therefore; but we see what Mr. Newman means. But, if we are to write "gaðer," where, be it remembered, the ð is a modern intruder, we do not see why we should not write ðus. Only we must not forget that neither thus nor ðus is what Mr. Newman's soul longeth after; the best of all is, thus and the second best Δus.

But Mr. Newman's thorny speculations are worth giving in full —

> To give rules to beginners when th shall be blunt, is equally hopeless. When we try to make rules, we are embarrassed by the exception of "words derived from Greek," and proper names. Nor can I tell why final th is blunt in with, booth, sharp in heath, worth; sharp in heathy, blunt in worthy. In short, th sharp and th blunt are historically different letters, like t and d, written with different forms in old English. We have only to fall back on antiquity, from which our fathers ought never to have departed. Let us boldly print ðe ðy ð a in elementary books, and in a single year the antiquarians first, and the public next, will applaud. It can give no more trouble to any one than the y^e and y^{at} of our old Bibles. To my eye the Greek Δ, as harmonizing with Roman type, and having exactly the right sound, is better than ð, which is derived from MS. But we cannot afford to lose the aid of antiquarians, who might resist Δ. When once ð has established itself, either the form of the letter may be improved, or people may ultimately not reject Δ.

Now here are two or three things to remark. We are afraid that Mr. Newman thinks better of our forefathers than they deserved. If they had the two sounds of our modern th they certainly did not distinguish them in writing. Þæt and þæt, Smið and Smiþ, are written all but indiscriminately. The only approach to a rule is one like that which regulates the use of the two forms of the Greek sigma. þ is most commonly used at the beginning of a word and ð in the middle and at the end. Now it seems very unlikely that if our forefathers really had had two sounds and two letters, they would not have done what Mr. Newman takes for granted that they did. We have here then a strong argument in favour of what, we need have no scruple in saying, was the privately expressed opinion of Lord Strangford—namely, that the th in that is altogether a modern sound, and that wherever it is found it is an intruder, as it undoubtedly is in father, mother, weather, and gather. The only difficulty is that, if so, it must have supplanted two sounds in different words—d in some cases, and sharp th in others. Mr. Newman's Δ has undoubtedly in modern Greek the sound that he wants, but there is every chance that this usage is as much a modern corruption as our change, dating only from the sixteenth century, of fader into faðer. And Mr. Newman's allusion to the "y^e and y^{at} of our old Bibles" is a little amusing. Does Mr. Newman know or not know that the y in those cases is simply a badly formed þ? We have before now argued that, as some few people still write ye, the letter þ is even now not quite dead. But we have very small hopes of making it fully alive again.

One or two of Mr. Newman's other remarks sound odd. "At the beginning of foreign names X is sounded Z, as Xerxes (Zerxes)." We believe that Zerxes is the pronunciation in Establishments for Young Ladies, but surely every one who has learned Greek says Xerxes. Then again,

> In the last half century we have injuriously lost the sound of h in wh, and hereby obliterate the distinction of various words. Wh was written hw by the Anglo-Saxons, and was so pronounced by many elder persons in my boyhood. We now look on the sounding of h in wh as Irish! Consider

> My schoolmaster always said hwôle for whole: I think also he said hwu for who. But the w in whore (a word not very urgently needed by children) has been added by ridiculous fancy. Is it too late, when all in Ireland, and many in Scotland, sound hw, for England to retrace her error?

We will not ask, with Mr. Matthew Arnold, "With whom can Mr. Newman have lived?" both because we always thought the question somewhat impertinent, and because Mr. Newman may perhaps turn round and ask, "With whom can the Saturday Reviewer have lived?" But surely the distinction between "wet" and "whet," "wight" and "white," is not so wholly forgotten in England as Mr. Newman seems to think. Talking of Mr. Arnold and Mr. Newman, we must copy the following, where the author of "the grand style" is duly honoured with the dignity of small capitals:—

> When final -re is preceded by a long vowel, the e is heard "furtively" before the r. That fire is virtually fier (Germ. feuer), its adjective fiery denotes. This is a general fact. But the r in such case, losing the vowel after it, cannot retain its full vibration. (Even the word iron, being sounded i-orn, (Welsh haiarn) is a perplexity in verse, as it is too long for one syllable and two short for two. MATTHEW ARNOLD has used fire as a dissyllable.)

Lastly we demur to the following saying of Mr. Newman's:—

> The wonderful progress of Greece in this century in recovering a purer and nobler language shows strikingly what national schools can do, and disproves the dogma that we can move backwards towards something better.

Would Mr. Newman count it a reform if bad Latin displaced good Italian as the high-polite speech or grand style of the restored Kingdom of Italy?

FRESHFIELD'S TRAVELS IN THE CENTRAL CAUCASUS.*

PROBABLY no region so near the civilized parts of Europe has remained more unknown to most Europeans than the great Caucasian range. Every one interested in such matters has a tolerable notion of the geography and the scenery of the Andes and of large parts of the Himalaya, or at least knows in what books to find information respecting them; but the name of the mysterious chain which severs Europe from Asia calls up only memories of Mount Kaf in the Arabian Nights, or of the Æschylean Prometheus on his solitary rock. Even in the days of the Crimean war, when we heard so much of Schamyl's prowess, and people were urging our Government to secure the co-operation against Russia of the unconquerable tribes he led, no one could give a trustworthy account of their country or their numbers. Now that Mr. Freshfield leads us through the very heart of the mountains we feel sadly disillusionized. The scenery, it is true, appears to be superb, with some peaks and some gorges grander than anything in the Alps. And although the natives are sufficiently rough and inhospitable, it is possible, as the success of this expedition shows, to traverse the territories of the rudest tribes in safety, with far less risk to life or property than an excursion through the Abruzzi would involve. But it is something of a shock to one's poetical associations to find in the Caucasus all the meaner and pettier vexations of Alpine or Pyrenean touring—extortionate charges for food and lodging, lazy porters, uncivil officials, dishonest guides, who raise their demand when they get you into a difficulty. These are annoyances which vex a traveller more than do the positive physical hardships to be encountered in a wild country, and they seem all the more offensive when met with, as they were by Mr. Freshfield's party, in a new country, unspoiled by tourists, explored, where explored at all, only by military surveying parties.

The book describes a comparatively small part of the chain, a tract of some 110 miles in length between Elbruz on the west and the pass of Dariel on the east, omitting altogether not only the country of the Tcherkesses on the one side, but also the very interesting region of Daghestan on the other side, between Dariel and the Caspian. This central section seems, however, to contain all the loftiest summits, and probably also the grandest scenery. Like the Pyrenees, but unlike the Alps, the Himalaya, and the Andes, the Caucasus appears to be a single chain of snowy peaks, sometimes spreading out into a mountain knot, but not branching off into high parallel ranges. Hence the width of the chain is, in proportion to its height, much less than that of the Alps, and as the secondary ranges are very much lower than the central one, seldom rising to the snow level, the loftiest peaks are visible from the low country on both sides, and rise with a commanding boldness which gives a quite peculiar character to the scenery. What seems to have struck the English travellers most was the contrast between the exuberant richness of the forests at the foot of the main chain, and the precipitous suddenness with which its walls and pinnacles of rock shoot up at the heads of the valleys, the glaciers not issuing forth in those broad and winding ice-rivers one sees so often in Switzerland, but tumbling down in cataracts thousands of feet in height:—

* Travels in the Central Caucasus and Bashan. By Douglas W. Freshfield. London: Longmans & Co. 1869.

> As a whole, Caucasian must, I think, rank above Alpine scenery. There is nothing in Switzerland that can compare with the magnificent grouping of the Suanetian ranges, or with the gorges cut by the northern rivers through the limestone range which bars their way down to the Steppe. In the Caucasus the slopes are steeper, and the usual character of the peaks is that they shoot up from the valleys at their base in unbroken walls of rock and ice to which the cliffs of the Wetterhorn afford the nearest parallel. Enormous cornices of ice are frequent, and sometimes crown the highest peaks, presenting an insuperable obstacle to the climber. The mountain sides, owing to their precipitous character, afford precarious resting-places to the winter snow, and avalanches, which choke the upper glens to an extent rarely seen in Switzerland, are consequently of frequent occurrence. We did not sufficiently explore the glaciers to be able to form a conclusive judgment as to their extent, but there can be little or no doubt that the number of square miles covered by snow and ice is less than in the Alps, though there are many glaciers worthy of comparison with any Swiss rivals. Owing to the steepness of the chain, the ice-falls are loftier and in every respect finer than those of the Alps, and they are rendered more attractive to the eye by the general purity of their surface. . . . Fine as Alpine forests often are, they can bear no comparison with those of the Caucasus. Lest it should be thought I have overstated the effect likely to be produced by the woodland scenery of Mingrelia on an European mind, I shall take the liberty of quoting the words in which Herr Wagner sums up his eloquent description of a ride near Kutais:—"Every spot that is not occupied by perennial plants presents one tangled growth of grapes, flowers, annuals, and every variety of creeper. Higher up, among the trees, the eye is soothed by the numerous shades of green, from the sombre verdure of the fir, tamarisk and cypress, to the lustrous foliage of the laurel, and to the silver-green of the Colchian poplar, whilst the purple clusters of the grapes peep out beneath every branch." In richness of flora the Alps must also yield to their rivals: the azalea and rhododendron make the alpenrosen seem humble, and even the gentian looks bluer when brought into immediate contrast with beds of snowdrops, while there is nothing nearer home to compare with the gorgeous magnificence of the Caucasian tiger lilies and hollyhocks. . . . I must now call attention to the deficiencies of the Caucasus, and the points in which it is manifestly inferior to its better known rival. A total absence of lakes, on both sides of the chain, is the most marked failing. Not only are there no great subalpine sheets of water, like Como or Geneva, but mountain tarns such as the Dauben See on the Gemmi, or the Klonthal See near Glarus, are equally wanting. There is no first-class waterfall in any of the valleys we visited, nor did we hear of any elsewhere. Certain districts, notably the headwaters of the Terek, are duller than anything in Switzerland, and their treeless monotonous glens are defaced, rather than enlivened, by the dingy and ruinous character of the native dwellings. Add to this list of defects that on the north side, the mountains sink abruptly into a bare and featureless steppe, and that the only halting-places within reach—Patigorsk and Kislovodsk—cannot vie in attractions with the numerous tourist haunts on the north side of the Alps, and we shall, I think, have fairly gone through the principal charges to which Caucasian scenery is liable.—Pp. 449–452.

It is worth remarking that the Caucasus, like the Alps, furnish many examples discountenancing the old notion, which still holds its ground in the minds of many people, that the loftiest summits of a chain are, or ought to be, placed upon its watershed. Just as in the Pennine Alps, we find peaks like the Mischabel Horner and the Weisshorn in short lateral ranges at right angles to the main axis, so here both Elbruz and Kazbek (as well as apparently the great peak of Dychtau) lie a little to the north of the line of the watershed, both, therefore, are wholly within the bounds of Europe.

In describing the natural features of the country he has traversed, Mr. Freshfield is usually clear, simple, and interesting. We do not indeed mean to say that he can as yet claim to rank among the foremost of our writers of mountain travel. He has neither the ardent eloquence and power of making scientific details interesting to the unscientific which we admired in the late Principal Forbes, and still admire in Dr. Hooker, nor the lucid and easy precision of Mr. Ball, nor the graphic humour of Mr. Leslie Stephen. But, on the other hand, he avoids the most conspicuous faults of the crowd of minor writers who have handled the same theme. He is free from the sentimentalism which so often offends in the narratives of Professor Tyndall, free from the forced and tedious jocularity of Mr. Hardy and many of his brethren of the Alpine Club, free from that straining after sublimity into which a German climber is apt to be betrayed when he is not content to be simply prosy. In dealing with the great difficulty of travel-writing—the blending in proper proportions the descriptive, or so-called objective, and the personal element—he has been far more successful than many writers of more ambitious pretensions. When he narrates the adventures of the party he is lively and often amusing, and he is careful to avoid wearying us with petty details about food, hours of march and the like, while his descriptions of scenery have a freshness and directness about them such as one seldom meets with. They are evidently not the work of a scientific man—none of the party seem to have had any knowledge of either geology or botany—nor of an artistic student of scenery, but they show that sort of hearty and straightforward love of mountain grandeur and feeling for mountain beauty which he who has long wandered among the hills insensibly and almost necessarily acquires, and they inspire us on that account with all the more confidence. Mr. Freshfield's mind is throughout so full of the Alps that when he tells us any bit of Caucasian peak or glacier is finer than what he has seen in Switzerland or Tyrol, we do not hesitate to believe him. His mountaineering skill, it need hardly be said, is of a high order, and the suggestions which the book makes for the benefit of future travellers will be extremely serviceable to them. Oddly enough, the region of the chain which he describes as finest, that lying around the great summits of Koschtantau and Dychtau, between the sources of the Ingur on the south and the Tcherek on the north, is the region which seems to have been least explored by the party, probably because when they discovered its surpassing splendour it was already too late to alter their plans so as to give adequate time to grapple with the difficulties it presents. That these difficulties would not otherwise have repelled them appears sufficiently from the singular boldness displayed in the three great mountain excursions which they undertook—the ascents of Elbruz and Kazbek, and the crossing and recrossing of the main chain by a new route from the valley of the Rion to that of the Uruch. Of the three expeditions, this last appears to have been much the most serious, inasmuch as the glaciers to be traversed were very extensive and broken, and the party had no native guides, and only one Swiss guide. It was one of those exploits which we call plucky when they have succeeded, and would have called foolhardy if they had failed. But readers not specially alpine in their tastes will probably be more interested by the account of the scaling of Elbruz, the loftiest summit not only of the Caucasus, but of Europe, within whose boundaries (as we have said already), and not, as used to be supposed, on the dividing line between Europe and Asia, its whole bulk lies. This peak, called by the Tatar tribes who dwell at its base Minghi-Tau (Tau seems to mean mountain, and is a frequent element in Caucasian names), appears both from its shape and from the rock of which it is composed, to be a volcano, of course long since extinct; and as it has, like most volcanoes, a tolerably equable slope on all sides, its ascent, although very long and fatiguing, is a matter of little difficulty and hardly any danger. Mr. Freshfield encountered a high wind on it, and suffered horribly from the cold; but in spite of the great elevation (18,500 feet) none of the party were affected by mountain sickness or difficulty of breathing. His description of the climb is one of the most spirited things in the book; we have space for an extract or two only:—

> A few benighted people still reiterate the assertion that the true beauty of nature ceases at the snow level, and that those who go beyond it get no reward for their pains except the satisfaction of having treated a great mountain like a greased pole. As we tramped over the snowfields of Elbruz, I could not help wishing we had some of these unbelievers with us, because, while they would have been compelled to admit the startling grandeur of the situation, the intense cold would have inflicted upon them a just punishment for their past offences. The last rays of the setting moon lit up the summits of the main chain, over the gaps in which we already saw portions of the southern spurs. The icy sides of Uschba and Tungzorun reflected the pale gleam of the sky; a dark rock-peak further west stood in deep shadow. We were high enough to overlook the ridges that run out from Elbruz towards the north-east, in which direction a dark band of vapour, illuminated by fitful flashes of sheet-lightning, overhung the distant steppe. The thick black cloud was still on the mountain before us, otherwise the sky overhead was clear and the stars shone out with preternatural brilliancy. . . . . A sunrise viewed from a height equal to that of the top of Mont Blanc is a scene of unearthly splendour of which words can convey but a feeble impression. A sudden kindling of the eastern ranges first warned us to be [illegible] atch; in a moment the snow upon which [illegible] were standing, the crags above us, indeed the whole atmosphere, [illegible] d with rose-pink. The cloud on the summit, which had changed from black to grey as daylight [illegible] ned, now caught the pervading flush, and suddenly melted away like a ghost who had outstayed his time. As the trees faded, the sun's orb arose in the east, and flooded us with a stream of golden rays, which were soon merged in the clear light of day. There was no increase of warmth yet, and, despite the improved look of the weather, it became a serious question whether we could go on. By 7·30 A.M. we were at a height of over 16,000 feet, and had now reached the rocks which form the upper portion of the cone. . . . On the top the two natives pointed out the various valleys, while we endeavoured to recognise the mountains. Light clouds were driving against the western face of the peak, and a sea of mist hid the northern steppe. Otherwise the view was clear. Beginning in the east, the feature of the panorama was the central chain between ourselves and Kazbek. I never saw any group of mountains which bore so well being looked down upon as the great peaks that stand over the sources of the Tcherek and Tchegem. The Pennines from Mont Blanc look puny in comparison with Koschtantau and his neighbours from Elbruz. The Caucasian groups are finer, and the peaks sharper, and there was a suggestion of unseen depth in the trenches separating them that I never noticed so forcibly in any Alpine view. Turning southwards, the double-toothed Uschba still asserted himself, although at last distinctly beneath us; the greater part of the summits and snowfields of the chain between us and Suanetia lay as on a relieved map at our feet, and we could see beyond them the snowy-crested Leila, and in the far distance the blue ranges of the Turkish frontier between Batoum and Achaltzich. Shifting again our [illegible] ition, we looked over the shoulders of a bold rock peak, the loftiest to the west of Elbruz, and endeavoured to make out the Black Sea. Whether the level grey surface which met our eyes was water, or a filmy mist hanging over its surface, it was impossible to distinguish. The mists, beating below on the slope of the mountain, hid the sources of the Kuban, but we looked immediately down upon those of the Malka. On this side the slope of the mountain seemed to be uniform for nearly 10,000 feet, and although there is nothing in its steepness to render an ascent impossible, the climb would be very long and toilsome.—Pp. 363–368.

Mr. Freshfield's book comes very opportunely at a time when mountaineers are seriously concerned at the exhaustion of their hunting-grounds. Switzerland had been very recklessly dealt with since about the year 1850, when climbing became fashionable; and when the Matterhorn was vanquished in 1866, men began to confess that for purposes of excitement the Alps were used up. In that year two ardent explorers started on a voyage of discovery in Eastern Europe, but as they brought back word that there was no ice there, and that the Carpathian flea was as much more voracious than its Swiss relative as Carpathian peaks were inferior to Alpine clubs,' and as another enterprising traveller reported that there was not a week's work in the Sierra Nevada, it was plain that adventurers must be prepared to wander further afield, beyond the bounds of civilized Europe. In these circumstances Mr. Freshfield and his friends sprang into the breach, and discovered for us a region which, when the railways of Southern Russia have been completed, will not be out of the reach of a summer tour, whose scenery is new in character and wonderfully striking, and on whose glaciers and precipices men may put their necks in peril with even greater satisfaction than on Alps or Pyrenees. The mountaineering fraternity is no doubt duly sensible of its obligations, and the general reader will be grateful to Mr. Freshfield for a pleasant and genial account of a new country —an account which is perhaps all the more agreeable because it does not wholly satisfy our curiosity. It is not the least of the merits of the book that its author knows when to speak and when to keep silence. His tour led him, not only to the Central Caucasus, but over Egypt and Palestine, great part of Russia, and parts of Turkey and Persia; nevertheless he has had the good sense to say hardly a word about these countries, confining himself to a description of the comparatively little-known regions of Bashan and the country at the foot of Ararat. May he find many imitators, as well in this reticence as in the adventurous spirit which his Caucasian expedition displays.

TWO MEDIÆVAL POEMS.*

THE few persons who read mediæval French easily enough to enjoy it may thank us for the information that two genuine and very interesting poems—one (Meraugis de Portlesguez) belonging to the early part of the thirteenth century, and the other to the latest decades of the fourteenth—have now been for the first time printed. Before proceeding to speak of these volumes as literature we may say a few words about them from a bibliographical point of view. M. Louis Perrin, the now famous printer of Lyons, was the first to revive in France the elegant typography of the sixteenth century, in which he has since been followed by Claye, Poupart-Davyl, Jouaust, and many others. The superiority in point of elegance of these old forms over the nineteenth-century letter might easily be demonstrated if it were not universally felt by every artistically cultivated eye. There is at the same time a moderation and a boldness in the curves, an artistic knack of stopping a curve in time, a rational sense of proportion between thick strokes and thin ones, and a charming quaintness which are altogether wanting in the clear but tasteless typography of our own century. The most perfect example of the latter is probably the typographie Plon, founts cut expressly for Plon, the well-known Parisian publisher. In this all the curves are as nearly as possible regular curves, parts of circles or ovals, the thick lines are very thick and black, and the thin ones, even in large capitals, so thin as to be almost invisible at a little distance. The eye is perpetually tormented. Either it is too near for the thick lines, or too far off for the thin ones. Another rule in the type of the nineteenth century, and one which precisely accords with its mechanical rather than artistic genius, is that the letters should be made to occupy as nearly as possible the same space, whereas in the true Roman letter there is a quaint diversity in this respect. The capitals used in the sixteenth century were in fact a much nearer approach, in point of form, to the antique Roman letter than ours are, and a classic taste would have preferred them to ours. The English revival of the antique type has also produced beautiful founts, but not so pure nor so elegant as the best French ones, in fact the type used by our own elder printers was never so elegant as the old French type.

The revival of an elegant typography has led to especial care in the choice of papers. The most recent fashion amongst the best French printers is papier vergé, a hand-made artistic-looking paper with the wire mark visible in it. This of course is seldom so perfect in surface or so equal in thickness as our toned papers, and the impression is rarely so absolutely clear and faultless; still, when papier vergé is well made, by such makers as Rives, or Hallines, or Hudelist, it will take a fine impression, and has a peculiarly sumptuous look.

The two volumes before us are, from the bibliographical point of view, amongst the very choicest products of contemporary printers. The Livre des Cent Ballades is printed by Perrin of Lyons, the poems all in italics, on fine papier vergé by Rives, with ornamental capitals, and a thin red line round every page. Meraugis is printed by Jouaust on paper by the same maker, with ornamental capitals and illustrations from the original mediæval miniatures, and the same vermilion line round the page. It is enough to prove the pride and spirit of the producers to say that a few copies of the Livre des Cent Ballades have been printed on real vellum and on parchment. In a word, it is obvious that these volumes have been a labour of love.

It may perhaps be suspected, from our dwelling upon the material beauties of these books, that little is to be said of them as literature, but the fact is that we have written the foregoing paragraphs in the pleasant consciousness of having something still more agreeable in reserve. The Livre des Cent Ballades is one of the most exquisite works, considered simply as poetry, that we ever met in any language; and indeed we remember no poem, either ancient or modern, which so charmingly combines the most elevated and pure sentiment with such grace of manner, and such entire freedom from didactic pretension. It is at the same time so joyously merry and gay, and yet so good and pure, that it has the lightheartedness of pleasure without its vice, and the virtue of austerity without either its sourness or its self-sufficiency. Who wrote it, nobody precisely knows. All that is known about him is that he was Seneschal of some French province, probably traversed by the Loire, at the latter end of the fourteenth century. That he had readers amongst the most distinguished and cultivated gentlemen of his time is proved by several poems in answer to the Cent Ballades, written by men whose rank and fame are known, and whose culture is proved by the grace and ease of their versification. It is odd that since they knew the author they should never, even by accident, have fully named him in any writing that has reached us. Regnault de Trie, in his ballad in answer to the Cent Ballades, implies that the author was called Hutin:—

> Sur les débaz que beaux et bons
> Mist en termes le bon Hutin
> Qui tant ama.

But it is very probable that Hutin may have been nothing more than his Christian name.

The subject of the poem is very simple. A young gentleman, riding by himself near Angers, is overtaken by an old knight, who at once guesses that he is in love, and then begins to talk of the elevating influences of love in a series of charming little ballads, of three stanzas each, always finishing with a refrain, changing with every ballad, and in many instances evidently a proverb. When the old knight has thus encouraged the young gentleman to persist in his fidelity, he leaves him by the banks of the Loire; and as he is watching the little fishes swimming about, and thinking of his love, a young lady, one of a merry company of knights and ladies who are amusing themselves hard by, comes up to him, and, like the old knight, guesses that he is in love. Then she argues against fidelity as the knight had argued in favour of it, and it must be confessed that in her arguments there is much wit and knowledge of the world. The youth remains faithful, however, and the poet proposes the question, after this hearing of counsel on both sides, whether it is better to be faithful in love or not? What is most curious and interesting is, that a jury of thirteen princes and lords actually wrote their opinions on the question, each in a ballad. One of these ballads, that of the Bâtard de Coucy, is lost. The other twelve are given in the volume before us, one only being incomplete. The predominant tone, both of the Cent Ballades and the twelve answers, is, as we have said, one of singular purity and elevation, and no one who can detect the difference between the honest expression of a heartfelt sentiment and the insincere affectation of it can doubt the earnestness of these writers.

The versification of the Cent Ballades is easy and harmonious. There are many poetical turns of phrase indicating very advanced lyrical art; some indeed strike us as so modern in form that we wonder how the mediæval singers found them out—a foolish wonder, for the ages which created Gothic architecture might well produce artistic effects in verse. Here is the opening ballad, or at least two stanzas of it:—

> Une fois pieçà chevauchoie
> Entre Pont de Cé et Angiers,
> Ainsi qu'en chevauchant pensoie
> Vint près de moy uns chevaliers
> A quoi pensez-vous, amis chiers?
> Je lui dis que je ne savoie.
> Lors me parla trop volontiers
> Pour ce qu'il vit que jeune estoie.
>
> Amis, vostre cuer est en voie
> Amoureuse, et vos desriers
> S'avez droit, car je ne saroie
> Deviser un plus doux mestiers.
> Aussi Amours en ses dangiers
> Me mist quant vostre aage avoie
> Et me fut doulx ès fais premiers
> Pour ce qu'il vit que jeune estoie.

And then the knight tells his experience of the ennobling effects of his love:—

> Et des biens qu'Amours me donna
> Le premier fu doulce pensée,
> Qui depuis tenu joieux m'a
> Plus que nul autre, mainte année.

And again in the third ballad he speaks of the > estincelle

> Amoureuse qui liement
> Me fist vivre et joieusement
> Et par qui me vint la léesse
> Où je vesqui puis longuement
> Du gré de ma belle maistresse.

Then the old knight speaks of the sweetness of his recollection of his love:—

> Et sachiez que de doucour tele
> M'est le souvenir bel et gent.

Every page of the earlier part of the poem has some pure and beautiful thought like the following:—

> Son gent corps, sa plaisant façon
> Faisoit les tres bons amieudrir
> Et maint hault penser accueillir.

Adonc crat en moy la pensée
D'estre plaisant et gracieux,
Et de faire que renommée
Fust bonne de moy en tous lieux ;
Car bien souvent l'amoureux dieux
Me disait que trop bien devoie
Estre bon, puisque je servoie
Celle qui toutes autres passe
De tous les biens dont dame a grâce,
Et que faire me convenait
Que vaillant fusse en toute place
Et que ma Dame le vouloit.

It seems a sin to mutilate anything so perfect as the seventh ballad, but we cannot quote everything. The knight tells the young gentleman to be generous:—

Car tous les bons
Les beaux, les preux plains de vaillance
Qui amerent dès leur enfance
Furent de ce faire joieux
Et du maintenir, sans doutance,
Ta Dame t'en aimera mieux.

* * * *

Soies en l'amoureuse loy,
Debonnaires, sages, preudoms
Plaisant entre les compagnons,
Vuide de toy oultrecuidance,
Souvent jurer, mentir, ventance
Garde, ne soies orguilleux,
Et de tenir ceste ordonnance
Ta Dame t'en aimera mieux.

* * * *

S'en assault viens, devant te lance
En mine, en eschielle, en tous lieux
Où proesce les bons avance,
Ta Dame t'en aimera mieux.

There is a true heroic ring in the following stanza:—

Telz fais sont assez plus greveux
A faire que à deviser,
Mais fortune se tient de ceulx
Qui emprennent a conquester.
Conquiers honneur; ne dois doubter
Paine, peril, n'autre labeur;
Aime et prie Nostre Seigneur,
Maintien toi en haute pensée,
Car ton bien fait sera douceur
A la belle qui tant t'agree.

The twentieth and twenty-first ballads are more remarkable than the preceding ones in respect to beauty of poetical form. Here are the two first stanzas of the twentieth.—

Longtemps me dura la léesse,
Beau doulx frere que je vous dy,
Car ma belle plaisant maistresse
Plus et plus tousjours m'abelly,
Et plut, car son doulx cuer vouloit
Au mien plus de bien qu'il n'avoit,
Et celle lé sa joieuse
A toute heure me présentoit
Sa belle beauté gracieuse

Son joyeux regart plain d'umblesse,
Son plaisant maintieng seigneury,
Son doulx parler qui en tristesse
Ne me laissast jour ne demy,
Son beau corps gent, joliz et droit,
La fresche colour que portoit,
Sa douce accointance amoureuse,
Sa loiauté qui tant valoit,
Sa belle beauté gracieuse

The opening of the twenty-first ballad is a most masterly poetical effect. Observe especially how sweetly the fifth and sixth verses come in their places after reading the first four.—

Tant me nourry joieusement,
Tant me quist de plaisirs Amours,
Tant me fist vivre liement,
Tant me fist de gracieux tours,
Que les ans me sembloient jours
Pour la grant lesse où j'estoie.
Nulle fois au temps ne pensoie,
Car ma Dame que tant chery
Me veoit souvent et je ly.
Et sa plaisance estoit fermee
A mon cuer de joie enrichir.
Celle grace me fu donnee
Tout pour loiauté maintenir.

We much regret not to have space for further quotations from the poem itself. The ballads in answer to it are of various quality. The first, by Regnault de Trie, though immoral in doctrine, is most felicitous in form. He argues in favour of free love:—

Car il me semble vraiement
Que moult il y a bonnes raisons;
Car s'un amoureux voit souvent
Belles dames de grans renoms,
Et il emploie ses saisons
A les servir tart et matin,
Tendant tousjours à bonne fin,
Il en sera trop plus courtois
Et plus prisiée, c'est bien drois,
Sera sa maniere gaillarde:
Pour ce vous dy qu'à ceste fois
Je me tendray à la guignarde.

For the benefit of the reader not versed in old French, we may say that guignarde means a woman who winks at you, and we all know what sort of woman that is.

Monseigneur de la Tremouille, one of the bravest and most loyal knights of the middle ages, is indignant against such theories as this. Paying court to many women is not, in his view, so much a school of courtesy as a school of baseness and falsehood, and it is especially hateful to him for the lying which is its inevitable accompaniment:—

Car tel tricheur font l'honneur amenrir
De mainte dame, en qui n'a villenie,
Tant par jeugler com par leur foy mentir,
L'un jure Dieu, l'autre saincte Marie,
En promettant loiauté qu'il n'ont mie.
De faux semblant font leur droit gouverneur,
Li malostru, li meschant, li bourdeur;
Tous sont parjur. Pour ce, leur fay promesse
Que j'aime mieux à servir, par douceur
En ciel un Dieu, en terre une Déesse.

But by far the finest stanza in the replies is the third in the ballad by Bucy. There can be no doubt that the writer was expressing his genuine sentiments. Every word comes from the heart, and with what a lordly largeness of expression! Speaking of his loyal hope of ultimately winning the "grace" of the one lady whom he loves, he tells us how this mere hope strengthens and sustains him:—

C'est mon désir, c'est ma joie sanz per,
C'est mon confort, c'est ma riche espérance,
C'est ce pour quoi je puis en pris monter
A toute honneur et à droite vaillance.
C'est mon éur, mon ressort, ma fiance,
C'est ce qui peut le mal que mon cuer sent Assouagier, se ses grez si assent;
C'est ce qui fait ma pensée enrichir
Pour ce doy bien mercier haultement
L'espoir que j'ay de sa grâce acquérir.

We have found so much to say of the Cent Ballades as to have no room left for a review of Meraugis de Portlesguez. We may recur to it at some future time, but it is well at least to mention the poem here, as a piece of interesting literary news. The French of the thirteenth century is less easy to read than the more developed language of the fourteenth, and we cannot hope that Meraugis will find many readers in England. The poem is a regular troubadour poem, often tedious and verbose, but with very fine passages which we should have been glad to quote. There is an odd resemblance between this author's manner and that of Mr. Robert Browning, of whom he often reminds us, especially in the use of the interrogative. The editors, both of Meraugis and the Cent Ballades, deserve our best thanks. Without such patient labour and noble enthusiasm as theirs, many treasures of old literature would be lost to us for ever.

FORSTER'S LIFE OF LANDOR.*

SOME one, in reference to writers who, like Landor, have failed to obtain a public recognition such as their genius entitled them to expect, says of Posterity that she has no doubt many virtues, but accessibility is not one of them. Mr. Forster, in the publication of which we have now to speak, has recourse to sheer weight of metal, with the hope of breaking down her barriers, and forcing an entrance into her presence-chamber for his friend. The book is an enormously big one, and very trying to a conscientious reviewer. It may be pleaded that the great powers of Mr. Landor, coupled as they were with one of the strangest of characters, constitute an apology, perhaps a sufficient one, for this μέγα βιβλίον, which we hope will find, as it deserves to find, readers in spite of its bulk. Nevertheless we will say at once, speaking for ourselves, that although the comparative want of popularity which always disappointed Mr. Landor and Mr. Landor's friends may have forced his biographer into quoting largely, Mr. Forster has decidedly overdone the business. Those interminable abstracts which "lie floating many a rood" on his oceanlike expanse of print weary the reader, and produce no effect which might not have been equally well accomplished by a less unrelenting use of the scissors.

We will speak first of the character of the man to whose memory these 1,100 pages are consecrated. As a member of society, if he had not been luckily a man of genius, Landor would have been simply intolerable; he was sent away from school, he was sent away from college, he quarrelled with his father, he quarrelled with his brothers, he quarrelled with his wife and children, he quarrelled with his landlords, he quarrelled with his tenants. He hated the Tories; he contemned the Whigs. His own countrymen were odious to him; he also detested the French; his contempt for the Italians was unbounded; he could not endure the Americans; he loathed the Welsh. He supposed himself to love the Turks, but, fortunately for them, he abstained from visiting Constantinople. Nevertheless, genius, though it often makes bitter enemies, secures also warm and faithful friends, and Mr. Forster, inspired by the memory of such a friendship, has contrived to present his old lion to the reader as in many respects a lovable creature. He was generous and outspoken, capable of strong attachments, and without anything little or mean in his nature. After all, his character now is comparatively unimportant; we shall therefore put it aside at once by saying that we do not believe him to have been of sound mind.

He quarrelled when in Spain (see Vol. I. pp. 230–231) with Mr. Stuart, the English Envoy. When Stuart, with a degree of temper and moderation which did him credit, put the truth before his ungovernable antagonist, and showed him beyond all possibility of cavil that he had taken offence without the slightest reason, Landor writes to Southey on the subject thus:—"Mr. Stuart has declared that he never could apply those expressions to me which I resented, and has offered peace; such offers I always accept." Mr. Forster adds, not unnaturally, it was a pity he did not at the same time regret the wrong that he had plainly done. Mr. Forster ought, no doubt, to know his friend's mind better than we do, but our interpretation of Landor's expression, "such offers I always accept," is that to him nothing of the kind was plain at all. Whenever an impression—an angry impression, we mean—had once stamped itself upon his mind, it seems to have been from that time forward indelible. Reason, justice, and common sense were as much wasted upon him at those seasons—Mr. Forster says so himself in another part of his book—as upon a hurricane at Cape Horn. There is another whimsical instance of this pertinacity of resentment in the manner in which he clung to a foolish notion that the Head-master of Rugby selected inferior exercises of his for honour, out of spite. The anger of the boy burnt on to the last, in the heart of the old man, as fiercely and as unreasonably as when it had been first kindled seventy years before. Such aberrations are surely the result of mental disease rather than of mere temper; at any rate we prefer to look upon them as such. If Mr. Landor was really in all respects a responsible being, much that he did went beyond any possible limits of indulgence. On the other hand, if we regard him as on some points partially deranged, we can pity him without scruple for the unhappiness which he then inevitably brought upon himself and others, and can admire the nobler and more gracious parts of his character without reserve. After all, if he really is a great writer, and this memoir of him permanently establishes him in the position of an English classic, it will signify but little to the readers of the twentieth century that he told an old lady at his father's table, without the slightest provocation, that she was a d—d fool, or even that he left his children in Italy to drift into ruin, if they chose, for want of some fatherly guidance and protection.

That he had great powers is unquestionable. That justice was not done to him during his life, particularly during the earlier part of it, may also be admitted—the rather that, by his crotchety temper and strange method of mismanaging all his literary negotiations, he brought his ill-success in a great measure upon himself. But his excellence both in prose and verse has, it appears to us, something artificial about it. There hangs over all he writes, as it were, an air from the hot-house, so that we very soon feel that we have enough, and long for a fresher and more natural atmosphere. Each sentence taken by itself is a good, we might say a beautiful, one, but the whole page made up of these good and beautiful sentences is less good and less beautiful than its parts. Moreover, though in his verse dialogues, such as that between Luther's parents, and in some of the conversations which belong to the order of prose-poems—e.g. Tiberius and Vipsania—dramatic power is shown, this is rare. In a great number of his Imaginary Conversations he either does not aim at any such object, or fails entirely to reach it. We are speaking here of his later productions, and not of Gebir, his first serious poetical attempt. This, though full of faults, was a noble and original poem. He is not unlikely to have been right in thinking that early success would have done much for him, and that his genius was depressed by unmerited neglect. If depressed, however, was by no means extinguished. He may have lost something of his early glow and fire, but in point of style, mastery over his subject, and the power of realizing his own idea of poetical excellence, he went on improving almost to the end of his long life.

Mr. Forster carries us along with him from the beginning to the end without losing breath. It is impossible, however, in an article of this kind to do more than indicate the stages of Landor's career. He was born on the 30th of January, 1775, at Warwick. When ten years of age he was sent to Rugby, then under the headship of Dr. James. He was celebrated among his schoolfellows for the excellence of his Latin verses, in which department of literature Rugby was long very famous, though this renown, unless we deceive ourselves, has been dulled, if not lost, in the blaze of Dr. Arnold's grand moral fireworks and transparencies. He published Gebir, a poem read by few but intensely admired by more than one eminent man, in 1798; the tragedy of Count Julian in 1811; and the first series of Imaginary Conversations in 1824. From that time till he was long past eighty, one literary production succeeded another, each of them in its turn spreading enthusiastic admiration through a small circle of highly cultivated friends, but not becoming popular in the ordinary sense of the term. On the 17th of December, 1864, he reached the end of that long avenue of quarrels through which he had stalked with unfaltering step for nearly ninety years, and slept with his fathers. Mr. Forster has recorded all his actions and analysed all his works. That it was unnecessary to quote quite so much, and to make abstracts quite so numerous, we have said before. But Landor is one of the few men who deserve an elaborate biography, and he certainly has got one.

Among the many interesting things in the book there is a charming letter from the beautiful Dorothea Lyttelton, a sort of Warwickshire Una, who gleamed for an instant before the eyes of the lionlike young poet.—Vol. i p. 67. It was written with a view of enticing Landor back to his father's house, from which he had gone away in a rage. Landor's observation upon it long afterwards is, "Had I been independent I should have married this lovely girl." We cannot but think that the beatified spirit of Dorothea is rejoicing, even to this day, that his independence came later in life. Another pleasant subject to dwell upon is the generous enthusiasm of Southey for Landor, and also for Wordsworth. So much sympathy with genius, and so complete an absence of personal jealousy, warms the heart of the reader. On the other hand there is much that is painful and depressing in Landor's mistakes and general wrongheadedness. On the whole, however, we think we may dismiss him, in the words of Mr. Henry Taylor, as "the greatest of the crooked."

We ought perhaps to say a word about Landor's Latin verses, on which he valued himself highly, but it is not very easy to do so. Englishmen practise Latin verse at school and college as an accomplishment belonging to the place, and then for the most part abandon it altogether. Bobus Smith, for instance, wrote those Lucretian verses which Landor thought finer than any other modern composition of the kind—in the ordinary course of his Cambridge career—as what are called Tripos exercises. We never heard that he pursued the study as a man. From a public-school point of view, there are certain elements of merit in modern Latin verse, such as a complete mastery of all the commonplaces of poetical diction, and a metrical cadence reproducing all the Virgilian, Lucretian, or Horatian effects as closely as they can be reproduced. These merits would very likely make Horace and Virgil laugh, when they did not make them angry; but, nevertheless, no one can write good Latin or Greek verses, from this public-school point of view, without being thoroughly intimate with the great Latin and Greek poets. It is to gain this end, we may say, that young men are taught to write them. Now Landor is an original Latin poet, with quite a different object; his merits, which we dare say are great, differ from those of the public-school boy altogether, and require highly trained critics to estimate with any degree of exactness. The structure of his heroic verse is neither like that of Virgil nor Lucretius nor Ovid, nor do his alcaics remind us of Horace. If he had a model it was Catullus, whose hexameters, though with beautiful movements in them here and there, were written before all the resources of the metre had been ascertained.

VASCO DA GAMA.*

The genius of Camoens has invested the figure of Vasco da Gama with a halo of greater glory than the voice of historical truth seems disposed to justify. In the fervid and somewhat stilted epic of the Lusiad the hero appears to be exalted above the common conditions of humanity, and to vie with the demigods of fable for the rewards of superhuman valour, justice, and wisdom. The one thing that detracts from his merit is that the favour of heaven so smiles upon and smoothes his path that its perils and straits might be thought all but illusory, or so over-ruled by a beneficent hand that not a hair of the hero's head is in real danger of being singed. The winds and waves are only indulged in their most angry moods in order to waft on the new Ulysses in triumph to his port. The great gods, with Venus at their head, combine against the hostile might of Neptune. Spirits of the wave and of the wind sport before his prow, and ease the shock of impinging billows. The stars in their courses fight only for the honour of guiding his bark onwards. So extreme a panegyric is enough in itself to provoke somewhat of reaction, and the bare facts brought to light in the course of more recent times have done much to reduce the hero of this modern Odyssey nearer to the ordinary level. The risk now to be feared may well be lest adequate justice fail to be done to the real character and exploits of the discoverer. Vasco may not have been a scientific seaman of the stamp of Columbus or Magelhaens. He may have lacked the powers of statesmanship and political construction which shone in Cortes. Still to his indomitable energy and courage we owe much of the most valuable of physical discoveries, and in him we have a representative of a certain type of character such as the annals of the world hardly enable us to match. For sheer bravery, though it may be of an animal kind, for strength of will, persistency of purpose, and those mixed qualities of heart and mind which make a man the king of a narrow realm, few names in history have higher claims than that of Vasco da Gama. These qualities are conspicuously brought to light in the authentic narrative of Vasco's three voyages for which we have to thank the Council of the Hakluyt Society. The work has been translated from the Portuguese of Gaspar Correa, forming part of the Lendas da India, and is entirely new to this country. For the present version, which is clearly and faithfully executed, we are indebted to the scholarly zeal and indefatigable labour of the Hon. Henry Stanley, who not long ago applied his rare and accurate knowledge of the Portuguese language and literature to bringing before us the interesting rule of Antonio de Morga in the Philippines.

Mr. Stanley has appended to the volume before us sundry documents in the original tongue hitherto unpublished, bearing upon Vasco's services and the dignities or rewards conferred upon him. In his slight prefatory notice of the Da Gama family and its greatest representative, Mr. Stanley omits all reference to the MS. record stated by many authorities to have been written by Vasco himself. From this silence we may infer either that he has no hope of meeting with such a document, or that the tradition of its existence rests on no authentic foundation. Its reality was believed in by Nicolas Antonio, Leon Pinelo, and Barbosa Machado, though it escaped the researches of Ramusio. Certain hints relative to it seem to have been furnished by Count d'Ericeira, in 1753, to the Spanish editor of Moreri. In a sale catalogue of 1844, according to the Nouvelle Biographie Générale, Gama's actual MS. was included by name; but no belief seems to have been placed in its authenticity. Far more authentic and really curious was the publication in 1838, by MM. Kopke and Paiva, of the Roteiro or log of Gama's first voyage, kept by a common seaman on board the ship of which Berrio was pilot, who has since been identified with Alvaro Velho, one of those who were charged with Gama's presents to the Zamorin of Calicut. We could have wished to see this document, which is quoted by Mr. Stanley, compared in detail with the narrative of Correa. Castanheda is believed to have based the greater part of his History on this precious Roteiro, which he bequeathed to the University of Coimbra. We are glad to think that no such literary doubts attach to the narrative of Gaspar Correa. Little indeed is known of the writer. He went to India, as he says in his prologue, when he was very young, sixteen years after India was discovered. That would be in 1514. The editors of his History, printed by the Academy of Lisbon, make him out to have sailed with Jorge de Mello in March, 1512, on the ground of a certain receipt signed by Correa, which, as Mr. Stanley remarks, is far from bearing out that assumption. Correa arrived in India fifteen years before Castanheda. While secretary to Alfonso d'Albuquerque, he got hold of a diary written by Joam Figueira, a priest who had accompanied Gama, and this, he says, gave him the desire to write down all that he could learn of the deeds done in India. He wrote the history of fifty-three years of the Portuguese exploits in India, leaving off with the government of Jorge Cabral. He mentions having written part of his work in 1561. The year of his death, which took place, according to Barbosa Machado, at Goa, is unknown, but his MS. was brought home by Miguel da Gama, son of D. Francisco, the second Count of Vidigueira, who left India February 21, 1583. Miguel's ship, the Reliquias, after encountering many storms, narrowly escaped burning in the Tagus. Correa's History, though mentioned with praise in the Bibliotheca Scriptorum Hispaniæ (Rome, 1672), and classed by the Lisbon Academy with that of Polybius, remained unpublished for nearly three hundred years. The writer, it is said, expressly intended it be a posthumous work, in order that he might speak freely the truth of all concerned. After his death, the corruption which had set in among the Portuguese rendered the truth still more unpalatable. Many passages too might have failed to pass the Inquisition, affixing as they did upon D. Joam II. and upon D. Manuel the stigma of Judaism and necromancy. In 1790 the Lisbon Academy determined upon printing the work, but could obtain no more than a transcript of part of the first volume. At length in 1836 the second, third, and fourth volumes, written in Correa's own hand, were deposited in the Library of the Archives by Senhor Dr. Antonio Nunes do Carvalho. No trace of the first volume could then be found. Some years since a copy (a little more recent than Correa's own time) was picked up in a confectioner's shop, and a second less perfect, apparently a century later, turned up in the Royal Library of Ajuda. By the aid of these transcripts, Correa's work was prepared for the press under the care of Senhor Rodrigo J. de Lima Felner, assisted by MM. Basto and Gomes Goes of the Archives. The translation now issued by the Hakluyt Society has been made from another copy unknown to the Lisbon editors, now belonging to the Duke of Gor, and formerly to the Count of Torrepalma. This copy appears oddly enough to be due to the same hand as that rescued from the confectioner, of which, however, a whole leaf had already gone to wrap up sweetmeats. Mr Stanley shows valid reasons for giving the preference to Correa's authority on points in which he differs from the other chroniclers who have treated of Gama's voyages to India. Correa came to India earlier than any of the other writers, and he alone it was who made use of the diary of the priest Joam Figueira. Castanheda went to the East in 1598. Damian de Goes did not visit India. Osorio takes almost all his facts from Goes, and Barros wrote much later. The reasons assigned by Correa why his work should be a posthumous one, together with the religious respect for truth which he professes, may weigh somewhat in his favour, added to which his narrative, where it differs from the rest, is more in accord with human nature and the laws of probability. The present editor has very properly given at the foot of the text the salient points from the narratives of Castanheda, Barros, and others, as well as the passages from the Lusiad which supply a kind of running eulogium in glowing verse upon the exploits of its hero. The Lisbon edition, Mr. Stanley points out, has been unjust to Correa, as well as inaccurate as to facts. It disputes his giving the chief credit of the voyage of Bartholomew Diaz to Joam Infante. Geography here supports Correa. The name of Rio do Infante, the term of the voyage in which those two fellow mariners doubled the Cape, shows that Correa had not exaggerated the position held by Joam Infante. If, too, there is any anachronism in the mention of espingardas or firelocks in Gama's voyage, the blame by no means lies with Correa, who only speaks of the use of crossbows.

Amongst the rare occasions on which Gaspar Correa refers to himself is an account of his being called upon by D. João de Castro, thirteenth Governor of Goa, in the year 1547, to paint a series of portraits, life-size, of all the former Governors. The reason for this commission was that Correa understood painting, and had seen all the Governors from D. Francisco d'Almeida downward. With the assistance of a native artist, Correa executed the task with great success, finishing with the portrait of D. João himself, armed as in a triumph, with a palm in his hand and a palm-leaf crown on his head. The autograph MS. of Correa exhibits his pen-and-ink sketches of these notables, which have been reproduced in the Lisbon edition. Mr. Stanley speaks of them as better than the portraits in Pedro Barreto de Resende's work, probably copied from the series at Goa, of which work a MS. copy is in the Sloane Collection in the British Museum.

In Mr. Stanley's short summary of the pedigree and family history of Vasco da Gama, no allusion is made to the popular tradition of a left-handed descent from Alphonso III. of Portugal. In the nobiliario of Antonio de Lima, the line of the Gamas is traced upwards to a knight who accompanied Giraldo the Fearless at the conquest of Evora in 1166. The date of Vasco's birth is a little uncertain, but the year 1469 is probably correct. It was not Vasco himself who originated the scheme of the Cape voyage to India. He was selected for the purpose by Don Manuel, to carry out a design devised by Prince Henry in furtherance of the attempt made by Bartholomew Diaz in 1487, and already matured by Don Joan II. Gama had before this distinguished himself by seizing certain French ships at anchor in port. Three ships were expressly built for Gama's service, with rigging and fittings of the same size and pattern, so that each might avail itself of the spars or stores of the other. Pilots who had sailed with Diaz were put on board. Vasco, as captain-major in the Sam Rafael, was permitted to nominate his brother Paulo second in command in the Sam Gabriel; the third ship, the Sam Miguel, being entrusted to Nicolas Coelho. Correa is made in the volume before us to date the departure of the ships "the day of Our Lady of March (the 25th)," whereas Barros and all later authorities fix it on July 8, "the day of Our Lady." The error, we apprehend, rests with the present editor, who has mistaken the ordinary ecclesiastical usage. Having a fair wind, the fleet made Santiago by July 28. Great pains had been taken by the King to have the course laid down, and all possible forecasts made that the incipient science of the day rendered possible. Abraham Zacut, a famous Jewish astronomer whose works are amongst the most curious productions of the age, had been specially called upon to exercise his art, which in the Royal mind, as well as in that of the narrator of the voyage, if not in that of the captain-major himself, was oddly mixed up with notions of astrology and necromancy. An astrolabe and other instruments for the purpose of navigation were furnished by this learned person to the pilots. Gama himself laid no claim to the use or understanding of these adjuncts to seamanship. His forte lay in choleric energy and fixity of will, and in courage pushed almost to rashness. He is seen at his most characteristic height at the crisis of the storm off the Cape, when the ships seemed on the point of foundering and the crews clamoured to put back. Gama clapped the mutinous pilot and master in irons, went on deck and flung into the sea the whole of the instruments of navigation. "See here, men," he exclaimed, "that you have neither master nor pilot, nor any one to show you the way from henceforward. And I do not require either master or pilot, nor any man who knows the art of navigation, because God alone is the master and pilot. Henceforward let no one speak of putting back, for know of a certainty that, if I do not find information of what I have come to seek, to Portugal I do not return."

On Christmas Day they sighted the coast of Natal, which Gama named after the feast of the Nativity. A similar instance of courage and presence of mind is told in Barros' narrative of the second voyage. The crew were in extreme terror at a violent agitation and boiling up of the sea off the Indian coast, when Vasco—who, Correa adds, was told the true cause by "a master in India was stained by not a few acts of cruelty, as well as by an amount of dissimulation for which his biographer puts forth the plea of necessity. With the slender forces at his command the tale of Portuguese prowess and success under his leadership reads almost like a page of romance. Dying on the eve of Christmas Day, 1524, the remains of the great captain found a temporary resting-place in the monastery of St. Antony, or, as some say, in the cathedral of Cochym, since laid in ruins by the mines of the East India Company in 1806. They were brought to Portugal in 1538, and deposited at Vidigueira, from which place the hero took his title of nobility. It is to the disgrace of the Portuguese populace that his tomb was violated in 1840. In a speech by Diego do Couto, made on the occasion of Vasco's portrait being set up in the Council Chamber of Goa, printed in the appendix, it is said that, as America was named after Vespucci, so India ought to have been named Agama, to preserve the name of its discoverer. The Council of the Hakluyt Society deserve our thanks for bringing to light this interesting memorial of his exploits.

ANOTHER young aspirant to poetical honours has appeared from Oxford. Mr. Courthope won his first laurels a few years ago with a prize poem which rose above the level of ordinary Newdigates, and gave some of his friends hopes that he might hereafter obtain distinction on a wider field. It was a poem of much grace, much delicacy, much (perhaps overmuch) sweetness. But of the divine fire, the flow of thought and feeling, the uncontrollable afflatus which in its intolerance of conventional restraints often plunges into licenses that are condemned by a maturer taste, of all the qualities which mark the advent of a real poet, not a trace was perceptible. In fact the excellences and defects were precisely those which characterize the poetry of a silver age. The more ambitious production which has just appeared presents qualities higher in degree, but the same in kind, and both explains and illustrates the defects which have prevented, and probably will prevent, its author from rising to a higher eminence. We are tempted to compare it with a slight jeu d'esprit written a few months ago by Mr. Crawley, who would have been a contemporary of Mr. Courthope's at Oxford. Mr. Crawley's poem was not wholly devoid of vigour and epigrammatic power, and was, in fact, a very creditable imitation of some of Byron's satirical pieces; but it was extremely rough and unfinished, and by no means worthy of the importance given to it by separate publication. Yet, though far inferior both in conception and execution to Mr. Courthope's poem, it presents some points of similarity which justify a comparison. Both the youthful critics tilt at the follies and the literary foibles of the age, both bid us return to models which, once universally popular, have nowadays fallen into comparative neglect and disrepute. Mr. Crawley, with amusing self-confidence, directed his lance against the chiefs of modern song, and in half a dozen couplets despatched the reputations of Mr. Tennyson and Mr. Browning. But there was in his Pegasus a good deal of the cart-horse breed, and the strokes which he dealt, though sometimes heavy, were blundering and wild. Mr. Courthope is a champion of a very different order. Daintily equipped in faultless armour, mounted on an ambling nag which has been trained to plant her steps with all the precision of the circus, he poises his slender lance, and when he adventures on literary warfare he prudently avoids the heavier weights, and deals destruction among the smaller fry. Learned ladies, lady-like poets, and the shrill maidens and matrons who declaim on the wrongs of their sex in "Woman's Rights Conventions"; Miss Cobbe, Jean Ingelow, Coventry Patmore, and "Mrs. Coe of Ohio"—all these in turn are pricked lightly by the point of his delicate shaft.

The title of the poem is at first sight a little enigmatical, but its key is to be found in Ariosto. In a charming canto (the 34th) of the Orlando Furioso, imitated by Pope at the end of his Rape of the Lock, Ariosto has described the moon as the receptacle and storehouse of all human vanities. This conception Mr. Courthope has taken up and very happily worked out. According to him, the gods, expelled by modern science both from Olympus and the regions of the air, have taken refuge in the "airless moon." To this region, drawn by some magnetical attraction, fly upwards all the foolish thoughts of mankind:—

> For Thought, that is of Silence born,
> Return to its own country craves,
> And from man's brain set free, forlorn,
> Flies wandering over hills and waves,
> Yet neither in the quiet corn
> Finds refuge, no, nor in the graves.
> The air with life seems all atune;
> At last it seeks the airless Moon.
>
> Behind each Thought the wingèd Words
> Mount in the livery of their master:
> Much swifter they than swiftest birds,
> But Thought than lightning flash is faster;
> So when they pass the air that girds
> Our planet, these endure disaster,
> And Space being lighter far than Sound,
> They sink to the infinite Profound.
>
> But the swift Thoughts, like Mercury shod,
> Now mounted to their goal, assume
> Their thinker's form, and to each god
> Make play, like spectres of the tomb:
> Pleased with a spectacle so odd,
> The Gods, who first were plunged in gloom,
> Made them a stage, and ever after
> Called it the Paradise of Laughter.

The world had grown very serious of late, and few merry thoughts had flown up to enliven the lunar stage, when one day a strange form appeared, which first stirred the gods to laughter, and then congealed with dismay the ichor in their veins. It was the Thought of Cornelia, a learned "Blue," who, discontented with the position of her sex, had summoned a Woman's Rights Convention, in which she proposed to lead a colony to the moon (where new methods might possibly prove single bliss to be compatible with a prolonged existence of the race), and meanwhile to found a Ladies' College, where the art of moon-flying and other lunar accomplishments might be studied. The gods, aghast at this projected invasion, send down Love, who boasts that he has fathomed the female mind, and is a match for all the arts of the sex. The infant god, equipped in his legendary armour, descends to earth, and "drops on Cornelia's college lawn." Here sleep overtakes him, he is discovered by Celia, a charming though somewhat mutinous student, and although his arrows do some execution among the maidens, he is finally seized by the stern Cornelia, mercilessly birched, and with ruffled plumes, bleeding back, and rueful mien, is sent ignominiously back to the moon. The gods, however, do not all despair. Venus flies to the cave of Momus, and is furnished by him with an idle dream, which she sends to earth. It enters the brain of Amadis, a youth born after his time, who dreams of the age of chivalry, and has long nourished a secret and hopeless passion for Celia. In emulation of Britomart he resolves to enter Cornelia's college in woman's attire. He is successful, and is able to indulge in a long discourse by moonlight with Celia, on the rival claims of Love and Knowledge; but his sex is finally betrayed by the loss of his chignon, and he is denounced by the mingled jealousy and patriotism of a fellow-student who has surprised the lovers. The offending couple are bound for sacrifice, and Cornelia and her band resolve to assume the offensive against their enemies the gods. The fourth and concluding canto describes the battle in mid space. The inventions of modern science incline the balance of victory towards the women, and the gods are flying in dismay, till Venus, hovering above the contending ranks, holds aloft the Shield of Vanity, forged for her by Vulcan, which with its wondrous mirror draws away the women to the extreme verge of the air, and then leaves them to fall into infinite space.

Such is shortly an outline of the plot. To apply serious criticism to such a thing of gauze and film would be to break a butterfly on the wheel. All the more searching tests by which we try genuine poetry here break down. Depth and truth of feeling, elevation of sentiment, the power of interpreting with accuracy and reproducing with fidelity the varying moods of nature and of man—these qualities are not to be looked for in a burlesque, and if found would be out of place. The burlesque moves in the region of moonshine and unreality; it does not affect to be original, it would be false to its purpose if it were profound. It plays the lightest part in the function of satire, the common subject-matter of which is furnished by the follies and weaknesses of mankind. The burlesque-writer is no Lucilius or Juvenal, to probe the ulcers of a diseased society. He can hardly even claim "to play round the heart." His butterfly wings skim the surface of life, and take good care not to drench their downy plumes in the deep and turbid stream of human passion. That the subject which Mr. Courthope has chosen admits of true, reverent, and genuinely poetical treatment, has been abundantly shown by the Princess; but we think that he has acted prudently in shirking the more serious aspects of the question with which he deals. We shudder to think of the result of the unequal combat if he were to meet in close quarters, we do not say Mr. Mill, but "Grotia," at whom he aims one playful dart, or the venerable lady who pours forth words of wisdom from the English lakes. The penalty which overtook his Cupid would prefigure his own, and fustigation—dire, ignominious fustigation—would be his inevitable fate.

If, however, a poem of this kind defies criticism of its subject-matter, so much the more strictly should it adhere to the laws of form. The language of a burlesque should be gay, graceful, and harmonious; its plot should be ingenious, compact, and consistent; its pleasantries should avoid grossness, and its personalities should never descend into vulgar abuse. Judged by these canons, Mr. Courthope's poem possesses great merit. We scarcely ever stumble upon an inharmonious line, the interest of the story is well sustained, the songs and episodical descriptions which are introduced are bright, graceful, and appropriate; and many of the renderings of Homer and of the modern Italian poets which are scattered here and there are extremely tasteful and delicate. We might choose many such passages by way of illustration. Here is a pretty description of the airless and soundless moon:—

> But stranger and more awful far
> Is that new heaven. for there no hum
> Of life is heard, no trade nor war
> Disturb the silence, all is dumb.
> Over the vast and voiceless star
> No momentary motions come;
> No wind, nor fire, nor snow, nor rain,
> Shall ever beat its face again.
>
> Or if at times some loosened rock
> Dash down the mountain, bound on bound.
> Crag meeting crag in thunder shock
> Of conflict, yet there comes no sound.
> Such battle seems the more to mock
> The melancholy peace around;
> As he who living passed in dread
> The voiceless gapings of the dead.*

In a short preface, which embodies much graceful and appreciative criticism, Mr. Courthope has discussed the laws and limits of the burlesque, and described the models which he has striven to follow. "My aim," he says, "has been to reproduce, to the best of my ability, in the epic style, the allegorical spirit which pervades the drama of Aristophanes, and it appeared to me that the best way of obtaining such a result was by uniting the classical method of Pope to the manner of the Italians." Mr. Courthope has called his poem an Allegorical Burlesque, and we have hitherto adopted his nomenclature. We are not sure, however, that it is quite appropriate. It may be that we are corrupted by the vulgarities of the modern stage, though we think that our view is borne out by the derivation of the word; but to us burlesque seems to imply the presence of an element of boisterous animality and riotous fun which is entirely absent from Mr. Courthope's poem. Only imagine his decorous muse being requested to dance the κόρδαξ or the "Cancan." She would faint at the bare suggestion.

However, call the poem by what name we will, the class of humorous literature to which it belongs, whose essence is to provoke mirth by the application to light and trivial subjects of characters, language, and imagery borrowed from a great and dignified theme, has been popular in all ages and countries, and is at least as old as the "Battle of the Frogs and Mice." The principles of humour on which it rests are so obvious, the motives to which it appeals are so universal, that it is amusing to find a fierce literary war raging in the seventeenth century on the question whether Tassoni was really the inventor of the mock-heroic. Tassoni did but cultivate with more exclusive care and greater finish a form of literature in which his countrymen have always excelled. The "Fescennin licentia," the Harlequin and Punch who have become household words throughout Europe, and the modern Carnival, form a continuous series of witnesses to the national love for satire and burlesque. The language of the modern Italians, deficient in rugged vigour, but light, flexible, and exquisitely harmonious, their acuteness of perception and their keen sense of the ludicrous—we may add, their incapability of appreciating the deeper and more spiritual forms of art—have rendered them unequalled in gay and graceful pleasantries, whether of prose or verse. The working of this vein has been sanctioned by the highest names in their literature, and Ariosto led the way in burlesquing the heroes of Carolingian romance. What an injurious influence this tendency has exercised over their character and history we need not here pause to point out. To genuine creation, whether in art or politics, the mocking spirit, "Der stets vernichtet," has always proved a consistent foe. Mr. Courthope instances the names of Aristophanes and Shakspeare by way of proof that burlesque is not incompatible with the very highest forms of art. But there are two points especially which raise Aristophanes above the level of ordinary burlesque writers—the genuine earnestness of his patriotism, and the tragic character of the times in which he lived. The irony of his relation to the times consists in the fact that his own irreverent jesting was the most powerful solvent of the old fabric of tradition and custom whose decay he was lamenting. This should be remembered by Mr. Courthope, who seems to sympathize with his hero's regret for chivalry, and breathes a ladylike sigh over the disappearance of loyalty and reverence from the modern industrial world. As for Shakspeare, he never treats his men and women as mere empty puppets. Sad and serious wisdom is often concealed in the utterances of his motley fools, and when he leads us into the region of Faery and Dream-land he never forgets, or allows us to forget, that the "pixie-led" crew in the enchanted island, or the lovers wandering at cross-purposes in the Athenian wood, are, after all, beings of like passions with ourselves and with himself. This, we suppose, if anything, constitutes the essential difference between wit and humour. The former deals exclusively with the external contradictions of things, and is light, heartless, superficial; the latter, whether genial with Shakspeare or grim with Carlyle, is full of tender sympathy with that which lies beneath.

In a later English generation the light growth of Italian wit and pleasantry found a more congenial soil at the Court of Anne. The "Rape of the Lock" is, and will probably long remain, the masterpiece of English mock-heroic. There was a time when this and similar productions were held to have reached the highest level which poetry was capable of attaining, when artifice was taken for art, and a poetry of "second intentions" had driven truth and nature out of the field. Those who entered the National Portrait Gallery, and surveyed the long monotonous rows of faces which represented the wits and statesmen of the "Augustan" age, each casting the same sidelong glance from his round blue eyes, each with the same smooth cheeks and complacent double-chin, each with the same unmeaning simper on his ruddy lips, making us wonder whether it was the painter or the perruquier who was responsible for their dull similarity, were able to some extent to realize the generation which delighted in patches and hoops, lapdogs and china, and which went into raptures over the last witticisms of the ingenious Mr. Pope. We are perhaps now rather in danger of running into the opposite extreme, and undervaluing neatness, grace, and finish. Italian literature has in the present day lost the place which it once held in the estimation of English men of letters. Two circumstances have mainly caused this result; the birth of a genuine and vigorous home-growth of poetry, and the sudden and marvellous outburst of German art. For one reader of Boccaccio or Ariosto there are now a hundred readers of Goethe, Schiller, and Heine. Dante is an exception. But Dante, now as ever, stands aloof from his lighter-hearted countrymen—stern, austere, unapproachable.

Mr. Courthope has evidently studied the lighter forms of Italian poetry long and lovingly, and if he can recall his countrymen to a sense of its great and real beauties, he will have done good service. The remarks which his preface suggested have led us too far away from his poem. We conclude by repeating our belief that in the department of literature which he has chosen he has achieved no inconsiderable success. We do not believe that this or any generation will be too serious to fail in appreciating the charm of "verses of society" such as those with which Praed delighted the last generation. If there is any one who on some fine summer's afternoon finds himself weary of dull debates on high topics of Church and State, and longs for a little "seasonable folly," let him take up the "Sports of the Moon." Trifling he may think it, but gayer or more graceful trifling he will hardly find.

ROPES OF SAND.*

We know not whether to congratulate or to condole with Mr. Lancaster upon his second novel. It is no offspring of a man of one idea; it is as different in plot, scene, and dramatis personæ from his Screw Loose as is possible to conceive. While the latter exhibited an intimate knowledge of the heavily mortgaged magnates of Slopeshire, the venue is here changed to the haunts and associations of colonial brokers in Bloomsbury. And if it is matter for congratulation that one who has charmed a limited circle of readers with such refined creations of neo-classical drama as Philoctetes and Orestes—poems, we admit, devoid of interest for the many, and therefore little calculated to win their author rapid or immediate fame—should have succeeded in catching one feature (with many the most popular) of the ordinary Dickensian novel, its photographic personification of out-of-the-way oddities, and its aim at representing to the life the quaint creatures that escape the broad-glancing eye of a superficial observer—then perhaps, for good or for evil, we ought to accord our congratulations to Mr. Lancaster on his Ropes of Sand. Its marketable value is greater than that of his Philoctetes. Its cleverness is patent. It will float on the tongues of the multitude at our seaside circulating libraries a name which, for far other merits, a select few had enshrined in their classical sanctums. It will instal among the ministers of a vulgar Baal one who, had he had patience, might have won a place beside the altar of a nobler and more lasting worship. We are far from undervaluing the novel of the period. It has its use and place in Victorian literature, and when it paints with covert satire the vices and follies of the hour, to attempt to stifle it were flat treason to sound wisdom and wholesome living. But we look for some alloy to the farrago of weakness, wickedness, and folly which a novelist dresses more gingerly than a satirist. We expect a mixture of better and worse, not "all worse"; and it must be owned that, in the leaven which Mr. Lancaster uses, the meaner and more sordid of human motives have an undue share. There is not even the pleasant diversity of delineated nature; all we have to contemplate is character of an almost always low calibre in scenes upon which no art has been bestowed to distract the reader from the unpleasant figures that move in front of them. In Ropes of Sand, as in A Screw Loose, there is too great a preponderance of the "worse" element. It is very readable, very clever; but no one who reads it can accept it as a true view of average life without renouncing at once that theory of the mixed character of human acts and motives which can alone excuse a man for not lapsing into misanthropy. Knaves, fools, and brutes are an ugly medley, needing a few more sets-off than the Bryan and Helen, and one or two other minor good genii, of the story that lies before us.

We have no idea that these preliminary remarks on Ropes of Sand can tend to spoil its popularity. Public taste sets in favour of this sort of book; and indeed there is sufficient merit in it of plot and construction for us to wish it a fair field and some favour, if its author would pledge himself to take another standard of aim and endeavour in his next. The story is on this wise. At its commencement a purse-proud twice-widower, Miles Sudgrove, residing in Bedford Square with a self-asserting, vulgar widowed daughter, and a modest son, Bryan, the hero of the tale, is about to buy the estate of Orpwood in Cornwall, and to found a family of landed gentry on wealth that has devolved on him through his brother, Turner Sudgrove's, intestacy. But the family attorney, Gilbert Noyes, represents in the first chapter the skull that was placed in ancient banquet-halls to admonish the reveller of the mutability of fortune. It is evident that Noyes holds the cards in his hands, though the millionaire cannot brook his hints to pause in his purchase, and sends the snubbed attorney home to the rodomontade loves of his daughter Selina and her foundling lover, Vincent Baker, in whom he divines the possible heir to Turner Sudgrove's will, if will there was. If, as the lawyer thought likely, a liaison of this Turner Sudgrove with one Melusina Baker resulted in issue, and that issue survived, Miles Sudgrove, the millionaire, would have to come down from his pedestal. But when commonplace Vincent Baker finds his mother by advertisement in Melly Knoblauch, the wife of a vulgar swindler, one instinctively feels that in them is not the solution of the enigma. The refined element of the tale, consisting of the loves of Bryan Sudgrove and Helen Rainbird, in which Clara Gow, a quondam playmate of Bryan's, and the wife of an elderly stockbroker, takes a very disinterested interest (seeing that she scarcely disguises a lingering affection for him herself), is more calculated to enlist the reader's sympathies in fortunes that run a risk through the mercenary spirit of Helen's stepmother, and the pompous arrogance of Bryan's father. This worthy, however, is fairly preoccupied by Lawyer Noyes, who fishes up a document of a nature to oust him from his possessions, if so be that his brother's illegitimate offspring should survive. But a quarrel between Vincent Baker and Selina sends off that interesting young cockney to Australia, verbi gratiâ, though really to a Cornish watering-place, just when his presence is most needed by his father-in-law expectant, and facilitates a staving-off of Mr. Sudgrove's Nemesis by his payment of 2,000*l.* per annum to the supposed chère amie of his late brother, instead of handing over the bulk of his fortune to her offspring. The question of making public the will of Turner Sudgrove is to be adjourned six months. Meanwhile trouble is brewing in Miles Sudgrove's family. His scheming widowed daughter is put upon the scent of her brother Bryan's love for Helen Rainbird, who is only the daughter of a monumental stonemason, by her ally and gossip, Aurelia Van, an odious old maid, whose qualifications for a spy or a scout Mr. Lancaster depicts in the chapter headed "Aurelia as Deer-foot." The chase after Bryan, though extravagant in conception, and the misadventures attending Aurelia whilst engaged in it, are the cream of the volume, if we can call that cream which is a mixture of the slang of cabbies and street-Arabs. She worms herself, however, into the Rainbird domicile, and by false names, insinuations, and anonymous letters, leaves a trail of mischief behind her that bodes ill to Bryan and Helen. Fresh from taking possession of Orpwood, elate with the organized and hired congratulations of an effusive tenantry, Sudgrove senior returns to town to hear from his daughter of the low match which his son and heir is contemplating. Bryan is turned out of doors, struck out of his father's will, and refused an asylum by the jealous husband of Clara Gow. The plot thickens; a swindling suitor of Mrs. Pipechick, Bryan's sister, works upon Stephen Gow's already prejudiced mind, and between this man and Aurelia Van such a misinterpretation is put upon a meeting betwixt Bryan and Mrs. Gow, that the latter has to leave her husband's roof and take refuge with a brother. After having disinherited Bryan and made heirs of Mrs. Pipechick and her infant, Alfred Ahasuerus, Mr. Sudgrove senior becomes daily more fussy and anxious-minded. His land-agent Podster and his lawyer Noyes discover that he is breaking, and that their joint interest lies in his successor being any other than Mrs. Pipechick. When the end comes, and the will in favour of this lady is read, they put in an old yellow document, which bids fair, with the help of their witnesses, to transfer the inheritance to Vincent Baker, who a day or two previously had been reconciled and united to Selina Noyes. But there is a screw loose in the chain of proof. Herein lies the secret of the plot, the point of which is the fact that Turner Sudgrove's child was a girl, not a boy, the daughter of Melusina, not of Melicent Baker, her sister. Who this girl was, and how she was able to establish Bryan by right of husbandship in the halls of Orpwood, we leave for our readers to pick out for themselves.

This slight sketch of the plot of Ropes of Sand—a title meant to indicate the frail tenure of the good fortune enjoyed by several of the principal actors—necessarily fails to comprehend the vulgar and repulsive underplot in which Dovey Snewing and his fidus Achates, Captain Womboys, play a chief part. The inveteracy of the former against the whole family of Comper, the scene towards the end of the third volume where he horsewhips a palsied cripple, and indeed all the passages in this history where he is introduced, strike us as excessively unnatural. The interludes which introduce us to Vincent Baker and Selina Noyes are much more conceivable, though farcical enough, and a laugh over the quarrel in the British Museum is irresistible. Baker in an evil hour has admitted that Selina is sometimes absent from his thoughts amid the pressure of business, and the admission bids fair to create a disruption:—

"I'm sure," he urged, in an ill-used voice, "I do everything customary and respectful, and try to be as near etiquette as possible, both in behaviour and feelings generally, and don't wish to shrink from anything usual from one in my predicament." "I won't have it called predicament," interposed Selina pettishly. "That's when a man gets into a ditch, or can't pay his creditors. Can you speak of my affection in that heartless manner?" "Well, then, in my present situation," corrected Baker feebly, rubbing his hair up. "That's what the housemaids say," frowned Selina yet more contemptuously.

And then follows a good deal more of these not unamusing amantium iræ. We must, however, protest against the outrageously overdrawn caricature of the Knoblauches, whose resources to "raise the wind" may be true enough to the life, but whose breakfast-table at Penshingle, where a pot of shaving soap with the lathery brush in it flanks the butter-dish, and the quartern loaf serves as pincushion for Mrs. Knoblauch's hair-pins is really an effort of imagination that is beneath laughter.

But though Mr. Lancaster is too apt to make caricatures of his characters, he often invests them with amusing and natural traits. Thus Mrs. Knoblauch, after the rupture between her son and the lawyer's daughter, attacks "vigorously, with true maternal instinct, her late prospective daughter-in-law, it being a beautiful provision of nature that a bare possibility of such a relationship subsisting between them is enough to engender mutual distrust in two delicate females' souls." Thus, too, in the conversation between worldly Mrs. Pipechick and her straitlaced father over Bryan's mésalliance, the former is represented as "only hoping that Bryan remembers his duty to his family and position enough to be only making a fool of this girl." Again, the same widow Pipechick, in a later chapter, plumes herself to her admirer Snewing upon her discharge of what was due to the defunct Davis Pipechick. "I did not go into greys till four months after the usual time." Pipechick was found to have muddled his affairs in a way peculiarly exasperating; but, says his widow, "I am thankful that I did not go a single crape flounce less deep on that account. If my lamented one could inspect the books of Messrs. Blots and Blower's mourning warehouse, I think that the heaviness of my account at that establishment might prove a melancholy consolation to my impalpable Davis." The characters, too, of Helen's foster-father, Sampson Rainbird, and his wife—"a dissolving-view kind of woman," too "airified" and languishing to tolerate her spouse and his gravestone talk for half an hour together—offer a field for portraiture of a minute kind, in which Mr. Lancaster has been by no means unsuccessful. His sketch of Aurelia Van, however, is most typical of his average style:—

Aurelia Van was elderly, hooknosed, and hunger-pinched in the face. She affected skimpy draperies and mangy furs; she was not unlike an old weather-beaten area-cat; and if you could have drowned and floated the same cat for a week between London Bridge and Greenwich Hospital, and then revived and dried the animal aforesaid, the likeness, we are inclined to think, would have gained rather than have suffered. She generally wore in her bonnet what seemed the cast-off battered flowers of some nymph in a pantomime two seasons back. Aurelia Van was moreover so tightly laced that her shoulders were always thrust most curiously forward, and raising either arm became a gymnastic impossibility. To conclude, she wore a light-brown front, sustained on her forehead by a moth-eaten narrow velvet band. She was very lean and wiry, and here the feline resemblance was again remarkably strong.

The salient points in this character bespeak an author who eyes everything with a predisposition to the grotesque, and who characterizes a church in the neighbourhood of Russell Square as "a church with a smoked nankeen and magenta east-window in alternate lozenges, and an inverted salt-cellar for its steeple." We cannot praise this addiction to the mannerism of Mr. Dickens. To do our author justice, he can be natural when he pleases. His sketch of Helen (in vol. i. p. 106–7) is fresh, graceful, and in good taste, as are also the conversations between her and her lover, particularly one in the beginning of volume iii. And we know from Mr. Lancaster's dramas, and the female creations in them, that he can portray with nice appreciation those purer and guileless natures which add grace to the reality as well as the romance of existence. But by deserting classical poetry for vulgarian novel-writing, he must know that he is forsaking character-drawing for caricature; abjuring the ideal, which it is ennobling, at any rate, to worship afar off, for the realistic, to which inferior minds can approach as closely and with as satisfactory results. If the transfer of his literary self is final, and if henceforth, instead of refined poetry, we are to expect from him nought but sketchy and somewhat slangy novels, let us counsel him to ballast his future efforts with a more distinct moral purpose, to vouchsafe a little more serious reflection and a little less screaming farce, and to remember that even books of the hour are the more pleasing for a background of agreeable description to set off the characters that move in front of the footlights.

GERMAN LITERATURE.*

THE fifth volume of Dr. Bastian's great work on the nations of Eastern Asia* is the third important book of travels in the Indian Archipelago which has appeared within the last few months. It is remarkable that not one of the voyagers by whom this interesting region has lately been described has visited it for its own sake. Shells attracted Mr. Bickmore; Mr. Wallace was allured by butterflies, birds of Paradise, and the Darwinian theory; Dr. Bastian's aims were ethnological, and his particular anxiety has been to collect every vestige of religious or mythological tradition. The proper study of mankind being man, his objects may be pronounced more worthy than those of his fellow-travellers. It is to be regretted that he is more than proportionately inferior to them in the craft of authorship. To mould the immense and heterogeneous mass of materials here accumulated into a satisfactory whole would have tasked the dexterity of the most consummate literary artist. Dr. Bastian heaps fact on fact, and illustration on illustration, without any attempt at harmonious arrangement. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that a great part of the volume is a simple transcript of his commonplace-book. Certain it is that much has found its way into the text which can originally have only been intended as annotation. Hence the most startling transitions, and the most singular juxtapositions of names and incidents derived from the most distant and unconnected regions of the earth. We must be content to regard Dr. Bastian's work as a mighty storehouse of abstruse Oriental knowledge, brought several degrees nearer to the European world than before, but still requiring much labour to render it available for general use. Sudden leaps from the Pandavas to Charles Martel, and from Buddha to Augustus, are not a little trying to the most tolerant reader. Some day, it may be hoped, a scholar as largely gifted with the faculty of organizing as Dr. Bastian is with that of accumulating materials will undertake to introduce order and harmony into this erudite chaos. Not until then will Dr. Bastian's services be appreciated as they deserve. As a record of personal experience this book is nothing; the author himself only appears rarely, and at distant intervals. It almost might have been written at home, could all the materials have been collected elsewhere than on the scene of the traveller's explorations. Much, however, was gathered on the spot, from oral intercourse with the wise men of the East; much else preserves the essence of numerous ancient, scarce, and valuable works. As a compiler, Dr. Bastian has undoubtedly rendered excellent service. Among the most lucid and interesting divisions of his own work should be named his account of the Jain religion, of the Mohammedan conquest of Java, and of the [illegible] of Japan.

* Reisen im Indischen Archipel. [illegible] Bastian. (Die Völker des östlichen Asien, Bd. 5.) Jena: [illegible]. London: Williams & Norgate.

Two minor books of travel *—one in Algeria, the other in the Spanish Peninsula—deserve favourable attention, both for their literary merits and their probable utility to other travellers. There is less medical and sanitary information in Herr Schneider's work than the title would have led us to anticipate, but the intending visitor to Algeria will find most things that he can desire to know intelligently set forth, and interspersed with picturesque descriptions. Professor Wattenbach's tour through Spain and Portugal embraced the most interesting portions of those countries. He seems to have found them less romantic than he expected, and frequently warns his readers that the sensible though slow progress of industry, wealth, and civilization has rendered many observations of earlier travellers inapplicable. His opinion of Spain and the Spaniards is by no means unfavourable; but he seems to prefer the Portuguese, remarking that, notwithstanding the miserable financial condition of Portugal, there is hardly a beggar in the country, and that the people have sufficient ingenuity to be their own photographers, the art in Spain being almost entirely in the hands of the French.

A history of the political dissensions of the United States, by H. Blankenburg†, is necessarily chiefly occupied with the transactions of the last few years. It may be recommended as a careful and, in the main, an impartial summary. It is of course hardly to be supposed that such a work would be undertaken at all by one whose sympathies were not to a certain extent enlisted on one side or other of the question, and the writer may be easily forgiven for the trifling bias he evinces in favour of the Democratic party.

Dr von Holtzendorff's thoughtful and well-reasoned work on the science of politics ‡ is divided into three books. In the first the nature of politics is investigated, and the possibility of a scientific treatment of the subject vindicated; in the second the relation of politics to morals is considered; the third discusses the philosophic ideal and practical ends of the State. All are distinguished by vigorous expression, close argument, and lofty morality.

A lively anonymous essay § contrasts Mr. J. S. Mill's theories of representative government, little to their advantage, with the conclusions deduced from observation of the actual working of the English Constitution by R. Gneist. Gneist, in the writer's view, is the practical statesman, Mill the doctrinaire. He convicts himself of enormous ignorance by describing Mr. Mill's important and responsible office at the India House as "a sinecure." It may be admitted that habitual concern with the affairs of a nation with whom the legislator can have no personal acquaintance is more conducive to theoretical than to practical soundness, and may very probably account for much that resembles inexperienced dilettantism in Mr. Mill.

F. Guth's work on political economy ‖ is strictly scientific in form and method, striving to cast some new light on the much-debated problems of production, profit, interest, and rent. Starting from the admitted doctrine that gold is a commodity like any other, A. Samter¶ advocates the establishment of a new paper currency, based, not upon the precious metals, but upon produce in general. By this scheme, the details of which would require much explanation to render them intelligible, the writer expects to secure the advantages, without the dangers, of an inconvertible currency, and to break down what he calls the aristocracy of capital.

"The Primitive History of the East," by Dr. M. Busch , is a most valuable compendium of the subject, which might with much advantage be translated into English. It is based on the manual by Lenormant, avoiding the religious and national prejudices which disfigure his work. French precision and German breadth have thus combined to produce a most admirable treatise, especially to be recommended as embodying the very latest results of investigation. The most interesting portion of the whole is that which treats of Egyptian history and archæology in connexion with the discoveries of M. Mariette, which have thrown so much light on the dynasty of the Shepherd Kings, and revealed the wholly unsuspected circumstance that Egypt was menaced, under the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties, by swarms of Celtic invaders from Libya—the same apparently as those whose sepulchres have recently been discovered in such numbers in the neighbourhood of Constantine.

A commentary on the Song of Solomon by Professor Noack†† could not well fail to be fertile in ingenious extravagances. The usual ascription of a merely erotic character to the poem is far too tame and commonplace for him; the traditional opinion of the Church is not sufficiently original. There must be a mystical interpretation, but it must be one of his own devising. Few will contest with him the credit of his discovery, according to which the Shunamite is Samaria, the royal lover Tirhakah the Ethiopian, and the subject of the piece the temporary reconquest of the Samaritan district from the Assyrians.

Dr. Caspari's commentary on Daniel *, on the other hand, is a very sober piece of criticism, consisting mainly of a close and accurate analysis. He endeavours to reconcile the authenticity of the book with its composition in the time of the Maccabees.

Dr. Scholten, of Leyden, is rapidly acquiring a name second to none as a critic of the New Testament. He possesses the erudition and boldness of the German scholars, without their drawbacks of perverse ingenuity and fanciful extravagance. In his recent work on the Gospels of Matthew and Mark† he investigates, with extraordinary acuteness and stupendous industry, the question of the mutual relation of these documents. From a laborious examination of all the passages which they have in common, he arrives at the conclusion that Mark was the earliest, except so far as Matthew in its present shape represents the λογια, or notes of discourses, originally collected by the Apostle. He considers Mark in its primitive shape to be nearly a contemporary record, and rather favours the tradition that it indirectly emanated from St. Peter. The attempt to distinguish between the original record and supposed additions is perhaps the least satisfactory portion of his work.

Two publications, by Professor Froschammer‡ and Dr. Schenkel§ attest the excitement created in Germany by the Papal Encyclical of 1864 and the announcement of a General Council. Froschammer, who has been deprived of his professorship for imputed heterodoxy, writes from the point of view of a liberal Catholic. There is little in his essay which would appear in any way extraordinary in a Protestant country; its importance depends entirely on the question how far it represents the views of his co-religionists. No Protestant writer could more emphatically assert the right and duty of every one to judge for himself in religious matters, or more decidedly contend for the authority of the State to regulate education and marriage. He bitterly deplores the extinction of the national and truly erudite school of Catholic theology represented in Germany by such writers as Mohler, and the contempt into which he believes the Church is falling in consequence. Dr. Schenkel is a prominent leader of the most liberal school of German Protestants, and the nature of his oratorical deliverances on the recent Papal utterances may be easily inferred. Two other lectures are employed in vindicating the fundamental principles of Protestantism against the retrograde party in the Protestant churches.

The younger Fichte ‖ is most honourably distinguished among German philosophers for sound good sense, impartial candour, and an abhorrence of sophistry and paradox. To this may be added such a disposition to bring philosophical methods to bear upon subjects of practical interest as ought to secure him a hearing even in these days, when impatience of the prevalent barrenness of metaphysical speculation has impelled the best minds to the pursuits of positive science. In the preface to his collected miscellaneous writings, the philosopher cannot avoid taking notice of this tendency, in which, so far as it involves the depreciation of metaphysical research as an idle logomachy, he is of course unable to see anything but a temporary aberration of the modern mind. Esprit de corps, it may be presumed, withholds him from acknowledging how largely it is due to the obscurity, the contentiousness, and the frequent insincerity of the philosophic guild. The only entirely new essay in these volumes, and perhaps the most remarkable, is a sort of philosophical autobiography, in which the writer details the course of his studies, and the effects severally produced on his mind by the great teachers of metaphysics, among whom he unhesitatingly assigns the first rank to Kant. Another very interesting essay investigates the problem of immortality, especially in connexion with the external evidence afforded by so-called preternatural appearances. The writer appears to conclude that these phenomena are in themselves subjective, but that they frequently originate in impressions produced upon the mind by something outside of the personality of the individual who experiences them. In another paper the phenomena of religious ecstacy are investigated, with especial reference to Mohammed, and some qualifications of Sprenger's depreciatory estimate of the Arabian prophet are suggested.

Julius Frauenstadt ¶ is a teacher of quite a different kind from Fichte—a clear-headed, practical man, without especial depth of feeling or strength of conviction, who follows the philosophical cur-
